But there has been nothing but confusion and hurrying to and fro for the last hour or two in Park Villas. Mr. and Mrs. Tabor do not go to church at all, but are sitting soberly and sadly in their darkened room. Mr. Huntingdon goes to church, as needs he must, accompanied by his wife; they still live in the house that was formerly Mr. Austin's; but they go with solemn faces and bent heads; they, too, have their blinds drawn down as for a death. The next house is Fanny's, and in it Fanny lies dead. She was quite well the day before—at least to all appearance. She had spent the afternoon with Ada, and had sat up rather later than usual, doing nothing in particular but dreaming away with some work upon her lap, and her favourite cat at her feet. In the morning the servants thought she was sleeping later than usual, but they did not like to disturb her. But when the breakfast-hour came and passed, they began to be uneasy. Puck, her favourite cat, began to be uneasy too. He was on terms of condescending familiarity with the kitchen cat, and would share her apartment for the night; but he was accustomed to breakfast with his mistress, and he roamed about the house for a time in search of her. At length he sat down before her bedroom door, and began to mew loudly and persistently.

"She'll hear him and wake up presently," said one and then the other of the girls. "She didn't go to bed so early as usual last night."

But she did not wake, and at length one of the maids went and knocked at her door.

No answer.

"The cat stood up on his hind-legs like a Christian," said the girl, "and put his paws against the door to push it open."

Then the girls got alarmed, and could not enter for fear, and one of them came running to Mrs. Tabor, and begged her to come and see if there was anything amiss. "Mistress might be in a fit," she thought. Mrs. Tabor hastened to return with her, telling her she ought to have entered at once.

The door was not locked, and after knocking once more and calling Fanny's name, Mrs. Tabor entered. She called once more, for she thought she was only sleeping; but there was still no answer, for the sleep was the sleep of death. Mrs. Tabor felt her pulse, and it was quite still; but she lay with a smile on her face and in an attitude of painless ease. Her favourite jumped upon the bed, and purring rubbed himself against her cheek.

Mrs. Tabor lost no time in sending for the doctor and for her husband. The latter hurried off for Philip and for Arthur Wildish, but the doctor speedily ascertained that no earthly power or skill could avail. She had been dead for several hours at least, and she had died quite painlessly. There was comfort to those who knew her in the thought. In all her innocent and happy life she had never been the means of inflicting the slightest suffering on any of God's creatures, and they felt that it was well that she was not called upon to suffer. She had simply awakened to the light of a Sabbath morning in heaven, perhaps from a dream of those who had gone before—the father and mother, and the little brothers and sisters, and all the old familiar faces she had been wont to summon round her, as she sat musing by her solitary hearth. There is truly none so solitary that they need die without being missed. The tears of Fanny's servants were enough to attest it. They would miss in her a gentle mistress, and a true friend, and they mourned accordingly. And not only in her little household, but throughout the whole circle Fanny was missed and mourned.

When her will was read—for she had had her way and made a will, with the approbation and connivance of Mr. Tabor—it was found that the whole of her fortune was left to Philip Tenterden. Ada, whom she loved, was rich, and did not require it. Neither did Beatrice, whom she did not love at all. And as for the rest, she believed that they would not survive her, or if they did, that they were safe in Philip's hands. Mr. Tabor would have had her divide it equally between Philip and her family; but he found that she was determined to have her own way in the matter. She was so hale and hearty, and so little liable to disturbance of any kind, that it seemed far from improbable that she would survive the most of them, certainly more than probable that she would survive her uncle and aunt, for whom Mr. Tabor pleaded.

Albert Lovejoy, whose sickly and unhappy life was still prolonged, was furious when he heard the contents of the will, uttering impotent threats that he would break it, and accusing both Philip and Mr. Tabor of using undue influence with Fanny; but he fumed and fretted in vain, for Mr. Tabor had taken care to be able to prove that everything had been done in the most straightforward and honourable manner as far as he himself was concerned, while Philip had had nothing to do with it whatever.

Albert's father and mother were glad that their son had not inherited the money, which would have been a curse in his hands, freeing him at once from the control which his poverty enabled them to impose on him. While in Philip's hands it was a blessing even to him. During a long and wasting sickness the latter supported Albert Lovejoy, ministering lavishly to all his bodily wants, thoughtful too for other wants than these. He it was who managed that his poor little wife should be near him at the last to give him what comfort and support she could, and that he should see as much of his children as pleased him and no more. Even his long discipline of sickness, and the Christian faith which came of it at length, did not change Albert Lovejoy into a saint. He was irritable, fretful, weak and wavering to the last; but there was nevertheless a change when his eyes would seek the door with longing for the hour of Philip's coming, when he could find strength in holding Philip's hand when the hour of his departure came.

Philip and Lucy are very rich, but there are those who doubt the fact, for, say these people, "They keep up no sort of style." But there are many who know it, and who perceive that, like our story, they are unfashionable enough to have a moral purpose, and that their motto, like its, might be—Not Wealth but Worth.

THE END.

HEART EMPTINESS.

BY THE REV. W. BOYD CARPENTER, M.A., VICAR OF ST. JAMES'S, HOLLOWAY.

Matt. xii. 43—45, and Luke xi. 24—26.

IT is impossible to overlook the immediate application of this parable. The unclean spirit, which had been cast out of the Jewish people through the exorcism of the affliction at Babylon, had returned, and returned sevenfold more wicked than before. No idol, it is true, overspread with gold glittered among the groves of Carmel; no image of Baal or Astarte shone from the corners of the streets of Jerusalem; but the spirit whence all that idol worship sprang was amongst them again. The idol cast down from the high places, and expelled from the Temple precincts, was set up in the hearts of the people. Their own religiousness, their own intellect, their own acts of charity, their own national privileges, these became the objects of their homage. To themselves, under various disguises, they offered incense and devoted their religious exercises. It was of himself the Pharisee thought when he dropped the costly contribution into the alms-box of the Temple; it was of himself he thought when he muttered his prayers at the conspicuous corners of the streets; it was of himself he thought when he recorded his gratitude within the sanctuary. That the old spirit was truly amongst them was our Lord's own accusation. They were, indeed, the descendants of those that slew the prophets of former days. The same hostility which drove forth to degradation and death the heroic seers who rebuked the idolatry and proclaimed the doom of their God-forgetting forefathers, broke forth in fury against the Prophet of Nazareth, whose stainless life rebuked their artfully-veiled vices, and whose heart-searching doctrines disclosed their hypocrisy. The spirit of indignant opposition to the teaching of Jesus Christ sometimes appals us as we read the Evangelical story. That men whose temperament might be called devout, and whose religious observances were orderly and punctual, should fling away the most ordinary restraints of morality, and plot together to take away an innocent life—that they should abandon themselves to the most reckless disregard of the very commandments they prided themselves in observing, may well startle us; but it is the proof that the spirit which hated heart-holiness, is among them in sevenfold more strength than of old.

This is no limited and local truth. The form in which Christ casts His words is one which warrants us in making their application general. The outcast spirit of evil will not tamely submit to his expulsion. From his very nature, as it seems, he cannot rest; and as he wanders through the unwatered solitudes, and finds no spot where repose is to be met, he thinks with regret of the house from which he has been driven forth. "I will return,"—and he does return; and not unfrequently, as the history of men and churches can show, to regain the sovereignty of the dwelling-place once more. The spirit of Paganism seemed to be driven out by the advancing power of the Christian Church; but while men slumbered and forgot their fealty to Christ their King, the alien spirit stole back and re-erected his throne in the more degraded, because profaner heathenism of mediæval superstitions.

The Reformation movement rose like the voice of Christ exorcising the evil spirit; but it has returned, and in bolder terms, and with more extravagant pretentiousness, it clamours for unreasoning submission to-day, and seeks once more to reduce into ignominious vassalage the mind, the conscience, the will of mankind.

The individual history of men reflects the same truth. Many a reformed man has accepted for a while the oppressive yoke of the decencies of life, only to find the wild passion throb more fiercely in his veins, till, lost to self-respect, he breaks through every barrier, and plunges madly into the vortex of vice, outraging society, and steeping himself in a worse degradation.

The caution is obvious. The foe which is expelled is not thereby exterminated; the enemy may be dislodged from the city, but he may yet repossess himself of it; he may storm it by successful assault, or he may regain it by stealing in at some unwatched entrance; and armed with reinforcements, overpower the garrison, and hoist his flag upon the ramparts once more.

An enemy thus strong, subtle, and persevering, we encounter in our spiritual conflicts. If St. Peter cautions us against his cruelty,—if St. Paul reminds us of his manifold devices, none the less surely does our Lord bid us watch against the persistent and obstinate resolution of an enemy that will not accept defeat, but in his most disastrous overtures refuses to abandon his purpose, and resolves with unswerving determination, "I will return to my house whence I came out."

It is a helpful and encouraging fact that while our Lord describes the wily movements and unfaltering purpose of a foe whose strength and cunning may excite our fear, He gives us a hint from which we may trace the true reason of his success.

That he should return will not surprise any who are acquainted with the devices of the wicked one; but that he should return and be successful in regaining his sway forms in one respect a difficulty; for he who has had the power to expel surely has the power to expel again, or at least to keep the fortress that that wicked one touch him not.

It is not necessary for us to fall back into any of the devious paths of speculative divinity, and to inquire to what extent theoretically man has power to keep the citadel of his being, the heart, against the assaults of his spiritual enemy; the inquiry is practical, but it is, I think, true both in theory and in practice that there is a point beyond which the foe of our souls cannot go. Tempt he may, coerce he cannot; and a practical fact within the experience of most of us is this—that there are very few men indeed who have not, at some time or another, repressed and partially subdued some vice or evil habit. A man, for example, finds that his passionate disposition alienates his customers and hinders his business; he instantly sets about a reformation, and in the majority of cases such a man will most certainly be successful. There are scores of men whose temptation to intemperance is strong and habitual, but from the very nature of their calling they are compelled for some protracted period to abstain from all stimulants; and they do so. To that extent then man has the power of controlling the vice. So far the evil spirit is expelled; but, alas! we all know too well how frequently the temper which has been controlled through the day behind the counter, breaks forth with fierce and cruel violence in the home; how the man whose craving for stimulants has been denied for long months, at their close rushes into the maddest dissipation and unrestrained self-indulgence. The evil has returned, and returned to victory.

Now there is a reason supplied by our Lord Himself for this easy triumph of evil. The spirit who returns finds the house unoccupied. There is trimness, neatness, the air of respectability about the house that was once the scene of foulness and of vice; but none of these afford any protection, for the house is "empty." In this one word we have the secret of every defeat, and the true cause of man's weakness in his encounters with the wicked one.

There is no real power of resistance in an empty heart.

It is the most simple thought in the world that the empty vessel is the most readily broken; and as the unsupported sides of the most exquisite porcelain vase give way when crushed in packing, so most surely the empty heart will not bear the weight of any opposition.

The experience of sorrow teaches us the same. When bereavement has fallen, and the spirit begins to know its ever-aching bitterness, and feels the great void which loss has made in the heart, then it is that the petty unkindnesses and cold thoughtlessnesses of our neighbours are felt. It needs but little to make the mourner's heart give way.

This is the key furnished by Christ Himself.

The weakness of the Jewish Church was its emptiness. With all the decent drapery of religious ordinances, with all their elaborate punctuality and intricate care for the minor matters of the law, the weightier matters which touched the spirit were forgotten, and the starved heart was left empty of that which alone could furnish vigour against the attack of the enemy. "I know you," is the Saviour's testimony, "that ye have not the love of God in you." He echoed the same witness in more awful tones when He cried, His last warning within the sacred precincts, "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate." It was desolate, because they would not welcome the Redeemer there. It was an easy and open prey to the fiercer spirit of evil, because their hearts were untenanted by that love which was the first and essential principle of God's law.

The truth is of universal application. Not of the Jew alone, but of every heart which is empty it is true that it is ready to be invaded and easy to be overcome. It has been recognised by the social wisdom of men, that unemployed energy is fatal to a nation's well-being, for idleness proverbially disposes men to evil.

But it is not simply in this sense that the heart which is empty becomes an easy conquest. The empty heart may be, in one respect, fully occupied. Business cares may be surging through the mind, eager hopes may be gilding the dreams of fancy, fond wishes waking the desire; the life may be full of occupation, the incessant stream of engagements may leave little leisure for the temptations which try the solitary; yet the heart may be exposed to the very danger which arises from its own emptiness. The truth is, that with all its weakness and its darkness, there is a native dignity about the heart of man which never wholly ceases. In his most eager pursuit of pleasure, there are moments in which man realises the utter unworthiness of the objects on which he spends the splendid energies of his being. In the glow of success and prosperity, the satisfaction of the soul seems complete; but after a while, the glow fades out of it, and the dissatisfied heart asserts its claim for higher food than these vain joys or fading glories. There are grand capacities and hidden depths of the spirit of man which are all untouched by mere worldly pursuits and enjoyments; for we are spiritual, and we must have spiritual sustenance. Thus, though the heart be filled with the world, it is really empty; for the heart is greater than the world, and the world cannot truly fill it. It may heat the imagination, it may fire the fancy; it can pervert the judgment, and distort the powers of perception; but it does not and it cannot satisfy the heart. The cry of the soul which has tried and tested all will still be, as it has ever been, "All is less than nothing and vanity! Vanity—emptiness." Hence it is that the powers with which the world can supply the heart are not protective, for they do not fill the void, and the busy man of the world may be as liable to the danger of the returning spirit of evil, which he fancies he has vanquished, as the man whose days are wholly unemployed.

The true moral of this human weakness and dissatisfaction points us to Him who alone can satisfy our heart with good things, and make us strong and lusty as the eagle. He who made the heart alone can satisfy it; and He who made it is He who stands knocking and seeking an entrance there. "I will come into him, and sup with him, and he with me." Receiving Him, we receive One who can take from our great foe all the armour wherein he trusted, thrust him forth from our hearts, and fill us with holy joy and peace. Nothing short of His love can expel the evil from the soul, and nothing short of the love of Him can fill the heart so that no strange or familiar spirit of ill shall find an abiding welcome there; for no evil has any right of shelter in those whom Divine love has made temples of the Holy Ghost.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART V. CHRIST USING THE MEANS OF GRACE.

Scripture to be read—Parts of Luke iv., Matt. iii., v.

BEGIN by asking the children Christ's character. Refer to His increasing in wisdom from a child: called the "Holy Child Jesus" (Acts iv. 27). When tried before Pilate found to be without fault (Luke xxiii. 4); when tempted by Satan, resisted the devil—so, altogether, was "holy, harmless, separate from sinners" (Heb. vii. 26). Ask the difference between Christ's nature and ours; whence did we derive our evil nature; had Christ original sin? No, because conceived of the Holy Ghost (Matt. i. 20). Ask what means of grace God has given us. Spoke of prayer in last lesson—to-day speak of the Scriptures, the Sacraments, and Public Worship.

I. THE SCRIPTURES. (Read Luke iv. 14—22.) (1) Remind of past lesson to show Christ's eagerness to learn while a boy of twelve. Why did He go to the doctors? Because they learned in God's law.

Now when grown begins to teach the same. Describe the scene of this His first sermon; the little village synagogue of Nazareth; His mother and old playmates present; the Old Testament, according to Jewish custom, read as the lessons for the day; Jesus standing up to read, sitting down to explain (see Acts xiii. 15, where Paul asked to do the same). Our Lord's words showed that He knew the fulfilment of prophecy from the Old Testament Scriptures. Had not merely read them as a task, but to find out meaning. (2) Again, remind of Christ's temptation. How was each temptation met? Here can see the application of the Bible to our wants and temptations. So David hid God's word in his heart that he might not sin (Ps. cxix. 11); Joshua was bidden to meditate day and night in the book of the law (Josh. i. 8) that he might guide the people right; Timothy was thereby made wise unto salvation (2 Tim. ii. 15). The remembrance of the second commandment prevented the three children from worshipping the golden image (Dan. iii. 18). (3) Read Matt. v. 21. Ask which commandment is referred to, and what it forbids? Show from this, and also from verses 28, 34, &c., how our Lord unfolds the spiritual meaning of the Bible. Not merely the actual words are to be followed, but the principle contained in them.

Application. Point out the way to study the Scriptures (John v. 39), not as a task, but as testifying to Christ, and bearing upon every-day life. If thus read, studied, applied, will make us, like Christ, to grow in grace.

II. The sacraments. Ask what are the two sacraments of the Gospel? (1) What did baptism take the place of? When was circumcision instituted, and for what nation (Gen. xvii. 10)? When was baptism commanded, and for what nations (Matt. xxviii. 19)? Explain that "nations" is the same word as "Gentiles," and show that Christ was circumcised as a Jew (Luke ii. 21), and baptised as a Gentile. Now read Matt. iii. 13—17. Describe the scene: John, with his long hair and rough dress, resting after his day's work of preaching and baptising; Christ asking for baptism; John's remonstrance as being unworthy; Christ's reply; the heavens opening; the descent of the Holy Ghost as a dove—emblem of purity; the Voice from heaven declaring His Sonship. Ask why Christ was baptised. As circumcision, so baptism receives into covenant with God—so a help to fulfil all righteousness. Did Christ need to be brought into covenant? But baptised as example to us. As an illustration of a covenant refer to ceremonial of admitting a person to the freedom of a city—name entered on books, &c.—gives rights of citizenship. (2) Ask what was the first and chief annual feast of the Jews; of what did the Passover remind them, and what did it typify? If time allows, point out the Lamb, unleavened bread, bitter herbs, as typical of Christ, His sinlessness, sufferings, &c. But as only Jews came out of Egypt Christ appointed new feast for all to remember His death. (Read Mark xiv. 22—25 for account of institution of the Lord's Supper.) From 1 Cor. xi. 26 show the object of it—to show forth the Lord's death till He come. Application. If Christ appointed, partook of, and commanded these ordinances, our duty plain—to use them as means of grace.

III. Public worship. Ask when Christ was first taken to the Temple. (Read Luke ii. 22—24.) His mother returned thanks, and He was publicly presented to the Lord. This was when forty days old. So His parents attended to the religious duties prescribed by the law, and He was trained to the same. His visit to the Temple at twelve years old was the next occasion recorded. When grown up, and began public ministry, always attended the synagogue worship on the Sabbath, and also attended the great feasts of the Jews. Refer to John ii. 13, v. 1, vii. 2, xiii. 1, &c.; and from John x. 22 show that He attended the Feast of the Dedication of the Temple, only of man's appointment. He attended these feasts (a) for public worship of God, (b) to set us an example, (c) to do good. Took advantage of presence of people in synagogue to work miracles, and in the Temple to teach.

Application. Hence see that attendance at public worship is a duty (Heb. x. 25), and also should be a pleasure (Ps. cxxi. 1). The benefits—communion with God, hearing His word, united prayer and worship, by all which are trained for heaven.

Questions to be answered.

1. What are the four principal means of grace?
2. Show three ways in which Christ used the Scriptures.
3. What are the two sacraments? When was each appointed, and what did it take the place of?
4. Why was Christ baptised? Describe the circumstances.
5. Give an account of the institution of the Lord's Supper.
6. Show that Christ attended public worship. Why should we do so?

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

A GREAT ship, homeward bound from the Cape, was speeding gaily over tranquil waters, that scarce were ruffled by the light breeze of a glad spring day—there was sunshine in the blue sky overhead—sunshine on the bluer sea below—but the brightness of life's own morning was on the cloudless face of Colonel Dysart's daughter, as she leant over the side of the vessel and looked out upon the shoreless ocean with a fixed, abstracted gaze. He was watching her, with an expression half amused, half wondering on his thin, refined face, as he lay on the deck propped up by a heap of cushions, and at last raising himself on his elbow he called to her, with a slightly mocking tone in his voice, "Una! I have come to the conclusion that you must be composing an epic poem at the very least; one half-hour by my watch you have been gazing immovably over the sea, without so much as stirring an eyelash, and I never in my life before saw you quiet so long. I tremble for the result. How many cantos shall I be condemned to hear?"

She turned round with a laughing light in her great brown eyes as she answered merrily, "Not one—for the present: I thought you knew by this time that I can only compose poems by rushing about frantically, knocking over the furniture and tearing my hair when the rhymes will not come right."

"What were you doing, then?"

"Thinking."

"Only thinking! it must have been on some very important subject surely to make you look so wonderfully serious."

"So it was," she said, a sudden gravity replacing the mirthful sunshine on her mobile face. "That very strange woman, Miss Amherst, made an attack on me last night which startled me extremely, and what she said was so very suggestive that I was trying to work it out in my own mind as it affected myself. Let me tell you all about it, father mine, I should like to have your opinion," and bounding away from her place she flung herself down on the deck beside her father.

Colonel Dysart looked at her with an expression of intense tenderness, which contrasted strangely with his habitual air of languor and indifference. She was all he had in the world—all that remained to him of the one love of his life. He was coming home invalided from the Cape, where he had been in command of an inland military station for many years, and where, greatly to the surprise of the London world, the clever and talented Lady Mary Molyneux went with him as his wife. No one would have supposed her to be a person likely to make a romantic love match, for she was very accomplished and intellectual, and somewhat strong minded; however, she turned her back on a host of adorers to follow the fortunes of handsome Harry Dysart in his distant exile, and there she remained, buried alive as her friends said, till her brave devoted life came to an end, when her only child Una was about seventeen. Colonel Dysart's post was in a very remote and lonely part of the country, where there were no European residents, but although Una grew up like a wild rose in some woodland solitude, with all the influences of Nature free and obstructed round her, she had the advantage of the very high culture which Lady Mary's rare mental gifts enabled her to bestow on her daughter. Una's rich, lavishly-endowed nature had responded readily to the really noble training she received, and she was now, at nineteen, a pure, high-minded girl, with generous sympathies and refined, artistic tastes—spirituelle, to use the untranslatable French term, rather than brilliant, cherishing an almost fierce scorn of all that was vile or mean, and a no less vehement appreciation of goodness in any shape. She had lived in such complete seclusion that she knew nothing whatever of the world, on which she was now for the first time entering, and where it was very certain her ardent, passionate temperament and eager impulsiveness would expose her to many difficulties and dangers which minds of a lower type might escape altogether. Una Dysart had a charming face, with an expression of mingled brightness and sweetness which gave her a beauty peculiarly her own, and her voice, both in singing and speaking, was singularly attractive, very soft and melodious, with a pathetic undertone, which seemed to tell of depths in her nature as yet unknown even to herself.

It was on her account that Colonel Dysart decided to give up his appointment and return to England, for he felt that his health was failing, and he had little doubt that if his daughter mixed for a time in the society from which he had so long been exiled she would soon make a home for herself, where he might leave her sheltered and beloved when he himself could watch over her no more. Una knew nothing of these gloomy forebodings, however; light of heart as a lark in the sunshiny morning, she had not a care or a fear in the world, but looked out with eager eyes to the unknown years, impatient to see them yield up the glorious possibilities with which they were fraught in the dreams of her confident youth.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"He was watching her"—p. 440.

"Well, child," said Colonel Dysart, as she nestled close at his side, "what did Miss Amherst say to plunge you in such profound meditations? I fancy a revelation from the days of her youth might be rather exciting; I have a strong conviction that some strange history lies hid behind the determined calm of that woman's face."

"You would not have thought her calm if you had seen her last night. It happened after you had gone to your cabin; I was looking out over the sea, which was all crimson and opal with the last glow of the sunset, and singing to myself so low that I thought no one could hear me. Miss Amherst was sitting near, quite still and silent. Greatly to my surprise up came Mr. Cunliffe, that stiff old Australian judge, and revealed to me that he had actually a soul for music, whereas I had doubted if he possessed a soul at all. He solemnly asked me to do him the favour of singing that oldest of hackneyed old songs 'Oft in the stilly night,' supposing I knew it. Happily I remembered how our sentimental bandmaster used to groan it out, over and over again, so I sang it at once to the best of my ability, and pleased him so much that he further asked if I knew any other song of a similar description. I thought of 'Tears, idle tears,' which expresses the same idea so much more beautifully, and which I set to music myself, and I sang it forthwith."

"The saddest little poem that ever was written," said Colonel Dysart.

"So poor Miss Amherst seemed to think," said Una. "I noticed that while I was singing both songs she sat quite motionless with her head bent down on her hands, but when I came to that last line, 'Oh, death in life, the days that are no more,' she suddenly started from her seat, with her face absolutely convulsed by some strange inward agony, and darted away to the other side of the ship, where I saw her grasp hold of the railing and lean down over it, seeming actually torn with sobs."

"Poor woman, I should have thought she was past the age for such keen feeling; she must be fifty at least."

"She has not lost the power of suffering, anyhow. Of course I was dismayed to find I had produced such an effect, and Mr. Cunliffe was evidently appalled at the prospect of a scene, for he departed as fast as his dignity would allow him, and left me alone with Miss Amherst. I went to her at once, and told her it would grieve me very much if I had been so unfortunate as to cause her any pain by the songs I had chosen. For a moment she could not speak, and then with a perfect passion of grief she exclaimed, 'Pain! it is agony! that cruellest agony, a vain remorse, which comes to me from the thought of the days that are no more!' Then she suddenly turned towards me and caught hold of both my hands, while she fixed her eyes, that looked like two deep wells of infinite sadness, full upon mine, and said in a low hoarse voice, 'Una Dysart, let my bitter experience bear fruit at least for you—let it teach you now, in the spring-time of your youth, while it may still avail you, the lesson which most human beings learn at the gate of the grave alone. Remember that you have one life only—only one life to make or mar; it is given you as a prey; you may crown it with joy, or poison it with anguish to yourself and to others; you may so deal with it, while the power of choice is still yours, that it may lead you in honour and happiness safe to the portals of Paradise, or you may so wreck it by error and fatal mistakes, that you will doubt if even from its last sad hours you can wring Heaven's pardon or pity,—but however you act by it, Una, remember, you have one life only. If you ruin it, blight it, waste it away like precious waters poured out on the sands of the desert, you can never have another wherewith to try and redeem its unutterable loss—one chance, one trial, one life alone you can have, and it is all in your own hand still; you can make it what you please. I charge you to be wise in time, look to it, while yet it lies untouched, untainted before you; determine even now what aim and meaning you will give to it, that whatever may be the outward circumstances you cannot control, at least in essence and spirit it may be bright and blest. Take care, Una, take care that you do not make of your one life an utter and a hopeless wreck as I have made of mine!' and when she had said all this she flung my hands away from her, and rushed down to her cabin, where she shut herself in for the night. Do you know she left me feeling positively awed by her words, for though they sound rather melodramatic as I repeat them, she was most thoroughly in earnest, and said, I am sure, nothing more than she felt."

"I can quite believe it; no doubt she wrung her experience out of the depths of some miserable past, but it was certainly a startling address to make to a young girl like you. It is strange, although, of course, it is the simplest truism, that we have one life only, yet it never struck me exactly in that light before. She is quite right, however; if in early youth we were to realise the fact that we have but one existence given us for weal or woe, we should be somewhat more careful not to ruin it by errors and weakness as most of us do. Well, Una love, it is not too late for you, though it is for me as well as for Miss Amherst: you must profit by her warning."

"I mean to do so," said Una, turning round and lifting her clear sunny eyes full on her father's face. "It is a glorious thought to me, that life is still all in my hands; to a great extent I can make of it what I will. I was thinking out the question with all my might when you spoke."

"No wonder you were abstracted then. Did you come to any conclusion?" he asked, looking down half sadly on her bright animated face.

"Yes, I did. I dare say you will laugh at me, cynic as you are, but I have made up my mind, and I am fully determined——"

"Determined to be as happy as you possibly can, I suppose; that is really the gist of all human desires, first and last, I am afraid."

"Yes, I do want to be happy. I am not in the least so enamoured of self-denial and suffering as some good people are. I want to be as happy as I can, but I want something more. I want my life to be noble and great, at least in its aims. I will not have it all given up to the commonplace selfishness of seeking only personal happiness, I will have it a grand strong life that shall leave its mark for good in the world, and be of value to others as well as myself—a life men shall honour and bless—and if along with this highest purpose I can compass my own peace and enjoyment as well, why so much the better."

"A 'vaulting ambition' indeed," said Colonel Dysart with a shake of the head.

"Which you think will 'o'erleap itself?' You do not trust me, you sceptical father; you doubt my powers and my firmness. Very well, sir; you shall see," and she nodded her head at him with saucy defiance.

"I shall not see, child, as the problem can only be solved at the end of your life, which it is to be hoped will be prolonged very far beyond mine; there will be no one to remind you of these magnificent plans, which I believe you will have forgotten long before the time comes to judge how far you have carried them out."

"I shall not let myself forget; I will be a witness against myself if I do fail in my purpose. Look here" (and she took from her pocket a little gold-rimmed book furnished with lock and key), "this is my most cherished notebook, and the paper is so prepared that anything written in it cannot be effaced; it shall keep the record of my present life-schemes till the day comes to test their fulfilment;" and with a determined air and steady hand she wrote a few lines in the book, then closed and locked it, and starting to her feet she took the key and flung it far away into the sea. "Now, father, you see at least for the present I mean what I say; I have written on a page of this book the words: 'I have one life only,' and below I have said very distinctly what I now mean that life to be. I shall keep the book in the little iron case where I have my mother's diamonds and all my other valuables, and when I am as old as Miss Amherst, if I live as long, or at the end of my life, whenever it may come, I shall break it open and look at that record, and know whether the end is success or failure."

Colonel Dysart looked up at her as she stood beside him, her eyes sparkling with the bold daring and confidence of youth, and said rather gravely, "I doubt if you are wise to keep such a record, Una; but I believe Miss Amherst's warning turned almost entirely on the question of happiness. She felt it was still possible for your one life to be as joyful as her own appears to have been wretched; if you accomplish that part of your programme I shall be very well content, without your attaining to any of this greatness and grandeur with which you wish to endow your existence."

"But I shall not!" said Una, with a proud flashing smile. "Some writers say that this world, of which I known nothing, is a very pitiful place; where there may be a certain glory in merely hating everything narrow and mean, and above all—false, as utterly as I do; so perhaps it will not be very difficult after all to make this little book a true prophet. I shall go and lock it up at once, in the safe hiding-place, where it will stay all the years I have to live;" and she darted away, without so much as a shadow of doubt or fear on her bright young face.

CHAPTER II.

No longer a swift ship, speeding under burning African skies, over seas sparkling with phosphorescent light, but a quiet English country house is the scene where Colonel Dysart and his daughter next appear. They had dropped, as Una expressed it, into a ready-made home which belonged to the "weird woman"—by which name she always designated Miss Amherst, after the night when she had startled her into so sudden an appreciation of the value of the bright young life which would never be renewed, if by error or mischance she marred its golden promise. And truly there did seem to be something weird and strange about Catherine Amherst and her unknown history. The Dysarts had first met her at the house of the Governor of Cape Town, with whom she had been spending a few days on her way home from the Mauritius. He had known some of her connections in England, but of herself he only knew that she was the sole daughter of the late Mr. Amherst, of Vale House, in Northangleshire, and that for some unexplained reason she had left her friends and her home twenty years before, and gone out to the Mauritius, where she had remained ever since. She was a striking-looking person, still handsome for her age, in spite of the pallor which made her seem almost ghastly, and the traces of intense suffering, which the impenetrable calm of her face could not completely mask, while her eyes, deep-set and piercing, had an abstracted look, as if she were for ever searching back into the past, for some lost hope by which she might still hold on to life and endure it to the end.

In spite of her excessive reserve, Una Dysart was attracted by her, for she seemed to have a wonderful power of sympathy, even with one so much younger than herself, and the acquaintance ripened into something like friendship when they met on board ship, and made the voyage together to England.

Una honestly confessed to her father that she felt no small curiosity as to Miss Amherst's history, and that she did her very best to find it out (but in this she failed miserably); all she could discover was the fact that the weird woman's only brother had died unmarried a short time previously, and that she had succeeded to the family property, and been compelled, in consequence, to come to England to arrange her affairs. She told the Dysarts, however, that she did not mean to remain a day longer than she could help in her native country, and that she should endeavour to find a tenant for Vale House, without visiting it personally at all, if possible.

Colonel Dysart wished to find a home for himself in a good neighbourhood, where Una could have pleasant society, and from Miss Amherst's description of her house, it struck him that it would be precisely the sort of place to suit him. His daughter was of the same opinion; and before they all landed at Southampton it was decided that the Dysarts were to go at once to Vale House, where Mr. Amherst's servants still remained, and if they felt pleased with the whole place and establishment, they were to communicate with Miss Amherst, who remained in London, and to enter into possession at once.

They both thought it very strange that she should refuse to accompany them to her old home, even for a few days; but when Una persisted in making use of all sorts of arguments to induce her to go with them, she at last turned round upon her, almost fiercely, and said, "Una, I would rather go down into those waves, and let them close over my head, and so make an end of all feeling, than I would go back to that house, even for one half-hour."

After such a speech there was, of course, no more to be said, and when Una Dysart took leave of Miss Amherst in London, it was with the firm conviction that they would never meet again. Little did she dream how strangely her life would be mixed up with that of the "weird woman."

Whatever Miss Amherst might think of it, there could be no question that Vale House suited the Dysarts exactly. It was a large, old-fashioned, strongly-built house, with handsomely furnished rooms, and deliciously ancient gardens and orchards, that would have horrified a modern gardener in their confused, overgrown condition, but which enchanted Una by the profusion of their sweet-scented flowers and tangled bushes, and gnarled, bending trees, that made deep shade over grassy walks and moss-grown fountains. They had only been domiciled in this pleasant spot a few days, but already they felt at home, and Una tormented her somewhat indolent father with impatient entreaties that he would fill his stables with the horses he promised to provide in due course, in order that she might go out beyond the grounds, to which as yet she had been limited, and explore the neighbourhood. She would have been well content to have commenced her researches with no better help than her own little dainty feet, on which she was now dancing round the room, as an outlet to her suppressed activity, while she told her father she could not possibly remain within the gates any longer.

Colonel Dysart's natural want of energy and supineness, increased by really bad health, were, however, proof against her efforts to drag him out on a voyage of discovery.

"The riding-horses will be here next week, and the pony-carriage, too; but till then you must go alone, Una, if you go at all; and I do not know in the least how far the conventional proprieties would be violated by such a proceeding on the part of a young person of your years. I must find some highly-decorous old lady to give me instructions on the manners and customs of respectable young women in this country."

"Oh dear! may such an old lady never be found. Anyhow, I do hope nothing will prevent me roaming about alone—at least in the morning, when I know the place and the people a little better; it would take away half the pleasure of life if I could not do that."

As she spoke the old butler, from whom she had already obtained a good deal of information about the neighbourhood, appeared at the door, and announced "Mr. and Miss Crichton, and Mr. Hervey Crichton." Thanks to the revelations of the antiquated functionary, who had been major-domo at Vale House for thirty years, the Dysarts knew that their visitors were the rector of Valehead—the parish in which they were now living—and his half-brother and sister.

Una cast a furtive glance of dismay towards her father as the clergyman walked slowly forward, for a man of more forbidding aspect it would not have been easy to see. He was tall and gaunt, his black clothes hanging loosely on his spare figure, and his countenance, not without a grandeur in the massive, strongly-marked features, was singularly unprepossessing, from the excessive coldness and severity of his expression. His brother and sister, the children of a different mother, were as unlike him as possible, and many years younger. Hervey Crichton, by his manner and bearing unmistakably a soldier, was a fine-looking man of five-and-twenty, and the young girl, who with no small timidity kept close to his side, was at least five years younger.

As Una's eyes fell upon Lilith Crichton, she was so much struck by her appearance that for a moment she almost forgot to welcome her. She was extremely delicate and fragile-looking, her complexion dazzlingly fair, her eyes blue as the morning sky, and the soft masses of her long hair hanging, like a sunny mist, round her sweet pure face. She reminded Una irresistibly of a snowdrop, as she hung down her pretty head with a shy grace; and it was so impossible to stand on ceremony with one so gentle and shrinking, that she involuntarily took her hand and drew her down to a seat by her side, telling her she was so very glad to make her acquaintance.

Meanwhile the rector, in a cold, formal manner, and in very measured tones, welcomed Colonel Dysart and his daughter to the neighbourhood, expressed a satisfaction, which Una felt sure nothing could really have made him feel, in their having become residents in his parish, and requested to know if he could be of any use to them.

Colonel Dysart thanked him, and said, with a slightly sarcastic glance at Una, that his daughter would certainly be very grateful for any information she could obtain as to the neighbourhood and the families with whom she was likely to become acquainted.

"There are so many residents in this part of the country, that it would take more time than I can spare to enumerate them all," said the rector, stiffly.

"Without giving you quite so much trouble as that would involve," said Una, "we should be very well satisfied if you would enlighten us on the history of the lady to whom this house belongs, without going any further——"

"That being a subject on which my daughter happens to be particularly curious," said Colonel Dysart with a smile.

"I am quite ready to admit that I am," said Una; "and I think it would be very odd if I were not. We have been in constant intercourse with her all the way from the Cape, and we know absolutely nothing about her beyond her name and the fact that she has been a long time at the Mauritius."

"Very little more is known of her by any one," said the rector. "Her desertion of her parents and her home is considered quite unaccountable, especially as her only brother, who after the death of his father and mother lived here alone, was a poor crippled invalid."

"Was no reason ever assigned for her going away?" asked Colonel Dysart.

"Some persons surmised that an attachment which was supposed to exist between her and a gentleman named Atherstone, who had a large property in this neighbourhood, might have had some share in her extraordinary proceedings, as he had gone out to the Mauritius some years before she did; but he returned from there unmarried when his father died, and she remained—no one knows why."

"Is he still alive?" said Una eagerly.

"No; he died about three years ago, and was succeeded by his nephew."

"He never married any one else, then?"

"No, he did not; but we need not assume from that circumstance that he ever intended to marry Miss Amherst. He was much attached to his nephew, who had been brought up as the heir of the large Atherstone estates, from the time that he was quite a child," said the rector.

"Is it a good property?" asked Colonel Dysart.

"The finest in the whole county," said Hervey.

"Yes," said the rector, "it has belonged to the Atherstones for more centuries than they can count; and there is a very remarkable building on the estate even more ancient than the house itself, which is really one of the old moated castles of former times."

"How I should like to see it!" exclaimed Una.

"If you are equal to climbing up a rather steep ascent, Miss Dysart, there is a point on the hill-side near this from which you may have an excellent view, not only of Atherstone Abbey and many other houses, but of half the county besides."

"Oh! I should so enjoy going there; I do hope I shall some day. But you must know, Mr. Crichton, I have the laziest father in the whole world; he will not move an inch beyond the garden, and he is in such a state of dense ignorance as to the habits of this great nation, that he has not the least idea whether it would be proper for me to walk about by myself. My unassisted intelligence would certainly conclude there could be no possible harm in it; but as I never was in a civilised country before, my views may be somewhat those of a savage."

Hervey laughed, as he showed by his involuntary glance of admiration how little like a savage he thought her, with her high-bred look and graceful movements.

"I should think, in this unsophisticated neighbourhood, you might walk about alone as much as you pleased," he said.

"I do not find it necessary to place any restrictions in that respect on my sister," said the rector to Colonel Dysart.

"Then Una may safely follow her example," he answered courteously.

"But there is no need you should go alone," said gentle Lilith, slipping her hand into Una's. "Will you let me go with you now to the place you wish to see? It is a beautiful day, and Hervey and I intended to take a walk."

"I shall be only too delighted!" she exclaimed, starting to her feet. "You do not want me at home, do you, father?"

"Not in the very least, my dear. I am exceedingly glad that you should have such an outlet to your overpowering energy, especially with so charming a companion," he replied, with a smile, looking at Lilith.

"Then I will go and get my hat at once," exclaimed Una, bounding away; and the rector was ready to take his leave when Una returned. He had no intention of giving them his society in their walk, and he turned off towards his own house as soon as they had passed the gates.

(To be continued.)

LIFE FOR THE TAKING.

"The Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely."—Rev. xxii. 17.

THESE words occur most appropriately at the end of the Bible, putting a climax to the long list of invitations to come to Christ and obtain everlasting life. They are almost the last words of the Divine Revelation—the few that follow being a curse pronounced on any who should either add to or take from the Word of God—a stamp and seal, as it were, of its being finished and complete; then a prediction of the speedy coming of Christ Himself, and a benediction. The above words are an emphatic epitome of all the preceding offers of God's mercy; as if, lest any should be still in doubt as to their right to accept of salvation, God, before closing His Book, speaks once more in the plainest and most encouraging words; in language that cannot be mistaken; that can leave no doubt in, or excuse to, any mind, as to God's entire willingness to receive all, if they will only come. This is the main purpose of the Bible, to tell "the glorious Gospel of the blessed God;" and just before ending His revealed will He sounds one last, earnest, unmistakable, unlimited invitation, as if, when we have read His Word through and shut the book, He would leave these attractive words ringing in our ears for ever. He makes no terms on which we may come. There are no drawbacks to be got rid of, no restrictions to be considered, no exceptions to be made—the words are "come," and "freely;" and He urges His request by all the agencies of His Spirit in the world, and by the soul-thirst which is common to man, and which is the Gospel's counterpart in the human spirit.

The Spirit says, "Come." To all without exception the voice of the Holy Spirit says, "Come." This He does in a thousand ways. Under His direction "holy men of old" penned the Bible; and in it, from beginning to end, we have many invitations, directions, entreaties, and warnings; so that by the whole Word of God He says, Come. He also strives personally with men, seeking to overcome their evil propensities and lead them from death to life. He works upon them inwardly, to enlighten the intellect, to awaken the conscience, to change and purify the heart, to "renew them in the spirit of their minds;" He works upon them outwardly; bestowing on them the goodness of God, the natural effect of which should be to lead them to repentance, or if that will not do, sending them trouble and sorrow, that when everything else is gone they may think of God. Having all the forces both of the natural and spiritual worlds at command, He brings them to bear in a great variety of ways to induce men to forsake sin, whose wages is death, and come to Christ for everlasting life. Time would fail to enumerate, even if we knew, all the ways in which the Spirit says, Come.

The bride says, "Come." In the figurative language of Scripture the Church of Christ is often called His bride, to indicate the closeness of their relation and how dear it is to His heart. The Church says, Come; by all whom it has appointed to preach the "everlasting Gospel;" by all the agencies it has at work throughout the world, and they are many and various; by the circulation of the Bible in many lands and tongues; by a vast stream of Christian literature issuing daily from the press; by its forms and ordinances, regularly and openly lifting up Christ crucified before the world; by receiving into its bosom people of every degree, whatever their lives at one time may have been, if they show by their conduct that they have closed with Christ's offer; by its individual members speaking to those around them; and it says, Come, by the most convincing of all appeals, the beautiful lives of its consistent members.

"And let him that heareth say, Come." All who hear are commanded to spread the cheering intelligence. Let the husband tell his wife, the wife her husband; parents their children, and children their parents; brothers their sisters, and sisters their brothers; let friend tell friend, and neighbour speak to neighbour, till it overspread the land. Let nation send messengers to nation, and people to people; let them tell by words, by actions, by every means in their power; till all shall know "the joyful sound," and "the earth be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea;" till the sin-worn, sorrow-worn, weary world lay down its death-burden, and drink and be refreshed, and rest at the feet of its Saviour.

"And let him that is athirst come." And who is not athirst? Where shall we find the soul-refreshed and satisfied man of the world? "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," is the cry that is ever in his ears. Cui bono, like a mocking devil, haunts him wherever he goes. Hot ambitions, anxious cares, weary labours, disappointed hopes, pains and griefs, unsatisfied longings, objectless aspirations, everything, to all appearance, only wearing on to death. It is thirst, thirst; always more or less an actor in "the stern monodrama of No object and no rest." Mankind, like a host of pilgrims, each with his peculiar burden, are toiling through the desert under a burning sun. There is a death-thirst raging within; but let them come, all who desire, and drink as freely as a traveller would drink at a flowing river, and thirst no more.

"And whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." A gratuity so precious that wealth could not purchase nor goodness merit is given away; and all are invited to take. Poverty can be no bar, for it is "free;" unworthiness can be no hindrance, for it is "whosoever will." There is no impediment to any but the want of will. No questions are asked: no matter whether the comers be good or bad, high or low, rich or poor, learned or ignorant, young or old—whosoever will can have it for the taking. Away with despair, away with doubt—with such an invitation as this, questionings do but make God a liar. "God is not a man that He should lie;" "hath He spoken, and shall He not do it?" He means what He says; and there is no ambiguity in "whosoever will, let him take." You may say, "I have sinned too long and too deeply, there is no hope for me,"—Christ says, Whosoever will. You may say, "I have sinned against light and against conscience, I have done despite unto the Spirit of grace, there is no hope for me,"—Christ says, Whosoever will. You may say, "I am no common sinner, my guilt is of a peculiar type; others may be pardoned, but there is no hope for me,"—Christ says, Whosoever will.

Well may we wonder at such a costly benison so freely offered to all who will take it. What more could God do for us and leave us free? Well may we wonder at the doubt and unbelief of men; and still more may we wonder at the ingratitude, the carelessness, the reluctance, the strong aversion of the many to drink of the healing stream, while they frantically seek to quench their sore thirst at polluted fountains, whose waters but increase their pain. Well may we wonder at God's long-suffering patience: and yet when we consider what He is we may cease to wonder, for both the gift and His patience are just like Him.

It is not for nothing that this costly water flows freely for us all. Jesus paid the price, the fearful price, by the sacrifice of His own life. And now every child of Adam who feels the poison of death working in his nature, may drink if he will and live for ever. No flaming cherubim guard the approach, no law in words of thunder prohibits the unholy; but the gentle voice of Jesus invites all the world to come and freely drink, that they may feel the new life-impulse, which is the deepest, fullest joy to be found on earth, "a joy unspeakable and full of glory"—the satisfying, delightful sense of the beginning of that fuller life that shall never have an end. J. HUIE.

SHAG AND DOLL.

A STORY OF TWO HOMELESS LITTLE ONES, IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER II.

ONE afternoon—it was Sunday—the brother and sister had wandered into some back streets where they had never been before, when they came upon a knot of children, big and little, with a sprinkling of grown-up people, gathered round an elderly man of plain appearance, who was speaking to them. Shag and Doll drew near to hear what he was saying. At first they could not make it out at all. He seemed to be telling them of some Friend, of whom they had never heard before (certainly Shag and Doll were not aware that they possessed a single friend in the world); but the speaker said He of whom he was telling them was a Friend to every child standing there; that He loved them more than words could say, and had a beautiful home all ready to take them to some day—a home where they would never more be hungry, or thirsty, or tired, or sick,—never more be beaten, or driven, or unkindly treated, but where, instead of their rags, they would be clothed in white garments, and have crowns of gold upon their heads, and live for ever with Him.

"I say, guv'ner, you're a drawing of it pretty strong, aint ye?" remarked one boy in the crowd, winking at a companion; "d'ye think we're jolly green enough to take all that in?"

"It's true—every word of it," returned the other.

"Where is this home then? let's know that, and the name of him you've been a tellin' on us of."

"His name is Jesus;" and there the speaker paused a moment; so sad it seemed that of all the faces round him—faces telling of misery and want, of sin and evil passions—faces of such varied expression and different degrees of stupidity or sharpness, not one displayed the most transient gleam of recognition at the sound of that name, not one appeared ever to have heard it before. "His name is Jesus; and the home I've been telling you of is in heaven, far away above the blue sky: but He is always here, though you cannot see Him; but if you will speak to Him, and ask Him for what you want, He will hear you. Oh, He loves the little children! He longs to bring them to that beautiful home when they die."

"Oh, Shag! shouldn't you like to go there?" whispered Doll under her breath, as she tightened her hold on her brother's hand, and fixed her earnest, longing eyes again upon the speaker's face.

"This Jesus—though He's God in heaven, was a boy upon earth once—just such as you, except that He never did anything wrong; and He lived and died for you, that you might go to heaven; and now He asks you all to try and keep from evil ways for His sake. He knows how hard, how well-nigh impossible it is for some to keep straight; but He will help you. Remember, boys, next time you're going to do something you know you ought not to do, that He is looking on to see whether you do it or not: and then ask Him to help you to turn away from the sinful deed, and depend upon it you will be helped. Tell me, my poor, ragged, barefooted, half-starved fellows, isn't the glorious home I've been telling you of worth striving for? isn't the Friend I've been telling you of a Friend worth having and worth pleasing?"

After a time little Shag and Doll got jostled and pushed until they were almost out of reach of the speaker's voice; and at length he, too, went off in another direction. So the children were free to talk over the wonderful things they had been hearing.

Little Doll's weary feet could not carry her far that day; but they seemed to be more than ever haunted by policemen. No sooner had they sunk down upon a doorstep than one of their enemies was sure to come in sight round the corner; when Shag would start up, saying, "Doll, we must run for it, or they'll be down upon us p'rhaps, and take us off to the workhouse."

Then Doll would run; but she was obliged to give in after a few steps. Whereupon Shag would take her in his arms, and try to carry her; but he staggered much more under his burden than he had formerly done, even though the weight was less. A sudden turn in the street brought them unexpectedly upon the river's bank, and they found themselves in the midst of wharves, quays, and landing-places, which in the week presented a scene of bustling, busy life, but which to-day were comparatively deserted. In a remote corner they came upon several empty sugar-casks and barrels, which had been cast aside until wanted for further use.

"Hurrah, Doll! here'll be a capital place to spend the night! We'll creep into one of these 'ere big casks, and we'll be ever so snug and jolly. Let's get into this one, and try what it's like," said Shag, pointing to one which lay on its side, and promised to afford ample shelter.

Doll crept in, and lay down with an air of relief.

"We shall be quiet here, there won't be no tormenting boys about," she remarked. "But, oh, Shag, I'm so hungry, I don't know how to bear it;" and the feeble tones died away in low sobs, as the starving little creature threw her wasted arms round her brother's neck, and laid her poor pale cheek upon his shoulder.

"Don't cry, Doll—poor little Doll!" said Shag, with a sense of choking in his throat, as he tried to keep back his own tears. "I'm dreadful hungry too. Let's go and see if we can't get somebody to give us a crust, or a mouthful of food."

Doll tried to rise, but all her strength seemed gone.

"I can't go no further, Shag. Leave me here; let me stop here till you comes back. Oh, Shag, how I wish we could go to that 'home' we've been hearing about!"

"Don't you go and leave me here behind," cried Shag in terror, as for the first time the idea presented itself that "maybe Doll was a going to die." "Oh, Doll, Doll! you mustn't go away and leave me! Whatever should I do without my little Doll?" and clasping her tightly in his arms, the poor little fellow burst into an agony of tears.

Doll cried also; but she was too exhausted for loud grief; and in a few moments Shag started up, saying, "I'll go and beg of every one I meets for a halfpenny or a bit of bread, and I'll bring it straight away to you, Doll. You'll be all right then, won't you? You wait here for me; I won't be long;" and away ran the boy, love and fear giving him for the time the strength which had well-nigh departed altogether from his emaciated frame.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

176. Where do we read that some of the chiefs of the fathers of the Levites were singers, and were employed day and night in singing?

177. The whole of the Evangelists record the fact that Joseph of Arimathea begged the body of Jesus, but only two state that he was a disciple of the Lord's. Which?

178. "But when they came to Jesus, and saw that He was dead already, they brake not His legs; . . . . for these things were done, that the Scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of Him shall not be broken." Name the passage of Scripture referred to by the apostle?

179. We are told by St. John (vii. 5) that "neither did the brethren of Jesus believe on Him." Quote a passage from the Acts in which they are referred to as among His disciples.

180. St. Luke says that Simeon "waited for the consolation of Israel." St. Mark records a somewhat similar instance of another individual. Give the passage.

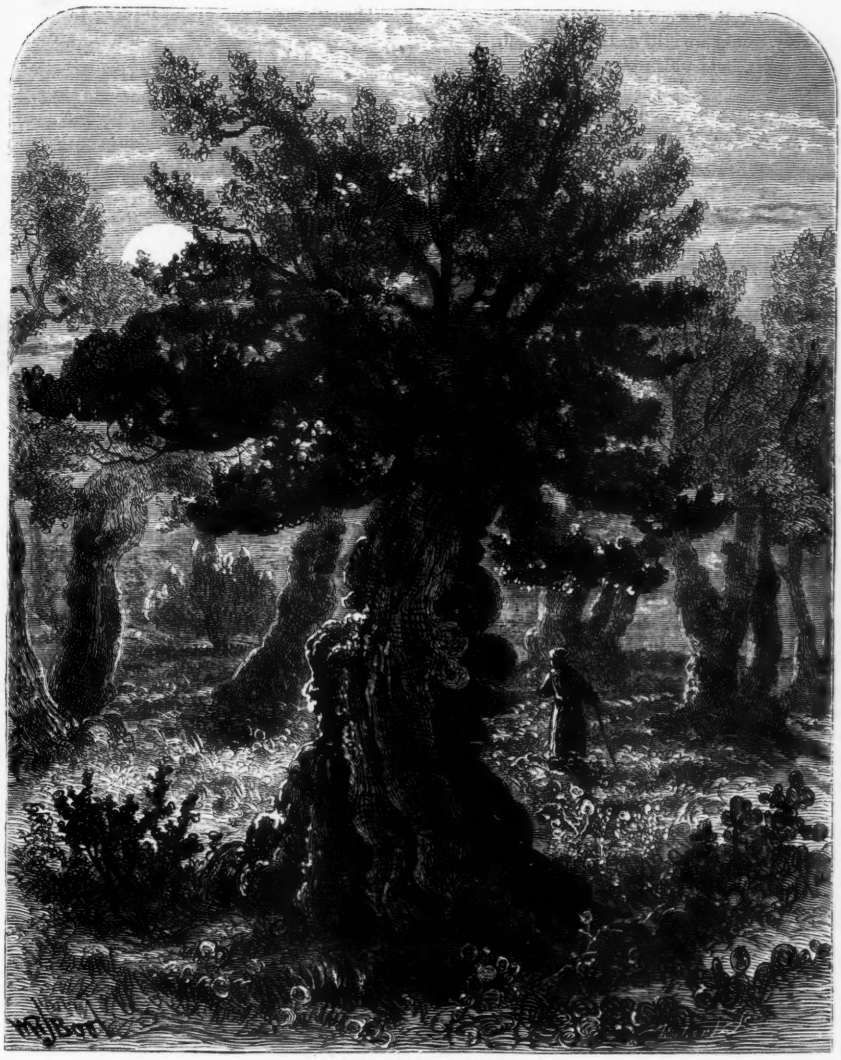
181. We read in the book of Numbers that Balaam was slain by the sword of the Israelites. The same fact is also recorded in the Book of Joshua. Quote the passages.

182. Name the three divisions of Holy Scripture which the Saviour declared contained predictions respecting Himself.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 416.

161. 2 Tim. iv. 8; 1 Cor. ix. 25.

162. Peter and John (John xviii. 15, 16).



163. Rev. v. 9—14; xiv. 2, 3; xv. 3.

164. See John xix. 27.

165. St. Luke (ii. 21—27) gives the circumcision and the presentation in the Temple; St. Matthew (ii.) gives the visit of the magi and the flight into Egypt.

166. 2 Kings xxv. 18.

167. Ezekiel (xl. 44).

(Drawn by W. J. Boot.)

THE OLIVE-TREES IN GETHSEMANE.

THEY stand there still,
Mute records of the deepest agony
Earth ever witnessed. 'Neath the midnight sky
The blessed Saviour bent submissively
Before His Father's will.

From earthly eyes
Those "unknown sufferings" were hidden quite;
Only in silence came, that awful night,
To "strengthen" Him, one of those angels bright,
Sent down from His own skies.

The chosen three
In that mysterious hour were far from Him;
The paschal moonbeams round about them swim,
Whilst He outpours, amid yon shadows dim,
His solemn litany.

Yet they were there *—
Those very trunks we still can see and feel,
Those boughs, 'mid which e'en now the moonbeams steal—
Beneath their sombre shade He deigned to kneel
In that prevailing pray'r.

When on His face,
So worn and wan for us, the strange drops stood,
The first-fruits of His Passion, "drops of blood"

* "There are eight venerable trees, undoubtedly of great age, their trunks much decayed, but branches flourishing. 'The most venerable of their race on the face of the earth,' says Stanley, 'their gnarled trunks and scanty foliage will always be regarded as the most affecting of the sacred memorials in or about Jerusalem.'"—Andrews.

Proving the closeness of His brotherhood
With all our sorrowing race.

What Gothic fane,
Piled by the hand of man, could ever rise
Fraught with such consecrated memories—
Though morn and eve upsending to the skies
Of Christian praise the strain—

As that gnarled tree
Which, centuries ago, was standing there;
And saw Iscariot's torches redly glare,
What time the Father answered Jesu's prayer
Breathed in Gethsemane?

For calm, at last,
He joined—the struggle o'er—His chosen three;
And went, without a pang, to Calvary.
So, Christian sufferer, shall it be with thee:
God sends His angel in thine agony—
In death all woes are past!

C. M. D.

CHRIST AND HIS CHURCH:

EXPOSITORY NOTES ON THE SONG OF SOLOMON. (Continued.)

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN, ETC.; AUTHOR OF "AIDS TO PRAYER," ETC.

"A bundle of myrrh is my wellbeloved unto me," &c.—Song of Solomon i. 11—14.

HERE we have Christ represented as the refreshment and delight and comfort of His Church: "A bundle of myrrh is my beloved unto me."

"Unto ME." He may not be so to others, who see in Him neither "form nor comeliness;" but unto me—who owe to Him my life, my peace, my hope, my all—He has a price above all gold, a sweetness above all perfume, a virtue above all healing balms, a life which defies corruption or decay. It cannot be estimated by what He is in Himself, because He is infinite and all-infinite. We can estimate Him only by what He is made to US; "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, redemption." Still all is relative to the faith of the believer himself. "Unto you that believe He is precious." "A bundle of myrrh is my beloved unto Me."

"A bundle of myrrh." The immediate allusion is to the Eastern custom of tying up a few sprigs or flowers of the myrrh-tree, which, being put into a bag, and deposited in the bosom, emitted not only a pleasant but a healthy fragrance. But besides this, there were many uses to which myrrh was applied, making the image easy of spiritual application. This myrrh was a principal ingredient used in the holy anointing of the ancient sanctuary,—that type of the oil of gladness wherewith Christ was "anointed above His fellows;" and which, being poured upon His head, in all its Divine and measureless abundance, runs down to the skirts of His garments, bathes with a sacred anointing the lowest and meanest member of His mystical body, and so opens the eyes of their understanding with its precious unguent, that they are led into all truth, and receive "the anointing which teacheth all things." Again, the gum of the myrrh-tree, or stacte, as it is called in the book of Exodus, was an ordained part of that mystical incense which the priest placed before the testimony in the tabernacle of the congregation—type, as we learn from the book of the Revelation, of that golden censer into which Christ casts the prayers of His people, in order that, blended with His own perfect intercessions, they may come up with acceptance before the throne.

But passing over some other uses of this plant, we may note especially that it was commonly employed in the embalming of dead bodies: even as Nicodemus, not knowing that it was impossible "the Holy One should see corruption," brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes to preserve the body of Jesus. Now such as the myrrh was intended to be to the sacred body of Christ, such is He Himself, the true myrrh, to the souls and bodies of His beloved. He is myrrh to their souls. "He shall lie all night—as a Rabbi interprets it, in my heart—dwelling in it, taking possession of it, permanently abiding there, through all the night of this present world; like a nosegay for ornament, like a precious perfume for refreshment; like a pledge or hostage of unalterable and undeparting love. "All night;" the Church will not be satisfied with brief and interrupted refreshings from the presence of the Lord. Her language is that of Jeremiah: "O Thou Hope of Israel, the Saviour thereof in time of trouble, why shouldest Thou be as a stranger in the land, and as a wayfaring man that turneth aside to tarry for a night?* Abide with me. Lean upon my breast, as the beloved apostle leaned on Thine." Much do the souls of believers need this quickening and ever-abiding influence. Often the spikenard of their own graces does not send forth its wonted fragrance. Under a painful sense of decaying spirituality, and faded love, and worldly carefulness, and unmastered sin, they seem to be in that Sardian state in which "the things that remain are ready to die." But these things shall not die. Christ dwelling in their hearts by faith; the savour of His love and grace shed abroad in their souls; the bundle of myrrh pressed close to the bosom through the long night of temptation, and conflict, and distress, and mental darkness, shall suffice to keep breath in them. The souls of believers are embalmed souls. They have not a sprig of myrrh, but a "bundle" of it to keep corruption away. Indeed, their soul's life is hidden in the myrrh: "Your life is hid with Christ in God."

Moreover it will be as myrrh to our bodies also. We shall go down to a perfumed grave. Christ has lain in that grave before us, and His presence will be there again. And this will keep from destruction every atom of our redeemed and sleeping dust. Through what changes that dust may pass before it develops into the form of a spiritual body, by what mysterious chemistry the decayed substance of the human organisation shall become changed, refined, sublimated into its pure resurrection-fashioning, we know not. All we know is, that, through the long night of time, through all those years or centuries during which our world may eke out its little life, we shall both sleep in Jesus, and feel the power of His Spirit quickening our mortal bodies. The likeness of these bodies has been chosen as the shrine of the Incarnation, and they can never perish. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." Their very grave-clothes "smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia," and every chamber of that viewless world is filled with odours fresh wafted from the paradise of God. The sepulchre is still in the garden.

But mark the last words of the Church in this her sublime "magnificat." She has not yet exalted enough the glory of her Lord. Deep hidden in the heart of her beautiful poetry lies the infinite mystery of the Atonement: "My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of En-gedi." By the word "camphire" or "cypress" the most trustworthy Jewish expositors understand a particular description of plant, symbolical of Messiah, and meaning literally "atonement" or "propitiation," so that with them a familiar rendering of this passage is, "My beloved is unto me the man that propitiates all things."* How refreshing is it, in an age which delights to loosen the foundations of ancient truth—and which, in regard to the propitiatory sacrifice of the Son of God especially would fain reason or mystify us out of our most cherished and heart-soothing hopes, to come, suddenly as it were, upon a testimony of three thousand years old to a doctrine, which is the hope of the Church, the unextinguished creed of the world, the strange instinct of the uncivilised and uninstructed conscience, and, with all its searchless mystery, the only method of mercy which upholds consistently the moral government of God.

Wherefore, in faith of that all-cleansing all-covering sacrifice of the cross, let us lay hold on Adam's hope, on Abel's hope, on Solomon's hope, on the Church's hope in all time. Let us endeavour, with enlarged faith and raised emotion, to enter into the depth of spiritual meaning, enfolded and contained in these last words of the Church to Christ her Lord, "My beloved is unto me a 'cluster' of propitiations; a richly-laden branch from the vineyards of En-gedi, with leaves for 'the healing of the nations,' and having fruit for the life of the world." Oh! what can our souls need that we have not abundantly provided for in Christ? Do we want wisdom—wisdom to guide, to instruct, to keep us in the good and the right way? In the Beloved is a "cluster" of wisdoms. "In Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." Do we need a righteousness—something to shield us from a deserved condemnation? In Him is a "cluster" of righteousnesses; "the fulness of the Godhead bodily." This is the name whereby He shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness." Sanctification, do we not need that—something to fit us for the pure society and fellowships of heaven? In Him is a "cluster" of sanctifications, countless changes of "fine linen pure and white," wedding garments bordered with gold and studded with silver. Is redemption our great need? In Jesus we have a cluster of redemptions—redemption from the curse of the law, redemption from the slavery of sin, redemption from the thrall of unbelief and fear, redemption from the bondage of corruption to the glorious liberty of the children of God. Oh! our Beloved is unto us as a "cluster" of saviours. He is able to deliver; rich in mercy; delighting in pardons; mighty to save.

* Jer. xiv. 8.

* See Bishop Patrick in loc. Dr. Shaw calls it the Athenna, and says of it that it is a beautiful and odoriferous plant, which puts out its little flowers in clusters, which yield a most grateful smell like camphire. ("Travels," p. 613, second edition.)

With such glowing representations, and with many like, does this book of Holy Writ set forth the relations of Christ and His Church. His love to her, and hers to Him, would be found to be the burden of this "Song of Songs," if we were to carry on our meditations to the close. On which side the love began, we all know; and therein is our security for its continuance: for whom Christ loves, He loves always. He changes not. Waters of a full cup may be wrung out to us, so bitter, sometimes, that we cannot but pray that, if possible, the cup may be taken away. But our sustaining thought must be, I know Christ loves me through this—perhaps loves me more on account of this. "Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it."* And so with our spiritual trials; when day after day of blank dreary deadness comes over our souls; when the light upon our tabernacle shines not; when we wrestle and wrestle with the angel, and yet are obliged to let him go without a blessing after all, then also do we take comfort in the thought that God "resteth in His love;" that Christ has set us as a seal upon His heart," and as a "seal upon His arm," and that His "love is as strong as death."† Nay, only on this unchanging love of Christ can we stay our souls, when we have gone back, or have declined from the ways of godliness, or have been overtaken in a grievous fault, or have even inflicted some deep wound upon the conscience, of which, though God should forgive the guilt, our souls will all our life long retain the scar. For in view of any such humbling experiences we say to ourselves, He loved David through this; He loved Peter through this; He loved Paul through this. We can find no other reason for the recovery of these pardoned ones. Those whom He loveth, He loveth unto the end.

Yes, even to the end of all ends. For thus far does the love of Christ reach, even to that intersecting line of two eternities, on arriving at which we shall see His love as it reaches back to the eternal ages, whilst in its length, and breadth, and depth, and height, it covers the boundless future of endless life. That which to us, as responsible beings, will be the end of everything—the end of probation, the end of effort, the end of repentance, the end of prayer—will show to us more of the enduring love of Christ; will cause the obscure and hidden parts of His dealings with us to appear plain; and will enable us to see that through sorrow, through temptation, through the darkness, through the light, the love of Christ has cleaved to us, and will cleave to us eternally. "For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Betrothed to Him, as we are, "in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercies," nothing can dissolve the bond of our everlasting espousals. For ever and ever, He is ours and we are His. "This is a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and His Church."

* Cant. viii. 7. † Cant. viii. 6.

"I WAS SICK, AND YE VISITED ME."

COME within these silent gates,
Come, and gaze with bated breath,
Here the stricken pilgrim waits
Issues high of life or death;
Here the Man of sorrow feels Every pang His pity heals.

Lord of mercy, at Thy word
Be these healing waters stirred;
Bid the sufferer, pale and wan,
"Go in peace," his anguish gone;
Or "Come hither to the shore
Where there are no sick and sore."

Bending o'er the weary bed,
In the watches of unrest,
Pillow every throbbing head
On Thy tender Brother's breast;
Weeping when Thy people pine,
Jesus, what a heart is Thine!

Though to-day our pulses beat
Healthful music in the street,
We may lie to-morrow low,
Full of tossings to and fro;
Let us hear the sick man's moan,
So shall Jesus hear our own.

He will hush the stormy fear,
When the hour of death is near;
He will make the midnight pall
Radiant with His silver call,
"Hither come to your reward,
For ye loved your fainting Lord!"

GEORGE S. OUTRAM, M.A.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

VI.—WITH THEM THAT GO DOWN TO THE SEA IN SHIPS.

IT is possible that those portions of the sacred history which have reference to the association of our Lord Jesus Christ with ships, and the wonderful portions of the great narrative where the Divine Voice seems, as it were, to come from the sea, may have a special attraction for us who live in an island and claim a kind of maritime dominion.

Surely the words "Lord save me, or I perish," and the instant response of the outstretched hand of the Saviour of men, must have been read with an awful joy by many a godfearing sailor on the homeward voyage. "It is I, be not afraid," must have come with an intensity of meaning to many a heart which has known the peril of the storm, wherein the voice of man to man has been almost inaudible.

There is something very solemn in the prayers we send up for those at sea. Most of us feel a heart-throb when we lie awake listening to the mighty murmurs of the wind, and waiting for the shrill shriek with which each long terrible blast gathers up its forces—a throb which comes of the sudden thought of lonely ships far out upon the ocean, where men are wrestling with the elements, and looking with clenched lips and straining eyes for the lingering dawn.

Yet with all this it is a national reproach to us that until a comparatively recent date we have done little or nothing for our sailors—little for those who have been ready to maintain the old supremacy of our fleet—almost nothing for that greater navy of the mercantile marine to which we are indebted for half the necessaries and for nearly all the luxuries which we enjoy.

A national reproach, because not only have charitable provisions for destitute, sick, infirm or disabled sailors been neglected, but subscriptions demanded by the State from seamen of the merchant service were never properly applied to relieve the distress of those for whom they were professedly received. Considerably over a million of money has been contributed by merchant seamen, by deductions of sixpences from their monthly pay for the maintenance of Greenwich Hospital, and in addition to this there have been accumulated in the hands of the Government the examination fees of masters and mates passing the Board of Trade examination, and the penny fees paid by common seamen on shipment and unshipment, while the unclaimed wages and effects of seamen dying abroad are calculated at about £8,000 a year.

Now there can be no doubt that Greenwich Hospital was originally intended to include merchant seamen in its provisions, for the preamble to the original scheme of William III. recites, "Whereas the King's most excellent Majesty, being anxiously desirous to promote the Trade, Navigation, and Naval strength of this Kingdom, and to invite greater numbers of his subjects to betake themselves to the sea, hath determined to erect a hospital," &c. For this purpose sixpence per man per month was to be paid out of the wages of all mariners to the support of the Hospital, and every seaman was to be registered. Why? That the charity might be "for the relief, benefit, or advantage of such the said registered Marines, or Seamen, Watermen, Fishermen, Lightermen, Bargemen, Keelmen, or Seafaring Men, who by age, wounds, or other accidents shall be disabled for future service at sea, and shall not be in a condition to maintain themselves comfortably; and the children of such disabled seamen; and the widows and children of such of them as shall happen to be slain, killed, or drowned in sea service, so far forth as the Hospital shall be capable to receive them, and the revenue thereof will extend."

So far as words went, therefore—and subsequent Acts of Parliament confirmed them—Greenwich Hospital was open to all registered seamen. The fact has always been, however, that it was barely able to meet the claims made by the disabled and infirm sailors of the Navy alone, and therefore the mercantile marine was practically excluded, while the payments were still demanded.

Now let us see what past Governments did for the relief of those old, infirm, or disabled men who having "seen wonders on the great deep," came home and sought help.

A charitable trust, called the "Merchant Seamen's Fund," had been established by merchants and shipowners of the City of London, who gave large sums to it, in order to try to make up for the injustice by which these sailors were virtually excluded from Greenwich Hospital, to which the men of the mercantile marine still had to pay sixpence a month. By a remarkably knowing piece of legislation, an Act was passed (the 20th of George II.) which incorporated the Merchant Seamen's Fund, appointed president and governors, and gave authority to purchase land for building a hospital, to help pay for which another sixpence a month was claimed from the pay of merchant seamen and masters of merchant vessels.

Not till the year 1834, by an Act passed in the reign of William IV., were the merchant sailors relieved from compulsory payment to Greenwich. They had contributed to the hospital for 138 years without having derived any direct benefit from it; and though they were not unwilling to subscribe for their brethren in the Royal Navy, the injustice which demanded their contributions, though their own fund was inadequate to pay for the promised building for which it was intended, became too glaring to be continued. It was therefore determined that a grant of £20,000 should be made to Greenwich Hospital out of the Consolidated Fund, and that the merchant sailors should go on paying their shilling a month for their own benefit (masters paying two shillings), and that a provision for widows and children should be included in the charity, the benefits of which were to be extended to Scotland and Ireland.

The hospital never was built. The Board of Trade taking the management of the contributions, appointed trustees, who were altogether incompetent, and did their duty in a perfunctory or careless manner. In 1850 only £20,000 was distributed among old, infirm, and disabled seamen, while £41,000 was bestowed on widows and children; the allowances varying at different ports from £1 to £7, each place having its own local government. Of course a collapse came. The fund was bankrupt; and in the following year an Act was passed for winding it up—for, says the Board of Trade Report, "the Government has had no control over the matter. The London Corporation and the trustees of outports could not by any management have prevented the insolvency of the fund, so long as they were guided by the principles which the several Acts of Parliament laid down . . . . . the whole system was vicious."

By the winding-up Act of 1851 compulsory contributions ceased; but those who chose to continue to subscribe voluntarily might do so. It is hardly to be wondered at that the merchant seamen lost confidence in the paternal protection of the Board of Trade. A few thousand pounds were left from the compulsory contributions, and when this came to be inquired for, nobody knew anything about it. It had somehow slipped out of the estimates, and nobody could tell what had become of it.

That is what past governments have done for poor mercantile Jack.

What has the great British public done for him? Not so very much after all. The truth is, that the sailor, who has always been spoken of as "so dreadfully improvident," has been practically regarded as being most self-helpful. All the time that we have been shaking our solemn heads, and lifting up our hands at the improvidence, the folly, and the extravagance of these frequently underpaid and sometimes overworked men, we have made even the help that we were willing to extend to them in their deeper necessities partially dependent on their own constant and regular subscription to the same end.

Poor improvident Jack—poor thoughtless, incorrigible fellow—it was necessary for the Government of his country to look after him, in order to protect him against his own want of forethought, and the result has been to run the ship into shoal water, and go hopelessly to wreck without so much as salvage money.

Jack ashore! Don't we all still look at the sailor in the light of the evil war-times, when the king's men were said to draw pocketsful of prize-money and to spend it in low debauchery or wild wanton folly? Even now we repeat the stories of frying watches along with beefsteaks and onions, or eating bank-note sandwiches. Nay, to this day in the fo'c's'le of merchant vessels some of the melancholy old songs in which sailors are want to satirise themselves are occasionally sung, telling how

> "When his money is all spent,
> And there's nothing to be borrowed and nothing to be lent,
> In comes the landlord with a frown,
> Saying, 'Jack! get up, and let John sit down,
> For you are outward bound.'"

There's a world of meaning in that grim suggestive summary; but, thank God, it has less meaning now than it once had. Until quite lately, sailors of merchant ships could be kept for days waiting to be paid, and, sickened with lingering for long weary hours about the office of the broker or agent who withheld their money, fell into the hands of the harpies who were, and still are, constantly on the look-out to plunder them. Men with all the pure natural longing for home and reunion with those near and dear to them, were compelled to loiter about the foul neighbourhood of the dock where their ship discharged its cargo, lodging in some low haunt with evil company, and liable to every temptation that is rife in such places, till too often so large a portion of their hardly-earned wages had been forestalled, that in a dreary and desperate madness of dissipation they were tempted to fling away the small balance remaining to them, and to awake to reason only when, naked and nearly destitute, they were compelled to go to sea again, with a slender stock of clothes, and a week's board and lodging paid for with advance notes.

From long confinement and monotony on shipboard, the sailor even now comes to a sense of temporary freedom giddy with the unaccustomed sense of solid ground and the wild toss and uproar of the ocean of life in a great city. What are still the influences which in many seaports await him directly his foot touches the shore, and sometimes even before he has come over the vessel's side? With a boy's recklessness, a man's passions, and the unwonted excitement of possessing money and boundless opportunities for spending it, a shoal of landsharks are lying ready to batten on him. The tout, the crimp, and all the wretches, male and female, who look upon him as their prey, will never leave him from the time when they watch him roll wonderingly on to the landing-stage, till that desperate minute when he flings his last handful of small change across the tavern counter, and calls for its worth in drink, since "money is no use at sea."

This was far more frequently the termination of mercantile Jack's spell ashore, before the new regulations as to prompt payment of seamen's wages came into force. At that time you had only to take a morning walk across Tower Hill, where the bluff lay figure at the outfitter's door stands for Jack in full feather, and thence to America Square, or the neighbourhood of the Minories and Rosemary Lane, to see dozens of poor fellows lounging listlessly about the doors of pay-agents, waiting day after day at the street-corners, with an occasional visit to the public-house, and the perpetual consumption of "hard" tobacco. It was easy afterwards to follow Jack to Ratcliffe, Rotherhithe, Shadwell, and the neighbourhood, where his "friends" lay in wait for him to spend the evening; in the tap-rooms of waterside taverns, where he sat hopelessly drinking and smoking during a hot summer's afternoon; to frowsy, low-browed shops of cheap clothiers, to hot, stifling dancing-rooms, to skittle-alleys behind gin-shop bars, where a sudden brawl would call out knives, and the use of a "slung-shot" as a weapon would make a case of manslaughter for the coroner; to very minor theatres, where he could see absurd caricatures of himself in the stage sailors, dancing hornpipes unknown at sea; to the dreadful dens of Bluegate Fields and Tiger Bay—to any or all of these places you might have followed Jack; and may even yet follow his fellows who have not yet been redeemed from the evil ways of those bad times, when there were no homes for sailors amidst the bewildering vice and misery of maritime London, and other seaport towns of this great mercantile island.

It so happened that I made my first intimate acquaintance with the one real publicly representative "Sailors' Home" in Well Street, near the London Docks, after having seen Jack under several of the terrible conditions just referred to, so that, with this painful knowledge of him and his ways, it was with a kind of delighted surprise that I suddenly walked into the great entrance hall of the institution, where he and his fellows were sitting on the benches by the wall with the serious, contemplative, almost solemn air which is (in my experience) the common expression of sailors ashore and during ordinary leisure hours. There they were, a good ship's crew of them altogether, sitting, as I have already said, in true sailor fashion—stooping forward, wrists on knees, lolling on sea-chests and clothes-bags, taking short fore-and-aft walks of six steps and a turn in company with some old messmate, smoking, growling, chatting, and generally enjoying their liberty; not without an eye, now and then, to the smart officer who had come in to see whether he could pick up a brisk hand or two for the mail service.

This was some five or six years ago, and it is a happy result of the plan on which the Home was first established (which was intended ultimately to make the institution self-supporting, if the cost of building were defrayed) that the whole scheme has been so enlarged since that time, that anybody who would see what our mercantile seamen are like, may now go and see them, in a largely increasing community, in this great institution, where so many come and go and reappear at intervals represented by the length of their voyages, that 10,120 officers and men had partaken of its inestimable benefits during the year from the 1st of May, 1872, to the end of April, 1873.

But the institution itself was founded in earnest faith, and built with the labour that is consecrated by prayer; and both to the Home and to its companion institution—the Refuge for Destitute Seamen—we will pay a visit on our next meeting.

SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

JEPHTHAH'S DAUGHTER.

Judges xi. 38.

"FAREWELL the dear old home, the happy days
Of innocent childhood, in the buried past;
Bright days which were, it seems, too bright to last;
When scarce was place for prayer, but all was praise!
E'en as at sunset, long upslanting rays
Tell of the golden noontide, while there creep
The purple shadows o'er a world of sleep,
So for life's happy morn the dirge I raise,
As forth upon the mountain wild I go
And consecrate to God my earthly loss,
Knowing 'tis He, not man, my will doth cross,
Though all His secret plan I may not know."
So spake a soul devoted long ago,
And so the King of saints and sufferers came
As in the Book 'twas written; cross and shame
Enduring, that our sins might lie that cross below.

M. D.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

UP the steep hill-side went bright, impetuous Una, scarce able to restrain herself from outstripping her companions, as she trod with her light, springing step on the elastic heath, and felt the fresh breeze rushing past her, laden with the scent of the pine-trees and a thousand wild flowers, which an especially lovely spring had scattered by handfuls all around them.

"Do you know this is the first time I ever took a walk in England in my life," she said, turning round her face, glowing with pleasure, "and I cannot imagine how people can prefer foreign countries; I think it perfectly delightful—fresher and sweeter than any other land."

"Wait till you see our native country in a November fog or a heavy fall of snow," said Hervey. "I have awful recollections of those vagaries of our climate, though I have been in India four years."

"Have you just come home, then?"

"Yes, only last month; and I am here for a few weeks on leave. It is almost my first visit to Valehead, for Lilith did not live here when I went away with my regiment; she came when our mother died, soon after my departure."

"Then you do not know much of the neighbourhood."

"Scarcely anything; but Lilith will be able to tell you about all the people whose houses you will see from the top of the hill; of course she knows them all by this time."

"Oh! wait a moment; what is that sound?" exclaimed Lilith; and as they stopped to listen, a faint, plaintive chirping was heard from a little distance. "It is a wounded bird, I am sure," she continued, and flew away towards the spot whence the murmur came.

Una and Hervey followed, and found her lifting gently from the ground an unfortunate thrush with a broken wing.

"How can it have been hurt?" she said, almost shuddering, as the bird writhed and fluttered in her hands.

Hervey stooped down to examine it. "My dear Lilith, my military experience enables me to tell you that it is suffering from a gunshot wound. I dare say Rupert Northcote shot it—singing bird though it be," he added, looking significantly at his sister. For a moment her transparent complexion was tinged with a faint flush, but it vanished very quickly, and she grew paler as the bird's struggles ceased.

"I fear it is dying," she said.

"It undoubtedly is," said Hervey; "your moving it has been its coup de grâce. You had better leave it, and think no more about it."

"I must stay with it till it dies. But do not let me keep you back, Miss Dysart; pray go on, and I will join you in a moment." She so evidently wished it that Una complied, and turned away.

"I could not imagine a sweeter face than your sister's," she said to Hervey, as they walked on; "surely she must be wonderfully good."

"She is, indeed—almost too good, I sometimes think, for her blamelessness and innocency seem hardly natural in this evil world. She is not clever, but the very simplicity of her goodness gives her a strange power with most people; her mind is just like a crystal—so clear and pure that one can read it through and through."

"Your brother must be rather an austere companion for so young a girl," said Una.

"He is certainly, and I think it is partly the cause of her great timidity and shyness; still she is happy with him, and would love him if he would let her; but love in any shape or way he seems to regard rather as a weakness than as a virtue," he added, laughing.

"So I should quite imagine," said Una demurely, and paused to let Lilith join them.

She came up to them quietly, making no remark about the bird, and they all went on together gaily, till they came near the summit of the hill, which was by no means very high.

"Now I must and will be first at the top!" exclaimed Una like a gleeful child; and as the wind, growing fresher and stronger, seemed to bear her up on its wings, she flew on, far past her companions, till she gained her point and planted her little feet firmly on the highest rock.

Hervey, who could easily have overtaken her, let her go unimpeded, that he might have the pleasure of looking at her as she stood with her slender, well-knit figure brought out in strong relief against the clear sky, and the breeze sweeping back the rich brown hair from her charming face, which was radiant with a look of saucy triumph.

Truly she made a pleasant picture as she stood there, with her clear eyes wandering from point to point over the vast landscape at her feet. Fair and bright the wide expanse of country lay before her in the glad spring sunshine, stretching away to the far horizon, with many a change of wood and field and rugged hill, and every here and there the silver

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"'At least, you do not come with us,' she said"—p. 462.

gleam of a rapid river, that rushed with musical murmur onward to the sea; and no less fair and bright, in that morning hour of life, the future seemed to spread its golden realms beneath her hopeful eyes; through flowery paths and scenes of joy her trusting fancy imaged out her yet unknown career; and the proud ardour of her strong young spirit glorified the whole with the pure light of the noble purposes which she had resolved should bring her the blessing of holiness, no less than happiness. And all the while her eyes were on the fateful spot where her strange destiny was indeed to be accomplished, in guise as different from these visions of her youth as well could be imagined; but no instinct warned her of that which was to come. A little time longer she would walk on in her golden dreams, and then—face to face the deadly conflict of her life would meet her.

Mr. Crichton gratified his eyes by gazing steadily at Una, as long as it pleased her to contemplate the view; but when at last she turned her glance downward to her companions, he bounded up the rocks and was at her side in a moment.

"Now, Lilith," he exclaimed, as his sister followed more slowly, "you must come and act showman to this great panorama. I can tell Miss Dysart the names of the houses, but you must describe the inhabitants."

"Provided you do not expect me to be very critical," she said, with her gentle smile.

"No, indeed; I am only too well aware of the extent of your unassailable charity. I have no doubt you will persuade Miss Dysart that this county is stocked entirely with angelic beings, which will be very satisfactory to her, until she comes in contact with a good deal that will seem rather odd in a seraphic population."

"Do you not know any of these wonderful beings yourself?" said Una, laughing.

"I know one, a young lady whom I met—not here, but in London, and it is quite—quite enough for me."

"And her name?"

"Is Miss Northcote—Miss Wilhelmina Northcote, commonly called 'Will.'"

"Not by you surely?"

"She would have no objection. I think of asking her to go out shooting with me some day; she is a capital shot." He laughed as Una opened great eyes of astonishment.

"I like Miss Northcote very much," said Lilith softly.

"Of course you do: who is there you do not like? but she is as unlike you as if she were the inhabitant of another planet."

"There is Northcote Manor, where her family live, Miss Dysart," said Lilith; "you see that large modern-looking house, half hid by the trees, not very far from here: though the whole property is on low-lying ground?"

"Yes, I can see it quite well. A gentleman and lady seem to be riding towards it along the high road at this moment."

"You are quite right," said Hervey; "it is Rupert Northcote, the eldest son, and his sister, whom I have already introduced to you as 'Will.'"

"Are they new people in the county? their house seems quite recently built."

"Oh no, they are an old family," said Lilith; "but the present squire pulled down the original house in order to build one larger: he has so many children."

"Happily, none are of an age to appear in the world of society yet, except Rupert and Will."

"Why do you say 'happily?'" asked Una.

"Because Rupert, though undoubtedly a fine handsome fellow, with some good qualities, is—shall I say what he is, Lilith?"

"Say whatever you think right," she answered, almost in a whisper; and the soft peace of her face remained undisturbed.

"Well, not to enter into details, he is extravagant and dissipated; very unlike his father, who is, I believe, a thoroughly good, kind-hearted man."

"And Mrs. Northcote?"

"Oh," said Hervey, drawing a long breath, "I met her, too, in London once; and she is the most terrible specimen of the British matron I ever encountered."

"She is very good, Hervey."

"Yes, my dear child; and in the days when I used copy-books, one of the wise sentences which I wrote over and over again was to the effect that goodness which made itself disagreeable was high treason against virtue. However, I leave you to comment on the rest of our neighbours; the Northcotes are really the only people I know, from having met them elsewhere."

"I have been making some discoveries for myself," said Una; "I can see that our present home is called Vale House because it lies just at the entrance of that pretty valley through which the river flows, and the village is called Valehead because it extends quite to the upper part, where the church stands, so well placed on ground that already begins to rise."

"Yes," said Lilith, "and there is the parsonage where we live, just behind it."

"That quaint, many-gabled little house? It is very picturesque; your garden looks beautiful, even from here. There are only two other houses which are not poor people's cottages—a very ugly, red-brick building at the end of the village street, and a little villa on the river bank. Who lives in these?"

"The inevitable functionaries, doctor and lawyer," said Hervey. "I have seen them both at church—Dr. Burton and Mr. Knight."

"Well, I suppose we shall make acquaintance with them, and all the others you have named, in due course," said Una; "but, Mr. Crichton, I am very anxious to know the name of that grand, austere-looking old place just at the foot of the hill on the opposite side. It has a magnificent position, almost embedded in that dark forest of pines, and with such precipitous rocks rising up immediately behind it."

"That is Atherstone Abbey; formerly in possession of the gentleman my brother mentioned in connection with Miss Amherst, and the very place you expressed such a wish to see."

"It would be well worth going a much longer distance to get a good view of it. Both the building and its entourage are wonderfully striking. It looks like the keep of some old Norman baron—sombre and massive, and quite capable of a stout defence; surely it must be very ancient."

"It is, undoubtedly. The county guide-book will give you a most elaborate history of it. I dare say you have studied it, Lilith."

"Every one here knows the history of Atherstone," she answered. "It was, just as Miss Dysart supposes, a Norman castle first of all; then one of the family in old times joined a religious order, and converted it into a monastery, from which it derived the name of Abbey. The chapel and cloisters were added at that time; but the next heir restored it to its original use as a dwelling-place, and so it has remained ever since."

"Always in possession of the same family?" asked Una.

"Oh yes," said Lilith; "it is said that the Atherstones would rather part with life than with the Abbey."

"They are a proud race," said Hervey, "and cling with a wonderful tenacity of affection to their old inheritance; but really one cannot be surprised at their devotion to it, for, independent of their historic old fortress, the lands belonging to it are of great extent and value. I should think few commoners have such a rent-roll as Humphrey Atherstone."

"Is he the present proprietor?"

"Yes; he succeeded his uncle, who was Miss Amherst's friend—or enemy, as the case may be; and as he is unmarried, and without brothers or sisters, he has the sole enjoyment of his rich possessions."

"Do you know him?"

"Not at all; but my brother does, of course; and from what I have heard, I imagine that of all the Atherstones that have ever lived he is the one who is the most entirely devoted to his old home, and intensely proud of it."

"He has lived in it all his life," said Lilith, "and he always knew that it was to belong to himself. He was brought to it as the heir, on the death of his father, when he was quite an infant. His uncle, who died three years ago, was the eldest brother; but he never married, so Humphrey of course succeeded. I believe he has literally never left it, excepting to go to school and college, and he refused to stand for the county the other day, because he did not wish to leave home. He has always managed the whole property himself, for both his grandfather and his uncle were much attached to him, and trusted everything in his hands. I believe he retains all sorts of superannuated old servants about him still; but I should think it must be rather a rough establishment, for there has been no lady belonging to it since his mother died nearly thirty years ago."

"He is not very young, then?"

"Upwards of thirty, certainly."

"And what sort of a man is he, Miss Crichton? I suppose you know him?" asked Una.

Lilith was silent for a few minutes, and then, when Una repeated her question, she said with evident reluctance, "My brother Richard does not like him."

"Why, Lilith," exclaimed Hervey, "he must be desperately bad if you have not a good word to say for him. I had no idea that he was such a terrible character."

"I did not say he was bad, Hervey."

"Never mind," said Una lightly, perceiving that Miss Crichton looked troubled; "I dare say I shall make his acquaintance some day, and then I can judge for myself. In the meantime do tell me what is that exceedingly strange-looking little tower on the very top of a tremendously high cliff, a long way above Atherstone itself. It looks even older than the Abbey, and seems half in ruins; but I should think it must belong to the property."

"It does," said Lilith; "and there is a singular story connected with it. An Atherstone, in very old times, committed some great crime—what it was I do not know, but he became haunted with a terrible remorse, which gave him no rest night or day; so at last he had this lonely tower built, as a place where he might spend the rest of his life in penitence; and when it was ready, he took leave of all his friends, and went up to it, and never left it again till the day of his death. It is called the 'Eagle's Nest,' because it is so inaccessible."

"It does look inaccessible; nevertheless, after hearing such a story as that connected with it, I most certainly shall make my way to it some day," said Una.

"If you think of going on horseback, Miss Dysart," said Hervey, "you would find it quite impossible; the ascent is much too steep and rugged, and there is no regular path."

"On these two feet I will go," said Una merrily; "but I shall not tell you, or any one else, how or when I shall accomplish it. I shall go by myself, and then perhaps I shall meet the ghost of the wicked old penitent."

"Should you think that a very desirable result?" said Hervey, smiling.

"Most certainly I should."

"And what would you say to him if you did meet him?"

"I should ask him to tell me my future fate. I have no doubt I should find he knew it quite well;" and as she spoke, with careless laughter, the flying breeze caught the words and bore them lightly away, but there came a day when they returned to her, and lay upon her heart with a weight of lead.

It was now growing late, so after a glance at the huge house in the distance, which Mr. Crichton told Una belonged to the duke, the great man of the county, they turned down the hill and took their way homewards.

CHAPTER IV.

THE Dysarts soon had hosts of visitors. Colonel Dysart was known by name—both as a distinguished officer and through Lady Mary's connections—to many of the families in the county, and they were very glad to welcome both him and his bright, aristocratic-looking daughter to the society of the neighbourhood; amongst others Mr. and Mrs. Northcote called, when both Una and her father happened to be out, so that one of the first places they went to when they got their carriage and horses, was to pay the return visit at Northcote Manor.

Colonel Dysart had limited his stud to riding-horses for himself and Una, and the groom who attended them, but he also provided her with a little low carriage and a pair of fast-trotting ponies, which she was to drive herself, for he was much too indolent to give himself even that small amount of trouble, and when they started on a fine afternoon to visit the Northcotes, Una managed the spirited little steeds, while her father leant back on the cushions at her side, and watched the skill with which her light firm hand managed the reins.

They had reached a rather steep ascent on the road, and Una let the ponies walk till they got on more level ground. Just as they gained the summit of the highest part they overtook Richard Crichton, who was walking slowly on, talking to a man following respectfully a step or two behind him.

"Wait a moment, Una," said Colonel Dysart, "I want to ask the rector a question," and she checked the ponies while her father got out and went up to speak to the clergyman. Mr. Crichton joined him at once, and they went on a few steps, while his companion, drawing back, turned slowly round, and standing within a few paces of Una, looked her full in the face. She gave an involuntary start, and an unaccountable fascination seemed to compel her to fix her eyes on the remarkable-looking person before her. It was fascination, but of a very unpleasant description, for the strangest feeling of chill and repulsion thrilled through her whole frame as she looked at him. He was a young man, not more than five-and-twenty years of age; not really tall, but gaining an appearance of height from his extreme slimness, with a dark olive complexion which spoke unmistakably of Southern blood of some sort; he had thin, finely-cut features and sleepy-looking, almond-shaped eyes, that were usually more than half veiled by the lids, but when opened to their full extent were of the most intense black, with a fiery glow in their inmost depths that made them look almost like the gleaming eyes of some savage animal. His thin lips had a snake-like curve, and his hair, cut very short over the whole head, was of a dead coal-black hue, straight and smooth. It was essentially an evil face, subtle and cruel in its expression, notwithstanding that it was, undoubtedly, not without a certain beauty of a peculiar kind. He was respectably dressed, but had not in the least the appearance of a gentleman. He wore gold rings in his ears and on the fingers of his dark lithe hand, and was unquestionably a foreigner, though it would not have been easy to judge by his appearance from what country he came.

As Una met the fixed gaze of this man, the sense of repulsion she felt at first grew into the strangest sort of superstitious terror she had ever experienced. How it could be she knew not, but she felt an instinctive conviction that this man had some terribly evil power over her destiny, and that she would be quite unable to free herself from his malignant influence. She shuddered, tried to avert her eyes, and found herself irresistibly drawn to look at him again. She felt as if an icy breath were passing over her making the whole air chill, and it was with inexpressible relief that she saw her father returning to her.

"Why, Una, you look quite blue with cold. How does that happen on such a sunny afternoon?"

She grasped hold of his arm and said in a hoarse whisper, "Who is that man?"

"The man Crichton was speaking to? How should I know child? What are you thinking of?"

The foreigner had moved away, and in a moment Una felt restored to herself, the chill of fear passed off, it seemed as if the sunshine had regained its strength, and she could not even understand what it was that had made her shiver and shrink so strangely the instant before.

"I do not know what in the world was the matter with me," she said, her bright smile returning as she made the ponies move on again. "I felt suddenly such a horrible dread and dislike to that man, though he never spoke a word, and seemed inoffensive enough."

"I do not see anything remarkable about him to make you notice him at all," said Colonel Dysart, glancing back at the foreigner, who had rejoined the rector. "He seems to be one of those mongrel fellows, half-African and half-European, of whom we have seen numbers at the Cape."

"Perhaps he reminded me of some I had a bad opinion of there," said Una; "but apparently he must be a meritorious individual, since Mr. Crichton seems to be actually feeling a grim satisfaction in talking to him: the rector's hard, cold face gives one the impression that his natural tendencies, at least, are towards a general condemnation of every one for everything."

"A sweeping conclusion, which certainly would leave no loophole of escape for any of us; but he is a thoroughly upright man, Una, you may be sure of that, he only unfortunately mars his goodness, as many do, by a want of geniality and courtesy," replied her father.

They were soon at the gates of Northcote Manor, and drove up a long avenue, through park-like grounds, to the door of the large substantial-looking house which, with no pretensions to architectural beauty, seemed thoroughly commodious and comfortable. A tall distinguished-looking young man with a rather languid air was lounging on a terrace at one side of the house, smoking a cigar, and he watched Una critically as she jumped out of the carriage and gave the reins to the servant, but he did not come forward, and she passed on with her father and entered the house.

They were ushered into a large pleasant drawing-room, which had only two occupants, a ponderous lady of decidedly formidable aspect, attired in the stiffest and most rustling of silks, who sat on a sofa reading the Times, and at once recalled to Una Hervey Crichton's description of Mrs. Northcote as a British matron, and a young girl who was crouching down on the floor beside a large Newfoundland dog, whom she seemed to be tormenting with all sorts of malicious tricks. She started to her feet as the visitors came in, and showed a light elegant figure, small but in perfect proportion, and a strikingly piquante face, with sparkling dark eyes, a mutinous little mouth, and a quantity of black hair, cut short and brushed off her forehead in a state of wild confusion, which was rather increased than diminished by the knots of scarlet velvet that were supposed to restrain it.

"I shall like 'Will,'" thought Una as she glanced at her, but she was obliged to give her undivided attention to Mrs. Northcote, who now came forward, wearing a look of stern benevolence, and welcomed the new-comers with deep solemnity. All this lady's movements, even on the most trivial occasions, seemed designed to show that she was engaged in a very self-conscious performance of duty, and that she wished it to be understood her every action, even when it consisted in nothing more virtuous then the depositing of her formidable frame in a comfortable arm-chair, was conducted on the strictest principle. It would probably be a very complete explanation of the eccentricities of Miss Wilhelmina Northcote to say, that they were simply the result of a strong reaction from the too severe training she had received.

The visit commenced with a most rigid observance of the laws of etiquette. Miss Northcote was introduced, Mr. Northcote was sent for, and Mr. Rupert Northcote, who sauntered in at the open French window, was named with a state ceremonial which would not have been out of place in presenting the heir to the throne. The gentleman who for thirty years had had the overpowering felicity of enjoying life in company with Mrs. Northcote was a stout, good-humoured looking individual, who had forgotten his spectacles on the top of his bald forehead where he had pushed them up from his eyes, and who glanced perpetually at the mistress of his affections (and everything else) with a bland, weak expression which seemed to show that, having resigned his purse and his conscience unto her careful keeping, he was now enabled to take life very easily, secure that all his affairs, including his duties, would be carefully managed. He was, however, a thorough gentleman, and talked pleasantly and kindly to his new acquaintances in the general conversation which followed his entrance; Mrs. Northcote's share in it was chiefly addressed to Una, who was painfully conscious that she was becoming exceedingly drowsy under a course of that lady's remarks, and she welcomed the appearance of afternoon tea with great satisfaction, as an event which might possibly cause a change in her position. Miss Northcote took care that it should; she had been openly manifesting no small impatience at the formal nature of the visit, and had already varied it on her own behalf by rushing herself out at the window to order Colonel Dysart's carriage to be sent round to the stables, when her father proposed it, and returning back again into the room before Mrs. Northcote had finished the speech in which she was requesting Rupert to ring the bell, that she might give the necessary orders. The young lady's next proceeding was to place Miss Dysart's cup of tea on a little table in the window which opened on the lawn, where they were out of hearing of the rest of the company, and Una gladly rose at her invitation and joined her there; Rupert followed, and Miss Northcote was soon laughing and talking as if she had known her visitor all her life. Presently she began to question her as to the acquaintances she had already made in the neighbourhood, and when Una mentioned the Crichtons, she perpetrated a frightful grimace at the rector's name.

"Don't speak to me of that iron man," she said, "I cannot command my feelings when he is mentioned; but Hervey is an uncommonly good fellow, I like him very much."

"I think Miss Crichton quite charming," said Una.

"She is the dearest little thing in the world," said Miss Northcote, "but awfully slow."

"Very slow indeed," said Rupert, composedly, "she does not talk slang."

"Since you object to my style of conversation, Ru, I will leave you to enjoy that of our respected elders. Miss Dysart, do come out and let me show you our fernery." She did not wait for her visitor's consent, but quietly turning round, she said, "Miss Dysart wishes to go out, mother, we shall not come back for some little time," and then lightly dancing down the steps which led from the window, she held out her hand to Una who joined her with great goodwill; Rupert was following, but Will stopped, and facing him in a very decided manner, ordered him to remain where he was.

"At least, you do not come with us," she said; "I mean to find out what sort of a person Miss Dysart is quite by myself." Rupert laughed, and went back as if he knew it was no use to dispute her authority, and she drew Una rapidly on by a shady walk which led to the river.

"That was rather a terrific announcement of yours," said Una, as they almost ran along together; "perhaps you will be very much dissatisfied with the discoveries you may make in my character."

"I do not expect I shall, I think you will suit me; anyhow, I simply want a jolly talk by ourselves. Of course we are not going to the fernery, I hate ferns."

"Where are we going then?"

"To a little nook by the river-side, which is a favourite hiding-place of mine, and where they will not be able to find us, if they send for you before I am ready to let you go. There now," she said as they reached their destination, "is not this perfect?"

It was a pleasant spot, certainly, a mossy bank carpeted at this season with primroses and violets, and drooping willow-trees all round them, whose branches, just tinged with tender green, touched the sparkling waters of the swiftly-rushing river that rolled past them, making music in the still soft air. Miss Northcote flung herself down at once on a bed of flowers, and Una very willingly took a place beside her.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART VI. CHRIST IN SOCIAL LIFE.

Chapters to be read—John ii., Luke x. (parts of).

INTRODUCTION.—Begin by asking a few questions about Paradise; man's creation; place of happiness provided, with every desire gratified. Pleasures of flowers to eye, food to taste, &c., yet something more wanted; what was it? Companionship. Not good to be alone (Gen. ii. 18). After the Fall find same thing. Abraham promised to become head of great nation (Gen. xii. 2). Solemn yearly feasts appointed for families to remember family mercies and deliverances (see Exod. xii. 3, &c.), so we are told that solitary are set in families (Ps. lxviii. 6), and families especially blessed (Ps. cxxviii. 3). Show that all this teaches how each has a share in social life; no one lives alone; all have some one in close daily intercourse. This involves certain pleasures, duties, trials. We will see Christ's example.

I. CHRIST AT THE MARRIAGE FEAST. (Read John ii. 1—11.) (1) The scene. Point out that it was our Lord's first miracle, yet His mother seems to have expected some display of power (ver. 5). What wonders had she seen attending His birth? Had pondered them for thirty years. Describe the scene of the feast: guests assembled, reclining round the room; servants waiting; supplies of wine running short. How would the bridegroom feel? Now ask about the water-pots; for what purpose? Refer to Mark vii. 3. (2) The miracle. Notice that it seems to have been done quite quietly—without show. The servants fill the water-jars; how full? Why to the brim? Could be no pretence that any wine was concealed, and would be good provision for the future for the married couple. Imagine the feelings of the bridegroom; amazement of guests, and joy of Mary. (3) The effect. Who were present? What had disciples heard John the Baptist say about Him just before (John i. 29)? Must have been surprised at this beginning of miracles: yet made them believe in Him.

APPLICATION. What does it teach about Christ? How was His glory shown? (a) In sharing our social life. Great honour when some one higher than ourselves will come to a meal with us. (b) In blessing the food. Remind how food, like all gifts, from God (James i. 17); how often Christ gave food? always with a kind of special blessing. Are to glorify God in eating as in anything else. (c) In giving pleasure to others. To His mother, who would delight in her Son; to the bridegroom, in receiving such a store of food, and having such an honoured Guest; to the disciples, in raising their opinion of their new Master. What does it teach for ourselves? (a) The blessing of having Christ in our houses. All seek Him in sickness and trials; how few in health and at feasts! (b) Christ's best gifts come last. Often have in this life sorrow, care, &c.; if seek Christ's blessing, weeping turned into joy, water into wine, and at end will find best reserved for last—cross become crown.

II. CHRIST AT BETHANY. (Read Luke x. 38—42.) Remind how Christ had no home. Sometimes stayed with Peter at Capernaum—sometimes with the family at Bethany. Ask who were the members, and anything about them; Lazarus afterwards raised to life; Martha, who came out to meet Jesus and reproached Him for not coming sooner (John xi. 21); Mary, who anointed His feet (John xii. 3). Where did they live? Describe the walk from Jerusalem; after teaching all day in Temple, going out of gate, down valley of Jehoshaphat, over brook Cedron, past garden of Gethsemane, up hill to cottage among olive-trees of Mount Olives. Picture the family scene; Lazarus coming in to supper; Martha bustling about to do all honour to the Guest; Mary nestling at His feet to catch every word. Contrast the two sisters. (a) Martha, quite right to think of Guest's comfort. Some have entertained angels unawares (Heb. xiii. 2); this more than angel: wrong to think too much of the meal; preparing many things, i.e., dishes. Christ man of simple habits, one dish enough. Also was "troubled," i.e., out of temper, because left alone to serve; might have been glad to spare her sister. (b) Mary, not praised for idleness, but for delighting to listen to Christ. Show how a teacher anxious to gain people would value eager attention to his words more than attention to his comfort. So Mary's was the "best part," which would last, feeding on bread of life (John vi. 27).

APPLICATION. Some children always busy, restless, eager about learning games, &c., but not about souls. Remind of Parable of Sower; that cares as well as pleasures may choke the word, and no fruit result. Learn to work for Christ, but to learn of Him first. So will grow in grace and bring forth fruit of good works.

Questions to be answered.

1. Show that God intends man not to live alone.
2. Describe our Lord's first miracle.
3. What does it teach about Christ?
4. What may we learn for ourselves?
5. What do you know of the family at Bethany?
6. Contrast Martha and Mary's welcome to Christ.

SHAG AND DOLL.

A STORY OF TWO HOMELESS LITTLE ONES, IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER III.

SHAG had not gone far when, on turning a corner, he almost ran against a stall on which rolls, buns, and various other things were displayed for sale. A three-legged stool behind the stall formed a seat for the owner, but it was now vacant; and the whole street seemed silent and empty. Of course the owner of the stall could not be very far away; still there was time enough to snatch some of the rolls and be off, long before any one could catch him.

It was a sore temptation. There was little Doll, waiting for him—perhaps dying—perhaps she might even be dead when he got back, if he did not make haste and take her something to eat. But if only he could give her a good meal, he might still save her. The thought made him desperate, and his hand was stretched out to seize the coveted prize, when suddenly, with a start as if he had been stung, he drew it back again. The words had darted into his mind—"The next time you are going to do something you know you ought not to do, think that He is looking on."

"Ah! that Friend he telled us about wouldn't like us to steal. He'll see me if I do; and I should like to go to that home—Doll wishes it so; if only we could go both together. Oh, I hope He'll help me! I'll keep my hands tight behind my back, and run past;" and, suiting the action to the word, Shag was darting away when he was seized in a woman's strong grasp, and suddenly brought to a standstill.

"Now then, you young rascal, what have you been a doing there at my stall? I see'd ye a standing there, and I'll be bound ye've been a helping on yourself pretty freely. Turn out yer pockets, and let's see 'em."

"I aint took nothing. I s'pose a feller may look at a thing, mayn't he? looking ain't stealing."

"It's very nigh it," retorted the other, "and I see'd ye put out yer hand, for I was a watching on yer." Then, after she had satisfied herself that Shag had secreted nothing, she continued: "Well, there, I see you've got nothing about you: you haven't many pockets that 'ud hold much in these 'ere rags. Why, the boy's nothing but skin and bone!" she exclaimed, loosing her hold of the arm, which was so thin it seemed as if it might be crushed within her grasp.

"And Doll's worse than me," sobbed Shag, bursting into tears as his thoughts reverted to her. "Doll's my little sister, and she'll die, she will, if I don't be quick and take her something to eat. Oh, she's such a pretty little dear, is Doll!" moaned the boy; and then his streaming eyes turned longingly towards the eatables displayed so temptingly upon the stall.

The woman's heart was touched. Rough though she was, she could not withstand such a mute, pathetic appeal, joined to the sight of such deep, childish grief. "Here, I've got a stale roll or two, and you may take 'em back to little Doll," she said in softer tones. "There, that's one apiece for you; and now make haste back with 'em to her; and a good thing 'tis for you that you didn't try to steal 'em, for if you had I'd ha' catched you, sure as I'm alive, and then you wouldn't ha' had none of my rolls, that's certain."

With hurried thanks, but grateful looks, Shag ran off back to the old cask where he had left Doll. She raised her weary eyes, and gave a feeble smile of welcome, as the boy, with a joyful shout, threw himself down beside her.

"See, Doll! here's good luck! A woman as keeps a stall give me these. Make haste and eat yours, Doll.

Oh, aint it good!" said Shag, feelingly, as he devoured his portion with an eagerness that showed how great had been his hunger.

Shag had finished his roll before Doll had eaten more than a quarter of hers. "Why, Doll, you don't seem to get on very fast."

"I think I've had enough," said Doll, with a sigh of weariness, as she laid down her roll.

"Enough! why I could eat three or four times as much! and I thought you said you was so hungry!" exclaimed Shag, in amazement.

"So I was, but I aint now; I've eaten a good deal already. You have the rest, Shag; you finish it."

"No, no," returned Shag, resolutely; "that's your share, and you're to eat it all, Doll. If you don't want it now, keep it till by-and-by. You'll soon be hungry again."

"But I'd like you to have it, Shag. Do take it; 'cause you're a boy, you know, and wants more than me."

"No, no," said Shag, gently pushing the tempting morsel away with his hand. "We'll keep it for breakfast to-morrow, Doll, in case we don't get anything else; you'll be hungry by then."

"Shag, afore we goes to sleep couldn't we ask Him the gen'leman was telling us of, to take care of us, and let us come to that home? Wouldn't it be nice if you and me could go there both together!"

Shag agreeing, the two children rose. As they were going to ask for something, it seemed natural to them to do it in the posture in which they were accustomed to beg: so hand in hand, with upturned faces, they stood and sent up their untaught petition.

"Please, Jesus, be our Friend, and keep us safe, and take us both to that beautiful home."

So far they said it together; and then Doll added, "Please take us soon." "And both on us together," continued Shag.

When the moon arose that night she shone upon the river, and the wharf, and the old casks lying about. Could her beams have penetrated into that particular one appropriated by the children, she would have seen two little forms, locked in each other's embrace, and in unconscious slumber.

But Doll was restless; she would often move, and opening her lips would murmur, "Please, Jesus, take us both safe home," and then would seem lost again in sleep. Once Shag awoke at the same time, when Doll tried to nestle yet closer to him, saying, "It's very cold, Shag—so very very cold."

Shag got up, and taking off the tattered, threadbare garment he called a jacket, wrapped it round Doll in spite of her remonstrances.

"You'll be cold yourself now, Shag; do put it on again, and then we'll lie a bit closer together."

"No, no; you keep it round you. I aint cold; and if I was, what does that matter?—boys don't care for cold."

"Give me a kiss, Shag, afore I goes to sleep—I'm so sleepy;" and the little lips were pressed against Shag's dirty cheek, whilst Shag, clasping her tightly inhis arms showered kiss after kiss upon her.

The heavy little eyes closed; but opened again after a moment; and once more the child spoke. "When we get to that beautiful home, we shan't be tired, nor hungry, nor cold, shall we, Shag? And we shan't be parted one from another neither."

"No, it'll be fine to be there!" responded Shag; and very soon both fell asleep.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

183. Which of the Evangelists gives the additional facts that the waves beat into the ship when our Lord was asleep during the storm, and that He was reposing on a pillow?

184. Is there any reason for supposing that St. Luke wrote his Gospel at a somewhat late period of the apostolic age?

185. St. Matthew narrating the healing of the sick brought to our Lord, adds: "That it might be fulfilled that was spoken by the prophet, saying, Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses." To which prophet did he refer?

186. Which body of believers did St. Paul call his "joy and crown?"

187. One of the Evangelists, in alluding to the village in which the Lord's ordinary home was situated makes a citation from a prophecy which is not recorded in any of the sacred writings. Quote the words referred to.

188. The prophet Jeremiah told a certain person that he "would be a terror to himself and to all his friends." Give the name of this man.

189. What plea did St. Peter urge in his defence when charged by those "who were of the circumcision" with eating with the Gentiles?

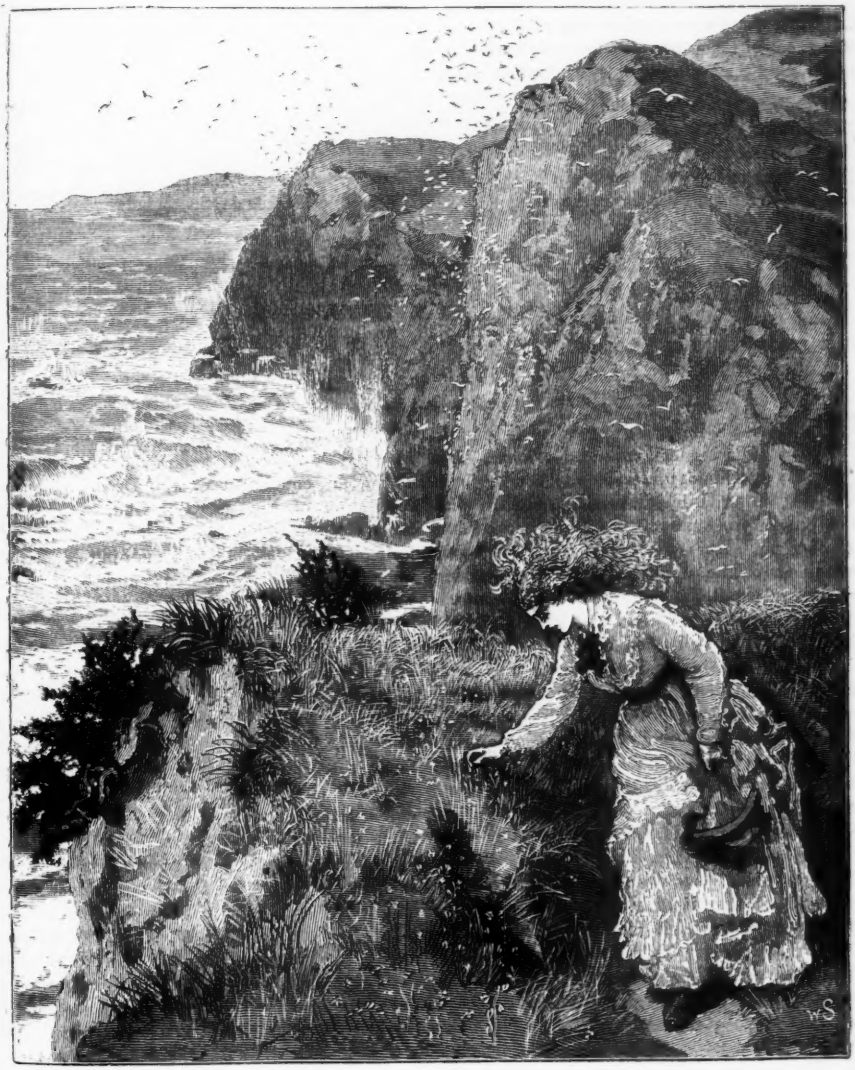
190. Find a parallel in the Old Testament to the words of the angel to Joseph in reference to the Infant Christ, Return, "for they are dead who sought the young Child's life" (Matt. ii. 20).

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 432.

168. Isa. xxx. 28; Amos ix. 9.

169. By Balaam's. See Numb. xxxi. 15, 16.

170. Annas (John xviii. 13; Acts iv. 6—20).



171. Ps. lxxii. 10.

172. James and John (Luke ix. 52—56).

173. 1 Kings xi. 41. The book of Nathan the prophet; the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite; and in the visions of Iddo the seer (2 Chron. ix. 29).

174. By the order of Herod Agrippa I. he was killed by the sword (Acts xii. 2).

175. We read in John xviii. 15 that St. John obtained admission for himself and St. Peter into the palace of the high priest when our Lord was conveyed thither, and remained while He was examined, and in Acts iv. 13 it is stated "they took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus."

AMONG THE ROCKS.

(WRITTEN AT WATCOMBE.)

HOAR cliffs! ye preach unto the souls of men
The gathered wisdom of uncounted years
That stretch into the past beyond our ken;
So star-dust through the sage's tube appears.
How vast a battle-field of hopes and fears
Your stone-leaves furnish for conflicting minds,
For Error's sophists and Truth's dauntless seers;
Whose blades must cross, till sense no longer winds
Round man a wreath of mist that dazzles while it blinds.

The spring has decked your brows with loveliness—
  You look as if in gratitude you smiled
On May's white blow and golden gorse's tress,
  Fairer than ringlet of the fairest child;
  And bluebells quiver to the sea-breeze mild,
Who gently strokes them with a viewless hand,
  Till faint, sweet music, ravishingly wild,
Breathes out of them, like strains from elfin-land,
Down-floating thence to die upon the foam-lit sand.

And in the sky, shows not a cloudy curl
  To share the sapphire with the sea-bird's wing,
And at your feet the crested billows hurl
  Their snowy tribute from the Ocean King;
  And ever and anon their forms they fling
Against your rugged sides, and feel no harm,
  But hoarsely laughing, with a sudden spring
Leap back again, creatures that bear a charm,
Proud nurslings of the deep, reared by a monarch's arm.

Ye wondrous piles! bearing a bygone earth
  Within you, ancestors of worlds to be!
We know not yet the secret of their birth:
  We shall know in our immortality.
  We know, by faith, those spirits shall be free
Who toil for Truth through prison-bars below;
  And that Great Cause, their one Creator, He Shall give them eyes of everlasting glow
To pierce creation's depths, and alway brighter grow!

JANE DIXON.

COMFORTABLE WORDS.—V.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK-ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"My Father's house."—John xiv. 2 (part).

THERE is something very pleasant in thinking of heaven as a home. We would not undervalue, of course, those other Bible-descriptions which surround the future state of the redeemed with a blaze of glory. It is well when eyes, too much accustomed to be occupied with the passing pageantry of earth, lift themselves to the contemplation of the gates of pearl and streets of gold above. And it is well when ears, too often filled with the hum and bustle of this lower world, can catch, in the occasional pauses of life, some echoes from the vast melodies of the upper sanctuary. But, perhaps, the calm and repose which we crave in times of sorrow are best found in such a thought as that presented to us in the words of our Lord just quoted.

Now consider that Christ was on the point of returning to His Father. There was a sense in which He could say—always say, "I am not alone, because the Father is with me." And yet there was also a sense in which He was separated from the Father, by the very relation in which He stood to mankind; and this separation could only be terminated by His rising again from the dead and ascension into heaven. At present then He was absent from the Father. Until His work was done, until His task was fulfilled, that close association and intercourse, for which His whole being longed, could not become possible. In Him, at this time, the utterance of the Psalmist found its truest expression, "My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God. When shall I come to appear before God?" And the people of Christ partake, in their feebler measure, of the spirit of Christ. Because God is the Father of Christ, He is also the Father of Christ's people, "My Father and your Father," says the Lord. And though there is, even in this world, an enjoyment of the Divine presence, a realisation of the personal God, which constitutes the "rest" of the soul, yet the Christian feels instinctively that something better and higher is in store for him; and he looks forward earnestly to the closer intimacies of the Home above.

It is not meant, of course, that our sojourn on earth is an altogether unhappy one. No! There is an unwholesomeness, and there is a tinge of insincerity too, about the language we sometimes hear applied to human life: and it is not grateful, to say the least of it, to depreciate the rich provision which God has made for our comfort, on our march from time into eternity. But still, no true Christian would like to abide here always. After all, with all his thankful recognition of bounties and mercies, he is not in his fatherland, but only on his way to it. His religion commands him to enjoy, but forbids him to rest in the enjoyment. As he travels onward through the desert, he may gladly welcome the little oasis with its green grass, and the cool shade of the feathery palm-trees, and the bright water of the ever-springing fountain; and, it may be, with the shadow of a great Rock in a weary land. But he must not let his heart so wrap itself round the pleasure and the comfort, as that he should forget the land to which he is hastening. He is only a pilgrim, a stranger and a sojourner, as all his fathers were; and he must be ready to strike his tent and move on, on the morrow. God has given us many little wells of blessing. Family affection is not the least of them. But we must not stay by them dreaming and enjoying; we must gird up our loins, and be up and away.

But let us change our image. Most of us know what are the feelings of children at school The boy is not unhappy there. He feels, perhaps, that the discipline and toil are necessary to fit him for the business of life; and he bears the yoke with some cheerfulness. Nor is he without his boyish pleasures to console him. But yet he longs for the time when school shall be over, and he shall return to the love and the companionship of his father's house. And is it not so with Christian people? They are not miserable. No. For who has such a right to be happy as Christians have? And a glow from heaven, bright as well as sanctifying, rests upon their daily life. Yet they are like children at school. They are in the school of Christ. In this school are many classes; some lower, some higher; and the disciples are being gradually advanced, under the teaching of the Spirit, from one to another. But all are learning one lesson, a lesson contained in four little words—"Thy will be done." How hard it is sometimes for us to learn that lesson! But learnt it must be. In some way or other we must be made perfect in it. And by-and-by the disciple is removed into the highest class; and then, having mastered the difficult lesson, he is ready to be taken from school. A messenger comes—the grim messenger Death! But what matters it? The scholar leaves his discipline, his tasks, his restraints, his punishments, to be taken to the repose and blessedness of his heavenly Father's Home.

Pursue the idea a little farther. Imagine the child travelling from the school to the house. The journey, perhaps, is taken by night; the road seems bleak and comfortless; the air is chill, and whistles through the trees; the snow begins to fall; and the boy shudders as he steps out into the gloom. But ere long he is carried up to the threshold of the mansion. The door flies open. The light and the warmth stream forth; and there are all his kin assembled to receive him, and loving hands of welcome are stretched forth to greet his arrival. He is folded in his father's and mother's arms; and in the calm peacefulness of his home, he forgets the sorrows of his days of discipline, and the discomforts of the way by which he came.

So with the Christian. Heaven to him will be no strange place, tenanted by unrecognised and unrecognisable forms. The Saviour whom he knew and loved on earth will be there; friends, relations, children—who have gone before—will be there; and a burst of loving joy from "the general assembly and church of the first-born," will greet him as he enters the gates of the celestial city.

THE SINNER'S HIDING-PLACE.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

"And Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden."—Gen. iii. 8.
"Thou art my hiding-place."—Ps. xxxii. 7.

TAKING these two passages of Scripture together, we are presented with a subject which well deserves all the attention we can bestow upon it. We are taught what a difference there is between hiding from God and hiding in God. We have two pictures here placed side by side. First, we see conscience-stricken and convicted sinners vainly endeavouring to provide a hiding-place for themselves. In the other passage of Scripture we have called up to view that hiding-place of inviolable security which the Lord has provided for the sinner in Himself. In the one case, we see Adam and his wife hiding themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden. In the other, we see David rejoicing greatly as he discovers the hiding-place which has been provided for him in God. These two Scriptures set before us what is ever taking place. We see many vainly seeking to hide themselves from God; while others, led by a truer wisdom, are to be seen resorting to the mighty God as their hiding-place and refuge.

(1) Let us look at these conscience-stricken sinners trying to hide themselves from God—that God whose law they have broken, and against whose rule they have rebelled. We see Adam and his wife hiding themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden. Having read the previous narrative, we feel compelled to inquire as to the reason of this newly-manifested dread of God, and reluctance to meet Him.

Our first vision of the world, as it proceeds from the creative hand of God, is a very pleasant and satisfying one. We see material order and perfection, upon which God Himself can look with complacency. We see man created in God's likeness, fulfilling the purpose of his creation, and enjoying communion with his Creator. We look again, and we see at once that a change has occurred; a blight has fallen upon material creation, the original order is disturbed, the harmony which once prevailed has been interrupted, the crown of glory no longer graces the brow of man.

If we inquire as to the amazing and disastrous change which has passed over the world and its inhabitants, the Bible alone can furnish us with the information we seek. If we refer to the narrative contained in this chapter, we find that while it leaves many questions unanswered, it tells us all that we really need to know.

We see man first in a state of innocence and moral perfection; we then see him exposed to temptation and falling under it; we then see him in a state of moral ruin and degradation, shrinking from all intercourse with his Maker; and, finally, we see him ignominiously expelled from that state of blessedness in which, but for his sin, he would have continued.

We have here an account of God's first interview with Adam after the Fall. Adam, who has previously come forth to meet and welcome his Maker, now dreads, and seeks to shun, His presence. He attempts to hide himself in the thick shade afforded by the trees of the garden; but the voice of the Lord reaches him in his hiding-place, and summons him to an interview from which, conscious of guilt, he shrinks.

Here we have one of the earliest effects of sin. We see Adam and his wife attempting to hide themselves from that God in whose presence and favour they had so recently rejoiced. Every sinner whose conscience is in any degree aroused and alarmed shares the experience of these original transgressors, and seeks to hide himself—or, at least, wishes he could hide himself from the presence of the Lord. The moment a man sins, he feels that he has something to hide, and that he himself has need to be hidden. It was so with these first sinners; it has been so with all their descendants.

We not only see Adam hiding himself, but we hear him, in reply to God's inquiry, declaring why he did so. He said unto the Lord—"I heard Thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked, and I hid myself."

Every circumstance is significant. God enters the garden as He has been accustomed to do—as though nothing unusual had occurred. There is nothing on the part of God to indicate His cognisance of man's sin; but Adam, instead of coming forth to meet his Maker, attempts to conceal himself. The attempt is vain; the voice of God finds him out in his hiding-place; the words—Adam, where art thou? fills his guilty soul with dread. These words have more the character of a complaint than a question. They reached Adam not so much as a simple interrogation, as a sharp searching demand, a demand with an imputation of guilt, not yet directly urged; God does not propose the question that He may be informed as to the state of the case with which already He is perfectly acquainted, but that Adam may be convinced of the sin, of the enormity of which he is still unconscious.

The question assumes man's altered position—Where art thou? Thou art not where I left thee. Thou art not what I left thee! Thou wast in the rightful enjoyment of paradise—in the possession of immortality; now thou art fallen into a state of sin and perdition. Always till now thou camest forth to meet me. Why dost thou shrink and hide thyself from my approach?

Adam is unwilling to acknowledge more than that he is afraid. "I heard Thy voice," he says, "and I was afraid, because I was naked, and I hid myself." God's question should have been enough to reach the heart, to stir the conscience, to fill the soul with sorrow and amazement, to elicit immediate and penitential confession. But, no! The deadening influence of sin already declares itself. Adam ignores the imputation involved in the inquiry, and in reply refers to his material condition, and not to the state of his soul; he refers to his nakedness, of which he is ashamed, but not to his sin, which is the parent of shame; he is terrified by the voice of God, but not because of the violation of His law. He admits that he is ashamed, that he is fearful, that he desires to conceal himself from the presence of God; but he does not acknowledge, and is altogether unwilling to acknowledge, that he has committed sin.

When God presses upon him the more urgent and searching inquiry as to whether he has eaten of the fruit of the forbidden tree—a question which he cannot evade—we see Adam, who at first sought to hide himself among the trees of the garden, now attempting to avail himself of the shelter of a vain and frivolous excuse, and an excuse as mean and cowardly as it was vain and frivolous. He said, "The woman whom Thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat." Apology for sin is almost as old as sin itself. Transgression of the law and excuse for transgression go together. Man sins, and he casts the burden of his transgression professedly upon the woman, really upon God. He virtually charges God with being accessory to his sin. "The woman whom Thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat." He says to God, "If Thou hadst not done that, I should not have done this." Sin, which belongs to us more really than any other possession, is the only property we are unwilling to acknowledge as our own. The pleasure which attends the commission of sin, or the profitable consequences of it, men are not averse from; but sin itself they will not acknowledge—that they always attempt to hide. Adam was not ashamed to commit sin, but he was ashamed to confess it; and we see how sin at the first declared its true character, and involved the sinner in the additional guilt of criminal evasion.

We have dwelt thus at length upon the conduct of our first parent, on this memorable occasion, because he stands before us as the prototype and representative of all who have succeeded him in the transgression of God's law. His conduct, as we read of it, appears very unreasonable; and so it was. But it may be questioned if it were more unreasonable than the conduct of not a few of those who express their surprise at it. There is a wonderful and dreary monotony in the history of crime; and sin, as to its essential principles and leading features, is ever repeating itself. Men have ever been following in the footsteps of Adam, not only in the way of sin, but in the way of sinful excuse; they have not only shared his dread, but they have, like him, though in different ways, sought to hide themselves and their sins from the presence of the Lord.

How fruitful in excuses are all those who transgress God's law and violate their own consciences! How do they refer to the force of circumstances, their special temptations, the positions of difficulty and danger they have to occupy, and the evils of their necessary companionships? How seldom do we hear sins called by their right names, have them exhibited in their true colours, attributed to their sole cause! How ready are men to refer to anything rather than the corruption of their own hearts! It is always some defect in early education, some peculiarity of temperament, something over which they have had no control. Their pride is always the right kind of pride, and their avarice a prudent regard for the future. And if Adam charged his sin upon Eve, we are ever ready to charge our sin upon Adam, and through Adam upon God. This tendency, indeed, to throw some of the blame of sin upon God, mixes with all the excuses for sin which men offer, and imparts to them a character of incurable malignancy.

In all this we see the sinner attempting to hide himself from God; we see proof of the fact that the sinner, however little sense he may have of the enormity of sin, feels that he has something to hide, and that he himself needs to be hidden.

Yes, the sinner's instinct is a true one, which leads him to seek a hiding-place. Every sinner needs one, but it is one which he can never fashion or find for himself.

(2) If we refer to the other passage quoted at the head of this paper, we see the sinner joyfully discovering the hiding-place which has been provided for him in God. We have two pictures—Adam and his wife vainly attempting to hide themselves from the presence of the Lord amongst the trees of the garden; David rejoicing in the inviolable security of that hiding-place which he has found in God. Instead of shrinking from God in fearfulness, he can cry out exultingly—"Thou art my hiding-place; Thou shalt preserve me from trouble; Thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance."

The general character of the psalm in which these words occur is worthy of notice. David had sinned against God very grievously. He had experienced the hardening, deadening influence which sin, unacknowledged and unrepented of, ever exerts; but at last, instead of continuing to hide his sin, he was led to confess it, and to confess it to One who is ever ready to forgive. And then the sin which he could not hide, God covered; and the sinner who could not hide himself from the Lord, was able to rejoice at last to find for himself a hiding-place in the Lord.

No sinner finds a hiding-place in which he can feel safe and happy (and we cannot feel happy till we feel safe) but he who, like David, finds out God as his hiding-place. Happy and safe are they who can look up to God in Christ and say—"Thou art our hiding-place, Thou wilt preserve us from trouble, Thou wilt compass us about with songs of deliverance." This, then, is the great lesson which the conscience-stricken sinner has need to learn—that instead of vainly seeking to hide himself from God, he should try and hide himself in God. Turning away from all deceitful and lying refuges, he should say, "Thou art my hiding-place, O Lord."

That the sinner needs a hiding-place God's Word uniformly assumes; the many references we meet with in Scripture to places of refuge, defence, concealment have no meaning unless this need exists. The sinner's conscience, as we have seen, confirms what God's Word both assumes and declares. There is no sinner who does not feel, at least occasionally, that he needs a hiding-place. The broken law assails him with its threatenings, justice with its inexorable demands, Satan with his accusations, his own conscience with its reproaches. Where, O where, shall the sinner hide? where shall he find some safe place of concealment and refuge? In Scripture we meet with this wonderful but glorious declaration—that God, the Lord of heaven and earth, condescends to become the refuge and hiding-place of His people. This is an idea unto which, of ourselves, we should never have attained, and one by the majesty and magnitude of which we are well-nigh overwhelmed. Is it true? we are ready to exclaim—is it true that such sinful, guilty creatures as we are, can find a hiding-place in God? Yes, wonderful as this is, no fact can be more certain. In every age of the world God has been known as the hiding-place of His people; and in every time of danger have they resorted to Him, and hidden themselves in Him until the day of evil was overpast.

God Himself—God in Christ—becomes the one sure refuge and hiding-place for the sinful and endangered children of men. The Lawgiver Himself becomes the refuge of the transgressors of the law, and yet in such a way that the law is magnified and made honourable.

This refuge is one which affords absolute and inviolable security to all who avail themselves of it; once within this hiding-place we are safe from all kinds of evil and danger. There are many hiding-places, many refuges which afford partial and relative concealment and protection; in them we are safe from certain kinds of danger, but not from all kinds of danger. Pursued by our enemies, we may hide ourselves in some strong fortress, into which they cannot enter; but we may take refuge there only to be smitten down by famine or pestilence within its walls—but here we have absolute safety.

This refuge is open to all who desire the concealment and protection it affords. The various hiding-places, refuges, sanctuaries which have been provided for the endangered and the guilty have been, as a rule, designed for certain classes, and for them only. It was so with the cities of refuge. They were for the protection of the unintentional homicide; but not for the wilful murderer, or thief, or adulterer, or any ordinary transgressor of the law. But whoever flees to this hiding-place, to this sanctuary, will be admitted; its gates are ever open to all who seek the protection it affords,—"None is excluded hence but who himself excludes."

This refuge is easily accessible. It is of no use in the time of imminent danger, when every moment is of consequence, to know that there is a safe hiding-place miles and miles away; to feel that if we were there we should be safe, that no harm could come to us. But then, we are not there; and, using all diligence, we cannot reach the place of refuge in time; but this hiding-place is ever within reach, it is not far from any one of us.

The way to this hiding-place is plain, open, intelligible. The roads leading to the old cities of refuge were plainly indicated and carefully kept clear of all obstructions. So it is with the way leading to this refuge. We know who the way is. "I," says Christ, "I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no-wise cast out." There are in the Scriptures some things hard to be understood, but the way of salvation is perfectly plain. No one who wishes to be saved need stand in doubt. What can be more simple, more intelligible than the declarations of God's Word on this point? Where is he to be found who cannot understand the faithful saying which is worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners?

This is an eternal hiding-place: the same age after age, generation after generation. We often in our travels come upon old hiding-places, old refuges which once were strong and sufficient, but which are so no longer. There are fortresses which were once deemed impregnable, which the science of modern warfare would utterly despise. But if the Eternal God be our refuge, He will be to us a place of concealment and refuge in all generations.

We all, without exception, need a hiding-place. The question is, Are we seeking to hide our sinfulness from God? If so, we are engaged in a fruitless attempt. Or have we been led to seek and find the one true hiding-place which is to be found in God as He is made known to us in Christ Jesus? If so, we may well rejoice and be glad, for nothing shall be able to harm us, no evil thing shall come near unto us, for the Lord, Jehovah Himself, is as a wall of fire round about us, and no weapon formed against us shall prosper. If we are there we are safe, and should feel safe; we should have the peace which flows from a sense of security. Our fears should drive us to the refuge, but entering it, we should throw our fears away. We should be able to say, "Surely in the floods of great waters they shall not come nigh unto me. Thou, O Lord! art my hiding-place; Thou shalt preserve me from trouble; Thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance."

SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

THE WIDOW OF SAREPTA.

1 Kings xvii.

THE barrel wasted not, nor did there fail
The cruse of oil. That simple house was bless'd,
As holy homes are always, with God's best,
Though threatened penury may make them quail—
E'en when the last grim foe came to assail;
When worse than poverty and want of bread
Came to yon widow—when her child was dead,
Though, for an awful while, her faith was frail,
And all seemed lost beneath the avenging rod,
Though tears might start to her maternal eye,
Though framed her lips one bitter passionate cry,
She owned the presence of the man of God,
And straight the dear one lived. E'en though the sod
Veil your beloved ones from your straining sight,
Know they are living in God's Home of Light,
Though in our faithless accents earth-named Ichabod.*

* "The glory is departed."—1 Sam. iv. 21.

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM, AUTHOR OF "WORDS OF HELP," ETC.

BUSYBODYING.

"IT'S all very well, my dear sir, but for my part I'm what you may call a plain-spoken person, and I detest your trimmers and your disguisers, and your bated-breath sort of people. It's my habit to speak out-and-out just what I think about matters. It's everybody's duty to speak and to act straightforward-like in everything. Don't you think so, sir? I like to call a spade a spade. People shouldn't do awkward things if they don't want them talked about. I don't quite understand you, therefore, sir, when you say that we must be considerate and charitable, and all that sort of thing. Truth before any such poor puling sentimentality any day, say I; and it's really too bad of you to have said so much lately about not being busybodies. It's really quite insulting and dreadful to listen to such a charge!"

"Certainly, Mrs. M——, I agree with you in saying that we ought to dislike trimmers and disguisers, and those sort of people; but what on earth that has got to do with the question of busybodies, I can't see for the life of me. Not to be one thing, does not make it necessary to be another. Two negatives don't necessitate a positive—except when street-boys say, 'I aint got no marbles.' We are certainly not called upon to be tattlers because we are not trimmers and disguisers; and as you like to be plain-spoken, Mrs. M——, allow me for a moment to be plain-spoken with you. I've called this morning purposely to see you, because of a conversation you had in my house with my wife about a neighbour of ours. My wife didn't believe the story at the time, and I have found out that it is utterly and entirely untrue: but you, as a plain-spoken person, thought it your duty to talk of the matter as a verified fact.

"'But part of the story,' you say, 'is true—you are sure of that!' Well, suppose it is, Mrs. M——, does plain-spokenness, as you are pleased to call it, necessitate on our part the revelation of all we know? Why there would be an end of all pleasant intercourse if we were to out with all we think and all we know. Suppose your own little boy were to shout out in the parlour—'Mr. Brown's got a big wart on his nose; aint it ugly, ma?' and to act thus in Mr. Brown's very presence. Probably both fact and inference might be right. Warts are warts, and warts are ugly—specially so on the nose; but then there is no necessity, that I can see, for plain-spokenness about it at all; in fact, we should all think it highly seasonable and reasonable for the juvenile offender, in such a case, to have appropriate banishment and early bed for his offence. Well, I can see no difference between that sort of thing and outspoken talk about people's tempers, and errors, and mistakes! In or out of Mr. Brown's presence we can talk at him or about him, and we can make him quiver with wrath and indignation and not do him even an ounce of good; and I can see no virtue at all in that sort of torture. If we are always to out with the truth, we shall find it as miserable a business for ourselves as for others.

"'It's all very well,' you say, 'talking like that; but for your part, you like to be dealt with in a plain-spoken way yourself.'

"Excuse me, Mrs. M——, if I very considerably doubt that. This is the very thing I question entirely; for I have ever found in life that satirical people wince extremely when they are satirised themselves, and people who make even poor puns on other people can't stand the slightest joke themselves; in fact, they turn budgy directly, and don't like the game played that way at all. For instance, don't you remember that at the very commencement of this conversation you said—'It's really too bad of you to say we mustn't be busybodies?' Why, notwithstanding that I pluralised the sentence, and said 'we' instead of 'you,' you will remember that you turned hot and indignant directly; and yet if I had adopted your motto of plain-speaking, I should have said, 'Mrs. M——, I hate busybodies, and I think you are a busybody;' which is exactly what I do think. Just a moment, madam—allow me to finish. I am quite prepared for the loss of any little friendship we have had. I have counted the consequences; but I should not have been so bold if you had not so unflinchingly nailed your colours to the mast, and proclaimed yourself a plain-spoken person; but, having done so, and knowing what I do know, I am determined 'to hoist you,' as the old proverb says, 'with your own petard!' Let me try how you like your own medicine; for depend upon it that it is true, as another proverb says—'people who say what they like, shall hear what they don't like.' Now, the conversation you had with my wife went no farther, so far as she was concerned, than my own humble self. But such a conversation you have had with other people; and when I called upon our neighbours the other day, I found the poor husband in considerable trouble, and his delicate little wife in tears, all about these baseless calumnies that you have made current; and I tell you plainly, that their misery is much more painful to me than your friendship is precious. Now, you know you flattered me just now by saying that you knew how straightforward I was, and that I was a plain-spoken man myself; and I remembered at once another old proverb—'Who paints me before, blackens me behind,' and I shouldn't in the least wonder if you make some busybody sketches of me sometimes; indeed, I know you do, for I found one such etching in the portfolio of a friend's memory the other day. St. Paul, you know, was an inspired man, a wise man, and a very straightforward man; and he warns us most earnestly against being busybodies in other men's affairs. Now, you can be as busy as you like about your own matters; but upon your own plain-spoken principles, I would advise you not to be a busybody in relation to other people; you hurt other's feelings, you injure their reputation, and you make yourself obnoxious without reaping any good.

"'A worse tirade you never heard; and it's shameful, detestable, disgraceful. You've never been called a busybody before, and it's enough to make you burst into tears.' Perhaps so, but I haven't finished yet. Busybodies escape very often themselves, because the attacked ones are afraid of them. People don't like to catch puff-adders, for fear of being stung unpleasantly themselves. But it's a mistake; the best way to handle a stinging-nettle is fearlessly to grasp it. There is one other thing also to be said. Unfortunately, people in general like to hear news just as the Athenians of old did, and they rather encourage 'tattlers to open out their pack,' that they may amuse themselves with their pictures, and the only excuse—if excuse it be—for busybodies is that people 'like to have it so.' Poor foolish souls, after being amused themselves they little think that they enter as figures into the unfolded panorama of life, when the busybody does the 'show' business next door. Be good enough to remember, Mrs. M——, that the happiness or misery of human life is made up of trifles, that character itself is the sum of trifles, and take care how you undermine the fabrics of human happiness.

"'It's quite a mistake,' you think, 'and I've quite put myself out, and the last thing in the world that you are is a busybody.' Perhaps you really think so, Mrs. M——, and you will remember the old lines—

> 'O would some power the giftie gie us,
> To see ourselves as others see us!'

We are not perhaps the best judges of our own likenesses, excepting brave Oliver Cromwell, who would insist upon the huge wart being painted on his face. Plain-spoken people pique themselves on this wise, 'I like your honest, down-right, down-straight sort of people; never mind if a man is a bit brusque, and that sort of thing; if he has a rough manner, he is all right at heart.' It is in this way that refinement, tenderness, considerateness, and charity get a back-handed slap in the face. We might truly say of all this downrightness and uprightness, 'These ought ye to have done, and not left the others undone.' Now for your comfort, Mrs. M——, this is quite a private and confidential. No one need or shall know a word about it outside these walls. If you like to take to heart in a right way this little chat, do so; and if when you die you wish 'eyes full of heart-break' to look down into your tomb, you will deal gently even with the erring; you will remember that you, too, often stumble in life's difficult path; you will be very eager to take 'the beam out of your own eye;' you will be none the less faithful, but it will not be in a critical, censorious, or plain-spoken way. Oh! I wish from my heart that I had all the plain-spoken people in cities, towns, and shall I say specially in villages, as my audience just now! I would tell them how if they are feared, they are also hated; I would tell them that this same plain-spokenness is impudence, and an impudence which, if exercised towards themselves, they would not stand for an hour. I would recommend them to take a dose of their medicine. Certain I am that one of the surest ways to cure them is to risk their friendship, and to reply when they are criticising some one of your friends, say in appearance, 'Quite so! but remember your forehead is very low, and your feet are very broad.' Then when the criticism is mental, 'Quite so! but then you, whose own education is evidently so limited, must try and show them a little sympathy.' Or when the criticism is moral, 'Quite so! but you know how difficult it is to govern your own precious bad temper.' My word! how the poor souls would dance a fire-dance like the Red Indians, or leap about like travellers stung by mosquitoes. I quite admit, however, that, if a sure way to correct them, it is not the wisest, nor the best way. Christ's way is the true one. Lift them by your own nobler converse into a higher sphere altogether; try and link your own name with the slandered one, and speak of a common need for the Saviour's mercy and pity and grace. Try and show by speech and manner how conscious you are that we have all done many things we ought not to have done, and left undone many things which we ought to have done, and in the purer atmosphere of Christian sympathy the rank weeds of supercilious criticism will soon die. Good morning, Mrs. M——; I too have busybodied sometimes as well as you, and if we keep this private and confidential to ourselves, it may benefit us both. Good-bye, madam, good-bye!"

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"At that moment a step sounded on the path"—p. 477.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

IT was not difficult for the two new acquaintances to find topics for conversation. Miss Northcote seemed to be inquisitive on every subject under the sun, and begged Una to understand at once, that she had an inquiring mind, which it was absolutely necessary she should satisfy by every means in her power, and notably by the present opportunity for enlightenment, which Miss Dysart's visit afforded her. For instance, she had a weakness for Hottentots. Would Una be kind enough to tell her whether she had found them agreeable companions at the Cape? and especially had she been able to discover whether it was pleasant to have a Hottentot mother? and how about the sailors on board ship; had she fraternised with them much? and had she ever succeeded with their assistance in being mast-headed? which was the object of her own highest ambition, as she should then at least feel free for one half-hour from all the terrible rules and restrictions of this monotonous civilised life. Oh! that she were a man; or could even look like one; then would she not go straight off to sea, and never come back again to be proper and polite. And so wild Will rambled on, talking the most ineffable nonsense, but letting gleams of shrewd common sense occasionally appear through it all, which showed that she had some sterling qualities under her quaint absurdity, and that her vehement independence of mind covered a good deal of feminine softness, and kindliness. At last, after she had insisted that Miss Dysart should give her some idea of the opinion she had formed of the British nation, from the specimens she had seen in that neighbourhood, she suddenly said—

"Now tell me, have you become acquainted with the county mystery?"

"The county mystery! I do not understand."

"The county hero then, he is as much one as the other."

"I cannot at all tell who you mean."

"I mean Humphrey Atherstone, of Atherstone; hero and mystery, certainly, and either almost a saint—or almost a demon—no mortal in this part of the world at least can say which."

"No, indeed, I do not know him; though I heard of him as possessing a splendid old place, which took my fancy immensely when I saw it from the hill-side. But I had no idea he was anything half so remarkable as you seem to imply. What a wonderful contradiction of terms you have used in describing him!"

"Only such as would accurately convey the county sentiments on the subject; there is an extraordinary conflict of opinion, some people believe him to be everything that is most terribly wicked—capable of all manner of crimes, and having committed not a few; whilst others think there never was any one half so good, so noble, so generous, so public-spirited. For instance, to show you I am not speaking at random, my mother and the rector are convinced that he is nothing less than an iniquitous monster; while my father and Rupert are disposed to be mildly charitable, and Dr. Burton, and Mr. Knight, doctor and lawyer, consider that he is endowed with every imaginable virtue: my own astute judgment is still at fault respecting him, but I incline to the worst."

"All this is very bewildering, but of course you have excited my curiosity to an unendurable extent, and you must really do your best to satisfy it now by all the explanations you can give. Please to begin systematically. You said he was a hero, a mystery, and a saint or a demon. Now, first of all, why a hero?"

"Because a man who, in the prime of life, with wealth sufficient to gratify the most luxurious and extravagant tastes, with undoubted talent, a stately presence, and a strong self-controlled character which would make him a power among his equals, chooses to shut himself out from the public stage of the world, from every channel of pleasure or ambition, and devote his fortune, his intellect, his whole existence, to the improvement of his estates, and the care of his tenantry, and the numerous poor people connected with him, is surely a hero in the strictest sense of the word."

"I should think so certainly, if he does it really with a view to benefit his people, and not simply from some eccentric fancy."

"There can be no doubt on that point, because before he came into possession of the property few men enjoyed life more than he did. But it is impossible that he can find any personal pleasure in the hard, austere, laborious existence he leads now. His whole energies are devoted to improving the condition of his labourers, and turning his land to good account; he has built model cottages, converted public-houses into temperance clubs, restored the parish church which stands on his ground, built a mission chapel for the outlying hamlets, and founded all manner of industrial and charitable institutions. He is at work early and late on these matters, and says he has no time to go into society. The only relaxation he seems to allow himself is an occasional gallop on a huge black horse, for which he has an especial affection."

"Well, you have certainly made out his claim to be a hero—at least in the nineteenth century; it is not exactly the description of a mediæval knight; but how is he a mystery?"

"Do you not think that a man living in a county absolutely replete with charming young ladies, and who yet announces publicly, that he never means to marry, is a decided mystery?"

"I am not quite sure of that; many men remain unmarried."

"But not under such circumstances. Humphrey Atherstone is the last of his race; if he were to die unmarried, there would be no heir to a property which has passed from father to son for ages upon ages. And it is the more extraordinary, because he has the most deeply-rooted attachment to the old home of his ancestors, and has always been noted for his intense family pride. It seems almost incredible that he should be willing to let the ancient Abbey pass to strangers in name and blood."

"Perhaps he may change his mind, as men often do, when the right woman comes in their way."

"I do not think he will. Mr. Knight, who is his lawyer, told my father that Mr. Atherstone had asked him to make it as public as he could, that it was his inviolable determination to remain single, and he said also that he had made a will in accordance with this resolution, which was of a very extraordinary nature. Of course he revealed nothing of its contents, and I suppose it was rather a breach of honour in a lawyer to say as much as he did; but it was perfectly plain, from the way he spoke, that he thought there was some strange secret lying at the root of this predilection for a single life, which was as much hid from him, in spite his having drawn up the will, as from every one else."

"Well, I admit you have proved Mr. Atherstone to be a mystery, and your description of his good deeds shows why he might be considered a saint by some people; but why should any one think him a demon?"

"Partly from a species of instinct which affects many people with regard to him, myself included; partly because the extraordinary change which came over him at the time of his uncle's death gave rise to rather uncomfortable suspicions respecting him."

"Not that he murdered him, surely?"

"Oh no, people are never expected to go so far as that in these moderate days; besides, Humphrey Atherstone was passionately attached to his uncle; but there is no doubt that the old man's death took place from the bursting of a blood-vessel, caused by the agitation of a violent quarrel between himself and his nephew. He was quite well before it took place, and dead an hour after. Of course, this alone was startling, but it was the change which was observed in Mr. Atherstone from that very day which made people take a prejudice against him. He had not been even a hero before that, though he had always taken an interest in the tenantry, and he was not in the least a mystery. He went into society like every one else, and he seemed quite to intend being married some day. I believe my prophetic mother intended him for me in due course, but he never had the advantage of seeing me, as I was unhappily not out of the schoolroom. Ah! if he had! do you not think it would have affected his whole career?" and Will half closed her merry black eyes with a sentimental air.

Una laughed, but she was too much interested in the strange story she was hearing to encourage an interruption to it. She went on eagerly with her questions. "Was the cause of the quarrel between the uncle and nephew ever known?"

"Yes, that all came out, for there was both an inquest and a trial.'

"A trial of Mr. Atherstone?'

"Oh no, of a man of the name of Edwards, concerning whom the dispute arose. I must go back a long way to make you understand it all. You must know that old Maurice Atherstone, the uncle, had in his day, quarrelled with his father, for a passionate temper is the invariable characteristic of all the members of this family, and in his rage he declared he would go abroad, and never come back till the old man was dead, and he kept his word. His only brother, younger than himself, had died just before, but the widow and child he left, the Humphrey of the present day, were living at Atherstone, and the old man in his anger against his eldest son, declared he wished to have no other heir than this grandchild, and always brought him up as the future possessor of Atherstone. In due time this choleric old gentleman also died, and Maurice came back, after an absence of some years, to enter on his inheritance. He brought with him a great many curious animals and birds from the Mauritius, and as part of the live stock a dark-faced, foreign-looking little boy, who talked some strange language, and wore a very picturesque costume. Maurice Atherstone explained that he was a little Malay to whom he had taken a fancy, and he let him run wild about the place, and used to play with him as if he were a tame kitten, or I should rather say a little tame tiger, for as the boy grew older he developed many of the qualities of that interesting beast of prey. Mr. Atherstone took care that Edwards, by which name he said the child had been baptised, should have a good education, and he became thoroughly Europeanised. As he grew up, he proved to be excessively clever, but with a subtle, cunning sort of cleverness which made him really dangerous, for he seemed besides to have the most singularly evil disposition, which no amount of training in good principles could counteract. He was deeply false, cruel to an extent which made him as a child torture every animal that was weaker than himself; and later he seemed to have but one motive in all that he did, and that was to gratify his own vicious inclinations at any cost of suffering to those who might stand in his way. The only person whom he deceived as to the real depravity of his character was his master, Mr. Atherstone, who showed him from first to last an extraordinary favour, and on whom he was always fawning with a semblance of the most devoted affection. The old man employed him as a sort of secretary, and besides the high salary he received, Edwards managed to get an immense deal of money out of him, which he squandered in secret transactions on the turf, and in gambling and betting and all sorts of wickedness far beyond mere extravagance. He used to go and spend weeks in London on the plea of transacting business for Mr. Atherstone, and there is not the least doubt that he appropriated to his own use sums of money entrusted to him by his master for other purposes. The only difference of opinion Maurice Atherstone ever had with his nephew, to whom he was really much attached, was on the subject of this wretched man. I believe Humphrey simply abhorred him, and naturally enough, for he saw through the outward mask of deceit which blinded the old man, and was perfectly aware of all the nefarious proceedings which Edwards carried on under it,—in fact, the two men had always been in collision from the time that they had been children together at the Abbey. As a boy, Humphrey was perpetually interfering between Edwards and his victims, rescuing miserable dogs and cats from his cruel hands; and he used, I believe, to get into continual disgrace with Maurice Atherstone for inflicting summary punishment on the horrible little Malay, who invariably succeeded in persuading his master that he was the sufferer by an unprovoked assault. When Edwards's crimes became more serious, later in life, Humphrey tried in vain to open his uncle's eyes to the real nature of the man in whom he trusted so implicitly, but if he ever succeeded in proving any of his evil deeds so completely that Mr. Atherstone could not deny them, he still always condoned the offence, and persisted in retaining the Malay in his service. At last the climax came, and it proved fatal to Maurice Atherstone. Humphrey suddenly discovered that Edwards had forged his master's name to a cheque, for a very considerable sum, and the whole circumstances were so iniquitous that he did not suppose his uncle could possibly refuse to let the law take its course, and to avoid any attempt at escape on the part of Edwards, he had him taken into custody before he communicated the facts to his uncle. This was the cause of the terrible quarrel which resulted in Mr. Atherstone's death; his fury and indignation against his nephew for this act were so violent that he ruptured a blood-vessel, and lived only one hour afterwards. What passed between Humphrey and the dying man during that hour no one knows, but it seems certain that there lies the key to the mystery which surrounds him now. The very few facts that are known as to Mr. Atherstone's last moments were told by Dr. Burton, who was called in when the fatal attack came on, but who found the case so completely hopeless that he plainly told the old man he could do nothing for him, as his life was ebbing away swiftly and surely. Mr. Atherstone at once intimated that he wished to be left alone with his nephew; and Dr. Burton went out of the room, but remained within call. He could hear the low murmur of voices, but distinguished no words, till suddenly after a little time there came a stifled cry from Humphrey. The doctor rushed in, and saw him standing up, rigid, with his hands clenched together, beside the couch on which his uncle was laid, and his face of so ghastly a hue, that he looked almost more death-like than the dying man himself. Maurice Atherstone was looking up at his nephew with a haggard, half-despairing glance, and struggling almost with his last breath to utter some words. By a supreme effort he managed to gasp out, in broken syllables, 'Humphrey!—see justice done; promise——' and then sank back and died."

"He must have repented of his anger then, at the last, and wished Edwards to be convicted," said Una.

"So Dr. Burton thought, and every one else; but if it was so, Humphrey Atherstone did not act upon it. That is just one of his proceedings which people think so strange. The first thing he did, before his uncle had been dead a day, was to put an end to the whole affair, so far as Edwards was concerned; he paid the money himself to the bank on which the forged cheque had been drawn; declared at the trial that the matter had been explained by Mr. Atherstone before his death, and had Edwards liberated as speedily as possible. It is believed that he made it a condition with the Malay that he should leave the country at once, which the man did; but he very composedly left his wife and children behind him."

"Was Edwards married then?"

"Yes, I forgot to tell you; when he was quite young, not more than twenty, he married a handsome gipsy girl, whom he encountered in some of his vagabond expeditions. I believe old Mr. Atherstone was very much annoyed when he suddenly brought her home with him; but in spite of that he had the marriage ceremony repeated at the parish church here, in order to make sure that she was really his wife, and then he gave them a cottage on the estate, and was very kind to them. Humphrey Atherstone supported the family entirely during Edwards's absence; but I hear that the man has returned to this neighbourhood."

"What a very strange story it is altogether; but it seems to me, though the circumstances of old Mr. Atherstone's death were certainly very painful, that they contain no clue to the secret of the change

(Drawn by M. FITZGERALD.)

"Waiting there,
As ever, on the crowded quay,
With longing face, so fond, so fair,
To meet and greet me home from sea."

"THE SAILOR'S DREAM," page 477.

which you say has taken place in his nephew since then."

"No, you are quite right, they do not, and that is just one of the reasons why people think there must be something wrong."

"Something mysterious there clearly is," said Una; "and I confess all you have told me makes me feel the greatest possible curiosity to see Mr. Atherstone."

At that moment a step sounded on the path which led along the river-bank, past the spot where Miss Northcote and Una were sitting, and as they looked up they saw a gentleman advancing rather slowly towards them.

He was a tall man, broad-shouldered and strongly built, but with an air of distinction and refinement, which prevented his somewhat massive proportions from giving him the least appearance of coarseness. He had a strikingly intellectual face with an unmistakable look of power, and with strong indications of a passionate temperament in the dark, closely-meeting brows and the finely-cut nostril; his haughty, determined expression would have been almost repelling but for the wonderful softness of his large hazel eyes, and a certain sweetness in the curve of the lips—which, however, were scarcely to be seen under his thick black beard.

Lifting his hat to Miss Northcote as he came up to her, he showed a broad, well-developed forehead, bronzed with the sun, the effect of which was somewhat neutralised by the masses of dark hair that waved over it. Altogether, he was a remarkable-looking man, and one who would not have escaped notice even in a crowd.

Una observed with some interest the peculiar quietude of his manner and the vibrating tones of his deep voice, as he paused for an instant beside Miss Northcote, and asked if he should find her father at home. She answered that he certainly would, as she had left him with Colonel Dysart, who was still, as she knew, at the Manor, whereupon, bowing silently, the gentleman passed on and was very soon completely lost to sight among the trees of the park.

Will Northcote waited till his footfall had entirely died away, and then, lying back on the bank, she went into fits of laughter, from which she could not recover herself for some minutes.

Una sat watching her, much amused at her merriment, without having the least idea what was the cause of it, till at last Will composed herself sufficiently to speak.

"Never was a more opportune encounter," she said; "we need no longer have the slightest doubt to what class of beings the gentleman belongs, whose history I have heen telling you. You know who it is that appears whenever people are speaking about him; even at the Cape of Good Hope you must have heard the proverb."

"Miss Northcote! you do not mean to say——" Una stopped, she could hardly have told why.

"I mean to say that you have just seen Humphrey Atherstone."

(To be continued.)

THE SAILOR'S DREAM.

I DREAMT we put to port last night,
I trod the old familiar quay,
And you were standing clad in white,
With hands outstretched to welcome me.
You pointed to the great black ships
And then towards the starry skies,
The moonlight on your pale, pale lips,
And tears were in your dear grey eyes.

We were alone there, you and I,
The silent town rose gaunt and black,
We only heard the wind go by
The moonlit water at our back.
I held your hands, my heart beat fast;
I called you, but you never spoke,
And then into the dark you past,
And left me speechless, and I woke.

There in my hammock as I swayed,
Sudden the place grew all a-gleam,
Far bells a mystic music made,—
I knew the sign, I read my dream;
I shall not find you at our hearth,
Sweet wife, I know it now full well,
For you are gone away from earth,
And entered where the angels dwell.

I shall not find you waiting there,
As ever on the crowded quay,
With longing face, so fond, so fair,
To meet and greet me home from sea.
But dwelling in my lonely town,
Or in my ship upon the main,
I feel you look with blessing down,
I know we two may meet again.

F. E. WEATHERLY, B.A.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART VII. CHRIST SHARING SORROW.

Chapter to be read—Luke vii.

ASK what was prophesied as to the life of Christ (Isa. liii. 3). How did He prove a "man of sorrows?" Describe the poverty of His birth and early life; afterwards, no home, rejected by the Jews, persecuted in His own city, Nazareth (Luke iv. 29), tired at the well (John iv. 6), hungry in the wilderness, suffering pain on the cross. All these His own personal sufferings. What others did He have? When do people feel pain besides for themselves? This called "sympathy," or "feeling with" other people. Shall see how Christ had this.

I. CHRIST AT NAIN. (Read Luke vii. 11—16.) (1) The widow. Show what a sad story. Picture the widow and her son living together; her comfort in him after her husband's death; her grief when he fell sick; the watch by the bedside; her despair at his death. She was probably left destitute. Could any lot be harder? (2) Christ's compassion. Describe the funeral procession coming out of the gate; Christ's eye upon the scene; taking all in at one glance—the bearers carrying the open coffin; the widow following, weeping; friends crowding round. No husband to lean upon; no child to take by hand. So Christ's compassion stirred. What does it show as to Christ's two-fold nature? was really "bone of our bone," touched with same feelings (Heb. ii. 18, iv. 15). (3) Christ's help. Ask the difference between Christ's compassion and that of crowd. They did what they could; went with her, wept with her, offered little attentions—could do no more. What did He do? Why did He tell the mother not to weep? Words contain a promise. Then with a word raised the man to life, and restored to his mother.

APPLICATION. (1) This miracle especially for mourners. Sometimes all feel lonely; dearest one removed; friends fail; honours hoped for fade; feel all alone, no good to any one, and cared for by none. To such Christ says, "Weep not." Show how vain are all earthly hopes; love of earthly things must bring sorrow. (2) Christ's sympathy unchanged. He still the same (Heb. xiii. 8). Ascended with human nature; still known in heaven as the "Lamb slain." Hence may count on His sympathy and compassion. (3) Christ's help pledged in trouble. Ask who was the first martyr, and how sight of Christ helped him (Acts vii. 57). May not give what we want, but will give better things. Dead soul raised to life (Eph. ii. 1); Holy Spirit in heart, &c.

II. CHRIST AT BETHANY. (John xi.) The chapter is too long to be read entire, and the story being familiar may at once be questioned upon. Draw out the following points. (1) The object of the miracle. (a) How long was Lazarus dead before raised? Why did Christ delay? Whose faith did He want to establish? See the question of the disciples (ver. 8), and of Martha (ver. 24). (b) From ver. 4 show another object. What miracle first showed His glory? This would far more. Ask who did not believe in the resurrection; also show from Acts xvii. 32, xxvi. 8, how incredible it was thought that any one should rise from the dead. How much then would such a miracle add to Christ's glory. (c) A third object of course to restore Lazarus to his sisters. (2) Christ with Martha and Mary. Remind of Martha's previous activity; so now comes to meet Christ. Point out the implied reproach and ignorance of Christ in ver. 21, 22. Needed plain teaching as to Christ's Divinity. Had missed some of His words previously. Now convinced and believes (ver. 27.) Show how Mary says same as Martha, only omitting last part, that Christ must ask God to raise him. Now picture out the scene similar to the miracle at Nain; the sisters surrounded by weeping and sympathising friends; Christ Himself moved to tears, though knowing what He would do. Why did He weep? Death always a sad sight, body turning to corruption, most loathsome—all fruits of sin; sisters in sorrow; many Jews unbelieving in Christ's power—all helped to move His pity. (3) Christ at the grave. Describe our Lord calmly giving commands; Martha remonstrating at the stone being moved, showing unbelief still; Mary silently watching, trusting fully in her beloved Lord. The Jews, all expectant, doing as bid. Then the wonderful sight—the dead coming to life. No wonder had effect that many believed.

APPLICATION. Ask how many Christ raised to life. Jairus' daughter just dead. Young man carried out. Lazarus four days buried. Show how the general resurrection only one step further. What became of them all? But these shall live for ever—where? Remind of Christ's words to Martha (ver. 25.) Show that there is a resurrection. Now, from the death of sin, and those who share that, and rise to new life with Christ here, will appear at resurrection-day with Him in glory (Col. iii. 3, 4).

Questions to be answered.

1. Give passages which show that Christ was a man of sorrows.
2. How did Christ show compassion to the widow of Nain?
3. What lessons does that miracle teach us?
4. How many people did our Lord raise to life?
5. Contrast the conduct of Martha and Mary when with Christ at the funeral.
6. What spiritual resurrection is spoken of in the Bible? Give texts.

SHAG AND DOLL.

A STORY OF TWO HOMELESS LITTLE ONES, IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER IV.

SHAG did not awake again until it was broad daylight. Doll seemed to be still fast asleep, and his first thought was that he would not disturb her; but, in spite of the jacket he had put around her, the hand he touched felt very cold, whilst her face, though always pale, looked so very very, white, that Shag, after sitting watching her for some moments, suddenly uttered a loud cry, and bending over her said, "Doll—Doll! wake up; it's time, Doll dear, for you've been asleep ever so long. Just open your eyes once, Doll—for a minute—and speak to me, and then you may go to sleep again."

But the little form neither moved nor spoke. Then Shag covered the still quiet face with his warm, passionate kisses; but Doll, who had always hitherto responded to his embraces by throwing her clinging arms around his neck, still neither moved nor spoke. The waxen features looked as if chiselled in alabaster, whilst the tiny face wore an air of such deep and perfect repose—nay, more, there was an expression of such wondrous happiness stamped upon it, that Shag murmured at length, "She's gone! Doll's gone to that home she was a longing so for ever since we first heard tell on it. I never see her look so happy—never—but, oh! whatever shall I do without her? Oh, Doll—Doll! how could you go and leave me all alone?" he said, half-reproachfully, in the agony of his grief, whilst loud sobs shook his whole frame.

He threw himself down beside the child's still form, clasping it tightly to him, as though afraid of losing these precious remains—all that was left to him of dear little Doll. And so he moaned and sobbed, until, worn out with the violence of his grief, he fell into a troubled slumber.

The sun was high in the heavens when he again opened his eyes, and sitting up began to rub them in a bewildered manner. He was conscious of some oppressive weight, of some heavy burden; but for the moment he seemed unable to comprehend what it was. When, however, his glance fell upon the marble face and motionless form beside him, recollection came, bringing with it a terrible sense of woe and desolation. Just then, too, his hand came against something. It was the remainder of the roll which Doll had wished him so much to finish the night before, and which he had insisted upon keeping for her breakfast.

"Ah! she has no need of breakfast," reflected Shag with a pang, and a fresh burst of tears, as he looked at the roll which he had hastened to bring her so joyfully, fondly hoping it would be the saving of her life. He laid it down again untasted. He wasn't hungry himself, somehow. He tried a mouthful, but it seemed to choke him.

Glancing up at that instant, he caught sight of a poor, lean, half-starved-looking dog prowling about near; and, on catching Shag's eye, which was fastened pityingly upon him, the animal timidly ventured nearer. Shag's compassion was aroused by the creature's miserable appearance. He held out a bit of bread, and the dog eagerly snatched at it. Another and another piece was broken off and thrown to him, until the last morsel was gone, when the animal, lying down at the feet of his new friend, looked up into his face with a grateful expression in his patient eyes, and gently wagged his tail.

Shag threw his arms around his neck, and rested his tear-stained cheek upon his rough back. He felt as if he had found a friend—a living friend—one that might perhaps help him to keep watch over Doll. He dreaded lest some one should come that way, and discover them, and take her away from him. So he crept as far as he could into the cask, and with one arm round "Doggie," as he called him, sat or lay for some time half dozing.

But as the day wore on he felt that dreadful craving for food which poor Doll had experienced. At length, unable to bear it longer, he was fain to leave his place of shelter for a few moments to go in search of something to eat, if only the merest crumb.

He felt so weak, it was all he could do to crawl along, but nobody seemed to notice him, or feel disposed to give him aid. Utterly wearied, he was standing against a post, when he saw, on the opposite side of the street, a child sitting on a door-step, munching a slice of bread. Half of it broke off and fell down, but the child appeared regardless of it. Shag darted across and picked it up.

"Don't you want this?" he asked.

"No. I've had enough. You can have it if you like," said the child, who could not help noticing the eager longing look on poor Shag's pinched face.

Shag devoured his portion—it did not take long to eat—and then, in fear lest anything should have occurred during his absence, went back, as fast as his tottering feet would carry him, to the wharf and the old cask. Then he and his dumb friend renewed their watch.

"Oh, Doggie!" said Shag, "I hope I'll soon get taken to that home Doll's gone to! She asked to go—and she's gone. I asked that we might both be took together—but we haven't. I don't know why; but I shall ask again—I shall ask to go after her."

And standing up, as he and Doll had done the night before, he prayed of that unseen Friend in whom these friendless little ones put such unswerving trust, "please take him home soon, 'cause he was so miserable without Doll."

The sun set that evening behind a bank of clouds, all tinged with crimson and gold. Some of his last beams, as he sank lower and lower, shone right into the old cask, and looked upon a little drooping figure, sitting sad and lonely, with one arm round the faithful dog, who never moved from his position, whilst the other hand strayed gently among certain flaxen curls, which it would lift tenderly, and then let fall again.

When next the sun shone upon the earth, the scene had changed.

Two little forms were then lying side by side; the one as motionless as the other. Shag's prayer was answered; his bitter day of sorrow was over; he had gone to join Doll.

The two little lives were ended on earth. All the sadness and suffering which had been their lot here, exchanged for the fulness of joy which was henceforth to be their portion for ever and for ever.

Happy little Shag and Doll!

Faithful Doggie kept watch over the children, sitting looking on with sad mournful gaze, as though he understood full well that never more would the boy, who had befriended him in his hour of need, give back an answering word or look to his caresses. When one or two rough-looking lads drew near, he barked so furiously and fiercely, that they took to their heels in haste.

But when a policeman—an honest good-tempered-looking man—came that way, Doggie seemed to feel there was a duty which he ought to perform.

With low whines he attracted the man's attention, and drew him towards the old cask; and then stood looking from him to the dead children, and back again into his face, with a pitiful gaze, as if the sight were too, too sad.

And so John Walters, the policeman, seemed to find it. He contemplated for a few moments the little innocent faces, so calm and peaceful in the sleep of death—and then he drew his hand across his eyes, which, for the minute, were blinded by some strange mist.

"Poor little things! poor little dears! was there nobody to have saved them from this! nobody to have given them a bit or scrap to keep life in them, but they must needs crawl away and die all alone! Ah, well, they're happy now! There's One as ever loved the little children, and most of all, I can't help thinking, such friendless little ones as these. They're in His arms now, and nought can ever harm them more."

So pondered John Walters, and then his eye fell upon the downcast form of Doggie.

"I suppose he belonged to them; and he seems well-nigh starved," he said to himself. "Well, he shan't be left to die if food can save him;" and so the faithful animal was taken home and cared for by kind-hearted John Walters.

Both followed as chief mourners when the little forms were laid in their last long resting-place. Doggie mourned after true, honest dog-fashion: but John knew well the happy exchange the little creatures had made, and felt a sense of thankfulness rise in his heart, that they had been saved from further wretchedness, or, it might have been, a life of crime.

But his heart was more tender henceforth towards all the lonely or ill-used little ones who came across his path; and many a crust found its way from his pocket into tiny palms that clasped it eagerly. And this he did for the sake of Shag and Doll.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

191. Which two of the Evangelists omit to mention anything of the first thirty years of our Lord's earthly life?

192. Is there any reason for supposing that the mother of the Apostle John and the mother of our Lord were sisters?

193. Name the tribe to which Joshua belonged, and state where we first meet with his name in Scripture.

194. How frequently does the word "piety" occur in the text of Holy Scripture?

195. Where do we meet with the name of the mother of the Lord Jesus Christ for the last time in Scripture?

196. We read in 2 Kings xiv. 25 that the prophet Jonah was of Gath-hepher. To which of the tribes was that town originally given?

197. That our Lord should teach by means of parables was predicted in the Psalms. Where does St. Matthew refer to the prophecy in question?

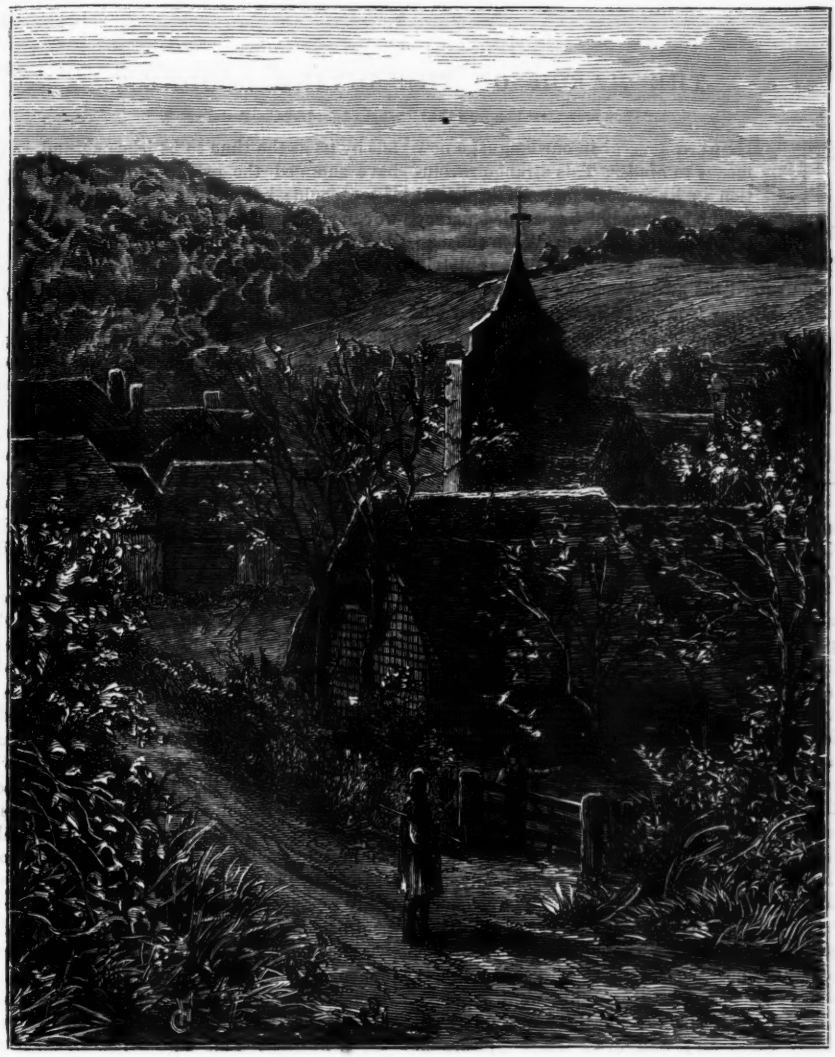
198. Which one of the Evangelists records the fact that the Saviour, though a "man of sorrows," was at least on one occasion "rejoiced in spirit?"

199. Name the apostle who applies the words of the Psalmist, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt Thou suffer Thy Holy One to see corruption," to the resurrection of the Saviour.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 448.

176. 1 Chron. ix. 33.

177. St. Matthew (xxvii. 57) and St. John (xix. 38).



178. Ps. xxxiv. 20.

179. Acts i. 14.

180. Joseph of Arimathea "waited for the kingdom of God" (Mark xv. 43).

181. Numb. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 22.

182. (1) The Law of Moses, (2) the Prophets, and (3) the Psalms (Luke xxiv. 44).

A SKETCH AT EVENING.

LOW in the west, like some great fiery eye,
O'er woods stretched black beneath it like a brand,
A shred of crimson burns along the sky,
Last remnant of a wrathful sunset grand.
Awhile, and ghastly pale its leavings grow,
Toned down into a unity of grey;

For with the last incarnadining glow
All roseate gleams and glamours fade away.
Sweet up this westward-wandering river steal
Soft winds, that sing and sing the reeds among,
As though they syrens were. A measured peal,
From some far fane borne by the breeze along,
Throbs through the dusk; while now and then a bird,
Faint twittering its last song, is faintly heard.

JAMES DAWSON.

THE MARCH OF THE DIVINE GOODNESS.

"Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness."—Psalm xxi. 3.

THE word prevent in our language now means to hinder. This strange revolution in its import may be explained by the influence of human degeneracy on the language of men. When one man seeks to go before another it is generally to outstrip him, or retard his advancement, so as to hinder him. But when God goes before us it is for our encouragement and help. So we must understand its meaning here—"Thou goest before him with the blessings of goodness." The Hebrew word is often so rendered: "Mercy and truth shall go before thy face." "Let us come before His presence with thanksgiving."

This psalm of David is a sort of national anthem or a Te Deum, ascribing the greatness of his position as King of Israel to God alone; and certainly in relation to him the words before us have a peculiarly striking application. His lot in life was not of his own seeking or devising. God went before him, and took him from the sheep-fold to place him on the throne of Israel; girded him with strength, and "prevented him with blessing" in all the varied steps of his chequered history. But the sentiment has an application to ourselves. It is true of every child of God that Jehovah prevents him with the blessings of goodness, and this truth may be variously illustrated.

1. God goes before us as creatures with the blessings of goodness in the provisions of Nature. When born into the world we were received by loving hearts and tender hands, without any possible care or forethought of ours. The welcome of parental affection is a kind provision of the Great Father of all. And in the helpless days of our infancy did not the blessings of goodness continually go before us? Our wants were supplied, our cries were hushed, our health and safety were tenderly cared for; and even where Nature in any case may fail, it is through human improvidence, recklessness, or sin in spite of the Divine goodness. Then as reason dawns and education commences, what a world of variety and beauty is there around us for the development of our powers—a world rich in the wealth of God, and abounding with the blessings of untold beneficence Besides, what cost and care were expended in our early training. Perhaps the drill and the discipline were felt by us at the time to be irksome, and we would have shunned the primer and the spelling-book if we could; but now, looking back upon them, we can unhesitatingly pronounce them as the blessings of goodness which went before us.

And is not the supply of all our creature-wants—such supply as we could not in any way have achieved for ourselves—the gift of Divine goodness? Mercies abundant, without our asking, have met our daily need. The very works around us in Nature which greeted our dawning senses and awakening reason—land and flood, mountain and valley, hoar-frost and storm, shower and sunshine, the sighing of the wind and the surging of the waves, the music of the groves, and the thunder of the clouds—all have had a bearing on our life, and contributed their measure of illustration to the truth, that our heavenly Father has gone before us with the blessings of His goodness.

2. God goes before us as men with the blessings of goodness, in the arrangements of Providence. He has formed us men, lords of this lower creation; made us at first in His own image, and capable of communion with Himself. Yet, having fallen from our original condition, we are short-sighted, feeble, imperfect, and always dependent. The future in mercy is hid from us, and we cannot tell what a day may bring forth. But God knows the end from the beginning, and ever goes before us with the blessings of goodness. It may not be always manifest to us that He does so, but it is not the less a fact. The providence of God is a study which richly repays those who consider it. "I have had a miraculous escape," says one, or 'a merciful deliverance," says another: what was this but God preventing them with the blessings of goodness? He is everywhere present, and always working for the best. His tender mercies are over all His works.

Men in this life often go recklessly on in rebellion and sin, without thought, without God, without hope, and yet in mercy He goes before them, to avert the consequences of their folly, and even to bring good out of evil. How constantly is the proverb illustrated, "Man proposes, but God disposes." The Divine Father goes before men to turn their purpose into some token of mercy or some means of blessing to themselves or others. How clearly was it so in the cruel enactment of Pharaoh, by which all the male children born to the Israelites were to be put to death—an edict that really led to the training of Moses in the palace of the Egyptian king, and ultimately to the deliverance of the Hebrews from bondage. How manifestly was it so when Joseph was sold by his brethren into Egypt, because of their unholy jealousy. Their purpose was to get rid of him, but God "prevented" them with His goodness, and overruled their unfraternal conduct into the means of blessing and safety for themselves and their children. The history of the Jewish nation abounds in illustrations of this truth. Nor was it peculiar to that people. Amidst the clash of thought, the soaring of ambition, the collision of armed hosts, the rise and fall of empires, and the establishment and overthrow of dynasties, God was working and weaving the web of His Providence in a marvellous and mysterious way—going before men with the blessings of goodness, that in the fulness of time Christ might be born in Bethlehem, the Light of the world and the Saviour of our race.

For ourselves individually this is a precious and practical truth. How often has God gone before us to prevent the results of our own negligence, to rescue us from unseen danger, to shield us from the assaults of the enemy, to make the very sorrow which befalls us, or which we may bring on ourselves by our own sin, the means of our highest good. How frequently does He put providential checks before men to stop them in some career of sin which would certainly end in destruction. In truth, He is ever thus going before us to enable us to meet temptation, or to make a way for us to escape—to order our steps in the pathway of duty, to console us in our afflictions, to encourage us in the great battle of life, to turn our tears into dew-drops of blessing, the very means of our spiritual refreshment and health. Such knowledge is too high for us, but it is very blessed and assuring:—

> "His providence is kind and large,
> Both man and beast His bounty share;
> The whole creation is His charge,
> But saints are His peculiar care."

3. God goes before us as sinners with the blessings of goodness in the economy of Redemption. A great change has passed over man since his creation. Though made at first upright, he has sought out many inventions,—has departed from his Maker, and lost the purity and perfection of the image in which he was created. Sin has entered the world, and death by sin. "We all like sheep have gone astray," "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." Not only is human degeneracy universal, but practical and personal disobedience more or less marks the life of every man. We acknowledge this. What then? Where there is sin there is guilt, and where there is guilt there is condemnation. Yet how gloriously God in infinite grace has gone before our fallen and ruined world with the blessings of goodness. Before man sinned a Saviour was determined on, and a Sacrifice provided in God's only begotten Son, as "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." Redemption was a Divine purpose before sin was a human fact. Man, as a sinner, to whom the Gospel comes, has now a greater assurance of eternal salvation than Adam had as innocent in the Garden of Eden. Then the hope was in himself, and his own doing, and he fell; now our hope is in Christ, and what He has done. He "is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." God has taken upon Himself the consequences of the Fall in the marvellous provisions of redemption. Thus for the guilty there is justification through the mediation and sacrifice of Christ: for the polluted there is purity in the blood which cleanseth away all sin: for the degenerate and ruined there is regeneration, the blessedness of a new spiritual birth in the mighty energy and renewing power of the Holy Ghost. Redemption was not an afterthought of God. It was His purpose from the counsels of eternity, and men as they are born into the world with a degenerate nature are met with the rich provisions of that grace which brings salvation to all classes and conditions of the human family. In every part of our history, in every need of our being, in every scene of our experience, our Divine Father is before us with the assurance that His grace is sufficient for us. What more do we need? what more can we desire?

4. God goes before us as His children, with the blessings of goodness in the prospects of heaven. The Saviour said to His disciples, "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you." Precious words these in a world where we are only strangers and foreigners. Here we have no continuing city. We seek one to come—"a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." His children have their treasure in heaven, and they are now travelling homeward to its inheritance. "And if children, then heirs, heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ." Christ is in them "the hope of glory," and truly this is a hope which maketh not ashamed, and which will never disappoint them. This is a world of trial, of imperfection, of tears, of suffering, but the coming inheritance is incorruptible, undefiled, and fadeth not away. In every step of the journey homeward God goes before us with His goodness, strewing flowers in our pathway through the wilderness, opening springs of gladness to refresh us, and becoming to us in reality what He was, in symbol, to the Israelites of old—a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night, lighting our steps and marking our way. He is guiding us home to the land of promise—the land of beauty, perfection, and love, where no clouds veil the glory, where no storm sweeps the sky.

But there is death! We have to cross the Jordan before we can enter the promised land. What of that? Our Saviour has abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light by His Gospel. He has made the dark valley to be only the valley of the shadow of death, by reason of the glorious light beyond. God goes before us with His goodness there, so that every Christian can sing, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me."

And more, Christ who conquered for us is in heaven before us, our Forerunner, waiting for us; and His saints will be with Him to behold His glory, and dwell in His presence for ever. There will be everlasting joy upon their heads; sorrow and sighing shall for ever have fled away. It will be an exceeding great and eternal weight of glory, with which our present light and passing afflictions are not to be compared. What a home there is before us; what a welcome awaits us; what an inheritance shall be ours! And when we have reached it and realise something of its glory, and gaze upon its beauty, and are enraptured with its melody, and taste its felicity, and are clothed with its perfection, then shall we sing with humble adoration and glowing ardour, as we look back on time and providence, "Thou, O Lord, hast gone before us all the way with the blessings of Thy goodness." Here, then, let there be gratitude, confidence, and hope.

JAMES SPENCE, D.D.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

VII.—WITH THEM WHO WERE READY TO PERISH.

ON the 28th of February, 1828, a very terrible calamity happened in the place known as Wellclose Square, Whitechapel. A new theatre, called the Brunswick, had been erected there on the site of a former building, known as the Old Royalty. It had been completed in seven months, and three days afterwards, during a rehearsal, the whole structure gave way and fell with a crash, burying ten persons amidst the ruins and fearfully injuring several others. Such a catastrophe was very awful, and the people of the neighbourhood looked with an almost solemn curiosity at the wreck of an edifice in which they themselves might have met with death suddenly.

Very soon, however, they began to regard the heap of ruins with surprise, for early one morning there appeared in the midst of them two officers of the Royal Navy, surrounded by a gang of labourers with picks and shovels, and before these men (some of whom were Irish Roman Catholics) began to work they listened attentively while one of the officers offered up an earnest prayer to God for a blessing on the results of the labour they were about to undertake. Morning after morning their labour was thus sanctified, and evening after evening it was celebrated by the voice of thanksgiving, till at length the ground was cleared, and on the 10th of June, 1830, the first stone of a new building was laid. The building was to be a Home for Sailors, and as a necessary adjunct to the Home, it was intended to establish a Destitute Sailors' Asylum.

The two naval officers were Captain (now Admiral) George C. Gambier, and Captain Robert James Elliot, now gone to his rest, who with Lieutenant Robert Justice, afterwards Captain, and now with his old comrade, in the heavenly haven, had been seeking how to ameliorate the condition of seamen, numbers of whom were to be seen homeless, miserable, and frequently half naked and destitute, in that foul and wretched neighbourhood about the Docks and beyond Tower Hill.

The task was a difficult one, and might have daunted less brave and hopeful men, for it was intended to demolish the piratical haunts where the enemies of the sailor lay in wait for his destruction; where crimps and thieves, and the keepers of infamous dens held their besotted victims in bondage, while they battened on the wages that had been earned during months of privation and arduous toil.

It was necessary, therefore, first to provide a decent and comfortable lodging-house for the reception of sailors coming into port,—a place where they might safely deposit their clothes and their wages, and where they could "look out for another ship" without the evil intervention of crimps or pretended agents. It was a part of the intended plan also to establish a savings-bank, for securing any portion of their wages which they chose to lay by, or for safely transmitting such sums as they might wish to send to their relations. In short, the design was to provide a home for the homeless, and hold out helping hands to those who were ready to perish.

Those ruins of the theatre stood on the very spot for such an establishment, and the two captains, Gambier and Elliot, began by buying the ground and the wreck that stood upon it, not by asking for public subscriptions, but mostly with their own money, to which was added a few contributions from any of their friends who desired to join in the good work.

It is impossible to use more earnest or touching words than those in which the late Rear-Admiral Sir W. E. Parry spoke of the labours of his friend and fellow-supporter of the Sailors' Home, in an address to British seamen at Southampton, in 1853. "And now," he said, "let me just add that, from the first moment in which Captain Elliot stood among the ruins of the Brunswick Theatre, till it pleased God to deprive him of bodily and mental energy, did that self-denying Christian man devote all his powers, his talents, his influence, and his money to this his darling object of protecting and providing for the comfort of sailors. Connected with a noble family, and entitled, by birth, education, and station, to all the advantages which the most exalted society could give him, he willingly relinquished all, took up his abode in a humble lodging, surrounded by gin-shops, near the 'Home:' denied himself most of the comforts, it may almost be said some of the necessaries of life, in order the more effectually to carry out his benevolent design; and for eighteen years of self-denial and devotion, made it the business of his life to superintend this institution."

For the noble officer lived to see the building for which he had wrought and prayed, complete and successful. In 1835 300 sailors could be received and welcomed there. The piratical lairs began to empty of some of those who had been shown a way of escape, and the good work went on. In the adjoining Seamen's Church the congregation was largely augmented by the boarders of the Sailors' Home, while the Honorary Chaplain and the Missionary attached officially to the institution, became not only parson and preacher, but friendly adviser and instructor, ready to speak, to hear, and to forbear. The addition of a book depository, where various useful publications may be purchased, and Bibles are sold at the lowest possible prices, and in various languages, was a valuable auxiliary to moral and religious instruction, and at once increased the home-like influences of the place.

The institution having gone on thus prosperously, under the direction of a goodly number of officers and gentlemen, added to its possessions by acquiring other plots of freehold ground, extending backward to Dock Street; and in 1863 Lord Palmerston laid the stone of an entirely new block of building, which was inaugurated by the Prince of Wales in 1865, since which time 502 boarders can be received, each being provided with his separate cabin.

Since the opening of the institution in 1835 it has received 246,855 seamen of various countries and from all parts of the world. Of these 72,234 have been old or returned boarders, and most of them have conducted their money transactions through the "Home," and have made good use of the savings-bank.

There are 270 inmates under that protecting roof as I step into the large entrance hall in Well Street to-day; and the two hundred and seventy-first has just gone to look after his kit and sea-chest, which have been carefully conveyed from the Docks by one of the carmen belonging to the institution, who has "The Sailors' Home, Well Street," worked in red worsted on his shirt, and painted on the side of the van from which he has just alighted.

It is evident that our friend No. two hundred and seventy-one has been here before, for he knows exactly where to present himself in order to deposit some of his more portable property with the cashier or the superintendent. He scarcely looks like a man who will want an advance of money, for he is a smart, alert, bright-eyed fellow, with a quiet air of self-respect about him which seems to indicate an account in the savings-bank; but should he be "hard up," he can ask for and receive a loan not exceeding twenty shillings directly his chest is deposited in his cabin. Just now the chest itself, together with its superincumbent bundle, stands against the wall along with some other incoming or out-going boxes, more than one of which are associated with brand new cages for parrots, and some odd-shaped cases evidently containing sextants or other nautical instruments. There is a whole ship's crew, and a smart one too, in the hall to-day; while a small contingent occupies the clothing-department, where one or two shrewd North-countrymen are being fitted each with a "new rig," knowing well enough that they will be better served there than at any of the cheap outfitters (or the dear ones either) in the neighbourhood. Fine blue broadcloth, pilots, tweeds, rough weather, and petershams are here to choose from "to measure," as well as a wonderful collection of hats, caps, underclothing, hosiery, neckties, boots, and shoes, so unlike the clumsy specimens that swing along with the tin pots and oilskins in some of the little low-browed shops about the neighbourhood, that I at once discover the reason for the smartness and general neatly-fitted look of most of the men and lads now pacing up and down, talking and smoking. It is quiet talk for the most part, even when half-a-dozen of the inmates adjourn to the refreshment-room, where they can obtain a glass of good sound beer (though there is a much more general appreciation of coffee) and sit down comfortably at one or other of the tables, where two serious mates are already discussing some knotty point, which will probably last till tea-time.

Tea-time? There is the half-past five o'clock signal gong going now, and light swift steps are to be heard going up the stairs into the large dining-hall, where the two hundred and seventy-one, or as many of them as are at home, sit down like fellows who know their business and mean to do it. It is a pleasant business enough, and one soon dispatched; for there are so many big tea-pots, that each table is amply provided by the alert attendants, who dispense bread-and-butter, watercresses, salads, and savoury bloaters and slices of ham and tongue, the latter having been already served by a carver who is equal to the occasion. It is astonishing how quickly the meal is over when its substantial quality is taken into account; but there is no lack of waiters, the number of attendants in the building being sixty-five, some of whom, of course, belong to the dormitories and to other departments.

The meals here are, of course, served with the utmost regularity, and without limit to quantity. Breakfast, with cold meat, fish, bacon, and general "relishes," at eight in the morning; dinner at one: consisting of soup, roast and boiled meats, ample supplies of vegetables, occasional fish, stupendous fruit-pies and puddings, and a good allowance of beer. After tea comes a substantial snack for supper, at nine o'clock, and the doors of the institution are kept open till half-past eleven at night; those who wish to remain out later being required to obtain a pass from the superintendent. Of course it is requested that the boarders come in to meals as punctually as possible; but those who cannot conveniently be present at the regular time, can have the meal supplied to them on application. Indeed, two or three belated ones are arriving now, as we go to the end of the long and lofty refectory to look at the crest of the late Admiral Sir William Bowles, K.C.B., which, supported by flags, is painted upon the wall, as a memorial of a gallant officer and a good friend to this institution and to all sailors.

Leaving the dining-hall, we notice a smaller room, set apart for masters and mates who may desire to have their meals served here; and on the same extensive storey is a large and comfortable reading-room well supplied with periodicals, (among which I am glad to know that THE QUIVER holds an honourable place), and containing a capital library consisting of entertaining and instructive books. The board-room is close by, and is of the size and shape to make an excellent mission-room, where week-night services and meetings of a religious character are held, and well attended by men who, having seen the wonders of the Lord upon the great deep, join in His reasonable service when they are at home and at rest. This vast floor also contains two dormitories; but most of the sleeping cabins are in the second and third floors.

There are few sights in London more remarkable than these berths, which are, in fact, separate cabins, each closed by its own door, and containing bed, wash-stand, chair, looking-glass, towels, and ample space for the sea-chest and personal belongings of the occupant. The cabins extend round a large area rising to a great height, and surrounded above by a light gallery reached by an outer staircase, round which are another series of berths exactly resembling the lower ones; so that there are, in fact, double, and in one or two dormitories treble tiers of cabins, and the upper ones may be entered without disturbing the inmates of those below. One of the three-decker areas is of vast size, and, standing in the upper gallery and looking upward to the lofty roof, and then downward to the clear, wide, open space between the lower rooms, the visitor is struck by the admirable provision both for light and ventilation; the former being secured at night by means of properly distributed gas jets, which are of course under the care of the night attendants, who are on watch in each dormitory, and may be summoned at once in case of illness or accident.

Not only is there provision against fire by a length of fire-hose attached to hydrants on each floor, but the water supply to lavatories and for other purposes is secured by a cistern holding 4,000 gallons at the top of the building; so that there is complete circulation throughout the various floors.

It is time that we paid a visit to the basement of this great institution, however; for, in more senses than one, it may said to be at the foundation of the arrangements. Yes, even with respect to the amusements provided for the inmates—for while chess, draughts, and backgammon are to be found in the library and reading-room, and billiards and bagatelle hold their own on the great landings of the first storey, we have down here a skittle-alley of a character so remarkable, that some of us who have read Washington Irving, think of the reverberations of the giants' pastime in the mountains, while we wonder where sailors can first have acquired a taste for this particular amusement. It is a good and healthy one, however, and is wisely provided, since it adds one more efficient inducement to the men to take their pleasure among their true friends instead of seeking it amidst the evil influences of a filthy tavern, or in the garish heat of some vile Ratcliff Highway bowling-alley, where men are maddened with drugged drink, and greeted with foul imprecations by the harpies who seek to rob and cheat them.

There is much to see in this basement, and to begin with here is No. two hundred and seventy-one sending his chest up by the great luggage-lift to the second floor, where he will find it presently in his cabin. We cannot stay to speak to him, however, for we are on the very verge of the kitchen, to which we are, as it were, led by the nose; for wafted thence comes an appetising perfume of new bread just taken from one of the great ovens devoted to the daily baking. There are lingering odours also of to-day's dinner, though the meat-ovens and the great boilers and hot plates are clean and ready for the morrow. The pantry door, too, is open, and there are toothsome varieties of "plain-eating" therein, while the store-rooms savour of mingled comforts, to which the gales of Araby the blest offer no parallel, and the butcher's shop has a calm and concentrated sense of meatiness which is suggestive to a robust appetite not already satiated with a chunk from one of a whole squadron of soft, new currant-cakes. After a peep at the large and busy laundry with its peculiar moist atmosphere, the coal and beer cellars, the pumping machinery and boiler-room may be passed by, and little curiosity is excited by this long and convenient apartment, where hot and cold baths are prepared to order at a merely nominal charge. There is a door close by, however, where we stop instinctively, for there is a cheerful light inside, and a sound of easy and yet interrupted conversation which can belong to only one department of society. There can be no mistake about it—a veritable barber's shop, and a gentleman with a preternaturally clean chin complacently surveying himself in a looking-glass of limited dimensions, while another waits to be operated upon by the skilled practitioner who carries in his face the suggestion of a whole ropery of "tough yarns," and was—or am I mistaken—tonsor to the Victory or to some ship of war equally famous when the British seaman shaved close and often, and pigtails had hardly gone out of fashion. There is no time for testing the great artist's skill this evening, though I could almost sacrifice a well-grown beard to hear some rare old fo'c's'le story. But no story could be more wonderful than the plain truth, that for all the generous provision in this excellent institution the rescued sailor brought within its wholesome influence pays but fifteen shillings a week. Yes, men and apprentices, fifteen shillings; and officers, eighteen and sixpence.

The evening lowers over the outer world of Mint Street and Leman Street, and the great blank void of the Tower ditch is full of shadow. Standing again in the large entrance hall, which reminds one more of shipboard, now that the lights are dotted about it, leaving it still a little dim, I hear the trickling of a drinking-fountain, and associated with its fresh plash hear as pleasant a story as any yarn that ever the barber himself could have spun for my delight.

The fountain, which is of polished Aberdeen granite, was opened last November in proper style, a platform being erected, and the chair being taken by the Secretary to the "Metropolitan Drinking Fountains Association," supported by several ladies and gentlemen. Mr. Lee made an appropriate speech, and called attention to the gift, and pointed to the inscription; and it was quite an emphatic little observance for the inmates who had gathered in the hall on the occasion. And well it might be, for the fountain bears this modest inscription:—"The gift of William McNeil, Seaman, in appreciation of the great benefits he has derived on the various occasions during which he has made the Institution his Home, for upwards of 25 years."

I think very little more need be said for the Sailors' Home than is indicated by this plain, earnest testimony to its worth. Yet it is necessary to say one more word. This Sailors' Home is in a way self-supporting, and at present seeks only the kindly interest of the public in case it should ever need another response to an appeal for extending its sphere of usefulness. Not a farthing of profit is permitted to any individual engaged in it, and even fees to servants are prohibited, though the crimps and touts outside endeavour to bribe them sometimes, to induce sailors to go to the common lodging-houses, where land-rats seek their prey. All the profits, if there are any at all, are placed to a reserve fund for repairs, improvements, or extensions. At any rate, no public appeals are being made just now.

But there is another institution next door—another branch of the stem which has grown so sturdily from the seed planted by the good captain—the Destitute Sailors' Asylum. That is a place full of interest, though there is nothing to see there. Nothing but a clean yard, with means for washing and cleansing, and a purifying oven for removing possible infection from clothes, and a great bare room, just comfortably warmed in winter, and hung with rows of hammocks, like the 'tween decks of a ship. That is all; but in those hammocks, sometimes, poor starved and destitute sailors go to sleep, after they have been fed with soup and warmed and comforted; and in the morning, when they turn out, they are fed again with cocoa and bread, and if they are naked they are clothed. There are not very many applicants, for, strange as it may appear, since sailors' homes have come in fashion there are but few destitute seamen; but there need be no unrelieved destitute sailors at all in London, for anybody can send such a one to the Asylum in Well Street, London Docks, and he will be admitted. Here then, is an institution that may claim support.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. P. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

IT is not often that any of the inhabitants of this world are able to say that they consider it an entirely pleasant place to live in; but such was, undoubtedly, the conviction at which Una Dysart had arrived, after she had spent a little time longer at her new home in Valehead. She and her father speedily became, not only intimate, but thoroughly friendly with the Northcotes and Crichtons, and they were on terms of pleasant acquaintanceship with various other families; but it was with those, their first friends, that they chiefly associated.

They met constantly—riding out together, and spending the evening at each other's houses, and both Will Northcote and Lilith Crichton became very dear to Una. Will was, however, the one whose society she most enjoyed; she was so racy and original, so unfashionably honest and sincere, and so very much better in all essential good qualities than she chose to appear. With Lilith, though it was impossible for any one to know her without loving her, Una often felt a sense of awe and constraint, from the very extent of her child-like innocency and goodness, which seemed to make her unable even to understand the possibility of any compromise with evil. Happily her brother Hervey was quite pleasantly human, and he managed somewhat persistently to make his way to Miss Dysart's side, whenever and wherever he could succeed in catching a glimpse of her.

It chanced one especially bright warm day, however, that Colonel Dysart and his daughter were going to ride out alone together, and as they passed through the gates of Vale House, Una asked her father if there was any particular direction in which he wished to go.

"None whatever, my dear; I am quite at your service, and I conclude from your asking the question with such extreme politeness, that you have entirely made up your mind what we are to do."

"Yes, I have," she answered, laughing, "you are quite right; I want to go to Atherstone Abbey."

"What! to pay a visit uninvited to Mr. Atherstone? Would not that be rather an eccentric proceeding for Miss Dysart?"

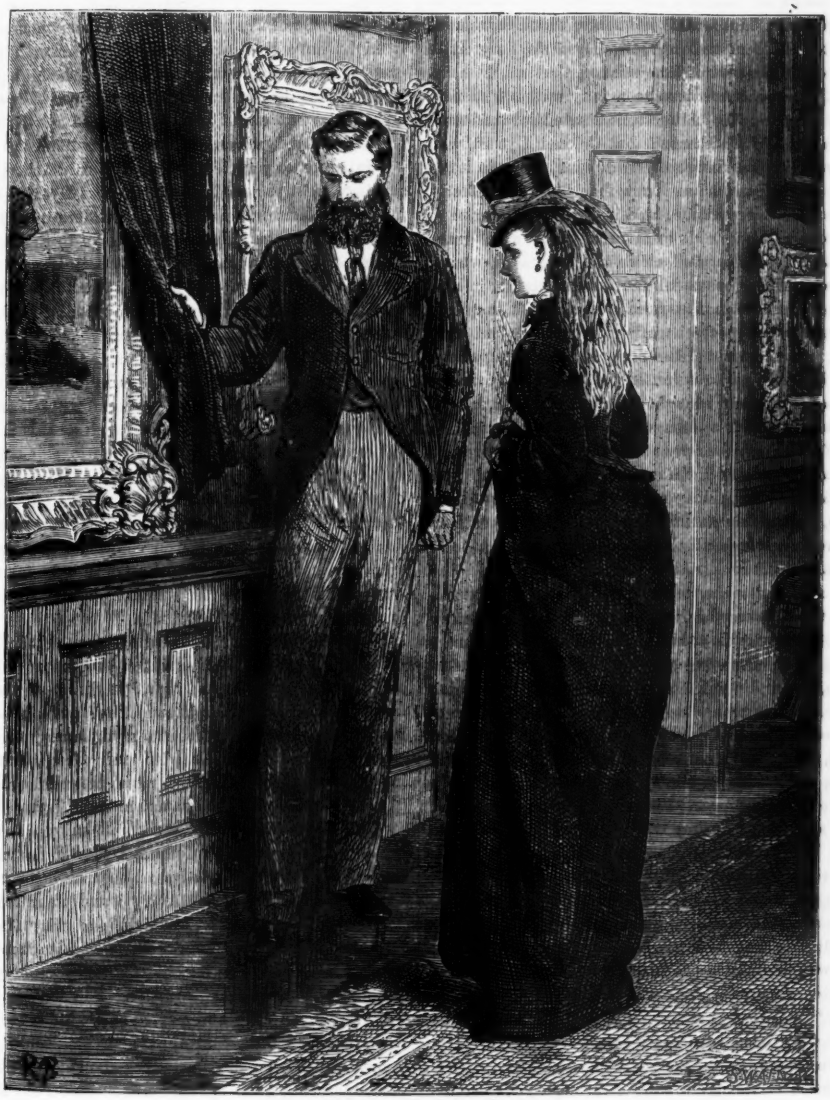
"Possibly; but I do not mean to go near him. I only want to see the place; and Will Northcote told me that any one who leaves their card at the lodge can have leave to drive through the grounds, which are splendid, I believe, and also, if they like, they may see the fine old house, where there is a good gallery of pictures amongst other attractions."

"That is very public spirited on the part of Mr. Atherstone; most English proprietors seem to grudge letting their beautiful parks be seen by any one but the rabbits and hares, and even those they shoot for their temerity. We will by all means profit by his benevolence, only we must not go to the house, Una; for I made his acquaintance the first day we went to Northcote Manor, and he said he should call upon me, but he has not appeared."

"What did you think of him? You have never told me, and people do spread such extraordinary stories about him."

"There is, undoubtedly, a strong prejudice against him in the county; but I saw nothing to justify it in the few minutes during which I conversed with him. There is, certainly, a rather peculiar reserve in his manner, and he looks proud enough to be descended from Lucifer himself; but he is a perfect gentleman, and he was very courteous and agreeable to me. You did not meet him, I think."

"Not at the house—he was gone before we came in; but I just saw him when I was out with Will."



"Northcote told me his history, and a strange enough one it is?"

"I heard it all from Will. Do you think he really has done anything wrong as people imagine?"

"It is hard to say. Northcote said Atherstone himself had told him that he considered himself in a sense guilty of his uncle's death, as he had driven the old man into the fit of rage which killed him; but I am sure I should have acted precisely in the same way with regard to the forger, with only this difference, that I should not have let him off as he did afterwards. I cannot conceive anything more intolerable than to be obliged, as Atherstone was, to associate continually with such an unmitigated scoundrel as that fellow Edwards seems to have been."

"Yes, and to see his uncle so miserably deceived by him, that must have been the worst of all; but let us go on a little quicker, father. I want to reach the place while the sun is still high, so as to get all the effects of light and shade on the grand old house."

They cantered on, and soon reached the nearest gate of Atherstone Abbey, which was not more than four miles from their own home. Here they found a very urbane lodge-keeper, who was quite willing to let them enter, and just as the heavy iron gates rolled back and they rode in, a horseman came at a hard gallop down the avenue towards them, whom they perceived to be none other than Mr. Atherstone himself. He was riding the powerful black horse, of which Una had heard already, and when he saw his visitors he checked him so suddenly as almost to throw him back on his haunches, which movement had the effect of making Miss Dysart's fiery little steed execute a sort of fancy dance, that might have proved very inconvenient to a lady with a less firm seat than her own. Atherstone started forward as if to come to her assistance; but Colonel Dysart, who was watching his daughter, made him a sign to leave her to herself, and he soon saw that she was perfectly mistress of her position, and knew how to manage her horse and quiet his excitement, both with grace and skill. Her hat fell off in the process, however, and her bright beautiful face, with her long hair waving round it in the wind, seemed to Humphrey Atherstone the most charming picture he had ever seen. She completed the conquest of her impatient horse by giving him a run on the turf at the side of the road, and then brought him quietly back, laughing merrily at his escapade, as she regained her father's side. Atherstone had dismounted to rescue her hat, which had fallen into a bush, and now brought it to her, fixing his dark eyes steadily, as he did so, on the fair smiling face that seemed suddenly to have brightened all the sunshine round him.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"He drew back the covering."—p 492.

Una met his look with one of eager interest. She could not resist the temptation of scanning attentively the features of the man whose strange history had so greatly excited her curiosity, and as his image impressed itself on her mind, never more to be forgotten, the indestructible conviction took possession of her, that it was a noble soul—a soul worthy of all human love and devotion—which lay behind that proud, dark countenance, whatever might be the errors, or mistakes or trials that had distorted his life.

"He is a king among men, let them say what they will," she thought, and when Colonel Dysart introduced him formally to her, she returned his salute with the brightest and most winning of smiles, longing, almost unconsciously, to show him that she at least would never share in the injustice which she felt sure was dealt to him by others.

"I was just setting out for Vale House with the intention of paying my respects to you," said Atherstone, "and I am very glad I have been saved from missing you by meeting you here."

"We came meaning to profit by your liberal permission to strangers to ride through your beautiful grounds," said Colonel Dysart; "of course, we had no thought of intruding upon you at the house."

"But I hope you will now do me the favour of going there," said Atherstone, "for there is a good deal that is worth seeing in my old place—at least for those who care to examine relics of former days, and in any case I think you will like to look at the pictures—we have rather a fine collection."

"I shall like to look at everything, Mr. Atherstone," said Una, with a frank, merry laugh. "I think it best to tell you at once, that I have been wildly anxious to get the chance of seeing Atherstone Abbey, ever since I caught my first glimpse of it from the side of the hill. It looked from thence as if it might have been the palace of a Saxon king, or even, perhaps, the country residence of the high priest of all the Druids, in the days when those old gentlemen still went about with wreaths of mistletoe on their heads and golden sickles in their hands."

"It is tolerably ancient, certainly," said Atherstone, smiling, "and you shall see it all, Miss Dysart—from the battlements, where the old warders really did keep watch for any possible foe, down to the cave in the rock of the foundations, where it is said they used to put the refractory monks in the days when it was an abbey, though my own impression is that it was simply the abbot's wine-cellar."

"I cannot allow any prosaic explanations while I am here," said Una; "there is not much romance left in this work-a-day world, and you must, at least, let it linger round a grand old place such as this is."

"I am not sure that the romantic element has really died out of the modern world, Miss Dysart, only people do not let their whole career pass under the gaze of their fellow-creatures as they used to do; you may be sure if you could sift the lives of some of those around you, there would be found in them incidents quite as startling and terrible as ever in the rough days of old."

"He is thinking of himself," thought Una, glancing towards the face which seemed to darken as he spoke; and she was right. Atherstone lived a life of such continual introspection, such ceaseless brooding over one tremendous difficulty, that it seemed to connect itself with everything, however insignificant, and to follow him night and day like a ghastly spectre which no exorcism could lay.

"Wait a moment, Una, and let us enjoy this view, it really is grand," said Colonel Dysart, as a turn in the avenue down which they had been riding brought them right in front of the Abbey; and there for the first time it burst full on her sight—massive, stately, imposing, with its dark-grey walls and its frowning battlements, and its background of sombre pines clothing the steep hill behind it. She looked at it with wide-open eyes and parted lips, half breathless with delight; but if in that hour she could have known under what circumstances she should one day gaze upon that grim old castle, she would have urged her fleet horse to his utmost speed, and flown away from it to some distant spot, where she could never look on it or its master more.

"Oh! Mr. Atherstone, you have indeed something to be proud of," said Una at last. "I should think the possession of such a place would compensate for many of the troubles of life."

"It had need to do so," he muttered to himself

"Come, Miss Dysart," he added more lightly, "let me do the honours in proper style. This was once the drawbridge; but I hope you will agree with me that we have done well to make it a somewhat more safe and convenient entrance;" and their horses' hoofs clattered noisily over an iron bridge which led to a huge arched doorway.

"Yes; but I am rather bewildered about the moat—if we are passing over it now: I thought it ought to be filled with water."

"I am afraid that has long since been drained away; but I hope you will think we have turned it to good account." Which they certainly had, for the channel, which had once been deep enough to drown a man, was entirely filled with blossoming plants, so that the stern old fortress seemed to be encircled with a garland of flowers.

"I think it has a most charming effect," said Una; "but that ponderous door seems to be opening by magic, for you have given no summons."

"Very easy magic," said Atherstone, laughing, "as the butler has simply seen our approach through the loophole at the side," and laying his strong hand on Una's bridle-rein, lest the grating sound of the massive hinges should startle her horse, he led her through the great entrance of Atherstone Abbey, and rode on with her to the centre of a stone court-yard, where they stopped to dismount. As he did so a sudden strange recollection came over him, that just in this fashion the Atherstones of old had been wont to bring in their brides, and lead them with triumph and joy across the threshold of that ancestral home, when by deeds of prowess they had won the lady of their love, to share with them its grandeur and its power, and his brows contracted with a dark heavy frown as he thought of it, for it would have been impossible for any man to be more deeply, more sternly resolved than was Humphrey Atherstone, that no bride of his should ever pass through the entrance to the Abbey.

"Are you not horrified to see a modern butler instead of a hoary seneschal, Una?" said Colonel Dysart, in a low tone, as that functionary came up with various other servants; but Atherstone heard him, and the gloom of his face passed away in a smile of amusement. "Thorpe might almost enact the part," he said, "he has been in our family forty years; but I hope before you make your pilgrimage through the house, Miss Dysart, you will not disdain some nineteenth century tea and fruit, instead of a boar's head, or any little dainty of that kind."

"Spurs in an empty dish is the only food that would suit my ideas," she answered, and her merry laugh woke the echoes of the old stone court.

"We have not heard such a sound as that this many a day, sir," said old Thorpe, as his master went up to give him his orders; "it does my heart good to hear it."

"It is pleasant music, doubtless," said Atherstone, "but I fear it scarce suits our old Abbey, anyhow we are not likely to have much of it here."

Turning back to the Dysarts, he helped Una to dismount, and then led them into a fine old hall, and through various large rooms filled with costly furniture of a somewhat antique description, till they came suddenly upon a sunny, tastefully-arranged boudoir that was in complete contrast to the rest of the house; a conservatory opened out from it, filled with the choicest flowers, and Atherstone placed an easy chair for Una close to it, so that she might enjoy their fragrance.

"I thought you would like this room," he said; "it was the one my mother always used, so I take pains to have it carefully kept exactly as she left it, though I generally sit in the library myself."

"Is it long since you lost her?" asked Colonel Dysart.

"Yes, it is indeed; I was only six or seven years old."

"Do you remember her?" said Una, softly.

"Just enough to know that this is an excellent likeness," he answered, taking a miniature from the table and showing it to her. It represented a dark, aristocratic-looking beauty, with the same liquid hazel eyes that Humphrey himself possessed, but not otherwise resembling him. Una remarked this at once, saying she should never have guessed it was a portrait of his mother.

"No," he said, with a rather melancholy smile, "I am too complete an Atherstone to be like her at all, and this was painted when she was very young, before her marriage with my father." He turned round the miniature as he spoke, and showed engraved on the gold at the back of it the name of Philippa Devereux.

"Devereux!" exclaimed Colonel Dysart; "was she of the Mount Devereux family?"

"Yes, she was the youngest daughter of the last lord."

"In that case she was distantly connected with the Molyneuxes, which fact constitutes my daughter in some sense your kinswoman."

"I am exceedingly glad to hear it," said Atherstone with a smile, looking round to Una.

"Do you mean that Mr. Atherstone and I are cousins?" she exclaimed, starting up as she eagerly waited for her father's reply.

"Only in a very remote Caledonian degree, I am afraid; but I believe if you could both get high enough in the genealogical tree you would meet somewhere at last," said Colonel Dysart.

"If it is only enough to prevent the necessity of my being on my best behaviour at Atherstone Abbey, very stiff and polite," said Una, "I shall be quite satisfied."

"Pray do let us consider ourselves related to that extent at least," said Atherstone, "and I hope you will do exactly as you please in all ways within these walls."

"I think if I did I should rush off this very moment and explore the whole house quite by myself," said Una, with a rather saucy glance at him, anxious to see if by chance he proved himself afraid of her discovering any mystery; but he looked perfectly at his ease as he said, "You shall do so if you like, but I must warn you that the only result will be your losing yourself hopelessly in a labyrinth of passages, in five minutes' time."

"Then I must resign myself to go in a proper and reasonable manner, I suppose."

"And I think we must not delay if we are to be at home again before nightfall," said Colonel Dysart; so they started at once for a thorough inspection of the Abbey.

It proved to be simply an exceedingly fine specimen of an old mediæval castle, and Una appreciated and enjoyed it all enough to satisfy even Atherstone's almost morbid love for the place. At last they reached the picture gallery, where there was so much to be seen that it was impossible they could complete the inspection on that occasion, and Colonel Dysart was obliged to agree to Atherstone's earnest entreaty that they would come another time and spend a whole day with him, in order to give as much attention to some of the masterpieces as Una desired.

They were turning to leave the gallery, and Colonel Dysart had already preceded them out of it, when his daughter's attention was attracted by a picture, before which was hung a veil of black crape. She paused and looked up at Atherstone, hardly liking to ask him if she might see it. The sombre expression which his face sometimes wore suddenly darkened over it; but he did not hesitate to grant the mute request of her eyes, and in perfect silence he drew back the covering and let her look at the picture. Una stood before it, transfixed with a painful sense of awe, for never had she seen a representation of human life in any shape, which had made such a powerful impression upon her as that now before her. It was a large and most masterly painting, executed with strong effects of light and shade, and showing the interior of a gloomy old tower, lit up by a rude iron lamp that hung from the ceiling. A low couch of straw, with a rough covering flung over it, was in one corner, and at the other end was an enormous stone cross; in front of this, kneeling with clasped hands and head turned upwards in a perfect anguish of supplication, was a man still young, but haggard and emaciated to the last degree. He wore a coarse brown dress, with a knotted cord at the waist; and the evidences of a life of torment and penance which were all around him were as nothing compared with the terrible revelation of his despairing face, which spoke of a remorse and horror that could find no rest. But the most painful sensation which this strange picture caused Una was the unmistakable likeness she could trace in the wild mournful countenance, to that of Humphrey Atherstone.

It was with a timidity in her voice which she could not conquer that she whispered at last, "Who is this?" and he answered, more like a man talking in a dream than one who knew what he was saying, "Fulke Atherstone, of evil memory." He let the black drapery fall over the picture while he spoke, and Una made no attempt to say another word on the subject.

They left the gallery, and as they continued to explore the interminable rooms, the corridors built in the thickness of the wall, and other matters of interest, Una quite recovered her gaiety, and went flitting about like a sunbeam through the lurking shadows.

"It is growing late, Una, and we really must go," said Colonel Dysart; "we have detained Mr. Atherstone too long already."

"I hope we have not quite tired you out," she said, looking up at their host with her charming smile.

"On the contrary, it has given me the greatest possible pleasure to show the Abbey to those who can appreciate it so well," he said heartily.

"Then, if I might see the cave of the refractory monks, I will ask nothing more."

"Oh, by all means," said Atherstone. "It will not detain you long to go round to the back of the house, where the entrance to it is; if you will come down this turret stair we shall reach it in a moment."

He took them out through a little postern gate, which led to a terrace running the whole length of the house, and from which a precipitous cliff rose abruptly and towered far above them. The rocky foundations of the house were here quite exposed to view, and the mouth of the cave yawned visibly before them, closed in by an iron grating. This was opened by a key which Thorpe, who was in attendance on them, produced from the ponderous bunch he carried. A flight of stone steps led down to the vault, and Colonel Dysart, glancing in, said he was sure it was frightfully damp, and that he must decline visiting the bones of the refractory monks, or whatever it was they were going to see.

"I am afraid there is not even anything so interesting as their bones," said Atherstone; "but it is a curious old cave, and Miss Dysart may as well see it. Let me go first," he continued, "to show you the way;" and she followed him down the steep flight of steps, while her father sauntered away to the other end of the terrace.

There certainly was not much to be seen, except the moist walls of an underground cave, and the atmosphere was sufficiently chilly to make Una willing to go back very soon to the sunshine. She stumbled on the first step going up, and as they were all rather broken and rugged, Atherstone took her hand in his and went in front of her, guiding her safely to the top. He had stepped on to the terrace, and she was just following, when suddenly she felt his grasp tighten on her hand with a convulsive movement, of which he was clearly unconscious, for his eyes were fixed on some object at a little distance, that seemed to have aroused in him a perfect passion of anger, which transformed his whole countenance in a manner that actually appalled her. Eagerly she followed the direction of his eyes, and saw a man, whom she recognised as the strange-looking foreigner she had seen with Mr. Crichton, stealing away round the corner of the house, and evidently trying to escape observation.

As he disappeared, Atherstone dropped her hand, apparently forgetting her presence, and striding up to Thorpe he seized hold of his arm with a violent grasp, and said, "What does this mean?—how have you dared to disobey my most positive orders?"

"It was not me, sir, indeed; I would sooner have died than let him in. It must have been the new footman, who does not know him by sight."

"Let every servant of the house be told that if he ever enters within the park walls again they leave my service, one and all; and go now at once, Thorpe, and see him well off my ground."

The old man hurried away, and Atherstone came back to Una, still frowning and disturbed.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Dysart. I was annoyed by the intrusion of a person who has no right here."

"I want you so much to tell me who that man is," she said eagerly.

"What do you know of him?" he asked, in an abrupt, stern tone.

"Nothing whatever; but I saw him once talking to the rector, and I took the strangest antipathy to him, for no reason that I could account for to myself."

"An instinct of what he is, probably—a villain, a base, deep villain, in the fullest sense of the word. His name is Edwards."

Una said not another word, and soon was riding home with her father, finding abundant food for reflection in her first visit to Atherstone Abbey. It was not her last.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. No. 15. CHRIST. PART VIII. CHRIST A PREACHER. PART I.

Scripture to be read—Parts of Matt. iv., v., vi.

AS it would be impossible in two lessons to go through the whole Sermon on the Mount, only a few passages can be selected. The idea of these lessons is to show what Christ taught about man's relation to God, and God's relation to man.

INTRODUCTION. (Read Matt. iv. 23—25.) Describe this new Teacher going about with twelve apostles—sick people brought in cool of evening—all cured. Tidings of such wonderful miracles spreading—great crowds collecting. Did He only want to heal the sick? No, wanted the people to receive Him—i.e., believe on Him; so must teach them about Himself. How could He teach a large number? Gathered together on a hill-side. Picture the scene, cloudless Eastern sky; the ground carpeted with flowers; birds flying about (vi. 26—28); the disciples around our Lord; He sitting (like all Eastern teachers); the multitude around eagerly listening. What will He talk about? Begins with man's relation to God.

I. THE BEATITUDES. (Read v. 1—12.) Ask who are commonly considered happy (or blessed.) The rich, mighty, distinguished—e.g., great warriors, statesmen, travellers, &c. Show why Christ calls peacemakers, &c., blessed. Because look forward to eternal future. Remind of difference between this world's greatness and that in God's sight; the latter is in reach of all, and is lasting. Ask which is better and most worth having. This blessedness God's gift to those that seek it.

II. CHRISTIAN DUTIES. (Read v. 13—16.) Ask the properties of salt in preserving; and explain how Christians must act on those around them, influencing for good; preserve from corruption, &c. Remind of Joseph exercising religious influence over Pharaoh; Daniel at court; little maid in Naaman's house, &c. So may school-boy, servant, lad in workshop, &c., let their light shine. Show how useful the humblest may be; the sun no use to us at midnight because on other side of world; but cheapest candle of use because at hand. So all have a little light, which may be of use to those near them.

III. CHRISTIAN CONDUCT TO ONE ANOTHER. (Read v. 19—23.) Ask for the law of murder; reminding of Cain's steps in sin—envy, hatred, murder; hence, show that these break the commandment, though the deed of murder not actually committed. The principle the same. Press this home to children at school, envious of others' success and wishing harm; or quarrelsome and passionate. Must observe the spirit as well as letter of the law. (Read v. 38—48.) Not enough to abstain from fighting and murder, must be actively kind. Ask for examples of passive submission to injuries—viz., Christ and Stephen. Show how here too the spirit of the law is intended—e.g., readiness to lend, give to the poor, go on a message for a friend; submitting to injuries, &c. Such conduct imitating Christ, proving us to be true children of God, who has forgiven us and submitted to all our wrongs to Him.

IV. THE WHOLE DUTY OF MAN. (Read vi. 1—4.) (a) To his neighbour. Explain "alms," and show how it includes all good deeds or acts of mercy to others. Why do men do these? Various motives—e.g., mere pity, because not like to see any one in trouble; or, for sake of show, to win applause from fellow-man. Such will get the reward they seek in commendation from others. How should such good deeds be done? Refer to Obadiah hiding the prophets of the Lord (1 Kings xviii. 4); Lydia receiving St. Paul (Acts xvi. 14). Remind of Christ's saying about the cup of cold water, and how He accepts such as done to Him (Matt. xxv. 45). Hence such good deeds must be done without show, out of simple love to the person and to Christ. Such will be rewarded openly at judgment. (b) To God. (Read vi. 5—8.) Ask for an instance of vain repetitions by prophets of Baal (1 Kings xviii. 26); and of a man praying in public for effect (Luke xviii. 11); also of the opposite—praying in secret. Isaac in fields; Peter on house-top; Paul in prison; Nathanael under fig-tree. Such prayer approved and heard; such as the publican's in the parable. Apply this to children by showing nature of true prayer; not merely repeating certain words, but lifting up heart in all places at all times to "Father who seeth in secret." (c) To himself (Read vi. 16—18.) Ask the object of fasting. To keep under the body (1 Cor. ix. 27) lest gross living should incline to sin. Remind of Christ's words (Matt. xvii. 21); of apostles' example (Acts xiii. 3). Explain that all things are lawful and all good, God's gifts. Still advisable at certain times to abstain from food and pleasure when about any peculiarly solemn work. Body must be trained as well as soul for service of God; but must be done secretly, or else is worthless.

Questions to be answered.

1. What are the two main topics of the Sermon on the Mount?
2. Give the heads of this lesson.
3. What three things are included in the whole duty of man?
4. Show how our Lord teaches the meaning of the sixth commandment.
5. Give examples of private prayer.
6. Give instances of fasting.

NELLY'S WISH; OR, HOW TO BE HAPPY.

"NELLY dear, why do you sit in that listless way; have you nothing to do?"

"I do not care to do anything just now; I was thinking."

"It is quite right to think, if any good results from your thoughts, but I never see that your reflections lead to anything. Now tell me what was passing in your mind just now."

"Well, mamma, I was thinking about Jessie Bell, and what a lovely new hat she wore last Sunday."

"And no doubt you felt a little dissatisfied that I cannot buy you one like it."

"Why, mamma! how did you know that?"

"Because those people who sit brooding for hours, as you often do, spend at least half that time in simply indulging vain wishes and useless regrets."

"I do so often wish we were rich enough to ride in a fine carriage, and wear beautiful clothes, and keep a lot of servants."

"If your wish could be gratified, you would then want something more, perhaps a grand title, or even to become a queen."

"Oh! how delightful that would be!" replied Nelly, clasping her hands with an amount of energy no one would have supposed such a child possessed.

"There, you see I guessed rightly again. Instead of feeling thankful for what you have, your time is wasted hankering after all you have not. Suppose your papa and I were to sit all day with our hands in our laps longing for a fortune, do you think it would bring one?"

"That would look very silly, but you might wish for it and work all the time."

"And what would be the use of wishing for it? If I was always fretting myself with vain hopes, instead of making things better by it, they would become worse; as my duties would become irksome, I should take no interest in them."

Just at this moment Mr. Watkins, Nelly's papa, entered the room, and observing from Nelly's large serious blue eyes that she was receiving some admonition from her mother, stroked her hair, and kissing her on the forehead, said, "Well, and how is my little girl to-day?"

Nelly as usual returned the salutation by clasping her arms round her father's neck most affectionately; he then turned to his wife, taking a note from his pocket, and said, "Here is a grand treat for our Nelly: Mrs. Blake is going to give a children's party, and has invited her to it."

"But, papa dear, I cannot go, my frocks are too shabby and common."

A shade of melancholy passed over the indulgent father's face as he replied, "We will see about the dress; what do you say, mamma, must we buy a new one?"

"I think it is a great pity to buy more now, as Nelly is growing very fast, and she has several to wear out; your white one will do quite well, dear, with your new sash."

"I hate that scanty thing," said Nelly, pouting; "it is as plain as a night-gown, and the sash is not half so good as cousin Alice's."

"Do you think," said the father, "you could choose one that you would like, if I take you to a shop?"

"Oh yes, papa! I am sure I could, but" (and here she faltered in her speech) "it would not be made so pretty as Jessie Bell's."

"But suppose we find out who made Jessie Bell's, and get her to make yours, will that do?"

"But can you afford it, papa? I heard you tell mamma you could not buy yourself a new coat just yet."

"That is true, my child, but I would stretch a point to make you contented and happy; besides, a coat costs a great deal more than a frock. Fetch your hat, and we will go down to Mr. Jones, and see what he can show us."

Nelly Watkins was the only child of kind parents in moderate circumstances. She had an interesting countenance, full of intelligence, but rather a sad expression, produced by a discontented spirit. Unlike most children, she never looked on the bright side of things, and so nursed a fretful, melancholy disposition. This failing was well known to her fond, anxious parents, and at times gave them great concern for her health. Every opportunity to check this spirit of discontent was embraced by them, though up to the present time very little success had attended their efforts.

Before Nelly returned to the room, her parents consulted each other as to the line of conduct on their part which would most tend to the desired reformation in her character.

"I think," said Mr. Watkins, "it will be well to indulge her wishes as far as we can, and so let her see that gratified desires do not always satisfy the mind."

"You know best," replied her mamma, "but sometimes I think she has too many whims acceded to. As a rule, children are happy in proportion to the opportunities they get of doing something to make those about them happy, but how to create in her the desire is my difficulty."

Nelly here returned duly equipped for a walk to the best draper in the town to choose a dress. Her father had his patience most severely tested by the length of time she took in the selection. At last the choice was made, the dressmaker's address obtained, and all was to be ready for the party. Nelly laid awake some time after going to bed that night, thinking of her new dress, and imagining the envy of some of her companions when they saw her so smart.

Her mother did not see the dress till it came home just before the party, but was at once struck with its unsuitableness for such an occasion; she, however, said nothing, hoping her little girl would find out for herself how foolish she had been.

By six o'clock many merry little faces and beaming smiles were collected in Mrs. Blake's spacious drawing-room. All were in simple white dresses with coloured sashes, similar to Nelly's despised one. Presently she made her appearance, with a fluttering heart, all intent upon the impression her costly, and really pretilly-made dress would make. She saw at a glance that she was more expensively dressed than any of her companions, and felt very important in consequence, till various whispers reached her ears, which made her feel rather uncomfortable. One little girl, who was very fond of her, ventured to ask if she had not a party dress to come in.

"What do you mean by a party dress? mine is a brand new one, made by Miss Fletcher, and cost a lot of money."

"I dare say it did," replied her little friend, "but it is not a proper one to dance and romp in. I heard Mrs. Blake say what a pity it was your mamma had not put you on a cooler frock: but never mind, perhaps you won't be too warm. We are going to have a game at blindman's buff."

Nelly felt somewhat discontented, but nevertheless joined in the game, and was destined to be very active in it, being easily detected by the marked difference in the texture of her dress; she was, therefore, blindman nearly all the evening, chasing the others round the room, till she became so overpowered with the heat that she was obliged to beg to leave the game and the room. Mrs. Blake, thinking she was only going to the ante-room to rest, did not follow; but when some refreshments were brought in she looked about to find her, remembering she had been absent a long while. No one had seen her since she left the room.

The servants were called and asked if they had seen one of the little visitors wandering about the house or garden; and the one who had charge of the hats and cloaks tried to find out which Nelly had worn, but among so many could not tell whether she had taken hers away or not. A servant was dispatched to Mrs. Watkins to inquire if she had returned home. This message, as may be supposed, put her parents in a great fright, as they had seen nothing of her. They returned with the servant, but could gain no tidings of the missing child. Her mother soon discovered that her hat and cloak were with the others. The house was again searched, but still she could not be found. A lantern was then procured, and search was made in the grounds, but with no better result. Her distressed father called her by name, but no answer greeted his ears. He returned to the house in despair, and met his wife's anxious look with blank dismay. A consultation then took place with Mrs. Blake as to the best means to adopt in searching for her, during which the door slowly opened, and the object of their solicitude walked in, rubbing her eyes and shivering with cold.

"Why, my child, where have you been?" cried the distracted parents.

"I only went in the garden to cool myself, and suppose I fell asleep. I was resting on the grass bank at the end of the lawn, but I woke up so cold. May I go home to bed? I'm afraid I shall never get warm again."

As might naturally be expected, Nelly had caught a severe cold. She was taken home, and many weeks elapsed before she could leave her bed. The first day she was able to join her parents down-stairs, she appeared looking very pale, but the fretful, peevish look had vanished, and in its place a sweet look of contentment beamed over her features, making her look very pretty in spite of her want of colour.

"And how does my little one feel to-day?" said her father, giving her the usual morning greeting.

"Thank you, papa, I feel so comfortable; all the pains have gone away. Oh! I am so glad to feel well again. Now I want to get very strong, so that I can help mamma, for she has had a great deal to do for me. How much trouble I have been to both of you!"

"Never mind that now, dear; we are quite rewarded by having you well again."

"I'm glad I've been ill, pa, now it's over."

"Why, my child?"

"Because I think it has made me a better girl. I used to be so silly, always having stupid wishes, but when I was ill I only had one wish, that was to get well again; and now I am well, I feel so happy to think all those dreadful pains are gone. I want no more."

"Then suppose I were to tell you that some one had left us a large fortune, what would you say?"

"Well, papa, I should be glad, for you and mamma would have less work to do, and would be able to buy all you wanted; but it would make no difference to me as you have always given me so much that I don't want anything more."

"But if you had a lot of money, what would you do with it?"

Nelly had to think for some time, then smiling up in her father's face, she replied, "I know what I'd do, I'd find all the poor little girls and boys who were ill, and had no kind friends to attend to them, and build a large house for them to live in, and keep a lot of servants to make nice things for them, and get some doctors to give them medicine to make them well; then mamma and I would go and see them and take them books to read and pictures to look at."

"That would be a good way of spending money," replied her father; "and I may now tell you that I am able to gratify even this good desire of yours. Your grandpa, whom you have never seen, died a few weeks ago, and we are now very rich indeed. Do you still wish to make a home for sick children?"

"Oh yes, papa! and I will go out in the streets myself, and every child I find in pain, or ill, shall come to my home. This is the happiest day of my life."

Thus, my readers, little Nelly was brought through her sickness to find out that true happiness is only to be obtained by contentment and a love of doing good to others.

M. N.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

200. On what occasion did Solomon petition God to be favourable to His people in case they were ever carried captive by their enemies?

201. The word "shipmen" (i.e., seamen) is used once in the Old and once in the New Testament. Give the passages.

202. Show that to die childless was regarded by the Jews as a very bitter calamity.

203. Name the Evangelist who more than the others records the private prayers of the Lord Jesus, and give examples.

204. Though the Jews, before the Babylonish Captivity, had very few (if any) domestic poultry, yet we read of "fatted fowl" being served at the table of an early king. Give the passage.

205. Narrate the circumstances which led to the league between the children of Israel and the Gibeonites.

206. In what respects did the ascension of the Lord Jesus (Acts i. 9) differ from those recorded in the Old Testament?

207. Which one of the Evangelists tells us the name of the servant of the high priest wounded by Peter on the night of our Lord's betrayal?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 464.

183. St. Mark (iv. 37, 38).

184. A considerable time must have elapsed, seeing that "many had taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things that are most surely believed among us" (Luke i. 1).

185. Isaiah (liii. 4). See Matt. viii. 17.

186. The Philippians (Phil. iv. 1).

187. St. Matthew says that in the Lord living at Nazareth was fulfilled that which was spoken by the prophet: "He shall be called a Nazarene" (Matt. ii. 23).

188. Pashur (Jer. xx. 4).

189. See Acts xi. 17.

190. Exod. iv. 19.

(Drawn by M. ELLEN EDWARDS.)

PENT IN THE CITY.

BY ISABELLA BANKS.

BRICK and mortar hem me in,—
I, who love the fields and trees,
Hear but the ceaseless din
Of traffic, toil and sin,
Not the murmur of the brooklet and the breeze.

The swift seasons come and go;
Golden kingcups star the grass;
June's crimson roses blow;
Rich dahlias are aglow;
And the holly hangs o'er pools that are like glass.

But the same dull round is mine,
In the same cramped blank of wall;
I know the sun does shine
And feel his rays divine,
But the very sun seems cumbered with a pall.

Sparrows twitter in the eaves,
(I've no lark within a cage),
But blackbird bowered in leaves,
Nor linnet from the sheaves,
Nor glad nightingale my thirst for song assuage.

There are woodland haunts I knew
When my life was young and sweet,
When hours were all too few,
And skies were always blue,
As the harebell and the speedwell at my feet.

But those woods are far away,
If we count the years as miles;
My hair has changed to grey,—
My heart well-nigh to clay,
Since I, wild-flower laden, sat on sylvan stiles.

And these never-ending streets
Wherein now my lot is cast,
Where every pulse that beats
The same sad dirge repeats,
That human life is hurrying on too fast,—

Seem to close and crush me in;
Not a gap left for escape
From their oppressive din
To heath, or crystal linn,
Yellow sea-beat sands, or breezy headland-cape.

I am tied to city ways;
I am bound as to a wheel;
But at my will I raise
The ghosts of other days,
And from the present to the past I steal.

Then the close walls fade and melt,
Grass and ferns spring at my feet,
Trees circle as a belt,
Beech-mast and acorns pelt,
And the perfume of the woods comes passing sweet.

And I linger in the lanes
Plaiting rushes as I go,
And list the birdie's strains,
And joy runs through my veins,
Such pure joy as youth and summer only know.

And some pleasant cheery face,
Some lithe and supple form,
Imparts a crowning grace,
To sun the shady place,
And to quicken up the pulses fresh and warm.

Therefore I may thank my God
That although in city pent,
My childhood's footsteps trod
Greenwood and daisied sod,
And memory wields a wand that should content.

For within this selfsame town
Exist some hapless men,
Whose sun of life goes down
As it rose, mid tear and frown,
With no summer field or forest in their ken.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

ABOUT AN UNPAINTED PICTURE.

THERE they sat, in the shabby old drawing-room at St. John's Wood, the "dear old man," as Maggie sometimes called her father in a petting sort of way, Maggie herself, and poor blind Miss Charlotte Campbell, all talking in the twilight.

"It is no use, Maggie," said Mr. Ashbury, "while the days are so short I do not like your coming home alone all the way from the National Gallery, or one of the museums; you are too young and too pretty," he added.

"No one else thinks so, daddy dear," she answered meekly, from her footstool on the rug; and no one ever looks at me."

"If I give my opinion," said Miss Campbell, in her usual stately manner, sitting bolt upright in the easy chair, with every fold of her stiff silk dress precisely, in its proper place, and her prim lace collar looking hard and white and prominent even in the dusk of evening,—"if I give my opinion," she said, directing her poor old sightless eyes towards Maggie, who was sometimes rather afraid of her, "I must say, from what I have heard, I do not think that Margaret will make an artist. Moreover, as her father's only daughter, it seems to me that her place is in his household, not in the ranks of those who are obliged to win their bread by outdoor labour or by taking to a profession."

Maggie always fretted a little beneath Miss Campbell's long and slowly delivered speeches, but she answered her gently though earnestly. "Dear Miss Charlotte, I assure you I do not neglect the household affairs; I would not for the world, for I think that a woman's first duty——"

"A woman!" said the old man, stroking the soft brown hair that generally looked untidy and always pretty.

"Yes, daddy," she answered tenderly, "a woman, but your own spoilt child as well. I think a woman's first duty is in her home; but my father is out all day, and I have done all there is to do in the course of a few hours, and then, as I am able, at any rate in a measure, to succeed, I draw. I may not always have my father," she continued, "or some day he may not be able to work for me, and then perhaps I shall work for him, so I want to make the best of the one talent I have, and besides I must have some occupation for my leisure hours," she pleaded.

"But you may marry, and not have occasion to work," urged Miss Charlotte, loth to give up her argument.

"But, Miss Charlotte, marriage is not a commercial speculation. How would you like it if any one married Charley for any other reason than the only proper one, for instance?"

"I should be very glad if you married him for any reason you pleased, my dear," she said, and Maggie looked up at the usually stern face (a handsome one still, in spite of her sixty years), and seeing the expression on it, thought vaguely that the prim, precise old lady carried a soft heart under a hard shell. She looked back upon that evening in after years, and wondered how it was she used to fear her so much, and love her so little, not understanding how much affection even then had been hidden under the girlish fear. We so seldom know the depths of our own feelings, until we have occasion to sound them.

"But to return to the question," she went on. "I may work at my art, may I not, daddy dear? I will never, never neglect you, and you shall never come and find me out, or in the studio and not ready for you, for I know how disheartening it must be to return home and not find some one there, and ready to welcome you; but let me do as I like in this matter- I want to get rich, you know;" and she laughed; "and I shall be an artist some day—I feel it in me, and I've the design of a grand picture in my head already."

"If all the pictures designed were painted, the world would be fuller of illustrations than it is of soldiers," said Mr. Ashbury. He had failed in health lately, had the old man, and it was odd how his thoughts had returned to the days of his youth. It had been his ambition to enter the army, and by dint of family management he had done so, but finding it impossible to live upon his pay he had sold out and taken to a "mercantile life" years and years before, though how it was mercantile no one ever quite understood, for he was a proud man in manner, and not easily questioned, but his heart had always remained in his old profession. During the last few months he had often gone over his old marches, fought his one battle, and lived the old garrison days over again. She did not know why, but there seemed something pathetic in it to Maggie, as if she dimly divined that life was only a circle; to some a small one, round which they journey many times, and to others a larger one, round which they only travel once; and if this last were the manner of the dear old man, was he not nearing the starting-point?

"But I shall certainly paint this," resumed Maggie, "and no one has ever done it before: it is the last meeting of Troilus and Creseide."

"And who on earth are Troilus and Creseide?" asked Charley Campbell, merrily and disrespectfully.

"Why, dear Charles, how did you enter so suddenly?" his aunt inquired. She always called people by their names proper, and her nephew used to say he was certain she treated even her own reflection in the looking-glass, in the days when she could see it, with the greatest respect.

"The servant was at the door, so I had no occasion to knock. Now then, Maggie, please answer my question," he went on, when he had spoken to Mr. Ashbury; "who on earth are Troilus and Creseide?"

"They are not on earth," she responded meekly, and she thought the more the pity, for they might have come to a better understanding; "and fancy your not knowing, Charley," she added; "Chaucer wrote about them; they were a pair of lovers, and Creseide was untrue."

"That is not at all improbable, so if that is the only way in which she distinguished herself there is nothing remarkable in her history."

"Oh yes," said Maggie eagerly, "but she repented of her inconstancy——"

"Ah! that was remarkable."

"And a long time afterwards, when she was poor and weary, Troilus passed her on his way to Troy, she was a beggar, and he did not know her, but there was something in her face that reminded him of his lost Creseide, so he dropped a purse of gold into her lap and silently went his way; but she recognised him, and having sent him back a ruby ring he had given her long ago, she fell down and died."

"How Maggie is always dreaming over the old poets and painters," her father said, half proudly, half tenderly; he liked the grave side of his high-spirited Maggie's character.

"Out of the fulness of the heart, &c.," said Miss Charlotte, "and our thoughts insensibly make a pathway down which our feet must follow. The man I honour is that artist whose wonderful picture of Christ preaching His sermon on the Mount of Olives was exhibited a few years ago. It was God's will, so I may not regret my lost sight," she said in her proud voice, yet with meek submission in her manner; "but I would have given much to have seen it. I have heard that though he produced many pictures, yet his heart was only in this one, and he lived his life to paint that most sacred of all times and countries. I have often envied that man; his inner life must have been the sweetest and the purest, and day-dreams were dreamt far away from the world and all its crowd of human beings; and even his thoughts of the past must have been such as could tinge and deepen all his hopes of the hereafter." She seemed to have been speaking to herself rather than to them, and when she stopped, Maggie drawing near, felt a foreshadowing of that love with which in after years she always thought of Charlotte Campbell. There was a dreamy, romantic side to the formal spinster's character as well as to the enthusiastic girl's, and she continued after a minute or two, "I had a friend once who knew the artist well, and he told me that he had a grave face, with a dreamy look of perfect content upon it;—a strange face, my friend said, and one that was difficult to forget, and that is what I should have imagined. I could fancy that in some dream he had seen the eternal city, and his face carried still the expression it first wore when he beheld it." They were silent for a few minutes, gravity seemed to have fallen upon them all.

"Well," said Charley at last—that Charley was always daringly disrespectful even to his aunt—"I wish you would talk rather cheerfully; this is about as lively as a party at a mute's. I say, Maggie, when are you going to begin the thing about Chaucer?"

"The end of it was not Chaucer's," she answered; "he left the poem unfinished, but it was continued and ended by Henryson in the time of Henry VIII."

"Now did you find all that out yourself, or did any one tell you?" he asked provokingly.

A stray shot often hits a target, and Maggie's cheeks were flushed as she answered, "No, I have not read any of Chaucer's poems but 'The House of Fame,' I could not get on with the old English. Mr. Bowden told me the story, and I could imagine it all well, for he describes anything so vividly."

"Oh yes, he's a wonderful person in your eyes."

"Now don't be disagreeable," she answered; "I'm going down-stairs to the dining-room to make the tea."

"Let me come too."

"No, I won't, you've such horrid manners."

"Do, Maggie," he pleaded, looking as mild as a full grown, high-shouldered young man with a beard and moustache can look; "do, Maggie dear."

"I won't; and I won't let you call me 'dear,'" and she stood with her back to the door, barring the way.

"Herbert does."

"Herbert's my cousin."

"Then I'll be your cousin."

"Very well—a cousin is just the same as a brother, you know, only you work him harder, and he bullies you less."

"Thank you, then we won't be cousins. Let me come down, Maggie."

"Well, say please then."

"P-l-e-a-s-e."

"Good bye!" and she turned round, darted out of the door, and fled down the stairs as fast as she could, while he tore after her, jumping three stairs at the time.

"Well," he said, when they had safely landed in the dining-room, and she stood looking at him with a mocking laughing light in those soft bright eyes of hers—"well, a nice tyrant you'll be for some one some day."

"I hope I shan't," she said defiantly.

"Why, shouldn't you like it?"

"No, of course I should not, and I should think any one such a stupid who let me be one."

"I begin to think you'll be a treasure after that lovely speech."

"So I shall—for whoever gets me."

"I hope I may."

"Do you! Then you won't;" and she laughed and looked at him again, so that he did not dare get serious, but he thought how many a truth is spoken in jest, and the very thought that this jest should be a truth made his face grave. She was a strange girl he thought; he had known her all her life, yet seldom understood her; only knew that she had stolen into his heart, especially latterly, always to be remembered as in looking back one sometimes remembers a burst of sunshine which lighted our pathway when least expected. Her character had many sides, and, perhaps, many faults. She was a woman, and womanly, and proud with a pride that was inward rather than assertive; yet a girl, and simple and girl-like—dreamy and quiet, save when sometimes, as to-night, she flashed into merry laughter and high spirits. It is difficult to describe what she was like, for her face was a varying one; at times she looked almost plain, at others beautiful was hardly too strong a word; but it was always sweet and fair, and shaded with brown hair that had now and then a gleam of gold upon it. She had eyes that were uncertain—now brown, like her hair, only darker; now showing, like it, a gleam of gold; but they were wonderful eyes, and they had long—almost black lashes, and there was a colour that came and went upon her cheek, and often a faint flickering smile about the mouth, and perhaps it was this that you noticed most and remembered longest when you had once seen it. She was not short by any means, and she had a graceful rounded figure; and that is all I can tell you about her—that brave, sweet, passionate girl, whose faults and impetuous will sometimes brought her many tears, yet never really lost her for a single day the love of those around her.

"Tea is ready," said Maggie; "I wish the others would come."

"What others?" he asked.

"Herbert, and Hetty, and Mr. Bowden."

"How is it that Bowden is always here?"

"He likes talking to my father."

"Yes, and to the father's daughter too, I expect," he said discontentedly; "I suppose he's one of your slaves, eh, Maggie?"

"Slaves!" and she laughed, but she turned her face towards the fire; "Mr. Bowden a slave!"

"Then he is one of your heroes?"

"No," she replied, "he is neither the one nor the other. Stir the fire, will you?" she said suddenly. She was sitting in the easy chair, lazily warming her toes, and could well have done it herself; but it always seemed natural for him to wait upon her. He went down on his knees to do it, and when he had made the blaze dance up the chimney, he lingered a moment at her feet.

"But which do you prefer?" he asked.

"What, slave or hero? oh, the last decidedly. There are some women who must be slave-driver or hero-worshipper, but they are generally only the first because they are unconsciously disappointed that Fate has not allowed them to be the last. There is a path between, however, which I think better than either."

"And, Maggie!" he exclaimed, seizing her hand, but she drew it away quickly.

"Get up," she said, "there they are at the street-door; whatever would they think if they saw you there?"

"I don't care."

"But I do; get up and don't be stupid, Charley."

"Suppose I told you that I did not think I was stupid at all?"

"Then—then I should never let you come and help me make the tea again, so retreat into common sense at once;" and she rose and went quickly out into the hall to receive her other visitors.

(To be continued.)

THE ISOLATION OF PRIVILEGE.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A., RECTOR OF ARMAGH.

"That which cometh into your mind shall not be at all, that ye say, We will be as the heathen, as the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone. As I live, saith the Lord God, surely with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out, will I rule over you."—Ezek. xx. 32, 33.

THESE words imply a desire on the part of the Jewish people to shake off utterly the yoke of God. And at first sight this seems almost incredible. That a nation which had promises so glorious and memories so spirit-stirring should be willing to sink to the level of other peoples; that men who had such dazzling revelations of a true and a pure God, and also of Divine help and protection and sympathy and approach, should propose to abandon all that was good and trustworthy for Baal and Ashtaroth, and gods beside whom even these were pure, is a startling and humiliating thought. But so it was. And perhaps, when we look again at their true position, we can understand their motives, even while we detest them. Step by step the chosen race had broken away from the restraints of the Mosaic law. They had demanded a king: they had tolerated the polygamy of Solomon, and the idol-temples which he built to gratify his foreign wives. Then they had been contaminated by these examples, which they wanted courage to stamp out, and had themselves drunk deep and long and often of the charmed cup of image worship. A time had come when the worshippers of Jehovah were persecuted to the death in the land which He had bestowed upon this ungrateful race. Every form of sensuality, of rapacity, and of injustice—all that debases one's self and wrongs one's neighbour and outrages one's God—were common in the Holy Land. And as the nation forsook its God, so God forsook the nation; its might was broken, its sons were driven back in battle, and its maidens were not given in marriage. Then they began to feel that between them and Jehovah there was no longer a covenant, but war. The awful purity of a violated law frowned upon them, and chilled their hearts. It was easy for them to see that their practice, and so much profession as they still kept up, were hopelessly opposed to each other. Nothing could be won from their present God, without renouncing the fatal sweetness of the sins which charmed even while they poisoned them. But were there not other, more indulgent gods? Tyre and Egypt, Nineveh and Babylon, were great and strong under the shadow of temples that laid no ban upon the sins they loved. Perhaps Jehovah's was the true religion, and perhaps He smote with an exceeding bitter stroke the professors of His faith who broke their vows: but plainly He did not smite these flourishing and truculent nations, who broke no vows because they made none. Perhaps these are right, and our cold austere worship and our vexing scruples are alike useless and unmeaning. Why should we not become as they, adore their deities, imitate their pleasures, share their impunity? Why should we not, once for all, break the bonds that eat into our flesh, and run the race of sin along green slopes, side by side with the foremost, instead of lingering in thorny places, and getting buffeted because our pace is slow, and we cast wistful eyes over the fence at freedom? Such were the thoughts, we may imagine, that came into their mind, when they said, "We will be as the heathen, as the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone."

"But," saith God, "it shall not be at all." The difference between them and their neighbours—between the chosen race, the specially favoured and endowed, and the common idolatrous mass of men—as it was not of their appointing, so it could not be by them wiped out. Into idolatry, into sensuality, into whatever iniquity they yielded to, they would bring a reproving conscience and a knowledge of better things. The servant who knows his master's will, and yet breaks it, is far worse than he who neither knows nor does it. And he shall be differently dealt with. For while God left those others to a kind of impunity, He warns the Jews that they shall not thus be left—He will rule over them against their will, and it shall be with a mighty hand, and a stretched out arm, and fury poured forth. They could not wipe out the fact that in covenant relation, in God's claim and right to them especially, beside His common right to all men, and in the gratitude they owed Him for all their privileges—their case was special: their guilt was special, and their punishment might well be special too.

Such is the plain meaning of our verse; and we have only to ask what lessons it conveys to us. Can we fall into this wickedness, or need this warning?

Clearly we are in no danger of plunging into any form of idolatry, or perhaps of open apostacy. And yet we have heard of miserable men who took up infidel ideas, and denied God, Christ, eternity, the soul, and whatever else raises us above the level of the brute, not from any rational delusion, but simply to share the freedom from restraint, the recklessness, and the guilt of the unbeliever.

And these have confessed with tears that they could not enjoy even the brief and low pleasures of sin for a season. They were haunted with fears, they were vexed with remorses, the knowledge of sin poisoned their enjoyments, and the knowledge of holiness shamed their very hearts. What was in their minds could not be at all.

But even far short of this, the apostacy of these Jews may be imitated still; and perhaps is imitated to an extent that some of us do not suspect.

A child of pious parents, piously brought up, is not in the same position with men otherwise trained. The example of our parents carries to each of us an assurance that God loves and claims us, but the message is forgotten and the help lost, unless it be taught the child and the youth, again and again, that he belongs to Christ, is bound to serve Him, and has salvation and love perpetually offered, and perpetually open to him to accept. Now suppose him to grow up in the knowledge of all this truth. He sees below the surface to the heart of things; he knows that every soul of man is like an island encircled by an ocean of mercy, overhung by a firmament of love; he knows that he is in solemn covenant relationship with God's Trinity of Persons, that each works in him, each desires his homage, each loves and woos his soul. As he stands beside the grave of friend after friend, he sees the light of eternity upstreaming from the pit's mouth, and he thinks, "What is for me when my eyes shall have closed, and my body shall be like this body, and my soul shall have pruned its trembling wing to take its flight?"

And he has learned a more solemn lesson than any of these—that he is a sinner, and must for evermore bear upon his soul one or other of two things, the guilt of Christ's death, or the merit of Christ's dying. A man may know all this, and feel its solemnity, and yet be unsaved—for salvation is to choose, to decide, to accept Christ, to live and die for Him.

But be sure that such a person never yet was a happy man. Every chapter and every hymn rebuked him. Every faithful and true sermon either shook him with fear or melted him with contrition, or made him ashamed at least that he was neither melted nor shaken. He might laugh, or work, or meditate—but he dared not look into the chambers of his own heart,

> "For over all there hung a cloud of fear,
> A sense of mystery his spirit daunted,
> And said, as plain as whisper in the ear,
> 'The place is haunted!'"

Such a man looks around and sees plenty of men, no better than himself, content and even happy A dinner or a concert, a happy stroke of business an interesting piece of scandal, an empty fashion or an empty romance, or pleasures that are lower, fouler, and therefore, be certain, more unmanly still—these are the real and keen delights to some. And as his soul moans within him and is unsatisfied, he asks, "Why should I not follow their example?"

I would ask young men and young women who read this page, has this temptation never crossed your mind? Have you never said or thought—"Since I cannot be happy in religion, let me make myself happy as I can; and look to frivolity, to dissipation, to the pleasures that are just on this side of actual sin, and to the pleasures just on the other side of it, for such gifts as they have to bestow? Let me," says many a young man who has known better things, "let me ask the billiard-room, and the public-house, and the betting-list, and the loud song with the questionable meaning, and the play, and the dancing-saloon, what they can give; or, if not these, let me plunge deep into the whirl of active life, make myself indispensable, and push myself on—not for duty, but for happiness." And you can always point to the example of some who seem, at least, to be well-enough satisfied. And many a young woman has sought her bliss in stimulants just as mischievous as these,—in giddy sentiment, in admiration and vanity, in show, and fashion, and frivolity. And many who scorn all these, have inflicted upon their sad souls the same ruinous error, striving to develop and indulge the intellect as a drug to the complaining of the heart. "We will be as those around us, to serve wood and stone," said God's people of old. Is it any better to say, We will be as those around us, to serve the world and the flesh, the lust of the eyes and the pride of life?

Let every one who ever felt one pulse of purer spiritual feeling, ever longed for purity, ever knelt in prayer that was not a mockery,—every one who has waited for God as men who wait for the morning, let every such man be warned. You cannot be as the disciples of pleasure, or as the idolators of gain. If you will give yourselves up to these, so be it; but they shall not yield their sweetness to your taste, nor their fragrance to your smell. Such as these are, they are not for you. The desire of holiness may gradually die away; but the inner loathing and abhorrence of sin shall not die; the sense of dishonour and degradation shall still live; the shame of your ill-treatment of your Benefactor shall linger on. And you shall not be able to forget death nor eternity; you shall see, as it were, the clear, deep eye that beholds and tries the children of men.

"Though thy slumber may be deep,
Yet thy spirit shall not sleep;
In the wind there is a voice
Shall forbid thee to rejoice;
And to thee shall night deny
All the quiet of her sky;
And the day shall have a sun,
Which shall make thee wish it done."

For better or worse, with your consent or without it, you are a marked, peculiar people. Gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

But, then, surely there is injustice here. Why should one people be marked out for this government in fury? Why should you or I be debarred from consolations, wretched at best, in which other sinners take refuge? Because it is not for such a fate you are marked out. You, like Israel, are called to special privileges and prosperity and bliss; and it is only the rejection and neglect of these that can darken your sky with denser and blacker cloud, as the fiercest tempests rage in the splendid climates of the South. The nations might have seen Israel, and envied him, and said, "Surely this great people is a wise and understanding people; for what nation is there so great, that hath God so nigh unto them?" And so God offers Himself, with special clearness and urgency and frequency, to us who gather, week by week, to worship and praise and hear of Him. Christ stands at our door and knocks, and if there is deadly woe for them who keep Him out, that is only the counterpoise of the ineffable bliss of those who open their door and welcome Him. It may be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon, for Sodom and Gomorrah, than for us. But, on the other hand, the ten talents well invested may give us ten cities to rule in glory.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART IX. CHRIST A PREACHER. (II.)

Chapters to be read—Matt. vi. 19 to end. vii.

OUR last lesson showed man's duty to God. Which commandments were referred to? What other duties? To-day shall speak of God's relationship to man, and the privileges and duties involved in that.

I. GOD'S CARE OF HIS PEOPLE. (Read Matt. vi. 24—34.) In the present. Ask what our Lord says about care for this life; explaining that "no thought" means undue anxiety. What instances does He give of God's care? Remind of where the sermon was spoken—a hill-side, with the beautiful birds of paradise flying about: so Christ pointed to them. Question upon the birds: where do they live? how are they fed? how do they know how to do all this? Call this instinct. Who gave those habits, and that knowledge? also show adaptation of birds' bodies to their habits—beaks, wings, &c.; all show God's care for them. Remind of ravens, who fed Elijah (1 Kings xvii. 4), the dove who brought the olive-leaf to Noah. How are we better than birds? What becomes of them? Therefore, as God teaches them where to get food, so much more does He feed us. Remind of promises of food to those in want; and ask for examples—such as Israelites fed by manna; the widow's cruse of oil not failing; Elijah fed by the angel (1 Kings xviii.), and many others. What do we ask for in the Lord's Prayer? He who taught us so to pray will not fail to supply food: see promise to Noah (Gen. viii. 22). So too with clothing. What would the hill be covered with? What causes the grass to grow? Why are the flowers made? of what use are they? what do we like to do with them? So by their beauty show God's loving care. Tell story of Mungo Park finding tiny piece of moss in chink of rock when faint in desert; took new hope: so all flowers teach God's care; they die —we die and rise to new life. Also warn against pride, by example of Solomon.

PRACTICAL. Apply this to children away from parents or friends: perhaps parents dead: then see Ps. xxvii. 10: perhaps amongst strangers; remind of the little maid (2 Kings v. 3). Jacob when leaving home (Gen xxviii. 15); amongst enemies, so was St. Paul at his trial (2 Tim. iv. 16). Who are they thus cared for? What must we seek first? (ver. 33); must put God first, and Mammon—i.e., this world with its cares, riches, pleasures &c.—second (ver. 24). In the future. (Read Matt. vi. 19—21.) Ask where treasures are to be laid up? why in heaven? What becomes of treasures here? rust, moth, fire, thieves, all liable to destroy: what becomes of them at death? but will find other treasure hereafter. Give as instance parable of Rich Man and Lazarus, who found his good things in next world. For description of these good things, see 1 Peter i. 4.

II. GOD A FATHER TO HIS PEOPLE. (Read Matt. vi. 7—12.) Describe a father coming home from his work; children running out to meet him, climbing about him, sitting round the table at the meal; asking for food. Does he dislike their asking? refuse request? give stones, and not bread? why not? because full of love. Greatest pleasure to give pleasure and grant requests. Show how God in this way is a Father. From Luke xi. 11 show that the good things of ver. 11 are the gifts of the Holy Spirit, for which see Gal. v. 22. For what do we want these gifts? where are we hoping to go? From ver. 13, 14 show how the way thither is compared to a road. Draw from the children the points of resemblance: an entrance, road, travellers met with, dangers to be avoided, helps for the journey, welcome at the end in a Father's house. Remind Who is the way (John xiv. 6), and how having Himself gone that road, Christ has set us an example. What is called the lamp? (Ps. cxix. 105), the enemies of the world, flesh and devil? the end—our Father's many mansions (John xiv. 2). Which road are we travelling?

III. PRACTICAL LESSONS. (Read Matt. vii. 16—29.) If God cares for us and treats us as a father, what must we do? (a) Hear. Ask for the parable about the seed. What became of the seed by the wayside—who picked it away? Show that the Word of God to do any good must penetrate; be hid in heart like seed. Do children care to hear? must, like Timothy from a child, know the Scriptures—like Christ as a child grow in grace; therefore must attend to instruction (Prov. ii. 1, 2, &c.) (b) Do. Question upon illustrations used by Christ. Point out two trees side by side. In winter both look alike bare, &c; in autumn one found still bare, the other full of leaves and fruit. Again, remind of children building castles on sand by sea. What becomes of them, and why? Other houses stand. So show what is expected of all. What fruit must they bring forth? what are the good works children can do? Not much for others, but great many for themselves—e.g., becoming humble, modest, truthful, peacemakers, &c. What will these things show—i.e., what do they proceed from? When will works be tested, and by what? profession or practice? What a warning to all careless ones!

Questions to be answered.

1. What two examples does Christ give of God's care?
2. What lessons can we learn from flowers?
3. Give instances of God's care for His people.
4. How does God as a Father treat His children?
5. How is the road to heaven like a journey?
6. What are the two practical lessons to be learned?

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

AMONG the holiday gatherings which took place at Valehead during Whitsuntide, was the anniversary celebration of the foundation of a cricket club, which Humphrey Atherstone had been the first to establish, with the view of securing some better recreation for the young men of the village, than could be found in the public-houses where they were wont to congregate. It had been very successful, other parishes had joined in it, the great people all round patronised it, and in the last week of May a great day of festivity was held, when the Eleven of Valehead played a match against all Northangleshire. The field used as a cricket ground on this occasion was at some distance from the village, and was most easily approached by the river, which was always thronged with boats conveying the inhabitants of the neighbouring houses to the scene of action.

It was the fashion of the county to go, and so the county went, and made its own little arrangements for amusing itself, quite irrespective of the duty of encouraging the cricket club. This year the weather proved extremely propitious, and by noon on the appointed day many a merry party was moving down the river with pennons flying and gay voices filling the summer air with glee. Two boats were allowed precedence of the others as conveying a specially illustrious freight. Mrs. Northcote was seated in the first, with an air as solemn and frigid as if she were personating Charon himself, while her husband, much subdued in such close proximity to the great arbitress of his destinies, sat on one side, and the rector on the other. Colonel Dysart and a few more persons unknown to fame completed the number, and in sober and stately fashion they passed on in advance of the gay party which followed them.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"Lilith! what is the matter?"—p. 508.

In the next boat Will Northcote and Una Dysart sat together, with Mr. Knight and Hervey Crichton on either side of them. Further on, Mrs. Burton, the doctor's wife—an affected, languishing invalid, who, suffered chiefly from want of occupation, was placed beside a very quiet curate, to whom she was detailing the extreme susceptibility of her nerves, and on the other side Rupert Northcote, deliberately turning his back on every one else, looked admiringly into the pure sweet face of Lilith Crichton. She seemed to be a being almost of another mould from the rest, as she sat there, perfectly still and unexcited, drooping her fair head like a graceful flower, her white robes glistening in the sun, without a fragment of colour about them to mar their spotlessness.

She appeared to be as much absorbed in Rupert's presence as he was in hers, but when she raised her great blue eyes and looked on him, they were filled with an intensity of mournful regret, which seemed strangely at variance with the knowledge she could not but have of his devoted affection, and the extent to which she apparently shared it.

Una Dysart often looked towards her with great interest, for Lilith was in many respects an enigma to her, though Hervey left her very little time to think of anything but himself, as he did his best to please and amuse her in every possible way. Una was slightly restless, however, and at last she somewhat suddenly turned round to Hervey, and asked him whether Mr. Atherstone did not appear amongst his people on this the gala day of the institution he had founded.

"Yes, I believe he is always there," he answered rather shortly.

"Only he rides down instead of going by the river," said Will, "for the express purpose of avoiding such parties as ours, and when he gets there he devotes himself to the cricketers and their friends, and ignores the society of his equals with a sublime indifference."

"By the way, Miss Dysart, we were all much surprised to hear that Atherstone had conducted you himself over the Abbey. It was an extraordinary feat for such a determined mysogamist. I feel sure you are the very first lady he ever indulged so far," said Hervey Crichton.

"I am very glad I was so much favoured then, for the house is well worth seeing."

"You did not find a wife imprisoned in any of the rooms did you?" said Will. "I sometimes wonder whether the fact that he has one already may not be the explanation of his determination never to marry—any of us at all events."

"I saw no one in the house but a fat old butler," said Una, laughing.

"No; Atherstone will never marry," said Mr. Knight. "I do not know his reason, but he is much to be pitied, for there is certainly some painful motive which makes him quite immovable in this determination. Poor fellow! I feel for him deeply," and Mr. Knight accompanied this remark with so meaning a glance at Will, to whom he had most vainly been endeavouring to make himself agreeable, that she started up, seeming determined to find a means of putting a stop to his attentions. She had a resource at hand. Stooping down, she drew out from under the seat a small violin-case, and took from it a dainty little violin, which she proceeded to adjust on her shoulder in the orthodox fashion, and then taking the bow in her firm little fingers, she began to draw forth the most exquisite melody from the strings, playing with all the grace and execution of an accomplished artist. Una was delighted, and even Hervey ceased looking at her in order to listen to the enchanted sounds, while little Will's bright black eyes grew soft under the influence of her own music, and only Mrs. Burton whispered plaintively to the curate, "How that masculine sight must pain you! I am so feminine in all my tastes."

When at last the strain ceased, to the regret of all, Una asked Hervey Crichton if he had observed that during the whole time Miss Northcote was playing, some one was keeping up with the boat on the bank of the river, running along behind the thick alder bushes, so that the movement of their branches alone was detected.

"I did not notice any one," said Hervey. "Shall we steer rather nearer the bank and find out who it is?"

They did so, and just as they came close under the bushes, which dipped almost into the water, the leafy branches were parted by two dark little hands, and the wild beautiful face of a gipsy woman gleamed out upon them suddenly, the deep flashing eyes scanning every face, and settling for a moment with a peculiar intentness on that of Una. Mrs. Burton gave a shriek of affected terror, and they saw the white teeth shine between the curved lips as they wreathed themselves into a scornful smile. Then the hands dropped down, the branches were allowed to meet again, and the face disappeared.

"Who in the world is that?" exclaimed Mr. Knight, who had been nearest to the strange apparition.

"I have not an idea," said Hervey; "a gipsy, at all events, most certainly."

"I know who it is," said Will to Una in a rather low tone; "it is Ashtaroth, the wife of the man Edwards, whose history I told you."

"I am glad I have seen her," said Una. "She is strangely handsome, though it is not exactly a pleasant face. Ashtaroth, goddess of the Sidonians! What a singular name for any one to have in these days."

"Everything is strange about the Edwardses," said Will; "but, behold!" she continued, raising herself and looking out across the country; "I perceive in the distance a black horse approaching, known as one Nightshade, which has the honour of bearing on its back the Master of Atherstone. He is coming this way;" and in the course of a few moments Humphrey, followed by his groom, came riding along the bank close to the boat. He was near enough to exchange a few words with them as to the favourable weather and the prospects of the day, and then Rupert suggested that he should entrust his horse to his servant and join them for the rest of the way.

"We have plenty of room," he said; "and, in addition to other attractions, we have a little old man here who plays the violin wonderfully well, and will entertain you with music when our conversation becomes too dull."

Humphrey smiled and began a courteous refusal; then he paused, his eyes fixed themselves on the bright face of Una Dysart, who had turned towards him, and he wavered, hesitated, and finally seeming to make a great effort, he said, "I wish indeed I could come, Northcote, but I cannot—must not—though I am none the less grateful to you for the offer;" and lifting his hat, he touched his horse on the neck with his hand, and it instantly started off at a rapid pace, bearing him speedily out of their sight.

"Now if ever a man did violence to his inclinations, it was Humphrey Atherstone," said Northcote. "It was quite evident that he longed to take his place amongst us, and was held back by some grave obstacle in his own mind, which compelled him to leave us."

"I have quite come to the conclusion," said Crichton, "that my brother the rector is perfectly right in his serious mistrust of Mr. Atherstone."

"What grounds can you have for making such an assertion?" exclaimed Una, turning upon him with a flash of indignation in her great brown eyes.

"Simply the logical fact which has become a proverb, 'that there is no smoke without fire,' and the no less certain truth that in these days, mysteries in the lives of individuals do not generally hide anything poetic or interesting, but rather something very discreditable to those who seek to shelter themselves behind them."

"Anyhow, it is utterly unfair to condemn persons on mere assumptions," she answered, for her own generous spirit rose in revolt at the injustice which, it seemed to her, was generally dealt out to Mr. Atherstone—and she allowed a feeling not only of dangerous compassion, but of instinctive championship on his behalf, to take possession of her from that moment. She made her first concession to it by turning her back on Hervey Crichton and occupying herself exclusively in talking to Will Northcote till they reached their destination. Crichton sat silent, looking vexed and uncomfortable, for Miss Dysart had been very friendly with him up to this time, and he was becoming painfully conscious of a daily increasing desire on his own part that they should go somewhat beyond being friends, and when they all disembarked he made a great effort to regain the place by her side which he had generally held when they met in society. But Una was not to be appeased—she somewhat maliciously took refuge with Mrs. Northcote, whom she very well knew the bold warrior would not dare to encounter. Hervey lingered at a little distance from her for a time, and then seeing she was determined to remain hostile, tossed his handsome head with a look of evident pique, and went off to Miss Northcote, who received him with such merry goodwill, that he could not help enjoying himself in her society most heartily, in spite of his annoyance.

It was a pleasant scene on which the new comers looked. The field was crowded with persons of all ranks, wandering about in the sunshine and strolling in groups, or more often in couples, down the shady paths by the river-side. The match had been commenced, so soon as Atherstone and a few more of the great people of the county came on the ground, and was being played with great animation and excitement. Una had never seen a game of cricket in her life, and therefore it was to her as unintelligible as it was uninteresting, and she very soon discovered that even those who might be supposed to understand it were entirely occupied with their own concerns, and paid very little attention to it. Atherstone was the only person who seemed really to try to make the day pleasant to the cricketers and their friends, of whom there were many hard-working men and women bent on making the most of their only holiday in the year. Una's glance followed him from place to place, while Mrs. Northcote poured a dropping fire of heavy remarks into her ear, to which she found it was not necessary she should listen in order to make suitable answers, and she was struck by the gentleness and consideration he showed to the poor people for whose comfort he seemed so anxious. She could hardly have believed that his dark face could have been so full of sweetness as it was when he carried tired little children back to their mothers, or found a seat for some poor old woman where she could see her boy playing this momentous game—and he showed very evidently that it was not to mix with his acquaintances, but to do what he could for the amusement of his tenantry that he had come on the ground.

While Una was standing very silently watching the whole scene, Mr. Northcote suddenly changed the current of her ideas, by exclaiming to his wife,—

"There is the rector talking to that fellow Edwards again. I must say I cannot understand his taking any notice of him. Whatever Atherstone may be, there is no doubt that man is a disreputable scoundrel."

Una turned eagerly in the direction to which Mr. Northcote pointed, and saw the Malay, standing half hid in the shade of a tree, talking with a cringing, furtive air to the rector, while he held upon his shoulder a tiny mite of a boy, whose gipsy face seemed sparkling with precocious intelligence.

Mrs. Northcote looked solemnly towards the group, and said, with the calm satisfaction which always accompanied her condemnation of her neighbours, "It may be, Mr. Northcote, that the rector thinks he has a better chance of inculcating morality on the low scoundrel, who makes no concealment of his guilt, than on the higher-placed evil-doer, who shrouds his crimes, whatever they are, under a hard, impenitent reserve."

This evident allusion to Atherstone was a little too much for Una, and she started away from Mrs. Northcote, feeling that she could not trust herself to speak to her without indignation, and went in search of her father.

She found Colonel Dysart engaged in an examination of Atherstone's horse, which had been left under the care of the groom, in a corner of the field, and as Una came up to him he said, "I was just wishing for you, Una; I know how much you admire a fine horse, and this is really one of the most splendid beasts I ever saw." He began describing to her the various good points in the animal; and while she stood listening to him, she saw Atherstone, in the course of some arrangement he was actively making for a group of poor people, accidentally pass near the rector and Edwards. It was clear that he had not seen the Malay before, for the moment his glance fell upon him he stopped suddenly, and let a chair he was carrying drop from his hand. A few moments he stood silent and rigid, then, as Edwards slowly turned his malignant face and looked at him, Atherstone hurriedly said a few words to those around him, and then came with hasty steps to the spot where his horse was standing. There was a very strange expression on his face, a sort of mingling of sternness and misery; but it changed to a softened sadness when he saw Una. He shook hands with her and her father, and told them that he was unexpectedly obliged to leave the ground.

"What, so soon, Mr. Atherstone?" said Colonel Dysart; "I thought that your people always considered they had a right to keep you with them to the last on this day."

"So they have, and I have never failed them before; but this year all is changed. I cannot stay in this place to-day." He mounted his horse at once, and saying to Una, with more earnestness than the simple words warranted, "I do trust you will enjoy yourself, Miss Dysart," he galloped off before she could answer.

Colonel Dysart looked after him, with a perplexed expression, and then turned to his daughter. "You have been desired to enjoy yourself, Una; how do you mean to accomplish that result?"

"Not by looking at the cricketers, at all events, and still less by rejoining Mrs. Northcote. I should like to find Lilith Crichton, as Will is clearly not accessible just now. Have you any idea where she is?"

"I saw her going along the path by the river a short time ago," said Colonel Dysart; "but you must not expect me to join you in a search for her; it is much too hot;" and he flung himself down under a tree to rest himself, while Una went in quest of her friend.

She was walking quietly along the bank of the river, when Rupert Northcote suddenly appeared at a turn of the path, and came rapidly towards her. He seemed greatly disturbed and excited, and with a muttered apology for his haste, passed her, apparently in a vehement hurry, and disappeared. She went on, rather surprised, and a few more paces brought her in sight of Lilith Crichton. Una stopped with an exclamation of dismay when she saw her.

Lilith was standing upright and motionless, with her hands clasped tightly on her breast, as if to still some emotion that was stifling her; her lovely face was white as snow; her great blue eyes were wild with misery; and her whole expression was that of one who feels as if the agony of life could not be endured another moment.

Impetuous Una rushed towards her, and flinging her arms round her, exclaimed, "My dearest Lilith! what is the matter? I cannot bear to see you suffering so frightfully."

But her warm caresses seemed lavished on a statue; and when Lilith spoke at last, it did not seem to be in answer to her questions, but rather that the words were weighing on her heart and burst forth involuntarily—"Rupert—my poor Rupert!"

"He loves you, Lilith—you do not doubt that, surely?"

"No; oh, that I could!"

"But why, dear child? Forgive me for saying it, but I feel sure you return his affection."

"I have no wish to deny it," she answered, while tears gathered slowly in her eyes, and fell from them thick and fast.

"Then why are you so sad?" said Una, anxiously. "You will marry him, without doubt, and be very happy."

"I would sooner die!"

"Lilith, what do you mean? Rupert wishes to marry you, I am certain, and his friends all love you; why should you refuse?"

"I love him too well to tell you why," she answered.

"That is a very incomprehensible answer, Lilith. I want you to tell me, because I cannot but think you must be making yourself needlessly unhappy; and possibly, if you told me the reason of your refusal, I could help you. Perhaps you are too much agitated now; but promise me that you will tell me some day."

"Yes," she said, in a calm, strange voice, "I will tell you some day, Una Dysart."

That promise was kept—but in what an hour!

(To be continued.)

"AT WAR WITH FAMINE."

IN one of the most touching of all the Bible narratives, the story of Joseph and his brethren, we are brought face to face with what is happily for us a state of things we can scarcely imagine, but only too common in the East—a famine. In our own highly-favoured island that is a contingency which is almost, humanly speaking, impossible. We have just been passing through a period when the prices of the necessaries of life were exceedingly high; indeed we have scarcely yet ceased to talk of meat and coals being at "famine" price, but we use the term loosely and colloquially without, perhaps, realising its full import. Actual famine has prevailed in Ireland; and from time to time in London, the richest city in the world, isolated deaths from starvation occur. Indeed it is, perhaps, impossible to calculate the number of deaths that are continually taking place from the want of necessaries of life, even where the final catastrophe is not assigned immediately to want of food. The system is lowered by continuous lack of nourishment, and though actual death may ensue from some definite disease, yet still it results indirectly from want. Had not God in His mercy given us an exceptionally mild winter, it is terrible to think what a number of deaths must, in all human probability, have been thus indirectly caused by lack of food and fuel.

But the famine against which we have, in the prophetic words of Sir Bartle Frere, thus "declared war," is no isolated case or set of cases; it is not one which is likely to do most of its deadly work thus impalpably and indirectly; though such secondary results must still follow in its train, when the transient tyranny of want is overpast. It is an actual famine like that which drove Jacob and the patriarchs down to Egypt; and, on the most moderate calculations, ranges over an area five times as large as Ireland.

That is the first fact we shall do well to bear in mind, when setting ourselves to the Christian work of relieving the distress in Bengal, in thus making war on the famine there—namely, the vast tract over which the contest rages. In an actual war, or even a single battle, this is always the difficulty which attaches to outsiders, and even in a measure to those engaged. They fail to grasp the extent of the seat of war, or to catch more than a single point of the battle. It is only by some such comparison as that now instituted that we can at all appreciate the wide-spread misery that must for a long time prevail in Bengal. Taken in its most moderate dimensions, the space over which our efforts must extend is five times as large as Ireland.

Then, again, supposing it possible that famine could prevail in Britain as in India, there are still circumstances prevalent there which increase the violence of the infliction. We do not now allude to the lack of communication by road, river, or canal, though it is indeed painful to read that in many districts where people are perishing for lack of sustenance, supplies are within what we should here consider a very practicable distance, but the defective means of transit render them unavailing. The most distressing fact, perhaps, for a Christian in connection with an Indian famine is the extent to which its evils are increased by the heathen custom of caste, which will often lead a Hindoo to perish from want, rather than accept aid from one of his own fellow-countrymen who is of a lower caste than himself. A distinguished writer on India has recently told us that caste is only a fashion, and of comparatively recent adoption; but it is a fashion that comes cruelly into prominence when such an infliction overtakes a country as that which now lies heavy on Bengal.

It may, perhaps, be said that no amount of material aid can do away with this custom so much more honoured in the breach than the observance; but a moment's reflection will convince us that this is scarcely so. It is, as we know, greatly the custom nowadays to depreciate the efforts of the missionaries in India; but we are exceedingly glad to see that the eminent authority from whom we have borrowed the title and many of the facts of this short paper, Sir Bartle Frere, writes thus:—

"Outside the duties of Government is a large area of national duty, which must be undertaken and discharged in the spirit of that feeling which recognises Bengal as much an integral part of the British Empire as Cornwall.

"The Government will need trustworthy eyes and ears to report, and honest and firm hands to distribute what it has to give, whether in work, wages, or in support of the starving; and there will remain, beyond all that Government can do, an immense field for private charity, far exceeding what can be reached even by the most ungrudging and catholic spirit of English or Indian charity.

"We have some thirty-three missionary agencies employed in impressing on the natives of India the truths of Christianity. Can we do better than support this agency in the work which it has always, in former cases of the kind, so well undertaken, of feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, healing the sick, and speaking comfort to the dying? Here is a field at once for the energies and means of all who have any portion of missionary spirit; and they will find on the spot an agency which, however scattered and scanty, is yet all-pervading, and capable of indefinite extension."

Works of irrigation and internal navigation take a long time even to set in motion, a much longer time still before their results are appreciable. In the meantime people are dying of want. The season which has been so favourable for our difficulty, has been adverse to them. The heaven has withholden its rain, and drought means death there to an extent which we, in our temperate latitudes, cannot in the least realise or conceive. The vexed question of the exportation of grain, too, from the suffering districts, which it seems so easy to answer offhand, but which is puzzling much wiser heads than ours, this must be left for others to settle. But there is one department, and perhaps only one, in which we can all bear our part. Whether it be for relief works, or for the equally important work of education, money is urgently and immediately wanted. The Lord Mayor of London risked obloquy by boldly proposing that we should forget political economy, and swell the Relief Fund. That was only a strong way of putting the duty of individuals, as contrasted with those of the Government. Our duty is plainly at this moment to give according to our ability, so as to make the best of the present emergency. If we waited to talk political economy, we should let our fellow-creatures starve. While we are doing our best to relieve existing distress, it will be the duty of our rulers, and the duties of individuals too in a measure, to devise means for preventing the recurrence of such disasters. It is gratifying to know that many suggestions coming from individuals and outsiders, have been respectfully entertained and energetically acted upon.

We shall never, of course, be able to destroy God's great landmarks, or to make tropical India the same as temperate England; but it is marvellous how much has been done by careful arrangements in the more sparsely-peopled districts of the Deccan; and there is no sort of doubt that proportionate results may be, by God's blessing, compassed in the densely-populated regions of Bengal. We have therefore established a Special Fund for the Relief of the Indian Famine, with the express purpose of providing every reader of THE QUIVER with means ready to hand for contributing his or her mite to so noble a purpose. Let us not forget the responsibility which rests upon us as Englishmen along with, and in proportion to, the privilege of governing this great nation. Think of the widow's mite, and do not withhold charity because it may be small, and seem insignificant in amount. "Many a little makes a mickle" is a good old proverb, but a better saying still, and based on the highest authority of all, is, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye did it unto Me!" There has been already a liberal and generous response to our appeal, and we feel confident that even the considerable sum which has been contributed is but an earnest of larger help yet to come.

BLIND BIDDY'S STORY.

BY MRS. STANLEY LEATHES, AUTHOR OF "PENELOPE," "LETTIE DEAN," ETC.

"To obey is better than sacrifice."

CHAPTER I.

ONE bright October day, about five o'clock in the afternoon, a young girl might have been seen climbing the steep stairs of a dingy-looking house in a poor street in London. She was quietly dressed in a russet gown, a large waterproof cloak, and a brown straw hat, which latter shaded what was ordinarily a sweet and pleasant face; but now it was somewhat clouded, and even a tear stood on the eyelid. She reached the door of the "third floor back," and then stopped a moment to rest before she knocked.

The knock was answered by a woman's voice, saying, "Come in;" and the young lady entered.

"Well, Biddy," she said, "isn't it a nice day? You can feel the sun, though you can't see it."

"Yes, Miss Mary," said the inhabitant of the room, who was an old and blind woman, "thank God, I can. There is much left to me, and I often think I should be unwilling to change trials with many of my neighbours. I have learnt to find there are many mercies mixed up with mine. I can hear the sound of a pleasant voice, and of the minister preaching and praying, and that's more than poor old Sarah in the parlours can do."

Mary drew a long breath, and then said, "Oh, Biddy!"

"There's something wrong with you, miss, to-day."

"Well, yes; I hardly know why I should be so vexed though; but Mrs. Crisp on the first floor has been very rude to me."

"Nothing more than that, eh? That's nothing; she's rude to everybody."

"But there is more, Biddy; my aunts say I must give up visiting in Heard's Court. They say it takes up too much of my time, and that I take things too much to heart; besides, my uncle has been putting it into their heads that I am too young to visit in London."

"Well, that is bad news, to be sure! What a miss you'll be to many, but to none more than to me, I may say, indeed. The day seems to me a long one that I don't hear Miss Mary's foot on the stairs; and it seems to lighten my heart, if you only as much as look in at the door, and say, 'Well, Biddy, how are you to-day?' There's a blessing, miss, goes with all the commandments, and it surely comes to those who go about, rejoicing with them that rejoice, and weeping with them that weep."

"It always seems to me, Biddy, that I do nothing, only I like coming so much. They say, though, that I may keep you, and poor deaf Sarah, and Mrs. Howard, in the kitchens, who is bedridden, and the apple-woman at the corner; you know, she lives at number five."

"Well, I am glad of that. But, in a way, miss, I expect your uncle's right. It's rough work for so young a lady as you are, and may tell on your health; besides, I expect you get taken in finely."

Mary smiled. "Yes, sometimes. But, Biddy, do you know I was thinking, last night, that I would not give up. You know the Misses Lewis are not really my aunts, though I call them so, and I am not bound to obey them. Am I not old enough, too, to decide for myself? Besides, perhaps it is right to disobey when you feel that what you do is a good and right thing to be done. Surely it can't be wrong to be useful? You know they are only afraid I shall do myself harm; and I am sure I shall not."

"Oh, Miss Mary, don't talk so, I pray you. It was following just such reasoning as that that brought me into so much sorrow. It was a wilfulness of that kind—I mean which I thought a lawful wilfulness, and right because it was (as I fancied) for the good of others. Don't rebel, Miss Mary; don't choose your own way, or you'll be sorry for it."

"I can't fancy that you have ever rebelled, Biddy. I wish you'd tell me about it; I have often wondered what your history had been."

"Ah, you know little enough of the bad in me, miss; but it's a long story, and a sad story; and when I once begin to talk of old times I shan't know when to stop."

"Well, Biddy, may I come and have tea with you to-morrow? My aunts are going to dine out, and I will ask them if I may come to you. They would call for me in the carriage as they came back."

Biddy's face brightened as she heard Mary's proposal. It was not the first time they had had tea together in that little attic, and it was a great delight to the poor old woman. Biddy was daintily clean about herself and her room, and everything in it was in as perfect order as though she saw each speck of dust and dirt; such was the effect of long habit. So, when Mary arrived the next day, the little tea-table looked quite inviting. The hearth was swept; a bright little kettle was boiling on a cheery fire; a clean cloth was spread on the table, and everything upon it looked faultlessly neat and clean.

Mary brought with her some tea and tea-cakes, and a pot of Scotch marmalade; and when she had thrown off her cloak, she insisted upon toasting the tea-cakes while Biddy made the tea.

"Oh, dear! how happy I am!" she said, as she looked up from her toasting, with cheeks all aglow from the heat. "This is much better than going, rustling in smart silks, to the dinner-party with aunties. But now, Biddy, let us have tea; I am longing for the story."

It was chilly enough for a fire to feel pleasant, and when the tea-table was cleared Mary drew her chair to the fire, and took out her work. Then, accompanied by the click of her knitting-needles, and the purring of the old cat on the rug, Biddy began the following story:—

"I remember well the day when our troubles began, or, perhaps, it was only the day when they first came home to me, for I was a light-hearted young thing, and very different to my elder sister Mary, who shared my mother's burdens from the time she could nurse a baby or carry a basket. We were coming home from berry-gathering one evening, just as the sun was setting; and I think I can see even now the golden clouds that glowed in the west; and the tall Scotch firs standing out black and clear against the bright sky. Our house stood alone, on the borders of a large common. It is all enclosed now, they tell me; but then it was covered with heather and bluebells and bilberries and wortleberries in abundance.

"Our little farm was snug and well-to-do-looking, with a few tidy ricks on one side, standing in a neatly-kept farmyard, and on the other a grassy knoll, on which the sheep fed, and which was topped by the clump of Scotch firs I spoke of before. In front was a prim, well-ordered kitchen garden, and just at the time I speak of there was a row of dahlias and hollyhocks on each side of the one straight walk which led up from the white wicket gate to the front door. In spring time there were gillyflowers, and spring flowers, and daffodils—indeed, there was not a gayer border in the country-side, for it was my mother's pride and delight. My father had begun life as a labourer, but he had been careful and industrious, and had worked his way up to rent this little farm; and aided by my mother, who was a clever manager, he was prospering, even though he had six of us to feed. He kept three cows, and took milk into Warbridge, which was our nearest market town, twice a day; and butter and the produce of the garden twice a week.

"But about our first trouble. We were coming home, laughing and singing; I and Jessie with briony-berries wound round our heads, and Ben carrying on his back our youngest brother, little Peter, whose stained mouth and cheeks told a tale as to where the berries had gone which he had gathered.

"I carried the berries which were to go into market next day. Whatever they sold for was ours, and we looked forward every year to our 'berry-money' as to a little fortune.

"I remember so well, as we went up the path laughing and playing, my father came out of the house and passed quickly by us. His face was grave, but he put his hand kindly on little Jessie's head as he passed, and gave us the kind of smile which grown people often give to children when they do not wish to check their happiness, and yet are too heavy at heart to share in it themselves.

"Mary met us at the door and quieted us at once, for she was crying.

"'Why, what is it Mary?' said Ben, shaking his hair back, and stopping short in his canter, with Peter on his back, 'what has angered father?'

"'He's not angry, Ben,' said Mary, 'but the black cow's dead!'

"'The black cow dead!' said we all, and we gathered round Mary to hear more, and I threw from my hair the scarlet berries, and felt ashamed of my late merriment.

"'Yes,' said Mary, 'she was found dead in Long Lane, lying in a ditch, and she had been stabbed!'

"'Stabbed!' said we all.

"'Yes,' said Mary. 'Father turned her out this morning on the common with Primrose and Jenny, but when Ralph went to call them at milking time, she was gone, and Carter has just found her in Long Lane, dead!'

"'I know who did it,' said Ben. 'Don't you remember when poor Black-eyed Susan strayed before, who vowed he would do her some mischief if he caught her on his ground again? If I were father I'd have him up before the magistrates. Poor Susan, why, she was the best cow of the three, and only a little wild. I say, Mary, if father won't—I——'

"'Hush!' said Mary, and she drew us all aside in her motherly manner, and out of the parlour came the keeper from the great house, followed by my mother. He nodded to us, and pulled Ben's ears, and stooped to kiss little Peter, and then wishing my mother a good evening, he went out."

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

208. Name three memorable occasions when the Apostles Peter, James, and John were permitted to be with our Lord.

209. The Feast of Tabernacles is called by another name in the book of Exodus; give it, and state how many days the feast lasted.

210. Show from the writings both of St. James and St. John that "a crown of life" awaits those Christians who endure temptation.

211. A king of Ethiopia who withstood Sennacherib is mentioned twice in Scripture. Give his name and the passages in which he is referred to.

212. Where do we read for the first time in Scripture of a pillar being set up to commemorate an event?

213. Which of the Evangelists tells us that the kinsmen of our Lord, thinking "He was beside Himself," went to secure Him?

214. How many of the Evangelists record the message sent to our Lord by John the Baptist?

215. Mention any passages of Scripture from which we may gather that spies were appointed to watch the Saviour.

216. What were the circumstances which preceded the first demand of the Jews that our Lord should indicate by a sign His authority for certain actions?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 480.

191. St. Mark and St. John.

192. See Mark xv. 40 and John xix. 25.

193. To the tribe of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 20—27). We first meet with his name in Exod. xvii. 9.

194. Once only. See 1 Tim. v. 4.

195. Acts i. 14.

196. Zebulun (Joshua xix. 12—16).

197. See Ps. lxxviii. 2; Matt. xiii. 35.

198. St. Luke (x. 21).

199. St. Peter (Acts ii. 27).

(Drawn by C. O. MURRAY.)

WATCHING FOR SAILS.

THE morning moaned with sweeping rain;
The wind shrieked with the raging main,
He took the seagulls in his hand,
And, laughing, blew them back to land.

The gulls went out again in glee,
To be carried across the sea;
The wind he puffed them from his hand,
Like bits of paper back to land.

The fishermen went out at night;
The herring-smacks are not in sight—
The wives are paled with tempest wails,
And watch with full eyes for the sails.

The big waves run against the rocks
As they would wake them with their shocks;
And still the wives stand in the rain,
And look for sails at early wane.

The rain it rained and the wind it blew
All day until the darkness grew;
Storm voices then together screamed,
And still wives watched as though they dreamed.

The herring-smacks are in from sea!
The fishermen are home at tea;
The bairns their little prayers have said,
And go in clean white gowns to bed.

GUY ROSLYN.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER II.

CONCERNING DIVERS PERSONS.

"ROWDEN," said Miss Campbell to Mr. Ashbury, when Maggie and her nephew had vanished; "it is a West-country name. Who is he?"

"He is a friend of Herbert's, a barrister, and they have adjoining rooms near the Temple. He has been here a great deal during the past year. I wonder you have not heard of him; he and Maggie get on well together." She raised her head quickly, but the old man was not a very quick observer, and he did not notice it. "He is coming this evening, so you will meet him. Maggie invited him, and also her cousin Herbert and his sister Hetty. She wanted to make your visit as much of a festival as possible, it is a very rare one. I only wish it were in our power to give you a better reception." They were something alike in their formality and old-fashioned politeness even towards each other, though they had been lifelong friends, and that was saying much, for the "dear old man" had somehow through life had a knack of changing his friends.

"It is all very pleasant," she answered; "what can be better than a welcome?"

The abode at St. John's Wood was shabby—there was no denying that. The house was small, and not in the best part of the neighbourhood, and the furniture had never been pretentious, even in its best days, yet for all that there was a cosy homelike air about the place, and an evidence of refinement that showed it was the home of a gentleman and gentlewoman. Mr. Ashbury was a man who had found life just a little disappointing; he had commenced it in the army, but found the pay too small, and his family had died off, or he had estranged himself from them, or they were unable or unwilling to do more for him, so he had developed into "a City man," as he expressed it, but what he did no one exactly knew. He had been manager to this company and secretary to that; the patentee of one or two unsuccessful inventions, and in one way and another he had contrived to keep up a home for himself and his daughter Margaret (his wife had died years ago). They had seen some ups and downs, however; they had changed abodes often, and their friends many times; but still Maggie's faith in the "dear old man," as she loved to call him (though he was at most not more than sixty), remained unbroken. The faith of others was, perhaps, a thing of the past, for he had had a knack in bygone days of hitting on ideas by which he was to make a fortune, and his belief in himself inspired others, who had lent him money to carry out his ideas; but they always failed, "just by some quite unforeseen chance," he said, and the money was not returned at all, or only after many applications, and then reluctantly and grudgingly, and he never forgave any one who justly or unjustly dunned him; so many of the friends had dropped off. To his daughter he was the kindest of fathers, and to all who came to his house the best of hosts, and provided he did not borrow money, there was no one so polite, so gentlemanlike, or so unselfish as the "dear old man."

Margaret knew her father's position, and, girl though she was, saw clearer than he did that the future was terribly uncertain if health or money-getting powers failed—and lately the former had failed sadly; his eyes had grown dim and his hair was streaked with grey, and the bend in his back more decided, and he talked often of the time to come in which she would look back and think of the "poor old man who died and left her alone in the world." A little selfish in his own love for her, he would have spent his last pound in buying her an ornament and sunning himself in her delight, yet he had never had the resolution to save even a stray hundred pounds in case he left her alone hereafter—a hundred pounds! he owed many a one, but it troubled him little; those of whom he had borrowed were not poor; he had borrowed, intending to repay, and had not been able to do so; and those who had lent had withdrawn their friendship. Good! they did not deserve to have their money returned; it was not in his power to pay, and they had resented his misfortune; the loss of their money was a just punishment, and did not trouble him. So Margaret worked at the art she loved, not only for its own sake, but for the sake of the father she loved still more. She had only two relations—cousins—Herbert and Hetty Ashbury; the former was a law student about to be called to the Bar, and lived in rooms in a court near the Temple, the latter lived with her widowed mother at home, and was a pretty bright-eyed girl, and Maggie's confidante.

Miss Charlotte Campbell was a very old friend, and one whom the "old man" had never offended; he never borrowed of a woman. She was rather grand in her way, of good family, and the last of her generation, and living with her nephew, to whom she had been both father and mother—he had been left to her care at an early age—in one of the old-fashioned streets near Cavendish Square. They—that is, both aunt and nephew—were well off, and though the latter had a profession (he was a civil engineer), it was from choice and not necessity. He was a good-looking, kind-hearted young man, not very clever perhaps, yet not by any means stupid, though he never found his way into that dream-world in which Maggie so delighted to linger.

CHAPTER III.

MAGGIE'S GUESTS.

So Maggie left her knight to rise from his knees as best he could, and went into the hall to welcome her guests.

"I am so glad you have come!" she said as she stood before them with her bright face giving evidence of the truth of her words. "And, Hetty, you little darling! how did you manage to meet Herbert and Mr. Bowden?"

"They had the grace to call for me," she said; "but they had not the politeness to wait till I had found my gloves, so I've come without them." Then the little coquette, who was Maggie's most unfaltering worshipper, caught sight of Charles Campbell, and looked another way, till he came indolently forward to meet her. A few minutes later and Mr. Ashbury and Miss Charlotte appeared, the business of tea commenced, and the conversation flagged. It always flagged when Stephen Bowden and Charles Campbell were both present, though why, neither of them knew, probably because each felt an almost unconscious jealousy of the other, and each scorning the idea, tried to give the other full play.

Herbert Ashbury broke the silence at last. A quiet self-possessed young man was Herbert, clever in his way, and with a superior air which showed that he was aware of it.

"Hetty wants to come and see me called to the Bar on Monday," he said, addressing Maggie, "and my mother is also coming. Will you join them?"

"It will be so nice to try on his wig and gown," chimed in Hetty, in her childish way.

"Nonsense," her brother said severely; "they will be kept out of your reach. Will you come—you and my uncle?" he said, turning to Maggie again.

"Yes, with pleasure;" and then he invited Charley and Miss Campbell, but the latter declined as a matter of course (she hardly ever left her own home); "what time will it be though?" Maggie asked, "I am going to work hard, and promised myself a day's drawing at the British Museum."

"Not till six, you must be in the gallery of the hall by half-past five though, you, my mother, Hetty, and my uncle. The two Morton girls and their father are also coming. Bowden and I will meet you on the steps and pass you in; afterwards, you can all come round to my rooms and have a bachelor's tea. Will that please you? You will have to wait till I have dined in hall though, as that is part of the ceremony, and the only time one feeds in one's wig and gown. That, however, you are not allowed to witness."

"Won't it be nice!" asked Hetty, in high glee; "Herbert has a piano too at his rooms, and the Mortons both sing, you know. I don't like the Mortons though," she added plaintively; "they are so clever, and thrust all they know upon you. They always overpower me."

"They never overpower me," her brother said; "I like clever women."

"I do not think the Mortons are so very clever though," said Stephen Bowden, coming to the rescue; "and they have a way, as your sister says, of thrusting all they know upon you. There are some girls who appear cleverer than they are, and let their shallowness gradually disappoint you, and others who seem stupider than they are, and let their cleverness pleasantly dawn upon you as you learn to know them."

"That is like Maggie," said Hetty, "she never pretends to know more than she does."

"I never pretend to know less," Maggie said honestly.

"Setting up for being a clever woman, Maggie?" asked Herbert. Somehow the cousins never quite managed to hit it, though they liked each other, especially in theory, as relations often do. He was rather inclined to patronise her as a rule, and she objected to patronage from those who stood intellectually on her own level.

"Certainly not," she answered quickly, with a momentary flash of fire in her eyes.

"Margaret does not set up for being anything," said Miss Charlotte, in her grave sweet voice; "she waits for time to prove her, and goes quietly on her way. Keep back your strength, my dear," she said, gently turning her face to the head of the table; "keep it back until the time comes to test it."

No one quite understood her words: Maggie herself did not till those after days came in which she remembered them many a time.

"I will try, dear Miss Charlotte," she answered, almost humbly, and then, excepting Maggie, they all returned to the drawing-room. After a minute or two Stephen Bowden returned. She stood before the fire, waiting for him to speak.

"Well?" was all he said.

"Well," she answered, with a little nervous laugh, "have you come to be forgiven?"

"No," he said proudly. He was not a man to eat humble-pie, nor, by the way, was that a repast to which the nature of the woman before him was likely to treat itself; "I think still that I was right in what I said the other night."

"But we are such old friends, we have known each other all our lives, and are just like brother and sister," she said, almost pleadingly.

"Nonsense, Maggie," he answered, impatiently; "he is about as much like a brother as I am, and you must choose between us. Why not let me speak to your father at once? that would put things on a proper footing."

"Oh no—oh no!" she said, with something almost like fright in her tone, "not yet;" and she held out her hand to him; "let me have my way a little longer."

"Very well, my darling," and Maggie knew that he was won over when she heard the last two words, "you must have your way I suppose; only keep him on his proper footing. Friendship between a man and a woman always seems to me like trying to go over ice with red-hot skates on."

"But this friendship is a lifetime old, and if I am suddenly distant and——"

"Talking about friendship?" asked Charley Campbell, entering suddenly. He had come to look for her, and had caught the repeated word.

"Yes," she answered, awkwardly; "did not some French cynic say that it was a question which was the most easily lost—a man's love or a woman's friendship?"

"Don't know, never trouble myself about cynics, especially French ones, can't speak their language. I'll tell you what though—a man's friendship and a woman's love (to reverse the order of your friend the cynic), will stick to you like anything." He said the last words as they went up-stairs together to the drawing-room. Then seeing that Bowden had not followed them, he stopped and asked, "Maggie, shall I come and fetch you from the Museum on Monday, and take you on to the Temple?"

"No," she answered sharply, in a voice of almost pain; "no, pray don't, Charley. I have other places to go to afterwards." Then by the dim light on the staircase she saw his face, and putting her hand upon his arm, she asked, "We are good friends, are we not, just like brother and sister? We have known each other all our lives, you know."

"Yes, of course; but what makes you say that now, Maggie?" he asked in astonishment.

"Nothing," she said laughingly. Her moods changed suddenly, yet her whole heart was in each one, so that she was always natural, however strange; "we shall always be friends, I hope."

"Yes," he answered gravely, "I hope so too—or never less than friends at any rate."

(To be continued.)

COMFORTABLE WORDS.—VI.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK-ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"I will come again, and receive you unto myself."—John xiv. 3.

HILDREN are often afraid to be left alone in the dark. Their fear—though, of course, it ought not to be encouraged—is not altogether so unreasonable as it appears. Darkness is really oppressive. It produces a sense of uncertainty and insecurity, of loneliness and isolation, an apprehension of peril assailing from unexpected quarters, a feeling of helplessness and perplexity; and experience and wisdom are needed to enable us to resist its influences. Darkness, in Scripture, typifies evil. And the heart of man acknowledges the accuracy of the symbolism; much more the simple heart of the child. What nerves the little one to be courageous is really the conviction that the presence of the parent, though unseen, is encompassing and protecting it.

At this time, the time of our text, the disciples were like children who feel that they are about to be left alone in the dark. The "kindly light" which had led them so long was going out. The voice that had cheered and guided them was soon to be removed to some mysterious and inaccessible region; and what they should do, and what would become of them,—they could hardly dare to think. But see, their Master reassures them, as a mother reassures her child, by the promise that He will come again, and take them to Himself.

Let us examine the promise more closely.

He is going away, but even when absent from them He will be engaged on their behalf. He goes to "prepare a place for them." What this preparation may be, it is not, perhaps, very easy to say; we only know that the dying of Jesus Christ upon the cross, and His subsequent descent into the unseen world, made a difference of blessedness to the saints who had departed this life before His advent. "When Thou hadst overcome the sharpness of death, Thou didst open the kingdom of heaven to all believers." But this we understand clearly enough—that if Christ has gone to prepare a place for His disciples, they are being prepared for it here below. What is the meaning of the trials of life? of the many troubles which Christian people have frequently to undergo? What is the meaning of that discipline to which the people of Christ, in some shape or other, are sure to be compelled to submit? Well, perhaps, much of it may be traced to their own fault; but it means that they are being gradually made fit for that place which their Lord is making fit for them.

We notice, in the next place, that the Saviour tells His disciples that He will come again, and receive them unto Himself. He—not a messenger—not a representative or substitute—not an influence or feeling—but He Himself. They are to have His personal presence with them. And when did He fulfil this promise? Partly, after His resurrection, when during the forty days He appeared occasionally amongst them, to accustom them to His mysterious risen life, and to speak with them of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God. Partly at and after the day of Pentecost, when the coming of the Comforter was most truly a coming of Christ. Partly, it is fulfilled at the time of His people's departure; for then, although it is the death-angel that seems to be sent, yet it is Jesus Christ who indeed appears to receive the parting spirit. But the final and exhaustive fulfilment of the promise will take place on the great day of resurrection, when the Church, the bride of Christ, shall rise, to be for ever with her Lord. Then He will come again and take His people to Himself.

And this thought suggests another; that there can be no permanent separation between Christ and His people. Without them He would be imperfect. He would be a head without the members. The Church is the fulness, the completion of Him who filleth all in all. Christ, therefore, longs, and—may we not say?—labours for His own perfection, in the gathering out of His Church. Till that great work is accomplished, there is something wanting even to Him. And the mediatorial work which He is carrying on now has always in view, as its end, the bringing in of the whole number of the saints into the glorious kingdom of the future. And Christians, on their part, grieve over even a temporary separation from Christ. They have "rest," and yet may be said to be restless; that is—just as the wife, though assured of her absent husband's love, and constantly receiving missives and tokens of affection from him, yet cannot be satisfied until she sees him: so the Christian soul, at peace with itself because at peace with God, feels that it is incomplete, until it arrives in the actual presence of its Divine Lord. To use the strong language of St. Paul, who would be the last man to undervalue the true happiness of believers—"We ourselves, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body."

But, perhaps, for those who are suffering,—for those whose end is approaching,—for those who have been bereaved of dear relatives, the thought that the hour of death is the hour of Christ's coming to receive His people unto Himself, must be especially full of consolation. Place the feeling of the poor heathen in contrast with that of the Christian upon this subject. The heathen have keen affections. They feel, as we do, the loss of those near and dear to them. And when the time of separation comes, they are frequently convulsed with uncontrollable agony. All is dark and desolate. They know that there has been a parting; they know not that there will be any future meeting. Their beloved has been drawn away from them into the unseen, and they are left behind without one single ray of consolation. How hideous must be the features of Death under such circumstances as these! How appalling his approach! Contrast with this distress the feeling of the Christian. With all its gloom, with all the pain which accompanies the thought of even temporary parting—what is death to him? It is Jesus Christ coming, scarcely in disguise, to receive His servant to Himself; that "where He is, there His servant may be also."

MY BRIDE.

MY bride is a simple maiden,
And love is her all—her all;
But better is love in a garret
Than hate in a gilded hall.
And fairer than all the jewels
That flash on a monarch's brow—
Ay! bright as the stars of heaven
Are the eyes of this bride, I trow.

When sorrows invest my bosom,
I look in her smiling face;
When friends like the snows have vanished
I weep in her wild embrace,
The beat of her heart is rapture.
The thrill of her touch divine,
And Poesy, darling Poesy,
Is the name of this bride of mine.

MATTHIAS BARR.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART X. CHRIST TEACHING BY PARABLES.

Chapter to be read—Matt. xiii.

INTRODUCTION. Ask the children the object of Christ's mission to earth—both to die as a sacrifice for sin and to live as an example of perfect obedience to God's law. How did He teach the people? By the example of His holy life; by His miracles of love and mercy; by direct sermons; and by parables. Work out the idea of a parable, as a story of every-day life used to illustrate some lesson; such as the good Samaritan and others. Show how Christ always used common things to teach Divine truth. Ask for examples, such as bread, salt, light, &c., in Sermon on Mount, mustard-seed, leaven, &c. Make children see the importance of finding in all God's works on earth something to teach us about His kingdom in heaven, so that a parable is "an earthly story with a heavenly meaning."

I. THE SOWER. (1) The scene. (Read xiii. 1—9.) Picture out the scene, our Lord in Peter's boat, pushed out into the sea; the people in crowds sitting on the shore. Strong men leaving plough to listen for a few minutes to this wonderful Teacher; tender women carrying infants; little children playing with shingle. Just then on hill-side a sower going out; Christ points him out; the crowd turn and look, then listen to the parable. (2) The story. Ask the children to describe the four cases of the seed falling, pointing out the different nature of the soil; the length of time the seed stayed; the progress towards maturity; the hindrances and the helps to its growth. Thus, in first case, it did not penetrate at all; why not? In the second, the shallow soil and warm sun made it quickly grow, and as quickly die. In the third, a plant was formed, but no fruit came. In the last, the soil being good, a plant and fruit resulted. Ask what good soil indicates? previous preparation, weeds cleared, well watered, &c. (3) The application. (Read 18—23.) Question briefly on each part, and bring it practically home to the children. Thus show how Satan catches away the Word; remind how often after worship idle talk, in churchyard has completely driven away the Word from the heart, so that it did not lodge at all. For the shallow ground, warn as to the danger of trusting to mere impressions. Children especially easily moved; listen eagerly, delight to hear, promise obedience; but often no root struck out—i.e., impressions not acted upon; no real turning of heart to God, therefore no fruit. As Scripture examples remind of Pharaoh, penitent during each plague, then relapsed into hardness of heart; of multitudes crying, "Hosannah!" one day, and "Crucify" two days afterwards. Show that the test is not the impressions and feelings of Sunday with its hallowed influences, but of the life in world, when ridicule or persecution met with—e.g., contrast Peter's boldness of profession with his thrice denial under fear of persecution. For the third class, remind of children's cares and pleasures, as real to them as graver ones to adults—e.g., lessons to learn, home duties to attend to, a gay party in prospect—all tempting to hurry over prayers in morning, &c. For last class, speak of a fitting preparation by prayer and quiet demeanour for hearing the Word; a heart prepared will retain seed and bring forth fruits of righteousness (Gal. v. 22); these in turn produce others, so that the end is lost in infinity. Press upon children the importance of studying and meditating upon the Word, if they would bring forth good fruit to the praise of God (John xv. 8).

II. THE TARES AND WHEAT. (Read 24—30, 36—43). The parable being familiar, draw out briefly the leading points; the master sowing openly, the enemy stealthily; the servants' question; the master's eye alone detecting the difference of the grains during growth (tares being a kind of spurious wheat); the division at the harvest; and the joy of the harvest-home. Point out the difference between this parable and that of the Sower; here the seed means the people of God. Ask who is the enemy, reminding of Gen. iii. 17. Show how the good and evil are mixed in this world, both making same profession and giving same promises; so much alike, often mistaken; the bad so amiable, &c., the good sometimes with so many blemishes that it is impossible for man to decide accurately. What will show difference? Remind of Christ's words (Matt. xxv. 41) about judgment-day and the testing of the fire (1 Cor. iii. 13). What shall we have to show? not merely certain good deeds required (1 Cor. xiii. 3), but heart and life given to God. Actions springing from love alone acceptable. Remind of Mary Magdalene loving much because much forgiven—then showing love by her offering. So with all; first the heart, then the life acceptable to God. Show how parable also teaches us, like Matt. vii. 1, not to judge others; we might make mistakes. God's judgment alone infallible, and great day will set all things right.

Questions to be answered.

1. In what different ways did Christ teach the people?
2. Describe the scene of the parable of the Sower.
3. Explain what is meant by the thorns choking the seed.
4. What produces the "good ground," and what fruits are intended?
5. Point out any differences between the two parables.
6. Give the explanation of the parable of the Tares.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

OVER the heath-clad hills that surrounded quiet Valehead, the sun had risen on a bright June morning; the air was full of that exquisite purity and freshness which scarce survives the earliest dawn; tender and evanescent as the fair innocence of human souls, which is dispersed for ever by the first breath of the world and its evil knowledge. Glittering dew-drops were on the little heath-bells, while they seemed to bend and whisper in greeting to the faint soft breeze; keen rays of light shot down through the branches of the stately pines, as though they were golden arrows, sent from heaven to wake the darkling earth; one pure pale star trembled and faded in the growing brightness, like the spirit of a saint dying into paradisiacal glory; but it alone remained to speak of night or gloom, for over all the clear blue sky was not a cloud, and high up in its crystal vault a lark was losing itself in a very ecstasy of song, while a thousand bird-voices from a lower sphere sent up the joyous tidings that day was come again, and the sunny hours were all before them, full of hope and pleasure.

"How beautiful!—how beautiful this dear world is!" thought Una Dysart, as she stood on the rocky path leading up the mountain-side, and looked back over all the fair glad scene. A vision of brightness she was herself, with the light of youth and hope on her radiant face, and the happy smile of a heart at peace playing on her unconscious lips. But little did she dream that she had reached the last hour of life's sweet dawn; that never again would she know the freshness of a free spirit, untouched, untrammelled by the burden of its own human sympathies; unmoved in its passionless peace by the knowledge of its true nature and strong capacity for suffering. It was the last hour when she could look up to the blue sky and think only of its beauty and not of the power of appeal against the tyranny of life, which might be found beyond its lucid depths; the last hour when gazing down on the earth in its greenness, she could forget the dark graves that were hidden beneath.

When she turned away at length from her long gaze over the smiling landscape, she knew not that it had been, in truth, a final farewell to the hope-lit scenes of her careless youth.

Una Dysart had never forgotten the glimpse she got of the strange old tower called the "Eagles' Nest," and the history of long-buried agony and crime which had been told her in connection with it. She had made up her mind from the first that she would see it. She knew that the distance from Vale House was not at all more than she could walk, and she had no doubt that her own active little feet would enable her to scale the ascent, steep as she was assured it was; but she had all along been quite determined to go alone. She did not like the idea of visiting a spot where so terrible a penance had been performed, and so bitter a sorrow endured, with the gay companions who were now associated with her in all her pleasure-excursions; and her father, even if she had wished for his society on such an occasion, would have resolutely refused to make the exertion. She resolved, therefore, to go very early in the morning, when she would run no risk of meeting any one by the way, and could return to the house in time to greet Colonel Dysart on his first appearance for the day.

Una found the path very pleasant at first, rocky and moss-grown as it was, and she went onwards rapidly, till she reached the foot of the tremendous cliff, on the very summit of which the "Eagles' Nest" was placed. There was a zig-zag track leading up to it, that might have suited a goat or a chamois well enough, but which would have been almost impracticable to one less surefooted and light of tread than Una Dysart, and looked formidable even to her. She was not to be daunted, however, and thinking it best not to look behind her, or give herself time to consider the positive dangers of the ascent, she started off as swiftly as she could, and never drew breath till, by the help of an overhanging branch of a tree, she fairly swung herself up on the little rocky platform which supported the ancient tower. Then she paused, panting and flushed, her limbs trembling under her, and she looked round for some spot where she might sink down and rest, feeling that between excitement and fatigue she could not stand a moment longer. But she soon saw that there was no place outside the building where she could sit down, for it occupied almost the whole space on the top of the high, pointed rock, where it had been perched, and the only thing to be done was to go inside and rest on the ground, if there proved to be no available seat. She turned round and prepared to enter by the low-arched doorway, but as she put her foot on the threshold a sense of shrinking timidity came over her at the idea of entering that unknown chamber in the midst of such absolute solitude, and for a moment she hung back; the next, however, she was laughing at her own fears, for she was thoroughly brave at heart, and accusing herself of expecting to meet the penitent, who so many centuries before had made of this tower a sort of ante-chamber to the grave.

"I do not suppose the poor remorseful ghost would harm me if I did meet him," thought Una, and at once plunged boldly into the gloomy little building. It was so dark that, coming from the dazzling sunshine, she could at first distinguish nothing, except that the floor was encumbered with rubbish and a few large stones, on one of which she sat down, thankful to rest at last. After a little time her eyes grew accustomed to the partial light, which was admitted only through the open doorway, and she could ascertain that she was in a small octagon room, the walls of which were, in fact, the actual rock, joined to massive stone masonry, which formed the remaining portions. It was very lofty, extending up the whole height of the tower, so that the roof was lost in impenetrable shadows, and there was no window and no furniture that she could perceive. One striking object only met her eye, because it happened to be exactly opposite the gleam of light admitted by the narrow door; it was a huge roughly-executed cross, hewn out of the living rock, and standing forward in bold relief against the indistinct background. Una gazed at it with great interest, thinking how before that awful symbol the poor lonely penitent of the old legend, night and day, poured out his anguish of remorse, and wondering if ever in this world he found peace. But while she looked on it long and steadily, a sudden terror shook her whole frame from head to foot, and made her very heart seem to cease its beating, for it appeared to her that she saw standing by the side of that cross, a tall dark figure, perfectly motionless, but with gleaming eyes fixed upon her, from amidst the shadows. For a moment she tried to persuade herself that it was a delusion, but as she forced herself to look again the apparition only grew more distinct, and completely overmastered by a superstitious fear, her courage failed her altogether; she gave a stifled shriek, and starting up, rushed to the door, stumbling as she did so over a stone, so that she was thrown violently forward, and would have fallen, had not the figure which had so terrified her darted towards her and caught her in his arms.

"Miss Dysart, I am so grieved to have alarmed you; there is nothing to fear."

Still terrified and bewildered, she struggled in his grasp, exclaiming, "Who—what are you?"

"Humphrey Atherstone; do you not know me?"

She looked for a moment into his face, on which the sunshine from the door at which they now stood was shining, and when she met the dark mournful eyes, gentle and softened now as they gazed into hers, she ceased to struggle and drew a long breath of relief. But the reaction was too sudden, and she still trembled so violently that she was fain to lean against him to avoid sinking to the ground. His powerful arm held her fast, as he looked down tenderly into the young fair face, now blanched to the very lips. But soon, with a heavy sigh, he moved, as if he dared not remain in that position another moment.

"Will you not sit down?" he said; "I can find you a seat inside."

"Oh! don't take me back in there," she said, shuddering. "Let me stay in the sunshine; I am better now," and she raised herself from his arms and stood upright.

"Wait one moment," he said, and going into the tower, he brought out a seat for her, which he placed in such a position that she could lean back against the rock. "You can rest here in tolerable comfort, I think," he said, and she thanked him with a smile as she sat down, while he stood beside her supporting his tall frame against the doorway. "Now, let me beg your pardon a thousand times for the needless terror I caused you," said Atherstone; "I saw you come in, and was aware also that you did not perceive me, and I was afraid I should startle you if I spoke too suddenly. I was just thinking how best to make my presence known, when you gave that sad little shriek of dismay."

"I was very silly, and I am quite ashamed; but the truth is, I was so completely convinced when I first came in that there was no living being there but myself, that when I saw a dark figure beside the cross, I thought——" She paused and seemed unwilling to finish her sentence.

"What did you think, Miss Dysart?" he said, gravely.

"You will laugh at me if I tell you."

"This is the last place where I am likely to laugh," he answered.

"I thought then," she said, in a low tone, "that it was the spirit of Fulke Atherstone."

Not a word did Humphrey speak for a few minutes; then he said, "It is strange, indeed, that you should have connected him and me in this manner in your mind."

"He was your ancestor, was he not?" asked Una.

"Doubtless; but I often think there is a closer connection between us than that fact need imply."

"I should hope you are not so unhappy as he is said to have been?" said Una, softly.

"I never committed a murder certainly," said Atherstone, in a voice so harsh that Una was quite startled.

"Did he, your ancestor, do so?" she asked.

"Yes—at least so the legend goes—he was a Cain, and slew his brother. He was the younger son, and he wanted the Abbey and the good lands of Atherstone to be his own, so that he might win with them the woman he loved, as well as a place of honour in the country. So he killed the rightful possessor and took them to himself."

(Drawn by R. Barnes.)

"A sudden terror shook her whole frame"—p. 520.

Having said this much, Atherstone turned away as if unable to proceed.

CHAPTER IX.

THERE was silence for a few minutes, then Atherstone faced Una again with his usual calm. "Do you wish to hear more of my ancestor's life?" he asked.

"Only this," said Una; "tell me if he truly repented."

"Yes, he repented, for his crime brought nothing but evil days upon him; although in those old, lawless times, when deeds of violence were frequent, he escaped the judicial punishment he so well deserved, and was allowed to live. The woman for whom he committed the crime refused to touch his blood-stained hand. She left him, and passed her life in praying for him; and when even in loveless solitude he sought to reign as lord of Atherstone, his equals in the land all combined to disown and shun him; no man would speak to him, no woman would smile on him, and they say that his brother's face, pallid in death, was ever before him. So at last remorse seized him, and it was like a worm gnawing at his heart. Then he built this tower and carved out the cross from the rock, and spent the rest of his life prostrate before it. He was found there dead at last, and is buried where he lay, for the remains of a murderer could not rest in consecrated ground."

"What a dreadful history," said Una; "I almost wonder that you can bear to come here, Mr. Atherstone. I came myself from mere curiosity; but I think if I had known all about the tower, I should not have ventured to visit it."

"I come here continually," said Atherstone, gloomily. "It is the place where best I can wrestle with the inexorable difficulty of my life—where I try to solve the never-dying problem of the true nature of evil; to adjust the balance of right and wrong, in cases which do not seem to be touched by any known laws, and to prove to myself whether my own position is founded on immaculate righteousness or on a hideous wrong."

Una looked up to him with a glance of wistful compassion. "You speak in riddles, Mr. Atherstone. I suppose you do not wish that I should understand what you say. But I fear there is one fact connected with you which I can comprehend too well; your life is very unhappy, I am sure."

He fixed his eyes keenly on her face. "Miss Dysart, will you tell me what you have heard concerning me? It seems an odd question, but I beg you not to refuse to answer it. What have you been told of my history, past and present?"

"Of the past, I have been made acquainted with all that is known of the circumstances of your uncle's death; and of the present——" she stopped and hesitated.

"Pray go on," he said entreatingly, bending down to her with anxious eyes.

"Of the present," she said in a low voice, "I have heard that you have firmly resolved to lead always the solitary life you are living now; that you will never allow any human tie to break its loneliness."

"Yes, you have rightly heard," he said; "but my will has no share in this harsh decree; it is a doom laid upon me. Miss Dysart, since you know that in this respect I am shut out from the common humanity, it will not, I trust, offend you if I say, that I never understood the extent of the sacrifice I am compelled to make till I saw, the other day, how your sweet presence made sunshine in my gloomy old home, and taught me what life might be for happier men."

She bent down her head and made no answer, and after a few minutes' silence, he said, more calmly, "What do you think of a life in which the chief element is not love, but hatred—hatred felt and returned?"

"Oh! it must be terrible," she said; "but surely it never can be right to hate?"

"Not even to hate evil?"

"Mr. Atherstone," she said, with a winning frankness, "you do not wish me to penetrate the mystery of your life, and therefore it is impossible I can rightly comment upon it; only of this be very sure—I feel deeply for you in the evident suffering which it entails upon you. I wish I could think you would one day be happier than you are now."

"Can I ever be happy when that irrevocable sentence has been passed, which shuts me out from all human love; which condemns me to drag on through my hopeless days, a solitary, childless man, with none on earth to care whether I live or die?"

"But you may have friends," she said, with a tender earnestness; "do let that thought comfort you: even though you are deprived of nearer ties, you may have much sympathy and joy in them."

Her voice was so full of the intense compassion she felt for him, that the strong man was greatly moved. He stooped down and gently took her hand. "Those words sound very consoling, spoken by your lips; may I count you among the friends you promise me?"

"Indeed you may, now and always," she exclaimed. But as she raised her sweet brown eyes to his face, as if to seal the promise with her eloquent look, and he saw the world of feeling that lay behind them; he felt his very heart sink down with despair, and he knew as he never had known before of what he was bereft.

To certain generous, deep-toned natures, the sentiment of compassion can become an influence more powerful than love, or ambition, or even the intense human desire for personal happiness. To women, especially, the suffering of one towards whom their sympathies have been strongly drawn out is intolerable, and when their tendency to hero-worship is roused, along with a restless rebellion against the pain they cannot reach, it is well-nigh inevitable that a power is thereby established over their heart and soul and life itself, from which they never more are free while thought and feeling last.

So at least it was with Una Dysart; a very tyranny of pity held her in its grasp as she stood an hour later on the threshold of her home, and let her hand rest for a moment in that of Humphrey Atherstone while he took his leave of her. But mingled with her aching regret for the darkening of his life, by the baleful shadows she dimly perceived, but in nowise understood, was a sense of strong admiration for the sacrifice of himself to some high theory of honour or rectitude, which she believed, from what he said, to have been the cause of all that was strange and unusual in his mode of existence. Little enough did the young girl know of the complicated difficulties that beset even the most white-robed souls, when they seek to walk with their garments spotless through the tortuous paths of this bewildering world; but her own pure instincts taught her that there is nothing upon earth more noble than the man who flings away life and its hopes like dross, that he may keep unalloyed the fine gold of truth and justice; and she believed she had discerned that this was the case with Humphrey Atherstone, although she was aware that she had as yet obtained but a glimpse of the singularly intricate web of trials and perplexities which seemed to surround him on every side.

They had come down together from the "Eagles' Nest" after that strange meeting, when during a moment Una had thought she saw the vision of a soul in pain, for whom the days of expiation were too surely gone, and found instead that it was a living, breathing man who stood before her, on whom the burden of the flesh still lay, with all its marvellous contradictions of miserable weakness and glorious strength. It was scarcely a matter of choice that he should go with her when she started to return home, for the descent by the steep and rocky path was much more dangerous than even the ascent had been, difficult as she had found it; and often her two little white hands were clasped in his, while she bounded from some impracticable rock to the lower level where he stood; or his strong arm held her lithe figure in his grasp when the shelving path threatened a precipitous fall. And when at last they had passed from the cliff to the heath-clad mountain-side, they walked on together through the dewy morning air, talking almost with the freedom of old acquaintances, on the strength of a tacit compact that henceforth they were to be special friends.

Poor little Una, in her naïve inexperience, thought that nothing could be much more charming than to have a confidential friendship with a man who never intended to marry, especially if he happened to possess such great qualities as those with which she invested Humphrey Atherstone, and had the additional merit of being unhappy, for it was so very pleasant to comfort people who were unfortunate; and under these felicitous circumstances, she could be as kind to him as she pleased, without the least risk of his mistaking her; and she could give him her confidence, and benefit by the hard-headed wisdom and freedom from pettiness of all kinds, by which she honestly believed men were distinguished from the weaker vessels among whom she herself was numbered. So she turned to him with a trust and sympathy which gave exquisite pleasure to the world-worn man, and roused in him a response of a somewhat stronger nature than she at all suspected.

Of course they exchanged confidences as to the past. It was as easy as it was delightful for Humphrey Atherstone to look through and through the transparent, sunny life of nineteen years, which was all that pure-hearted Una had yet tasted of human experience; but it was a very different matter when she turned her eyes, clear and unclouded as they were, on the veiled existence, whose hidden struggles had made him what he now was. He could speak to her of his youthful days, when the world and its joys were as free to him as to any one on earth; of his exploits at school and college, and of the period after his return home, when he made the old Abbey one of the gayest centres of the county society, and he was himself foremost in all the field sports for which Northangleshire was famed; but when he came to the point where the grave of Maurice Atherstone seemed to lie across his path in life, and cut off that which was past from all that was to come, his lips became locked in an impenetrable silence, from which she learned indeed, better than words could have told her, that out of that grave had arisen the dark, inexplicable mists through which he was now stumbling on, like a man who has lost his way, and knows not whether the course he has taken will lead him to safety or destruction. But she could read no further than this one fact in the riddle of his history. Very bitterly he spoke to her, however, of the suspicions which had fallen upon him, even while he offered no explanation of the change in himself which had caused them, and it was for this especially that Una longed to comfort him as they stood on the doorstep of her home, scarcely conscious how unwilling they were to separate.

It was, perhaps, fortunate that an interruption came. The old butler suddenly appeared, ushering out Mr. Northcote, somewhat to Una's surprise, as it seemed an early hour for a visitor. He shook hands with her, merely saying he had called to see her father on business; and then, as he went down the steps, Atherstone gave a quick pressure to her hand, and followed him at once, with a bitter expression of self-scorn on his silent lips as he felt the pain it caused him to leave her.

(To be continued.)

HISTORIC FAMINES.

THERE is an old familiar saying, that we never estimate aright our blessings until we miss them; and the adage may be extended one degree further still, so as to include even those events which do not actually befall ourselves, but which, by being brought prominently before us, enable us to realise ideas which, before such occurrence, were scarcely more than vague conceptions in our minds. This is especially the case with that awful word "famine," which is now on every one's lips, and meets our eye day after day, with increasing frequency in the columns of our newspapers, in connection with that mysterious dispensation of Providence now devastating the finest provinces of our great Indian Empire. It is scarcely too much to say that with very many of us "famine" is, or has been, almost a meaningless word, and so illustrates the remark just made, that some striking outward event is often necessary to enable us to realise fully the force even of words which occur frequently in our common speech. Our lots are cast, not only in a temperate climate free from those extremes of prodigality and failure to which tropical countries are liable, but more especially at a time when intelligent cultivation of the land, and some conception, at all events, of the science of political economy enable us to make the most of every acre of the soil, and also by wise forethought in time of plenty to guard against the possibilities of dearth.

With all our provision, we have, even within very recent periods, felt the pinch of high prices in some of the commonest necessaries of life, as if just to show us what a delicate and complex arrangement is that of demand and supply. They answer one another so readily in ordinary times, that we come to take it almost as a matter of course, like the sun rising and setting, that they should do so. We shall soon forget that coals have been exceptionally dear, or butcher's meat difficult of attainment by the poor, if God's mercy sends us, as it seems likely to do, more prosperous times. The very name of "famine" has been applied to a dearth in Ireland within the last few years; and yet it is still correct to say that many scarcely realise the full import of the word when they read it in the Bible or in records of current events.

The earliest record of a famine in the Bible is that which occurred in the time of Abraham, when we read (Gen. xii. 10), that he "went down to Egypt to sojourn there; for the famine was grievous in the land;" but the great dearth which Holy Scripture tells us "was over all the earth," is that into connection with which we are brought in the touching history of Joseph. This lasted seven years; and we can easily understand the fluctuations of plenty and dearth in a country like Egypt, where rain is almost unknown, and irrigation takes place by means of the infiltration of the waters of the Nile through the soil, at their annual rising. The prevalence of a south wind, which dries up the soil and keeps off the rain-clouds from the Mediterranean, is a certain precursor of failure in the crops of the Delta. And so too in all those countries of the East, where there are few springs, and the rivers are not large enough to water the immense tracts through which they flow, any failure in the periodical rains is sure to produce a drought, which the primitive condition of agriculture renders it powerless to remedy by means of artificial irrigation.

The famine in Samaria too, about which we read in the history of Elisha the prophet, lasted as long as this Egyptian one. Elisha (2 Kings viii.) "spake unto the woman, whose son he had restored to life, saying, Arise, and go thou and thy household, and sojourn wheresoever thou canst sojourn: for the Lord hath called for a famine; and it shall also come upon the land seven years."

The only record we have of a famine afterwards lasting as long as this is in the reign of the Fatimee Khalif El-Mutansir Billah, in the year of the Hegira 457—464, or A.D. 1064—1071. Drought, pestilence, and anarchy combined, as they frequently do, to devastate the country, and rendered the famine much the most severe of modern times. The people were reduced to eat corpses, and dogs and cats fetched fabulous prices. Even the Khalif himself kept only three of his horses alive, while kidnappers in Cairo caught unwary passengers as they went along the streets, by letting down ropes, like fishing-lines with hooks at the end, from the windows.

It has been already said that the temperature and climate of England alone would not suffice to preserve us from those extremes to which Eastern countries are liable. We cannot too strongly impress upon our minds, that the exceptional privileges we enjoy involve corresponding obligations. The inhabitants of Oriental climes live much more what may be called a "hand-to-mouth" life than is possible for us. The less violent extremes of our climate and soil have to be supplemented by constant labour on man's part. We have neither the alluvial fertility of the Delta of the Nile, nor the parched plains of Hindostan, which must have their rain "in season," or remain altogether unprolific. It may be interesting, then, to notice some failures of this kind in early English history; happily we have none in our modern annals upon which we can lay our finger as at all deserving the name of "famine." The fourteenth century seems to have been a singularly unfortunate one in this respect in England; though perhaps with modern prices in our mind we shall scarcely be able to estimate the severity of "famine-prices" then. In London, in 1304, the price of a fat cock was 1d.; two pullets, 1d.; a fat capon, 2d.; a goose, 4d.; a mallard, 1d.; a partridge, 1d.; a pheasant, 4d.; a heron, 6d.; a plover, 1d.; a swan, 3s.; a crane, 12d.; two woodcocks, 1d.; a fat lamb, from Christmas to Shrovetide, 6d.; the rest of the year, 4d. In 1314, says the chronicler, food was so scarce and dear that the people could not live, and higher prices were forbidden to be asked in the city than was afore fixed, but no meat was to be had, nor fowls; a quarter of wheat, beans, or peas was sold at 2s.; of malt, for a mark; of salt, 35s. In 1315 prices were not permitted to be fixed; but the dearth was so great through rain, that wheat sold at 40s.; the mortality was so great that the dead could hardly be buried; the beasts and cattle died; horseflesh was esteemed a great delicacy; the poor stole the dogs to eat that had fattened on the corrupted cattle; some ate their own children, and thieves in prison devoured one another. In 1379 a gallon of white wine cost 6d., of red 4d.! In Ireland, in our own time, famine occurred through the failure of the potato crop in 1845. Ten millions were voted by England, but failed to stop the progress of the dearth.

It is, however, to India that our regards naturally at this moment turn; and we find that as far back as the incorporation of that now suffering province in the great Mogul Empire, there is the record of a terrible famine, of which the historian, quoted in Mr. Hunter's "Rural Bengal," says:—"Thousands died daily. The living, wearied with burying the dead, threw their bodies into the river. This created a stench which only increased the disease. The governor was carried off by the plague. The city was at once depopulated, and from that day to this it has been abandoned. At the time of its destruction it had existed two thousand years. It was the most magnificent city in India, of immense extent, and filled with noble buildings. It was the capital of a hundred kings, the seat of wealth and luxury. In one year it was humbled to the dust, and now it is the abode only of tigers and monkeys."

The famine of 1770 has been truly said to stand "an appalling spectre on the threshold of British rule." John Shore, afterwards Lord Teignmouth, thus describes the impression it left on his mind:—

"Still fresh in memory's eye the scene I view,
The shrivelled limbs, sunk eyes, and lifeless hue;
Still hear the mother's shriek and infant's moans,
Cries of despair, and agonising groans.
In wild confusion dead and dying lie;
Hark to the jackal's yell and vulture's cry,
The dogs' fell howl, as midst the glare of day
They riot unmolested on their prey!
Dire scenes of horror, which no pen can trace,
Nor rolling years from memory's page efface."

Two years after this famine of 1770 Warren Hastings wrote a report on the state of Bengal, and set it down that one-third of the inhabitants at least had perished. "It represents," says Mr. Hunter, "an aggregate of individual suffering which no European nation has been called upon to contemplate within historic times. Twenty years after the famine the remaining population was estimated at from twenty-four to thirty millions; and we cannot help arriving at the conclusion, that the failure of a single crop following a year of scarcity had within nine months swept away ten millions of human beings."

The same authority, speaking in his latest volume on Orissa, about the causes of these and similar visitations, specifies them as "droughts" and "floods." The water which would be of priceless value in a dry season, is suffered in a wet one to become an instrument of evil by causing inundations. "A total absence of rainfall," he says, "produces the climax of misery. Nothing remains for the people but to die. In 1770 ten million peasants suffered the last agonies of hunger, and one-third of all Bengal lay waste and silent for twenty years. In 1866 the same province suffered a famine equally severe; but our modern facilities of intercommunication, and liberal though tardy application of money, reduced the mortality to less than one-tenth of what it was in 1770, and only 750,000 British subjects died of starvation. One-fourth of the whole population of Orissa was, however, swept away!"

Such are some few of the more prominent precursors of the terrible visitation, which has now come to teach us the meaning of that fearful word "famine." But let us be sure it has a gentler mission too, to teach us something of that nobler word "charity." Let us try to realise that expression even in a larger sense than merely ministering to the crying necessities of the moment. Good men doubt whether private charity be in place here. We do not doubt it, or we should not have written these lines or initiated the fund for relief. But do not let us quarrel with one another in such a work, or brand those who differ from us with preaching a "cheap philanthropy." They do not mean it to be so, any more than they mean it unkindly when they tell us that our utmost munificence is but a "drop in the bucket." We think of the widow's mite, and humbly yet cheerfully and confidently contribute that drop. Many such drops would fill the bucket; and that is exactly what we are trying to get—"a drop" from each one who reads THE QUIVER.

THE VIGIL THROUGH THE NIGHT-TIME.

WITH a wealth of rich and lavish glory
Flung the western beams their parting grace,
Where, enshrined in hues of pictured story,
Glowed the knightly arms of ancient race.
Through the deeply-bayed and tinctured oriel
Streamed the radiance of the evening rays,
Flinging downward from the panes armorial
Show'rs of gules and amethystine sprays.
Underneath there waved the verdant banners,
As the evening's chill and rustling soughs
Sang with wailing sad their drear hosannas
Through the mazes of the beechen boughs.
Darker then the shadows grew without us,
Piled up deep amid the silence lone;
Colder still the night-wind played about us,
With its rising swell and screechy moan.
Sullen seemed to grow the sombre glooming,
As it closer wrapped its darkling cowl,
As alone the bittern's dreary booming
Mingled with the screaming of the owl.

* * * * *

Chiller far the storm that, sweeping o'er me,
Smote the chords of life with sound of doom!
Blacker far the shadows that before me
Deepened out in night of rayless gloom!
She, my sister dear, my priceless treasure,
Who had taught to me the life sublime,
Taught to wait the joys surpassing measure
In the fulness of the future time;
Who had twined, with mystic intertwining,
Round my own her wondrous spirit's cords—
In her hopelessness of health, reclining,
Softly hymned sweet hymns of loving lands;
With her soft brown tresses gently floating
O'er the pallid cheek and shrunken bone,
Crimsoned by the hectic flush, denoting
God had set His sign-mark on His own;
With a bright gold ring that, richly gleaming,
With its sapphire gem of virgin blue,
Matched the dark-blue eyes that, softly beaming,
Looked like violets wet with evening dew.
O'er us in their countless mazy clusters,
Scattered wide about the pure serene,
Hung the lamps of night their many lustres;
While in soft and mellow silver sheen,
Cold and chaste, about my dearest sister,
Played the moonlight's wan and crystal grace,
Seeming, when in radiant flood it kissed her,
To enwreathe a nimbus round her face.
As in agony of anguished feeling,
In the whirlwind of that spirit-storm,
Lonely by her couch-side quietly kneeling,
Prayed and watched I by her drooping form,
Thinking of the days, whose vista, sparkling,
Seemed to glisten back in golden light—
Thinking of the years, whose shadows, darkling,
Deepened out before in endless night,
With her fingers deftly interlacing,
Twined she round my neck a chain of gold;
And the scenes of after seasons tracing,
Precious words of priceless import told:
"If ye be true knight, your vigil lonely,
Through the long and dark and dreary hours,
By the silent shrine, shall nerve you only
For the conflict with the evil powers.
If ye steadfast watch your chrysmal armour,
Keep it free from base defiling stain,
Its bright gleam shall daze the wily charmer,
Its true steel shall turn his deadly rain.
Yea! and if this erewhile separation
Pierce with woe your loving, trustful heart,
Think ye of that blissful restoration
In the realms where nevermore they part."

G. H. PALMER.

BLIND BIDDY'S STORY.

BY MRS. STANLEY LEATHES, AUTHOR OF "PENELOPE," "LETTIE DEAN," ETC.

CHAPTER II.

"YOU must all have looked a strange contrast to my mother—Jessie and Mary crying, Ben angry, and I and Peter bewildered and uncomfortable. But she came to us with a smile on her sweet calm face, and with almost a cheerful voice, said, 'Come, dear children, what's done can't be undone. See if you can't help to cheer up father. He's sadly out of heart. Maybe, it's all for the best, for the journeys to Warbridge every morning are getting too much for him, and Primrose and Jenny will give enough for butter and the neighbours, and he must give up Warbridge.'

"'But she was such a beauty, mother!' said Ben.

"'And gave such milk!' I said.

"'And who could have done it, mother?' said Jessie.

"'Who, indeed?' said my mother; 'but now, Mary, put the tea, and, Ben, run and help Ralph in the yard, and you, Biddy, give little Peter his supper and put him to bed. And be all in your places, dears, when father comes in, and talk about something else, if you can.'

"Poor Black-eyed Susan! She was my mother's cow. My grandfather had given her to her when father took the farm, and she was the envy of every one. Her milk was like cream; my mother used often to say she was worth two ordinary cows, though she had one fault, and that was straying. My father fed his cows on the common, and beautiful grazing it was; rich verdure grew along the course of the little river War, which intersected the open country. But Susan wanted a larger world than she had allotted to her, and when she was turned out into the common she would stick her tail in the air, and gallop and gambol to the surprise of the staid donkeys and kine, who fed day by day, drowsily and contentedly, on the nearest patch of green they could find. And then a fence was looked upon by Susan as only put up for her amusement, that she might leap over it for practice. In vain did my father try all the usual methods of checking the truant tendencies of cows, they were useless; till at last she was tethered. I remember well when it was done, and I remember, too, that we cried, Ben and I. It was like tethering a mountain goat, and so it proved; for Susan pined under the confinement, and would soon have died, every one thought, had she not been liberated. About three months before, she had made her way into a grass meadow of a neighbouring farmer, Job Smith. She was found in the long grass, as Jessie said, 'only smelling the cowslips;' or, as any but an angry man would have confessed, doing no harm. But Job was very angry, and swore 'if ever that evil-looking black cow of Farmer Lee's crossed his fence again, he'd do her some harm.'

"Well, we were all ready and waiting in the big kitchen by the time father came home. Mother had piled the fire with wood, and it blazed brightly, and there was new honey on the table, and cresses from the spring. I sat reading a book with Ben, and we whispered over it, not to bring up the subject of Susan's death to father, as my mother had said.

"'There were gipsies in the lanes yesterday, Ben,' I said, 'Woodman saw them.'

"'They didn't kill Susan,' he said.

"'But you don't think——'

"'Hush! here's father;' and in he came, followed by Ralph. They took their places at tea, without a word, my mother calling us round the table in her usual gentle manner.

"We talked about the berries, to-morrow's market, and the gipsies, but father seemed not to hear or heed. At last he said, 'Well, Margaret, what have you got to say about this affair? You're wonderful clever at seeing a bright side to things. I take it I'm a ruined man.'

"'Not so bad as that. There won't be so much coming in, to be sure, for we cannot raise another cow; but we women must do something, the girls must put their shoulder to the wheel.'

"We all murmured something to the effect that we were willing. But father said, 'No no—no man is to stand still and be wronged in this fashion. I'll——'

"'You'll be turned out of the farm, as sure as the day, if you do,' said Ralph, who was a cool, silent lad, and very wise of his years; 'and then we're ruined if you like, father, after laying out all you have on the land. It was only to-day I heard that Sir Geoffrey left all the letting and management of things to Job now—indeed, that he was agent and bailiff and head man and all.'

"My father groaned, and pushed his chair from the table. 'I'd almost sooner they'd fired my ricks, Margaret,' he said.

"'Trials come from above, John,' mother said; 'no one could harm you if they wasn't let, and if they come from above, there must be good in them hidden under the pain and sorrow.'

"'Thee art always on the right side, wife, but still there is such a thing as injustice, and that's what I'm groaning under. I never harmed the man,' he said, in a lower voice, 'yet he always seems to be doing me a grudge. He took care to be out of the way himself, but no doubt he paid some one to do the dirty work. Talk about giving up Warbridge, woman! why, we don't find there's too much grist in the mill as it is, to fill the mouths of all these young ones, and as for me, I'm well enough. I shan't let old age climb on my back, so long as I have strength to shake him off. Laziness often makes old men of young ones. Those who have a heart to work can work, I say.'

"'But, father,' said my mother gently, 'there's something more than work to be done. That's needful, I know; but don't let us take our troubles like heathens; they could only grumble and lament.'

"'Or avenge themselves,' whispered Ben; but no one heard him but I, for Mary put her hand on his mouth 'ere the words were well out.

"'Say on, mother,' said my father; 'you're always, like the mariner's compass, pointing the same way. We should all have been shipwrecked many a time but for you. What more must we do?'

"'Take it patiently, and trust.'

"No one spoke. It seemed almost like asking too much, to take such a provoking trial patiently.

"'Mother read out of the big Bible this morning,' said Mary, as she bent over father's chair and put her hand on his shoulder, '"Thou shalt not be afraid of any evil tidings."'

"'Well, lass?'

"'I suppose that means, that though evil tidings come, they are not to make us afraid, or lose our trust in God.'

"'Quite true, child; and, with a godfearing wife and dutiful children such as mine, I am well-nigh a heathen to take on about this matter; so let us talk no more of it, but pray the Lord, all of you, that we may take this trouble just in the very way He'd have us take it, and make no more ado.'

"When father said the prayers that night, I remember how his voice shook when he said, 'Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us,' and we all knew what he was thinking of. And mother read out of the Bible the thirteenth chapter of the Second of Corinthians, and we went to bed silently and soberly, but somehow not so sorrowful as might have been expected.

"Well, it was never proved who had done us this injury, though it was pretty plain to us and the neighbours. However, poor Job Smith died soon after in a very dreadful way, and his family left the country. I have heard none of his children prospered; but, be that as it may, we will leave them alone.

"The times were bad for farmers just then, and we were not rich enough to stand such a loss as our poor cow. It was a hard struggle to get along at all. We never saw meat on our table that winter, save bacon and pork, and mother began to ail and look thin, and there was much harass about several bills for seed and farming implements. When I say this you will think we were very unhappy; but instead of that we were a very happy family. We clung the closer to one another for all our troubles, and we thought it almost a pleasure to give up anything to save our parents trouble.

"There were no new ribbons or gowns that winter, but we twisted and turned about our old ones; and I remember seeing Ralph brushing and tidying up his Sunday suit, which was very shabby, and never so much as saying a word to any one of his want of a new one, though it had always been a custom with us all to have our new clothes on father's birthday, All Saints' Day.

"One day we elder ones talked together on our way from church, and Ralph said, 'We seem too many for the work to be done about the place, and I have serious thoughts of taking the under-gamekeeper's place at the Hall. It was time Ben left school,' he said, 'and made himself useful to father.'

"So when I went into the house I said, 'Mother, let me go and do for myself somehow; I am seventeen now. Shall I go to service? or what can I do for the best?'

"She smiled, and said, 'God has been very good to me, Biddy; even our troubles have made us happier, for they have shown us what honest and dutiful children we have. There's not one of you would be content to eat the bread of idleness.'

"But the credit was not ours. Our good mother had taught us to love work, and to love to do it well. She had also taught us how much happiness there is in helping others. Oh, how much we owed to our good mother! and, oh! how much mothers can do! A mother makes the home; and what she teaches sinks deeper than any lessons her children may learn from others.

"Soon after I had said this, just when I was wondering what steps to take to get a place, a letter came from my father's sister who lived in London. She wrote to my mother and said she had more work than she could do as a sempstress, and that her eyes were failing her; so if one of us could be spared, she might earn a good livelihood, and be a comfort at the same time to her. The proposal was talked over in the family, and all were anxious to do the self-denying work; but father and mother decided that I was the fittest to go. Mary was so useful in the dairy, and to mother in every way, and Jessie was full young, and rather sickly; whereas I was strong, and by far the handiest at my needle. So with rather a heavy heart I set to work to mend up my clothes to go to London."

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

217. Which of the tribes quarrelled with Gideon because they were not summoned to join him in fighting against the Midianites?

218. Both the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Psalmist testify that the heavens and the earth were created by the Lord Jesus Christ. Give the passages.

219. Joseph told the chief butler that he was stolen away out of the "land of the Hebrews." Is there any evidence to show that the Egyptians at that period knew Abraham's descendants by that name?

220. St. Luke gives as the first of our Lord's miracles His cure of one possessed of an unclean spirit. Is this order identical with that of any other Evangelist?

221. What was the cause of the quarrel between St. Paul and Barnabas?

222. Give an instance when the people desired the Lord Jesus not to depart, and another when He was entreated to leave them.

223. One of the Evangelists says, in reference to the ignorance displayed by the disciples respecting Christ's resurrection, "For as yet they knew not the Scripture, that He must rise again from the dead." To what Scripture did he refer?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 496.

200. At the dedication of the Temple (1 Kings viii. 46, 47; 2 Chron. vi. 36, 37).

201. 1 Kings ix. 27; Acts xxvii. 30.

202. See Jer. vi. 26; Amos viii. 10; Zech. xii. 10.

203. St. Luke (iii. 21; vi. 12; ix. 18, 28; xi. 1).

204. 1 Kings iv. 23.

205. Joshua "made a league with them to let them live" because "they did work wilily, and made as if they had been ambassadors, and went to Joshua, and said, We be come from a far country," &c. (Josh. ix.)

206. Enoch's ascension was not visible to men (Gen. v. 24); Elijah was taken up in a chariot of fire in a whirlwind (2 Kings ii. 11).

207. St. John (xviii. 10).

(Drawn by J. D. WATSON.)

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

OH, never spurn the humblest guide,
If thou wouldst stand at Jesu's side;
The morning star will light thee, till
The day breaks on the Eastern hill.

When thou true blessedness hast found,
Hide not thy treasure underground;
But tell the wondrous things of life
To father, brother, child, and wife.

Be not disheartened, if thou bring
But one poor trophy to the King;
Thy little one, perchance, may win
His thousands from the ways of sin,

Nor envious nor sullen be,
If those who come to Christ by thee
Outshine thee in the lists of grace,
Or swifter run the Christian race—

But up, and do, without delay,
The hour of daylight hastes away;
A soul, more precious than thy all
May be to-morrow past recall.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

MAGGIE CHANGES THE SUBJECT OF HER PICTURE.

SATURDAY evening, the Saturday before the "call" night, and Margaret Ashbury and her father sat over the fire talking.

"Getting old, Maggie, that's it, and getting worn out."

"Oh no, daddy," she answered, "you are only a little tired. Has anything vexed you to-day?"

"No," he answered, "but I am worried. I should like to see you married, for one thing. I am sure Campbell likes you, and it would please his aunt; or there's Bowden, he is well off, and a nice fellow."

"I am very contented as I am," she said.

"Yes, but I should like it. Besides, Maggie, you know how I want a few hundreds. I shouldn't like to ask Campbell, unless you were married to him, and then his aunt would know it and fancy I was going to throw the money away. It is different with Bowden, he is well off and clever, and if you were his wife, or going to be his wife, I should have no hesitation in asking him to join me——"

"Oh no!" she said, in almost terror, "he is not speculative; he is a generous man, but a prudent one. I would not have you borrow of him for the world."

"What do you know about his being generous or prudent? I should get him twenty per cent. for his money; I could make a fortune if I had a few hundreds to go on with, instead of bringing home a few pounds now and then as I do, and I don't see how I am going to do that much longer. I want to pay Herbert back his eighty pounds," he said presently. "He asked me for it for the second time the other night; if he does so again I shall tell him my opinion."

"Perhaps he wants the money," she said gently.

"So do I; but I do without it, and so must he. It is not as if I'd spent it in waste; I did my best with it, and failed, and he must wait till I can repay."

"I wish," said Maggie with a sigh, "we had never borrowed in our lives" (she put the fault in the plural, though she had had little enough to do with it). "The very chink of money seems enough to frighten away friendship. Let me go and sit in my own chair, daddy." The old man drew yet a little closer to the fire; his shortcomings had been the result of mistakes and misfortunes, not of intention.

"I must get money somehow, and soon too," he said; "and repay Herbert for one."

"Let us stint ourselves and save it up little by little," she said eagerly. "Don't borrow again or speculate, dad, pray don't. I know you always mean to do well, but Chance often tyrannises sadly over one's intentions. I know, too, men think differently of things, but it always seems to me that speculation is like blindfolding Sorrow, and sending her out to seek some one in a crowd, it does not matter, and she does not know, whom—for the gain of one is often the bitterest loss and trouble of another. Besides, it is almost a confession that you have not courage to fight the world and take only what you fairly gain by your work in it."

"Margaret!" he exclaimed, astonished and angry; but she went and knelt down before him.

"I did not mean to reproach you, dear," she said, gently; "I know how you have worked and done much and meant to do more; but as I say Chance is a terrible tyrant, and a capricious one, and we should not trust to her. Let us keep to the even way of work, father. I will help and give drawing lessons; oh, I will!" she said, as he shook his head, and she put up her hands and stroked his hair, which was getting thin and grey, and caressed him in the way he liked best, and he forgot his anger. "No one will know, and some of my pictures may sell. I am going to begin my grand one soon, and the money from that shall extinguish a dun by paying him."

"And what is your grand picture to be?" he asked, drooping his head lower till his cheek almost touched her hair. He was so fond of his Margaret.

"Troilus and Creseide."

"I think you might paint your poor old father," he said, in a voice that was half-pathetic, half offended. He did not mean his words, but he liked making the semi-appeal to her feelings. It was the sort of weakness in which many of us now and then indulge—the almost begging for a little food for our poor vanity.

"So I will, some day," she said.

"Perhaps you will not have me some day," he said. And then they were both silent, but the words, carelessly spoken, went to her heart. She could not remember a single unkind word from him. No matter how great a builder of air castles to the outside world—air castles of which his friends' money had gone to buy corner-stones—to her he was the dear old man who had been kind to her all her life. She had never known her mother. She had had few friends, and she was a woman who did not waste her heart on every second person she met, simply because their paths in life sometimes led them by the same roadway, but those to whom she did give affection she gave it with no niggard's hand, and her father—well, she found excuses for his faults and loved him dearly.

"Daddy," she said presently, when she had brushed away the tears which had crept into those soft eyes of hers, "Daddy, I will not paint my Troilus and Creseide until I have first painted you," and she rose to her feet and went off a little distance, and with her head a little on one side, she stood looking at him with an artist's eye. "Yes," and she laughed, a happy little laugh, for she was back in her dreamland of poetry and pictures already. Happy we who have a dreamland, whatever it may be, into which we can escape—a feather will often bridge the space between it and the world, or a puff of wind will waft us there! "Yes, Mr. Daddy, I will paint you, your very dear old self, sitting over the fire, just as you are to-night, that shall be my first picture; and then, if ever I should be really famous, I shall remember in looking back, that in painting the portrait of the face I loved best we laid the foundation of the future together, my daddy and I."

"Is it the face you love best?" he asked tenderly, not because he doubted it for a single moment, but because he liked the assurance, the words which satisfy us most often leave us hungry for a repetition of them.

"It is the face I have passed my life in looking at," she answered gravely, "and the one I have loved the longest."

(To be continued.)

THE DOOM OF LOT'S WIFE.

BY THE REV. C. J. ELLIOTT, M.A., VICAR OF WINKFIELD, WINDSOR, AND HON. CANON OF CHRIST CHURCH, OXFORD.

WE may scarcely doubt that it was with a prophetic reference to the assaults which the scepticism of after ages should make upon the truth of the historical records of the Old Testament that we find not only general testimony borne to them in the teaching of our blessed Lord and His apostles, but also distinctive allusions made to particular events; which events are so essentially interwoven into the annals of Jewish history that if their credibility be established, the presumption in favour of the historical reality of the whole becomes almost irresistible.

Nor can it be without design that we find included amongst those portions of Old Testament history, which are thus stamped with the impress of Divine authority, just those particular incidents which present the greatest amount of divergence from the ordinary course of Nature and of Providence, and which have become in modern times, at once the stumbling-blocks of faith and the strongholds of unbelief.

It will suffice to appeal, by way of illustration, to the direct or incidental allusions which we find in the New Testament to the account of the creation, as contained in the first and second chapters of Genesis (Mark x. 6—9; Col. iii. 10; 1 Tim. ii. 13); of the temptation and the fall as contained in the third chapter of the same book (Rom. v. 14; 1 Cor. xv. 22; 1 Tim. ii. 14); of the flood, as recorded in the sixth and following chapters (Luke xvii. 27; 2 Peter ii. 5); of the appearance in the bush, as recorded in Exod. iii. 2 (Mark xii. 26; Acts vii. 30); of the miracles in Egypt and the Red Sea, as recorded in the early chapters of the book of Exodus (Acts vii. 36; xiii. 7; Heb. xi. 28, 29); of the miraculous supply of manna from heaven, and of water from the smitten rock, as contained in the fourteenth and seventeenth chapters of that book (1 Cor. x. 3,4); of Baalam's ass speaking with human voice, as recorded in Numb. xxii. (2 Peter ii. 16); of the miraculous destruction of Jericho, as recorded in Joshua vi. (Heb. xi. 30); of the restoration to life of the son of the woman of Sarepta by Elijah, as recorded in 1 Kings xvii., and of the son of the Shunammitish woman by Elisha, as recorded in 2 Kings vi. (Heb. xi. 35); of the rescue of the three children of the captivity from the fury of the flames, as recorded in Dan. iii. (Heb. xi. 34), and of Daniel from the den of lions, as recorded in Dan. vi. (Heb. xi. 33).

But amongst all the remarkable instances recorded in the historical books of the Old Testament of deviations from the ordinary course of God's dealings with the children of men, there is probably none which has given greater offence to the unbeliever than the record of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire and brimstone from heaven, and, more particularly, that of the punishment executed upon Lot's wife. It cannot, then, be unworthy of notice that, just as in regard to God's dealings with the world at large, and with Israel in particular, those portions of Old Testament history which involve the most striking interpositions of the Divine Arm, appear to have been selected for special confirmation by our Lord and His apostles; so, in regard to the general account of the destruction of the cities of the plain, and more particularly in regard to the doom of Lot's wife, we have the most direct and explicit attestation of the truth of the sacred narrative from the lips of Him who not only selected the overthrow of Sodom as one of the special types of His own second advent, but who also selected the history of Lot's wife as one most worthy of the special consideration of His hearers. "Remember Lot's wife" (Luke xvii. 32).

The whole of Lot's history is replete with lessons both of warning and of instruction. In his original selection of the well-watered plain of the Jordan, reminding him probably of the irrigated land of Egypt which he had lately left, and in his disregard of the danger of contamination to himself and to his family from the proximity of its sinful inhabitants, we observe indications of selfishness and of worldly-mindedness which the warnings given him in Egypt ought to have repressed. In his continued abode in Sodom, after his signal deliverance from the hands of Chedorlaomer and the confederate kings, we can scarcely err in tracing indications of a like insensibility to judgment and to mercy. It is true, indeed, that his own integrity was, at least partially, maintained, and that, whilst still dwelling in Sodom, "his righteous soul was vexed from day to day with the unlawful deeds" of its inhabitants. But the fatal results of the wilful exposure of his family and his household to the "evil communications" of those amongst whom he dwelt are but too apparent in the history of Lot. When Abraham offered up his intercessory prayer that Sodom might be exempted from the impending destruction of the cities of the plain, and received in answer to that prayer the assurance that if ten righteous persons should be found in it the whole city should be spared, we may well believe that he relied, and as it should seem, not unreasonably, on that number at least being found amongst the family and the dependants of Lot.* The result, however, proved that in this, as in other cases of wilful exposure to contamination, the evil example of the wicked is much more contagious than is the consistent example of the righteous. Not only had Lot's religious life been devoid of all beneficial influence upon the inhabitants of Sodom generally, but further, whatever may have been the number of his own immediate family and near connections, his wife and his two unmarried daughters could alone be prevailed upon, and that apparently not without force (Gen. xix. 16), to accompany him in his flight; and, whilst the open mockery of those who remained behind revealed but too plainly the corruption of Sodom, the lamentable history of those who were induced to forsake it is left on record as a solemn admonition to "him that thinketh he standeth to take heed lest he fall."

At the earnest solicitation of Lot, who feared that his strength would not hold out until he could reach the mountain, the little city of Zoar was saved from the general destruction, and to this city he was urged by the angels to hasten his escape.*

It was but a small remnant which was thus brought out of Sodom, a company consisting of only four persons; but that number was destined to undergo a yet further reduction before a place of safety was reached.

In common with Lot and with his daughters, Lot's wife had escaped out of Sodom. In common with them she had heard the solemn mandate, "Escape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain." There is no ground for the supposition that there was more reluctance displayed by her than by Lot himself, or by their two daughters, in leaving Sodom. If she lingered behind her husband, as seems to be intimated in ver. 26, the same lingering is recorded of Lot also in ver. 16, and there was the same necessity in his case as in that of his wife and of his daughters, that the men should lay hold upon his hand, and should "bring him forth and set him without the city."

And yet, alike unmindful of warnings already given, of mercies already experienced, of judgment about to be executed, "his wife," we read, "looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt."

* Some idea of the ordinary extent of a patriarchal household may be gathered from the fact that Abraham was able to arm 318 persons out of the number of those who were born in his house (Gen. xiv. 14).

* Canon Tristram, in his "Land of Moab," p. 330, regards the identification of the modern Zi'ara, at the north of the Dead Sea, as one of the most important results of his expedition. The arguments in favour of the northern site of the cities of the plain have also been ably urged by Mr. Grove. On the other hand, all ancient testimony, and, in the judgment of Bishop Harold Browne (see note at end of Genesis xix. in "The Speaker's Commentary"), "local names and local evidences" are in favour of the southern site of the cities. As regards Canon Tristram's presumed identification of Zoar with Zi'ara, it may be observed (1) that the fact of its position at an elevation of 3,000 feet above the Jordan Valley appears to us to present an inconsistency with the ground on which Lot urged his request for permission to flee to it "rather than to the mountain;" and (2) that Canon Tristram's argument from the Jerusalem Targum is based upon a misconception of facts, the name of the city in that Targum, as well as in the Targum of Onkelos, being the same as in the Hebrew text. It is true that the word Zehira occurs in the Targum of Onkelos (not in that of Jerusalem), in ver. 20, which Canon Tristram has probably taken as the equivalent of Zoar, but it is the equivalent for the Hebrew word rendered "a little one," and not for that denoting the city.

It would be an unprofitable subject of investigation were we to attempt to decide upon the precise manner in which Lot's wife perished. The testimony as to the exceeding saltness of the Dead Sea, which is commonly supposed to occupy the site of the Jordan plain, is express and abundant.* Diodorus Siculus says that the masses of bitumen were like islands, covering two or three plethra: Josephus says that they were of the form and magnitude of oxen.† Ibn Ezra supposes that Lot's wife was first destroyed by fire and brimstone from heaven, and then incrusted over with salt, and the allusions to the statue or pillar of salt near the Dead Sea which are found in the writings of Josephus, Irenæus, and Tertullian, bear witness to the traditionary belief then prevalent.

The moral lessons which this narrative suggests are those of deepest interest and importance. The world in which we live presents to us the same attractions which the well-watered plain of Jordan presented to the eyes of Lot; and beguiled, like him, by its fair external aspect, we refuse to take heed of the wickedness in which it lies. Too readily those who profess to be "not of the world" adopt its customs, and become conformed to its spirit. Like Lot's wife, they see no symptoms of its impending doom, and if when warned of the speedy advent of the Judge, and the dissolution which then awaits the earth and its inhabitants, they refrain from mocking openly with their lips, they say in their hearts, "My Lord delayeth His coming;" and having once put their hands to the plough, they look back with envious gaze upon the world.

And what, it will be asked, are the excuses which men plead for thus deliberately making light of a warning as solemn as that given by the angels to Lot, of a doom as certain, and a destruction more universal? They plead, for the most part, their necessary duties, their lawful occupations, their innocent pleasures. And might not Lot's wife have pleaded the same excuses with equal or with greater reason? Was it nothing for her that she should be summoned, at a moment's notice, to leave country, kindred, and friends; a land like the Garden of Eden for beauty, and endeared, in all probability, to her by her earliest associations, and her most cherished recollections?

It may be that in that very moment in which the fatal look was cast upon the doomed city, her memory was reverting to the scenes of her childhood and her youth; and that that last longing, lingering, passionate gaze rested upon the roof beneath which she had been nurtured, and beneath which, it may be, at that same moment some of her nearest kindred were unconsciously doomed to destruction.

But, whatever the palliations of her guilt which might be urged, as they availed not in her case in justification of disobedience to a Divine command, much less will they avail in the case of those to whom clearer light is given, and to whom higher privileges are vouchsafed. "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. And he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me" (Matt. x. 37, 38). To linger in Sodom, when charged to flee from it; or having once "clean escaped" from its pollutions, to become again entangled with them in heart and in desire, are alike perilous, and, in the issue, alike destructive. The sin of Lot's wife, as recorded by the historian, and as recalled by our Lord to the minds of His hearers, consisted not in the refusal to leave Sodom, or in the actual return to it when it had been once left. The command, "Look not back," was as imperative as the command, "Escape for thy life." The sin of disobedience to the one, was as great as that of disobedience to the other; and the punishment inflicted on the disobedient look was a punishment as severe and as enduring as that which befell those who "mocked," when they were urged by Lot to escape.

Allusion has already been made to the tradition which prevailed during the early centuries of the Christian era, respecting the identity of a pillar of salt near the Dead Sea, with that into which Lot's wife was converted. The tradition probably owed its origin to the idea of perpetuity, which was, not without reason, associated with "salt." Salt, as is well known, is used in Scripture as an emblem of that which is enduring. The salt with which the minchah, or vegetable offering of flour and oil was to be seasoned (Lev. ii. 13), denoted, doubtless, the perpetuity of Jehovah's love for His people, and the unchangeableness of that covenant between Him and them which is described in Numb. xviii. 19 as a "covenant of salt."

Now, when regarded as a lesson for all times, there is a deep and most significant meaning in the "pillar of salt" into which Lot's wife was changed; and in the "brimstone, salt, and burning,"—which were the types as well as the instruments of Divine vengeance inflicted upon the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, of Admah and Zeboim. In the case of the one, our Lord's solemn charge to "remember Lot's wife" may well suffice to engrave upon the hearts, as well as the memories, of the readers of the sacred narrative. the fearful penalty of disobedience; whilst in the case of the cities of the plain generally, the perpetuity of the warning which the doom was designed to convey to the Church of all after ages is asserted in terms the most express and unqualified by St. Jude, when he declares that "they are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire" (ver. 7).

* The following is an analysis of Dead Sea water, given in Dr. Thomson's "The Land and the Book," p. 624:—"Chloride of sodium, 8; potassium, 1; calcium, 3." Another given in the same book is as follows:—"Calcium, 2½; chloride of magnesium, 10½; of potassium, 1½; of sodium, 6½."

† See the note to which reference has already been made, appended by Bishop Harold Browne to "The Speaker's Commentary" on Genesis xix.

But whilst, on the one hand, the doom of Lot's wife, when viewed, as the Book of Wisdom represents it, as "the monument of an unbelieving soul," may well suffice as a solemn warning of the peril of turning back in heart after once putting the hand to the plough; and whilst the record of the overthrow of the guilty cities stands out together with that of the Deluge as God's own sermon against sin, it is well worthy of observation that the unwillingness of God to give up His people, though they be prone to forsake Him, and His longsuffering and forbearance towards them even when they deserve punishment, are set forth by the prophet Hosea in figures derived from the history of two of those very cities of the plain whose history is so pregnant with warning. Having set forth, in the preceding portion of the chapter, the waywardness and perversity of Israel, their proneness to forsake the service of the living God, and to burn incense to graven images, Jehovah, speaking by His servant Hosea, sets forth in the words which follow His determination to stay the execution of His vengeance, and in wrath to remember mercy: "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim? mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together. I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger. I will not return to destroy Ephraim: for I am God, and not man; the Holy One in the midst of thee: and I will not enter into the city" (Hosea xi. 8, 9).

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER X.

"RATHER an unexpected meeting, Mr. Atherstone," said the outspoken Squire Northcote with his genial laugh, as they walked down the avenue together. "I dare say you did not look to find me at Vale House so early, and I certainly did not anticipate seeing you as a young lady's escort at this time in the morning."

"An accidental encounter," said Atherstone, so grimly that Mr. Northcote hurriedly changed the subject, and plunged into explanations as to his own proceedings, which had he paused for reflection he would probably have withheld.

"Colonel Dysart asked me to come and advise him about his will, which he wishes to draw up in the course of the next few days, while Mr. Cunliffe is with him."

"Who is Mr. Cunliffe?"

"An Australian judge, who came over in the same ship with him from the Cape. It seems Dysart has some property in Australia, which he has never seen, and he thinks this man can advise him as to the proper testamentary disposal of it, so he has asked him to come and visit him for a few days, and he wishes me to be one of his executors."

"Is Colonel Dysart feeling ill, that he is making these preparations?"

"Not worse than usual, I imagine; but he tells me he has some malady which is likely to carry him off suddenly, though he may live for years yet. Of course, his only anxiety is about his daughter, to whom he wishes to secure this property."

"What would become of her if he died?"

"She has some relations on the mother's side to whom she could go, I believe, though she has never made acquaintance with them. But Dysart naturally expects she will marry and have a home of her own; and I should think there could be no doubt that she will, for she is an uncommonly pretty, attractive girl," added the squire, glancing at his friend. But when Mr. Atherstone spoke again it was to ask, with much apparent solicitude for Mr. Northcote's comfort, how he came to be on foot at such a distance from his home.

"My horse cast a shoe, and the groom took him to the blacksmith's; but here he is bringing him to meet me. I say, Atherstone," he continued, after he was mounted and ready to start, "the Dysarts are coming to dine with us the day after to-morrow, and they bring their guest with them; will you join us? I fancy this Cunliffe is a shrewd old fellow, well worth knowing."

For a moment Atherstone stood irresolute, with a frown on his face, as if he were in a sort of angry perplexity; then, with an impatient stamp of his foot on the ground, he turned impulsively to Mr. Northcote and said, "I will come with the greatest pleasure, Mr. Northcote. What is your hour?—seven? Thank you; I shall not fail to appear;" and therewith the men shook hands and parted.

"Bless me!" exclaimed Mr. Northcote to himself as he trotted away, "what on earth will Mrs. Northcote say? she has such a horror of Atherstone nowadays; and I never dreamt he would come. What possessed me to ask him?—old habit, I suppose. Well, the deed is done, and cannot be undone. I must do the best I can with her;" and thus philosophically making up his mind to endurance, the oppressed squire trotted on to his doom.

Never in all her life had Una Dysart felt so restless as she did during the remainder of this day. It might have been supposed that after her fatiguing walk in the morning she would have been glad to have rested in peace; but instead of that, if she attempted to sit still for five minutes, her impatient little feet seemed to carry her off in spite of herself. From room to room she flitted like an unquiet spirit, tormenting her father by her efforts to make him leave the papers with which he was occupied; then making wild proposals to go and meet Mr. Cunliffe at the station, to which plan Colonel Dysart strongly objected; and finally, in spite of the heavy rain which had quenched the brightness of the morning, and made it seem to her more like a sunny, far-off dream than a reality, she determined to go and visit Lilith Crichton, whom she had not seen since the cricket match a few days previously.

Una had often thought with great wonder and distress of the strange state of suffering in which she had found the rector's sister, by the river-side, on that occasion; but after the few words already recorded which Lilith had spoken when first taken by surprise, she had said nothing which could explain the seemingly unnecessary pain she was inflicting both on herself and Rupert Northcote. Their marriage had been considered an almost certain event by every one who knew them, including Rupert's own family, for with his usual cool nonchalance he had spoken quite openly of his wishes respecting Lilith, and she herself had seemed too entirely childlike and simple to make any concealment of the fact that she returned his affection with the utmost devotion. Yet there could be no question that she had refused to be his wife, and had flung all her hopes of happiness to the winds, on that sunny summer's day, when she stood with him beneath the shade of the drooping willows, while the river at their feet flowed onward to the sea, with its plaintive, ceaseless murmur, like the voice of a never-dying regret.

Rupert Northcote had left the cricket field immediately after he passed Miss Dysart in such hot haste, and it became known that he had gone that same evening to London, where it was supposed he still remained, as he had not reappeared in Northangleshire; while Lilith, abruptly quitting Una, had sought out her brother Richard, and besought him to take her home at once. This the rector had done with the utmost alacrity, being only too glad to escape from that peculiar phase of his duties which he was at the time performing with infinite labour, as he tried in his stiff, awkward manner to join in the amusements of his parishioners.

From that hour Lilith had shut herself up in the rectory, and had been seen by no one—even Una had been excluded, although their intimacy had ripened into a strong friendship, and she felt by no means certain that Lilith would receive her even now. Anything was better than staying at home, however, so, wrapped in a long waterproof cloak, she battled her way through wind and rain to the parsonage gate. Here she encountered the rector, who had just arrived from the opposite direction, and he welcomed her with a warmth very unusual to him, and said he was truly glad she had come to see his sister, as she did not appear to be well, and was certainly too much alone. Without consulting Lilith at all, he took Miss Dysart at once into the room where she was, and left them alone together.

For a moment Una stood looking in silence at the young girl, who did not seem conscious of her entrance. Lilith was sitting at the window, framed in by the heavy crimson curtains which hung on either side of her, and so perfectly still and motionless that she looked in her white dress much more like a marble statue set in a niche than a living human being. Her fair face had the waxen purity of a white camellia—entirely without colour, and wearing an expression of passionless calm, such as is rarely seen except on the face of the dead, who have done for ever with the world and its cares. An open book lay upon her knee; but her hands were clasped over the unread pages, and her blue eyes, fixed and dim, gazed out through the window with a vacant look, which showed that they saw nothing of the objects to which they were turned.

She slowly rose as Una came towards her, and yielded passively to her embrace, without any of the eager affection she had always hitherto shown to her friend, and then dropped back into her seat and turned again to the window, as if to resume her gaze on the unseen far-off vision which seemed to occupy her. Una hardly knew how to address her; she was so unlike the loving, childlike Lilith who had always welcomed her with eagerness, and spoken so freely of all the little interests of her life; of Rupert Northcote, it is true, they had not often talked, for Una respected her delicate reserve on the subject which lay so near her heart; but there had been a tacit understanding between them that Lilith would certainly one day be his wife.

Determined at last to break the oppressive silence in any way, Una began to speak of the gay little flower-garden which lay spread out before the windows, and had been one of Lilith's favourite amusements.

"I see your gardener has been making some alterations," she said; "I hope you did not forget to tell him to carry out my special wish, and have a bed prepared to be entirely filled with snowdrops next spring."

"Hervey told him, I believe," said Lilith in a low, measured tone.

"Then, when the time comes for them to appear, you will have a multitude of little likenesses of yourself just under the window. You will only have to look at them, to know exactly how you appear to us commonplace mortals."

"I shall not see them," said Lilith.

"Why not? have you any plan for travelling next year?"

"No; but I shall not see them—because I shall be dead," she answered composedly.

"My darling! what are you saying?"

"Yes, it is true; and I am very glad of it."

"Oh, Lilith! you must not speak in that wild way; you are simply depressed and morbid. You will live to a good old age, I hope and believe."

"Do you remember the little singing bird Rupert shot?" said Lilith, turning her great blue eyes, with their unnatural calm, on Una's face.

"I remember the dead bird on the hill-side, you pitied so much; but we do not know that Mr. Northcote shot it, do we?"

"Yes, it was his hand that killed it; he told me he was out with his gun in that very place a few hours before we went to it, and for want of better sport, he took aim at a little bird soaring up through the sunny air on its happy wings, and brought it down all faint and wounded to the earth, where it beat about, helpless and quivering, till it died."

"He might have been better employed, certainly; but why think about that poor little bird now, Lilith? I am afraid it only shared the fate of thousands in this sporting county."

"Doubtless; and so shall I; but I shall die as that bird did, Una." She spoke with such a set, rigid face, and so much quiet certainty, that it seemed impossible to answer her.

Happily Una was spared the necessity; a quick, eager step came to the door, and Hervey dashed into the room, his handsome face glowing with excitement and pleasure.

CHAPTER XI.

"WHAT wonderful good fortune to see you here, Miss Dysart!" exclaimed Hervey Crichton, as he found the two girls together. "Who could ever have hoped for such a visitor on this miserable day? and I so nearly escaped missing you altogether!"

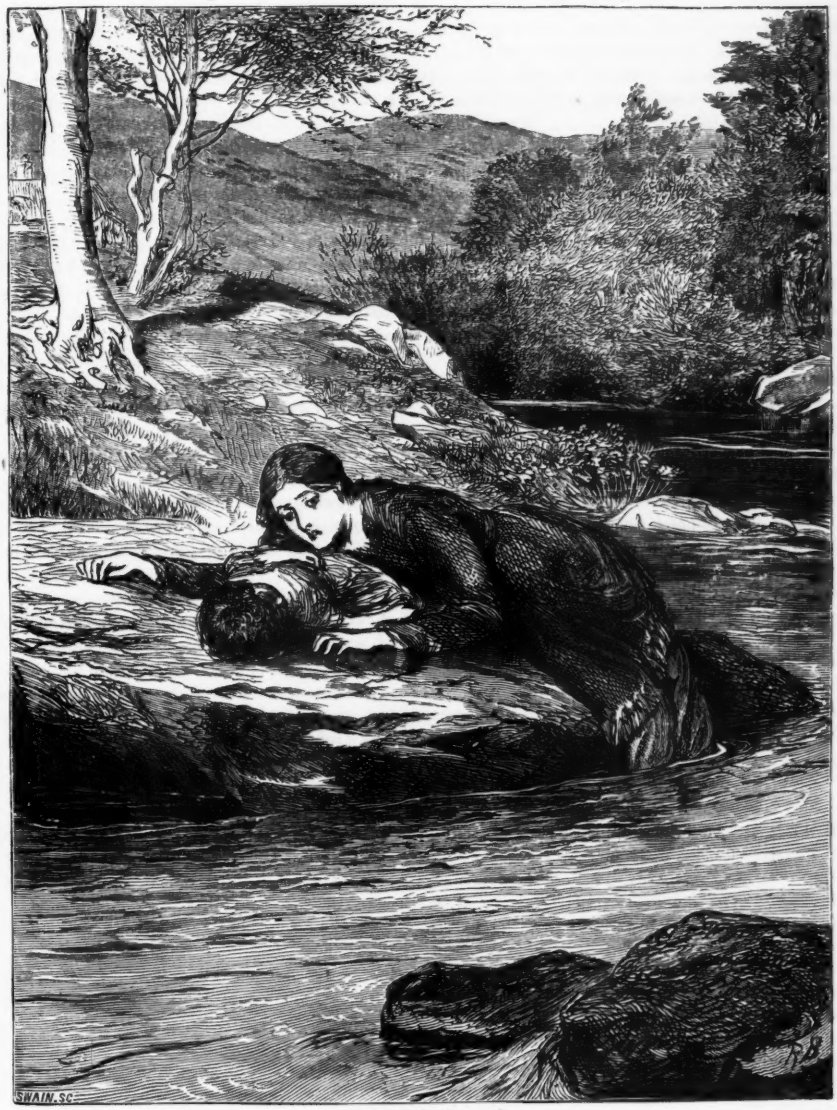
"That would have been a tremendous misfortune," said Una. "How were you saved from the fatal occurrence?"

"By the good offices of an old fairy, in the shape of Martha, Lilith's ancient nurse, who now acts as the benevolent guardian of the whole family. Would you like to know what she said? She came to me, when I was lounging in the verandah in a state of the deepest despondency, and solemnly remarked, 'Muster Hervey, you doesn't know what I thinks you'd like to know—as how Miss Dysart's in the drawing-room, bless her pretty face.' She is gifted with penetration, you see; and I repaid her kind offices by nearly upsetting her altogether, for I flung my arms about wildly in my surprise, and I believe I jumped over her; but anyhow, here I am."

"Well, I am glad I am in her good graces," said Una; "she is the dearest old woman possible. But, Mr. Crichton, why do you not take better care of Lilith? she is looking very ill."

"I only wish I could," he said, "but she baffles me in every way; she has become a regular sphinx. However, it must do her good to have you with her, Miss Dysart; I hope you will come to us as much as you can. We have not shown you half the wonders of our neighbourhood yet, and we are sure to have fine weather for walking or riding parties after this rain. By-the-way, there is one expedition you must positively make; you have never yet seen the 'Eagles' Nest.'"

"Yes, I have," said Una, a sudden gravity settling on her bright laughing face.



"You do not mean to say so!" exclaimed Hervey, looking much surprised; "when, and how? In what possible way did you get up the cliff?—not alone surely?"

"Alone, on my own two feet, as I told you I should," said Una; "but it was an exploit entirely of my private arranging, and I do not mean to tell you anything about it, Mr. Crichton."

"Did you see the spirit of Fulke Atherstone, as you expected?" said Lilith, suddenly turning her white face towards them.

For a moment Una remained silent, with a rather strange expression in her eyes, then she said, "I almost think I did."

"What a pity you must say 'almost,' Miss Dysart," said Hervey, "otherwise we might hope for quite an orthodox ghost story; but if he was visible in any shape, did you ask him to tell you what your future fate is to be? I hope if he did reveal it, he mentioned me," continued he, dropping his voice to a low whisper on the last words; not so low, however, but that Una might have heard him, had she not been absorbed in the thoughts to which his careless question had given rise. Her future fate! Had not the voice she had heard at the "Eagles' Nest" been prophetic at least of a great change in her existence? Could the world ever again wear the same aspect to her as in the days that closed but yesterday—when it seemed a realm all sunshine and brightness, with free airs blowing through it, and shining rivers bearing joyous spirits on through banks of flowers to the haven of a deep, serene sea? Could it ever look thus again, when the great cloud that hung over Humphrey Atherstone's life had cast its shadow on her path, and made her feel that to disperse that gloom for him, in ever so partial a degree, were a fate more desired by her than all the visions of a happy love, which once had charmed her girlish fancy? She remained silent, thinking on these things, with thoughtful eyes and serious lips, while Hervey Crichton watched her anxiously.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"Where she sank down exhausted"—p. 539.

At last he spoke. "I really believe the ghost did foretell your future fate, Miss Dysart; you look so serious."

"Yes, I believe he did," she answered very gravely, turning her eyes full upon him. Then she rose somewhat abruptly, and saying she would come to see how Lilith was very soon again, she took her leave, declining Hervey's escort in her homeward walk.

Mr. Cunliffe duly arrived next day; he was an astute, hard-headed lawyer, who had so long been employed in administering justice with that inflexible impartiality which is the special characteristic of English judges, that he had become exceedingly expert in adjusting the balance between the intricate developments of good and evil, as they appear in the complex human nature; and Colonel Dysart thought very wisely that he could have no better guardian of his daughter's interests in the event of his own death. He had, therefore, asked Mr. Cunliffe to become trustee for her property, as well as his own executor, jointly with Mr. Northcote. Of course these arrangements involved the transaction of a good deal of business, and Una was left quite to her own devices, while the two gentlemen were closeted with Mr. Knight in Colonel Dysart's study the whole afternoon.

The rain of the previous day had been succeeded by brilliant sunshine, which tempted Una to spend the afternoon out of doors; but not caring to ride without her father, she started off to take a solitary walk by the river-side. She passed through the village, keeping out of sight of the rectory, as she did not wish to be joined by Hervey Crichton, which was an event pretty sure to happen, if he chanced to perceive her at any distance.

After leaving the last cottages in the little street behind her, the road, or rather path which skirted the river, entered on a wild uncultivated district, where a far-off, lonely little house was the only sign of human habitation. Una met no one whatever, as she walked along, absorbed in her own thoughts, and the whole tract of country seemed entirely deserted, excepting by a peasant lad who was herding cows in a distant field.

Just as she came in a line with the solitary cottage, however, she saw a child standing on the river-bank, who irresistibly attracted her attention. He was a little boy about four or five years old, and he was entirely occupied in watching the fate of a vessel he had just launched on the river, in the shape of his own little tin drinking-cup, freighted with cowslips; but his peculiar appearance, with his keen dark eyes, olive complexion, and the spiral black ringlets hanging round his head, enabled Una at once to recognise him as the child of Edwards and the beautiful gipsy, who had gazed at her so intently on the day of the cricket match. Everything connected with this man had a sort of horrible fascination for Una, not only on account of the singular aversion she had felt towards him on the first occasion when she had seen him, but because she knew by instinct that he was the object of the deep undying hatred, which Atherstone had told her was the one great element in his life. She drew near to the child, therefore, and asked him if he were there quite alone, in the soft low tones which were usually found so winning by all who heard them. They seemed, however, to have quite the contrary effect on this strange-looking boy. He started aside like a little wild animal, and then, when he thought himself at a safe distance, he glanced out of the corners of his eyes at Una with a sly scrutiny, which invested the childish face with a look of preternatual old age and cunning. She felt only the more anxious to make some sort of acquaintance with him; so in order to reassure him, she went and sat down under a tree, and appeared to take no notice of him whatever. This plan succeeded. In the course of a few minutes he crept stealthily back, keeping his black eyes fixed on her, however, even when he was engaged in the rescue of his boat, which was making an undeniable shipwreck among some reeds. Gradually, however, as she neither spoke nor moved, he seemed to forget her presence altogether, and darted backwards and forwards with supple swift movements, utterly unlike those of an English child, while he collected a new cargo of leaves and blossoms, wherewith to load his tiny vessel. When it was finally arranged quite to his satisfaction, he proceeded to the very edge of the water, and launched it with an energetic push, intended to give it an impetus down the stream; but in doing so, as might have been expected, he overbalanced himself and fell headlong into the water, with a wild piercing shriek, which rang in Una's ears for many a day afterwards. The current was at this point exceedingly strong, and in another moment the poor little child was being whirled away with a rapidity which left small chance that his living body would ever be rescued from that fatal stream. But Una had started to her feet the moment the accident happened. Quickwitted, and thoroughly brave, she had seen at a glance that there was but one chance for the drowning child's rescue. Some way further down, a rock jutted out nearly to the centre of the river, and it was possible that his frightful course in the power of the foaming torrent might be stopped at that point, or at least, greatly impeded. If she could reach it before he did, she might find it practicable to save him; for she had been taught to swim like many other girls in this sensible age, and although she could not, of course, plunge into the water without great risk to herself, burdened as she was with her heavy clothes, she did not hesitate for a moment to make the attempt. She started instantly along the river-bank at her utmost speed, flinging off her hat and jacket as she ran, to give a little more freedom to her movements, and she succeeded in reaching the rock, before the river had brought its burden quite to that point; it was very near, however. The gleam of colour in the midst of the foam made by the little red frock, was all she could see—and it was within a few yards of her, as she sprang without hesitation into the stream, and struck out boldly towards it. For a few minutes she struggled on, gasping, toiling against the fierce current, weighed down by her clinging garments, and half blinded by the spray dashing over the stones. She felt almost in despair, and it seemed to her quite like a miracle, when just as the sinking child was being borne past her, she was able with a sudden effort to catch hold of his clothes, and then exerting all her fast-failing strength, she succeeded in dragging both herself and him on to the rock, where she sunk down exhausted, half in and half out of the water. For some little time she remained thus, grasping the child tightly with one hand, while she maintained herself in her perilous position with the other; but gradually she rallied from the almost overpowering effect of her great exertions, and crawling along the slippery rock she gained the river-bank with her burden, and soon found herself once more on the path she had so abruptly quitted. Then for the first time she was able to look at the child, and she saw with dismay that his eyes were closed, and he was quite insensible, if not dead. She glanced wildly round for help, and perceived with infinite satisfaction that the boy who had been tending the cattle in the field at some little distance, had seen the accident, and was now making his way towards her. She told him hurriedly, as soon as he reached her, that he must run for the doctor as fast as he could, and asked him if he knew where the child's parents lived.

"Sure and I do; it's little gipsy Edwards," he answered; "they lives up yonder, all by theirselves;" and he pointed to the lonely house Una had noticed as she came along.

"Then I will take the child there, and you must go and bring the doctor. Tell him Miss Dysart sent you. You know where Dr. Burton lives, I suppose?"

"A babby might know that," said the boy, who was a somewhat uncouth specimen of the British peasant; "but will you mind the cows, whiles I be gone?"

"Never mind the cows," said Una, laughing, in spite of her anxiety about the child; "I will pay you well, only go quickly."

This assurance reached even the remote gleams of intelligence which were existent somewhere within the lad's thick skull, and he started off at once in the direction of Valehead.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XI. CHRIST TEACHING BY PARABLES.

Chapter to be read—Luke xv.

INTRODUCTION. (Read 1—3.) Remind of the circumstances of the last lesson—a crowd gathered on sea-shore; Christ pointing to sower, &c. Now again a crowd—of whom composed? Explain that publicans were tax-gatherers, noted for extortion; hence, John the Baptist's rebuke (Luke iii. 12); mostly rich, but of bad repute: these open, notorious sinners now gathered together. Who made objections, and why? What standard of morality did Christ set up? Remind of lesson on Sermon on Mount; yet professing to be so pure, Christ sat down with open sinners. Why? Ask His mission; the meaning of His name Jesus. Who require salvation? Remind of parable of Pharisee and Publican praying (Luke xviii. 11). Which, then, were those Christ came to save?

I. SOMETHING LOST. (Read ver. 4, 8, 12—19.) Point out that in all the parables something was lost. What was the difference? one out of one hundred, ten, two. Show the different ways in which they were lost. (a) Do sheep know any better than to stray after food, &c., which may appear tempting? Then whom do they resemble? Show how the hundred sheep are like the masses of heathen who have not heard of Christ. Remind how all are called God's sheep because made by Him (Ps. c. 3), though may not recognise Him as Shepherd. (John x. 16). Become lost when err from His ways, go after lusts and pleasures of this world, &c. What do they lose? Show from the analogy of a sheep-fold that they lose the loving care, guidance, heavenly food and drink (John iv. 10, vi. 56) given by the Good Shepherd. (b) Then ask about the piece of money. What is a coin? Whose image does it bear, and of what use is it? Who lost this coin, and how? Show that, as result of this carelessness, the image of king would be defaced, and the coin itself be useless. Ask in whose image man was originally made (Gen. i. 26); how has he lost it? Show that, like tarnished coins, sometimes man so defaced by sin as to have lost all likeness to God. Whose fault is this? Suppose parents do not train up children in fear of God, whose fault is it if lost? Remind of duty of all to let light shine before men; to influence others for good, lest their fall be laid to our charge (Matt. xviii. 7). (c) From the third parable, show the son of own free will deliberately leaving father, home, happiness, in search of own pleasures; describe his gradually falling into want; a stranger in strange land; his false friends leaving him when money spent; in danger of starving; thankful for most menial employment. Show the misery of a sinner; left the love and favour of God for things which can give no lasting happiness. Remind of Rich Fool, and Dives in parable. Show how riches and earthly favour and bodily pleasures can give no lasting satisfaction. Such a man by his own fault lost.

II. THE SEARCH. (Read ver. 4, 8, 18—20.) Again show the difference in the parables. (a) The shepherd, missing his sheep, going in search. Ask for texts about the love of Christ in leaving heaven to come and seek us. Let the children note the greatness of sin which needed, and of love which prompted, such salvation. (b) The woman lighting the candle, searching nooks and corners. Show the resemblance to the Church of Christ alive to her duty, by means of God's Word (Ps. cxix. 105) searching for lost souls: make this practical by showing how children may try and bring back any over whom they have had bad influence. Let all example and influence be now for Christ, so may have reward of those who win souls (Dan. xii. 3). (c) In the Prodigal Son. Show how God as Father was watching for signs of returning life—was looking out for son; before son had time for full confession the Father was kissing him, and treating him as a son once more. Let children learn how God is eager for them to turn to Him; how He marks each step; but let them note His requirements—heart-felt confession and true repentance (1 John i. 9). For examples of such, remind of David (Ps. li. 1—3), Peter, and others.

III. THE LOST FOUND. (Read 5—7, 10, 22—32.) Picture out (from the well-known picture) the sheep found, faint, bleeding, laid on shoulders, brought home, once more safe in the fold; the joy of all. Also the coin found at last, the dirt rubbed off, again put in circulation. Ask when will be safe for ever—no more go out, no more dangers—enemies, &c.; but not to be idle—have to serve God, be useful (Rev. xxii. 3); but will always wear renewed image of King—i.e., be like Him (1 John iii. 2). Show how angels (like real friends) interested in all that concerns Christ—share His joy at conversion of a sinner, as did His return to heaven (Ps. lxviii. 18). Turning to third parable, ask who disliked the merry-makings, and why? Notice his boast of perpetual obedience; was it likely to be true? What was his feeling? Show what a deadly sin this envy; remind of its leading the chief priests to desire Christ's death. From ver. 1, 2 show who were meant by Christ in description of elder brother. For their privileges, see Rom. ix. 4, 5, yet jealous of favour to Gentiles. Point out the Father entreating the elder son, as Christ yearned over Jerusalem (Matt. xxiii. 37).

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) God's call to sinners. Ask who were saved in each case; so must realise our lost state, or else cannot be saved. If puffed up with idea of our goodness, &c., are not in state to receive salvation. Right state is that of blind man, "Jesus, master, have mercy." (2) God's love to sinners. Show how in each case search was continued till thing found. So God will not leave alone; He able, ready, willing to forgive all who come to Him. (3) God's joy for sinners. All restored to previous condition before fell. Place in fold; of use to King; home in Father's house. Surely will make us more anxious about our salvation.

Questions to be answered.

1. For whom were these three parables spoken, and on what occasion?
2. Point out the different ways in which the three were lost.
3. What is meant by the piece of money? Show the resemblance.
4. Describe the state of the prodigal. How is it a picture of a sinner?
5. What does the parable teach as to the angels?
6. What are the three practical lessons to be learned?

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

VIII.—CASTING BREAD UPON THE WATERS.

ONE of the old Saxon commentators on the Holy Scriptures, in referring to the passage, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and it shall be found after many days," ventures to suggest as a meaning—"Give succour to poor and afflicted seamen." Whatever may be the conclusions of critical Biblical expositors, there can be no doubt that the pious annotator was right in a true—that is, in a spiritual interpretation of the text.

Should it be necessary to appeal twice to the English nation—which has, as it were, a savour of sea-salt in its very blood—to hold out a helping hand for those who, having struggled to keep our dominion by carrying the flag of British commerce all round the world, are themselves flung ashore, weak, old, and helpless, dependent on the goodwill of their countrymen to take them into some quiet harbour, where they may, as it were, be laid up in ordinary and undergo some sort of repairs, even though they should never again be able to go a voyage? It is with feelings of something like regret that an average Englishman sees the old hull of a sea-going boat lie neglected and uncared for on the beach. Not without a pang can we witness the breaking up of some stout old ship no longer seaworthy. Yet, unhappily, we have hitherto given scant attention to the needs of those old and infirm seamen, who having for many years contributed out of their wages to the funds of the Naval Hospital at Greenwich, and having been again mulcted of some subscriptions which were to have been specially devoted to found an asylum for themselves, are left with little to look forward to but the workhouse ward when, crippled, sick, or feeble with age, they could no longer tread the deck or crack a biscuit.

It is true that there are now hospitals or sick-asylums in connection with some of the sailors' homes at our seaports, and to the general hospitals any sailor can be admitted if he should be able to procure a letter from a governor. The 'tween decks of the Dreadnought no longer form the sole hospital for invalided merchant seamen in the Port of London; but even reckoning all that has been done for sailors, and fresh from a visit to that great building where three hundred hale and hearty seamen of the great mercantile navy find a home, we are left to wonder that so little has been accomplished for those old tars who, having lived for three score years or more, going to and fro upon the great deep, can find no certain anchorage, except within the walls of some union where they may at last succeed in claiming a settlement. Surely there is no figure which occupies a more prominent place in English history than that of the sailor—not the man-o'-war's man" only—but the merchant seaman, the descendant of those followers of the great old navigators who were called "merchant adventurers," and who practically founded for Great Britain new empires beyond the sea. In the poetry, the songs, the literature, the political records, the social chronicles, the domestic narratives of England, the sailor holds a place, and even at our holiday seasons, when our children cluster on the shingly shore or the far-stretching brown sands of the coast, we find still that we belong to a nation of which the sailor long stood as the chosen representative. Nay, in the midst of the life of a great city we cannot fail to be reminded of the daring and the enterprise which has helped to make London what it is.

The poet, who, standing on the bridge at midnight, and listening to the chime of the hour, found his imagination occupied with serious images and his memory with solemn recollections, would have been no less moved to profound contemplation had he been a temporary occupant of one of the great structures that span the silent highway of the Thames. There is something in the flow of a broad and rapid stream which has a peculiar association with thoughts of the struggle and toil of human life, and as we look on the ever-moving tide, we ask ourselves what have we done for the brave old toilworn men who, having seen the wonders of the great deep for so many years, and who have brought so much to us that we can scarcely speak of food or drink without some reminder of their toilsome lives and long voyages? Well, a little has been done,—very little when we reflect how much yet remains to be accomplished; and yet much, regarded as a fair opportunity for doing a great deal more. I have already recounted some part of the sad story of what a provident Government did when it thought to undertake the affairs of poor improvident Jack. How it collected his money, and neglected to give him the benefit of the enforced subscription; how it administered and laid claim to his poor little effects and arrears of pay, if he died abroad and nobody came forward to establish a right to them; how it demanded additional contributions from his monthly wages, in order to show him how to establish a relief fund; and how somehow the scheme went "by the board" (of Trade), and the balance of the money was lost in the gulf of the estimates.

As long ago as 1860 it became clear to a number of leading merchants, shipowners, and officers of the mercantile marine that nothing was to be looked for from the State when the subject of making an effort to provide for aged and infirm sailors was again urgently brought forward; but it was determined to make a definite movement, and "The Shipwrecked Mariners' Society," which had then 40,000 officers and seamen among its subscribers, was appealed to as a body having the power to form the required association.

It was not till 1867, however, that the actual work of providing an asylum for old sailors was commenced. The society had then put down the sum of £5,000 as a good beginning, a committee had been appointed, of which the late honoured Paymaster Francis Lean was the indefatigable honorary secretary, and Captain Thomas Tribe the secretary, while the list of patrons, presidents, vice-presidents, and supporters included many eminent noblemen and gentlemen who took a true interest in the undertaking.

Several public meetings were held, and "a pension and widows' fund" was first established. Then the committee began to look about them for a suitable house in which to begin their real business, and had their attention directed to a large building at that time for sale, situated on the breezy height above Erith, and formerly well known as the residence of Sir Culling Eardley, who had named it Belvidere. The property, including twenty-three acres of surrounding land, cost £12,148, and £5,000 having already been subscribed, the balance of £7,148 was borrowed at five per cent. interest. Not till the 5th of May, 1866, however, was the institution inaugurated and handed over to a committee of management.

It is admirably suggestive of its present occupation, this fine roomy old mansion, standing on the sheltered side, but near the top, of the lofty eminence, whence such a magnificent view may be obtained, not only of the surrounding country, but of the mighty river where it widens and rushes towards the sea. Here on the broad sloping green, where the tall flagstaff with its rigging supports the Union Jack, the old fellows stroll in the sun or look out with a knowing weather-eye towards the shipping going down stream, or sit to smoke and gossip on the bench beneath their spreading tree opposite the great cedar, while the cow of the institution chews the cud with a serious look, as though it had someway caught the thoughtful expression that characterises "turning a quid." A hundred infirm sailors, each of whom is more than sixty years old, are serenely at their moorings in that spacious square-built house, where the long wards are divided into cabins, each with its neat furniture, and many of them ornamented with the curious nick-nacks, and strange waifs and strays of former voyages which sailors like to have about them. There is of course a sick-ward, where those who are permanently disabled, or are suffering from illness, receive medical attention and a special diet; but the majority of the inmates are comparatively hearty still, though they are disabled, and can no longer "hand reef and steer."

There are a hundred inmates in this admirable asylum, and ninety pensioners who are with their friends at the various outports of the kingdom, each receiving a pension of £1 a month, called the "Mariners' National Pension Fund," the working management of which, with the "Widows' Annuity Fund," is made over to the "Shipwrecked Mariners' Society."

A hundred and ninety worn-out and disabled seamen now provided for or assisted, and a total of 290 relieved since the opening of the institution. A good and noble work truly. But can it be called by so great a name as National, when we know how large a number of old sailors are yet homeless, and that at the last election there were 153 candidates who could not be assisted because of the want of funds to relieve their distress? Looking at the number of men (2,000 to 5,000) lost at sea or by shipwreck every year, and at the inquiry which has been made, through the efforts of Mr. Plimsoll and others, with respect to the conditions under which the service of the mercantile marine of this country is carried on, is it not a reproach to us that during the eighteen years since this institution was founded, so little has been done? Year by year it has been hoped that the Board of Trade would relinquish its claim to take possession of the effects of sailors dying abroad, and would transfer the £1,200 a year represented by this property to the funds of the society, but hitherto the committee have waited in vain. The donations from all sources are comparatively few; and though the annual subscriptions are numerous, they are rapidly absorbed.

Many masters, mates, seamen, engineers and firemen pay to this institution a subscription of five shillings a year, for which they have a vote at each annual election; or any such subscriber may leave his votes to accumulate for his own benefit when he shall have reached the age of sixty years, and becomes a candidate for admission.

One-fifth of the candidates admitted are nominated by the committee on the ground of their necessities or special claims to the benefit of the charity, while general subscribers or donors have privileges of election according to the amount contributed. Perhaps one of the most touching records of the subscription list is, that not only did the cadets of the mercantile training-ship Worcester contribute something like £100 in the last official year, but that the little fellows on board the union training-ship Goliath lying off Grays, have joined their officers and their commander, Captain Bourchier, to send four offerings to the aid of the ancient mariners, of whom they are the very latest representatives. On many a good ship these small collections are made for the same object, and at the Sailors' Home in Well Street there is a box for stray contributions; but much more has yet to be done. Perhaps it is far to go to see this great house on the hill, but most of us have caught a glimpse of its tall towers and its flagstaff in our excursions down the silent highway of London's river, and it might be well to think how little effort is required to give to each cabin its inmate, and to fill the dining-room with tables, each with its "mess" of six or eight old salts, who are ready to greet you heartily if you pay them a visit, and to salute you with a grave seamanlike respect. Would you like to know how this rare old crew lives in the big house under the lee of the wind-blown hill? To begin with, the men who are not invalids turn out at eight in winter and half-past seven in summer, and after making beds and having a good wash, go down to prayers and breakfast at nine or half-past eight, breakfast consisting of coffee or cocoa and bread-and-butter. At ten o'clock the ward-men, who are appointed in rotation, go to clean wards and make all tidy, each inmate being, however, responsible for the neatness of his own cabin, in which nobody is allowed to drive nails in bulkheads or walls, and no cutting or carving of woodwork is permitted. The men not for the time employed in tidying up or airing bedding, &c., can, if they choose, go into the industrial ward, where they can work at several occupations for their own profit, as they are only charged for cost of materials. Dinner is served in the several messes by the appointed messmen at one o'clock, and consists on Sundays of roast beef, vegetables, and plum-pudding, and on weekdays of roast or boiled meat, soup, vegetables, with one day a week salt fish, onions, potatoes, and plain suet-pudding, and in summer an occasional salad. A pint of beer is allowed for each man. The afternoon may be devoted either to work, or to recreation in the reading and smoking rooms, or in the grounds. Tea and bread-and-butter are served at half past five in summer and at six in winter, and there is often a supper of bread-and-cheese and watercresses or radishes. The evening is devoted to recreation, and at half-past nine in winter, and ten in summer, after prayers, lights are put out, and every one retires for the night. None of the inmates are expected to work in the industrial wards, and of course there are various servants and attendants, all of whom are chosen by preference from the families of sailors, or have themselves been at sea. The whole place is kept so orderly, and everything is so ship-shape, that there is neither waste nor confusion, and yet every man there is at liberty to go in and out when he pleases, on condition of being in at meal-times, and at the time for evening prayers, any one desiring to remain away being required to ask permission of the manager. It must be mentioned, too, that there is an allowance of ninepence a week spending money for each inmate.

The men are comfortably clothed, in a decent sailorly fashion, and many of the old fellows have still the bright, alert, active look that belongs to the "smart hands," among whom some of them were reckoned nearly half a century ago. The most ancient of these ancient mariners at the time of my first visit was ninety-two years old, and it so happened that I saw him on his birthday. He came up the broad flight of stairs to speak to me, with a foot that had not lost all its lightness, while the eye that was left to him (he had lost one by accident twenty years before) was as bright and open as a sailor's should be. This is a long time ago, and William Coverdale (that was his name) has probably gone to his rest. Significantly enough, the oldest representative of the last muster-roll was James Nelson, a master mariner of Downpatrick, eighty-five years of age; while bo's'n Blanchard is eighty-one; able seaman John Hall, eighty; William Terry (A.B.), eighty-two, and masters, mates, quartermasters, cooks, and stewards range over seventy. With many of them this is the incurable disability that keeps them ashore; the sort of complaint which is common to sailors and landsmen alike if they live long enough—that of old age. It will come one day, let us hope, to the young Prince, whom we may regard as the Royal representative of the English liking for the sea. For the asylum for old and infirm sailors at Greenhithe has not been called Belvidere for some years now. Prince Alfred went to look at it one day, and asked leave to become its patron, since which it has been called "The Royal Alfred Aged Merchant Seamen's Institution"—rather a long name, but then it ought to mean so much.

BLIND BIDDY'S STORY.

BY MRS. STANLEY LEATHES, AUTHOR OF "PENELOPE," "LETTIE DEAN," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

"PEOPLE talk of poverty coming in the way of living to God; but it was not so with my mother. The more her trouble seemed to thicken, the more she leant on the one strong Friend who could not fail her. Her love towards God was so great that she saw good in everything that happened, and would smile through her tears and work on hopefully. While we young ones were disposed to doubt and complain, she would cheer and soothe us, and rouse herself to fresh exertion and self-denial, saying sometimes, 'Children, we are but schoolboys and girls, grumbling over the hard lessons we have to learn. We do not see now how needful they are for us; and if we only set to work bravely to learn them, the difficulties will disappear. If, too, we trust our Master that He would give us nothing needless, but that each task is helping to fit us for the life before us.'

"The day I left for London was one of the mild spring days early in March. A few gillyflowers and spring-flowers were peeping out in our garden. The birds were singing as I passed down the walk to the carrier's cart by which I was to travel, to save coach-hire. They all followed me weeping, save Ralph, who tried hard to be the man. Poor father's face—I can see it now—it was so sad. It was the first break-up in our family, and it seemed like tearing away a limb from a whole body.

"The carrier was a kind of cousin of my father's, and he was very good to me, and made me a bed in the wagon, of hay, and his coats, and brought me hot coffee and toast from the houses we stopped at by the way. We travelled all night, and it was cold and weary work; and when at last we reached London, I had a racking headache, and felt altogether very wretchedly ill. This did not help to make things look pleasanter, and I thought London the most horribly dirty place imaginable. My aunt was waiting at the inn where the carrier stopped. She was a sickly, rather sad-looking person, neat in her dress, but very silent.

"'Thank God you're safe, Biddy!' she said, as she helped me out of the cart. 'It's a dreadful journey for you; but you've got a brave heart, I hope.'

"'Yes, aunt,' I said, faintly; 'but is this London?'

"'Ay, child, it is, and likely enough you think it not over-sweet and pleasant; but it matters little where we live if we have got rest in our hearts, Biddy, and a contented mind.'

"'No, aunt,' I said in a choked voice, for I could scarcely keep down my tears; and I gathered my clean skirts round me, lest they should brush against the dirty women that passed me on the pavement, and I sighed as smuts fell on my blue bonnet-strings, and on my clean collar. My Aunt Elizabeth lived, like most poor people in London, in one room of a house that had once been inhabited by gentry, but was now let off in separate rooms to many poor families. As we went in, there were dirty children playing on the stairs, and bad smells coming from the rooms; and I shrank from the walls on either side, lest they should soil my clothes. I felt almost angry, and sick with disgust at the slatternliness and dirt and withal the finery of the people whom my aunt greeted as neighbours—I who had been brought up to think dirt and untidiness to be vices!

"The room was the third floor front, and there were several pots of nasturtiums, now yellow and drooping, outside. The room itself appeared to my dainty eyes very uninviting, and I had no sooner looked round it than I dropped into the nearest chair and burst out crying.

"'Poor child,' my aunt said, 'you're overtired. Come, take off your bonnet, and have a cup of tea. It's all strange to you at first, and London's not over-pleasant to look at, but there are hard lessons to be learnt all through life, and better to begin and learn them young. This place don't look like your mother's pleasant kitchen, but it's cleaner than it looks, and I've spent many happy hours in it, and I'll do all I can to make you happy too.'

"Happy!—why, it sounded to me mere mockery to suppose any one could be happy in such a place. I tried to smile, and thank my aunt, but as I did so I looked once more round the room and saw, as I thought, its wretchedness. One little low room, smoky, and with a dirty paper upon the walls; a bed in the corner, with dusky-looking coverlet and curtains; signs of cooking and even washing being done in this one little room—for a line hung across it, and a few clothes upon it. How different they looked to the snowy white linen our mother took such pride in!

"'Oh, mother—mother!' I said, and panted for breath, for the room felt close, and I could scarcely breathe; "'oh, mother—mother! what shall I do?'

"'Biddy, Biddy, thy mother would bid thee take a brave heart with you. It's a bad look-out indeed if you're home-sick already.'

"At these words of my aunt I did indeed feel ashamed of myself, and tried to help her get the tea, after which I did a little ironing, though I longed to wash the clothes again, and bleach them on the common." (To be concluded.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

224. How frequently is "faith" defined in Holy Scripture?

225. How many times is it recorded that St. Paul used the words, "Be not weary in well doing?"

226. That St. Peter was married is incidentally mentioned both by St. Matthew and St. Paul. Give chapter and verse.

227. We read in the Apocalypse, "He that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword." Our Lord and Moses also gave expression to the same law. Quote the passages.

228. "And the people with one accord gave heed unto those things which Philip spake, hearing and seeing the miracles which he did." Who were the people referred to?

229. On what does St. Paul base his argument for a general resurrection?

230. Mention two occasions when the Lord appeared to refuse to accede to the requests made to Him, but afterwards yielded.

231. Name several occasions, as recorded by St. John, when our Lord's words were taken literally by His hearers, and consequently were misunderstood by them.

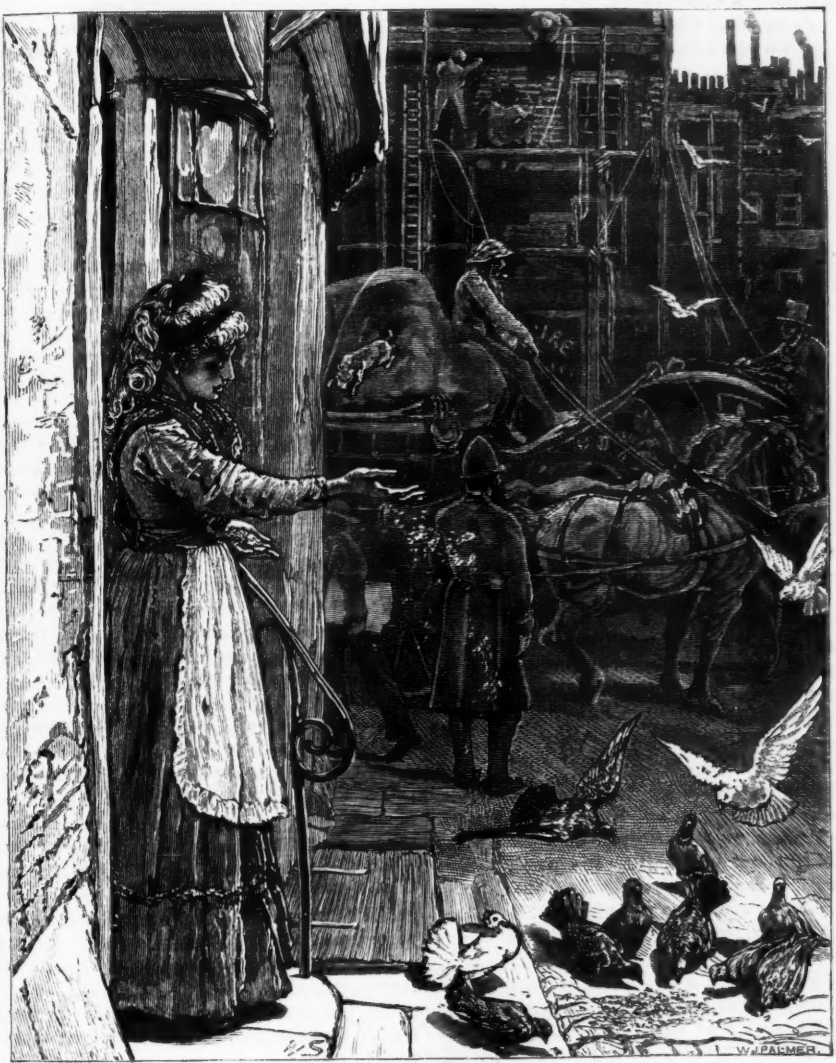
ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 512.

208. 1, The raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark v. 22—37); 2, at the transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1, 2); 3, in the garden of Gethsemane (Mark xiv. 32, 33).

209. "The Feast of Ingathering" (Exod. xxiii. 16; xxxiv. 22), which lasted seven days (Deut. xvi. 13).

210. See James i. 12; Rev. ii. 10.

211. Tirhakah. See 2 Kings xix. 9; Isa. xxxvii. 9.



212. Gen. xxviii. 18.

213. St. Mark (iii. 21).

214. Two. See Matt. xi. 2—6; Luke vii. 18—23.

215. Matt. xv. 1; Mark iii. 2; vii. 1.

216. See John ii. 14—18.

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

STREET PIGEONS.

BY THE REV. M. G. WATKINS, M.A.

IN muddy ways, midst hurrying feet,
Who loves a homely sight
May mark how pigeons haunt the street,
And learn midst his delight.

Fragments of brighter worlds they bring
To us who little reck;
A myriad sun-tints bar their wing,
A rainbow rounds their neck.

When crushing wheels or trampling hoof
Approach, they flit aside,
And puff an ampler crop aloof,
And coo with conscious pride.

Bred in a noxious court, they cheer
Some heart athirst for love,
As tumbling o'er in swift career
Through airy rings they rove.

O happy birds! we hasten by,
Oppressed with careful thought;
You with bright mien and sparkling eye
Before our ken are brought.

Thus kindly nature would allay
Our baser moods, and teach
A simpler bliss, a calmer way
Of life is in our reach;—

Would often bid us beauty see
In common guise enshrined,
And hint, whate'er our station be,
Some winged thoughts we may find.

And now the pigeons rise, and coy,
Seek a less bustling nook,
Types that the world holds fleeting joy,
When men no higher look.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

STEPHEN BOWDEN AND HIS REFLECTION.

HE was a handsome man, not very young—some two or three and thirty perhaps, and he looked and felt older. A barrister by profession, and one who had already made his mark, though, refusing to take chambers in the Temple, he still lived on in his little rooms on the ground floor in Cocke Court (which, however, was only a stone's throw off), leading the quiet life he liked best. In spite of his success, he felt disappointed in his profession, as men sometimes do when they are brought face to face with its realities, so he supplemented it with his books, and now and then he wrote a little. He had made his mark in literature too, and was known as the author of one or two articles not likely to be forgotten. A clever man was Stephen Bowden, and recognised as one; educated and thoughtful and discriminating,—something of a dreamer perhaps, yet more of a thinker, and—for it is that which brings him before us—dear beyond all measure to the heart of Margaret Ashbury. He had known Herbert Ashbury for years, and now they lived in adjoining rooms, yet they were never violently intimate. There were strong, good points in Herbert, though he was always rather a reflection of his friend's greater mind than the possessor of a distinct individuality of his own, and there is no real depth in a reflection at any time. He was a good son and a good brother; had worked hard to prepare himself for his profession, and out of the slender means he had to do so, contrived to save a sum of money which, partly from kindness and partly in the hope of gain, he lent to his uncle; but he was aware of his own virtues. He was a man who did not shirk his own acquaintanceship; he knew precisely what he could and what he could not do, neither under nor over rating himself, forgetting that his very knowledge of his own strength proved its limit. He was not conceited or arrogant, but he felt a little superior to the general run of mortals; he had no vices, he indulged in but few follies, his tastes were rather elevated, and he knew it, and felt elevated in consequence. Books and study he delighted in, and he was capable of thoroughly appreciating those whom he recognised as greater than himself; but on the other hand he was apt to feel slightly contemptuous towards those whom he did not so recognise. He reverenced great thinkers, and might have been one himself, but for his conscious endeavour to be one, and his everlasting analysis of his own progress;—he was a man who was a dreamer in his way, and loved to contemplate the heights others had gained, wondering if he also might not reach them. He worked hard at his profession, yet in his quiet moments he thought of greater aims and ends, which he never quite defined to himself, yet which he might have attained if he had not sunned himself in an imaginary consummation till he learnt to shirk the labour which realisation would involve. But all this concerned only his inner life; we all live two—the one to ourselves, the other to the world; and in his outer one he was a persevering, studious young man, with a rather contemptuous manner, and a knack of making himself coldly admired rather than warmly liked.

The two men liked each other; the one saw the good in the other, and tried to expand it; the other tried to rest on his friend's stronger character, and strengthen his own by it; and between the two there was this link which must ever be felt as one, not merely old acquaintance, but the knowledge of the estimation in which each was held by the other.

Margaret Ashbury had known her cousin's friend for about two years, and though, excepting Hetty Ashbury, no one had the slightest idea of it, was engaged to be married to him. How it had happened, and why she liked him, is perhaps best told as she herself related it to Hetty, the only person to whom she could have spoken absolutely without reserve.

"You know, Hetty," she said, "we were not very good friends for a long time; I do not think we even liked each other, but we had between us, and felt it between us from the first, that link which, it seems to me, is a stronger one between two human beings even than love—sympathy. Have you not often felt the want of it even in those you love best,—felt that, though you lived your lives together, yet at the end of them you would still be strangers? I have, and when we have met and talked of the little incidents of everyday life, we have finished with each other, and after that we search about in our minds for something to say, and each gets dull and fagged. You cannot, you do not know why, creep into each other's world,—no, not by any means whatever, though you are together for years, so you each play a part to the other, while a sort of second self seems to look on and wonder. Stephen Bowden and I always understood each other, we entered into each other's ideas, and had no want of faith in each other's comprehension, though he is much cleverer than I——"

"Oh no," said Hetty, that excitable, euthusiastic Hetty.

"Yes, he is, dear," she went on musingly, as they sat, those two girls, over the fire on that quiet evening; "and I am thankful that he is—not that that is saying much for him—but still I can understand him, and follow him, far off, yet sympathetic, and thus the simplest woman and the cleverest man may tread the same path together, as a leaf and a branch may float down the same stream. He never forgets too that even if a woman has not studied a subject, she is generally quick enough to grasp it from some point of view, and now and then possibly from a fresh one. So we were always excellent companions—such as Herbert and I, cousins though we are, have never been, though we have many tastes in common, or as Harry Campbell and I should never be though we have known each other all our lives——"

"Why?" asked Hetty, breathlessly.

"Because, though we thoroughly like each other, there is no sympathy between us. He never enters into my world, and—dear good kind boy that he is—he has no world of his own, but clings to the surface of other people's, and so he fritters away his life. It was so different with Stephen," she said again, with quiet satisfaction in her voice. "He has understanding and appreciation of every one, and he is so perfectly self-unconscious. He is always interested in others, or in the thing he is doing, or in the book he is reading, or whatever it may be, but he never seems to think of himself, never forces himself on you, or seems to remember his own individual existence, and if he asks for your sympathy it is for what he is doing or thinking, not for himself. It was all this won me, Hetty—this and his truthfulness and uprightness, and all those good qualities, without which no nature could be great; but I never even dreamt of his caring for me, and when one day he told me that he did——"

"What did he say?" asked Hetty, girl-like.

"I am not sure that I can remember, but I could not tell you if I did," she answered; "I do not think any girl could tell what the man she really cared for said to her, any more than she could show his letters. I could not. It would seem like taking the edge off its sweetness."

"But why do you keep the engagement a secret?" It was only a month before she changed the design of her picture, that Margaret took Hetty into her confidence.

"That you mustn't ask me, dear," she answered; "you must be content to keep my secret without knowing why it is one."

"Do you ever quarrel?" she asked next; "I fancied that you were not friends the other day."

"We very often quarrel," Margaret laughed gaily, with one of her sudden transitions of moods. "It's so absurd too, he is always fancying he is too old and grave for me, though he is only two or three and thirty, and after a quarrel, or during one, always thinks I repent the engagement, and offers to release me; and then I get my pride up too, and think he is cold, when he is only proud, or that, perhaps, I fall short and disappoint him, and altogether I wonder it is not broken off, and sometimes fear it will be in one of these ridiculous squabbles; it would have been before this but for the knowledge of each other which underlies everything we may say or do."

"Do you care for him very much, Maggie—I mean very, very much?"

The girl hesitated a moment, then flushed, but answered fearlessly enough in her sweet calm voice, "Yes, Hetty dear, very much. I am not ashamed of it," she added, as if to excuse the colour in her face, "I should be more ashamed if I did not care for him;" then she laughed again. "I wonder if you will ever fall very deeply in love, you dear little dimpled Hetty. I am always telling Harry what a dear little wife you would make," and she put on that amusing air of patronage engaged girls and young married women love to assume.

"I believe he likes you——" Hetty began.

"That's what Stephen persists in," Margaret interrupted, impatiently, "and it makes me so angry! and I refuse to change my manner towards him, it is a lifetime old; why it might change his feeling towards me if I did, or make him think I'd changed mine towards him. We are, and always have been just like brother and sister."

"I understand you, Maggie," Hetty answered; "I always think I do somehow," she added thoughtfully; "though," she went on in an injured tone,

"Herbert thinks I know nothing, and think of nothing, because I laugh and amuse myself with trifles; but that is not a sign——"

"No," laughed Margaret, "a brook tosses and froths and plays over a trifling ridge or stone, and it might be called a sign of its shallowness; but the waves toss and frolic too, and yet the great sea flows beneath their playing—no, little goose, it is no sign at all;" and she rose and lit the lamp and pulled down the blinds, and the twilight in which Margaret had told Hetty her love-story was over.

(To be continued.)

"STRENGTHEN THE THINGS THAT REMAIN."

BY THE REV. ROBERT MAGUIRE, M.A., VICAR OF CLERKENWELL.

"Be watchful, and strengthen the things that remain, that are ready to die: for I have not found thy works perfect before God."—Rev. iii. 2.

DIVERSE indeed were the addresses and appeals of the Spirit to the seven churches of Asia. According to the circumstances of each was each addressed. Some were commended and some were blamed; and both praise and blame were mingled in the address to others. The worst of all the seven was the Church of Laodicea, provoking nausea and loathing contempt on the part of the offended Spirit of God—"I will spue thee out of my mouth" (Rev. iii. 16). The next in order, just a shade better than the worst, was the Church of Sardis, to which the words of admonition contained in our text were addressed. The Church of Sardis was a backsliding church, gone back from God. It still retained its name, but nothing more—"Thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead." To this church, under these circumstances, is the counsel given—"Strengthen the things that remain." This counsel is addressed to the Church as a body, and to its members individually; and as addressed to each, the words have their own deep meaning and significance respectively.

First of all, this counsel involves that the Church of Sardis should make diligent inquiry as to its spiritual condition, and take stock of its state before God. The result would be to show that, if its liabilities are great, its assets are small; that its stock is run down, and the working spirit and strength of the church reduced accordingly. Certainly a ray of hope is let in upon this dark and dismal state of things—the Church still retained its "name," and even that was something. If a business be suspended, and a firm become bankrupt, and its stock reduced to almost nothing; yet if the "name" is still kept on, it may be worth something, as carrying with it the good-will of the house, and securing what remains of its former self. But besides this, there was another residuum, as the basis of future promise—"Thou hast a few names even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments" (iii. 4). It must, indeed, have been a degenerate church, when "even in Sardis" there were found any righteous men at all; yet these are among "the things that remain," and serve as a ground of hope. The Lord's people are always and in every place but a "few;" as a "little flock" they are always capable of being numbered. Sardis was like Sodom, dependent on the few to save the city. How many or how few these "few" might be, I know not; but they would seem to be numbered; and the fifty righteous, or the lack of five of the fifty righteous, or the forty, or thirty, or even the "ten righteous," have much to do with a church's acceptance before God. Indeed, the New Testament seems to be, in this respect, more merciful than the Old, for the Gospel promise is that "wheresoever two or three are gathered," Christ is there. The remnant may be small, but if it be sustained, and (better still) if it be "strengthened," it will be as the salt, preserving the body from corruption; and, if only for their sakes, God will not destroy that church.

But to the individual members of a church do these words also apply. What is each one's own individual state before God? Here is the occasion for self-examination; taking stock again, not of the body collectively, but of self individually. The spiritual decline of a church means the spiritual decline of its members. It is the circumstances of individuals that make up the aggregate results of communities. As the constituent parts of a building are strong or weak, the building itself will be strong or weak. So it comes to individual inquiry after all; and in each heart are the things of God, many or few. A backsliding church means a community of backsliding members, where the stock has run low, and it looks like suspension of business, and closing up altogether. To individuals, then, are these words addressed—"Strengthen the things that remain."

And there are two reasons for which this counsel is given: one of these may be found outside the text; the other is contained within it. The reasons are these:—

First, because there is a promise to such. Nor is this so much outside the text; for every command of God involves a promise. The commands of God, and His promises—His enabling promises—are ever side by side. To the man with the withered hand Jesus said, "Stretch forth thy hand;" and with the command He gave the power also to obey it; and the man stretched forth that which was withered and dead, and which of course he could not have stretched forth but for the quickening power of Christ which he received. The promise that would be best adapted to this command to the Church of Sardis is, "A bruised reed shall He not break, and smoking flax shall He not quench" (Matt. xii. 20). This is the comforting and enabling promise to all those who receive, and endeavour to obey, the command of the Spirit, "Strengthen the things that remain." A bruised branch or twig of a tree may be hanging by a single shred; through that shred runs a vein, bruised, but not yet broken; and through that vein runs the life-blood from the tree to that bruised branch. The husbandman might, perchance, in his impatience break off that bruised twig, and cast it away to perish and die. Not so Jesus; He will the rather bind up the bruise, and gently swathe it round, and tend it, till the bruised parts knit together again, and the wound is healed. The flax has been all a-glow, burning brightly; but the flame has gone down, and now there remains nought else but the smoke of the slumbering embers. Some rude foot, perchance, passing by that way will stamp out even this remaining sign of life. Not so Jesus; He sees that the smoking flax wants air and fuel; and He supplies the food, and breathes upon it with the breath of His Spirit, and the smoking flax is fanned again into a flame. Such is the promise that I would suggest as the companion to the command of our text, "Strengthen the things that remain."

Then a second reason is contained within the words of the text itself—"Strengthen the things that remain, that are ready to die;"—that is, "Strengthen the things that remain, because, otherwise, they will die." It is like the physician urging upon a stubborn patient—"If you do not eat, you will die." All waste and exhaustion, unreplenished, means in the long run, and ere long, death and cessation of action; as the apostle says, though speaking on quite another subject—"Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away" (Heb. viii. 13). How important then is this admonition, "Be watchful, and strengthen the things that remain, that are ready to die!" It is each man's own individual affair. No one else (save God) knows the measure of the decline of your spiritual state better than yourself. You, surely, must know it. Then turn the eye inwardly upon yourself. How fares it with the garrison of the soul? It still holds out, but with diminished forces—"the things that remain." Then pour in supplies, for these are as much needed for the soul as the commissariat and ammunition are needed by the army in the battle-field.

What then is our individual state? At what degree of cold or heat does the thermometer of the soul register our spiritual atmosphere? Are we up to the mark? Is our vigour increased or decreased? Have we asked ourselves the question? or do we care to make inquiry at all? Our hope, through grace, is in "the things that remain." The "few names" in Sardis mean, in our own individual selves, the few thoughts that we retain of God; the few prayers that now and then we offer; the few stray feelings and emotions that occasionally remind us that all sense of religion has not left us. These I would have you to "strengthen." Every man has some religion left in him; and the little religion we have renders us responsible. That "little," if only used aright, would increase, as the talents did, and be for ourselves and for God to rejoice in.

"The things that remain" are a capital to start from, afresh and anew. It may be a small beginning; but have not princely fortunes been made from small beginnings, by use, and thrift, and industry, and watchfulness? Keep then an eye upon yourself; institute inquiry at times; mark the ebb and flow, the rise and fall, of your spiritual tides; and all will be well. But close your eyes to your own best interests; neglect the gift that is in thee; bury thy talent out of thy sight; and woe is the day of such folly and neglect!

And these are the germ within the man, to be "strengthened" and developed, lest they diminish and die. All spiritual strength needs this replenishing, just as physical strength also does. The spirit of man is subject to wear and tear and loss, and it needs fresh food and fuel to feed it. And this is to be supplied from time to time, the "daily bread" and nourishment of the soul. All ordinances and means of grace are temporary, declining in force and fading in the power of their results. They must, therefore, be oft repeated and renewed. Filled to-day, I hunger to-morrow, and must be fed again; and thus the effect of means of grace doth also decline, and the soul must needs have more. Life is like a dark road, and the spiritual life is also dark at times. Along this darksome path are the street-lamps, not all clustered together, but placed at intervals; these are the ordinances and the means of grace. And after we have passed this lamp, its light gradually decreases and declines, and, lo! another lamp begins to grow upon the sight; and our shadows are reversed, as the old light fades and the new one nears to view. Far from the light, the rays are faint and feeble, and scarcely reach at all; yet are these rays "the things that remain." Let us draw nearer to the light, and we shall see all things plainly.

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM, AUTHOR OF "WORDS OF HELP," ETC.

CRUELTY.

"HEAD over heels!—what a fall! Let us come down from the cliffs and see! 'Poor fellow,' you say? Well, I'm not quite certain of that. The donkey has thrown him in an awkward place—very. These broken pieces of rock on the beach are certainly not the softest pillows to fall on, though they have often a loose sea-weed covering which smooths over their rough angularities; but head first on to any of them is not a pleasant sensation at any rate. He is not stunned, though; he has picked himself up somehow, so he is not senseless, that's one thing.

"Well, young man, are you hurt very much? 'Shaken a little,' you say. No doubt, for you came down with a sharpish crack. 'Awkward, obstinate beast,' you say; 'you'll lay into him now.' Not exactly, my fine fellow, or we'll have you up at the police court. What's that on the poor beast's side? Why, it's blood! 'You only pinned him a bit,' you say, 'to make him go.' Pinned him! ay, yes, you did, and a detestable piece of cruelty you were guilty of. Why, the poor creature is pierced in more than half-a-dozen places! You ought to be richly ashamed of yourself, young man, and I hope the donkey proprietor will prosecute you. Perhaps then you would be bailed off, or only fined; for English law has not yet become a law of equity concerning cruelty. Come, come, it's no good your getting into a white heat of passion; you richly deserved your crack on the rocks, and you've got off a deal easier than the poor donkey has. 'Thick-skinned beasts, they don't feel,' you say. How would you like a pin stuck deep into your flesh, young man? and how can you tell what donkey-sensation is on the other side of the skin? 'You'll square up to me in a minute,' will you, 'if I don't hold my jaw!' Try it, my man. Cruel people are generally cowards, and though I'm a parson, as you say, I'm not altogether a coward; only I shouldn't trouble myself to battle with such as you, but simply ask my friend here to help me hand you over to the police. Be off with you! and think yourself lucky if you don't hear of the matter again.

"Now that coarse customer has gone, Martin, tell me what you think of the laws affecting cruelty in England. I fancy you are one of the pessimist legislators, and think law should do as little as it can, and be confined to as limited a sphere as possible. 'Certainly you do, and you think society must protect itself against adulteration and cruelty, and all that sort of thing; for if law becomes too paternal, society is weakened in its self-governing powers.' Oh! that's it, is it, Martin? And tell me how society is to protect itself in a case like this. It's all very well to advocate liberty of the subject, and all that sort of stuff; but who is to constitute the Nemesis to punish a fellow like that? Here you and I are quite powerless, unless we caned him ourselves, and took the consequences. The fact is that cruelty is on the increase in England, and something must be done to prevent it and to punish it. Now I wanted to talk to you about the loose ideas you have been giving vent to lately in certain of your papers and speeches, about the ultimate principles of liberty, and so forth. The 'let-alone' theory is one of the easiest to be eloquent about, but one of the most pernicious to apply. 'Oh! but we shall be everlastingly harassed and irritated if bumbledom and beadledom in general are to be increased. Shall we? I doubt that very much. I don't know why amateur artists should chalk heads on church doors, or why lively boys should produce elaborate etchings on Mr. Briggs's carriage gates, with the epigram, 'Briggs is a fool!' written underneath. Bumbledom may be laughed at for eccentric follies; but I prefer in such a case bumbledom to boys. I for one believe that we want some public prosecutors, especially for cruelty. The position, for instance, of women has been an old-world difficulty of philosophy, and it is so now. And as the law stands in its present ridiculosity, a man may give suitable punishment to his wife! Why, almost every newspaper contains heartrending accounts of wife-starving and wife-beating; and when the hideous tyrants by courtesy called husbands pound their wives into jellies, juries often pronounce it manslaughter only, and where death does not ensue, but only the loss of front teeth, with a broken arm and a fractured skull, then the punishment ranges from two to four months. And then think of the mass of cases which do not result in gross disfigurement, or in more fatal results—they scarcely come into our courts at all. Doubtless, drink does it, the root of the evil is there, but the fact remains that when done, theft of a thing is often punished ten times more seriously than cruelty to persons. If the law is not to be more active in this direction, do you think it is easier now than of old to step in between man and wife? Would you do that, Martin? 'Not exactly,' you say; 'but the everlasting intermeddling of law would be a greater evil than cruelty.' Would it indeed? You see, Martin, the cruelty is not tried on you, so you are scarcely a good expositor of the case. Then take the dumb animals. I know we have an admirable society for their protection in such cases; but how slender are its resources, and how limited its range. It would be too much to suppose that ten per cent. of the actual cases come within its range. Here are over-driven underfed beasts of burden every day around us; here are coarse fellows jagging the bits of cart-horses with tender mouths; and here on these sea-side sands, day by day through the season, are these poor donkeys hacked and whacked and kicked, and nobody interferes. Look at the sights here daily! Why, even the poor horses, meekest and gentlest and most obedient of animals, become obstinate—as well they may do in this sad employ. Here at mid-day when the excursion trains come in, the streams of visitors pour down to the sands. A crowd of holiday-makers want amusement. Forthwith great heavy fellows, whose boots nearly touch the sands bestride these poor donkeys, and begin to belabour them with heavy sticks, and to hack their jaws as though they were made of leather, and Christian people laugh at the fun when the company of women with hats half-blown off, and men out for a holiday, gallop by shouting and screaming to each other. Why, if we saw such sights in some countries we should illustrate heathendom by them.

"There is another aspect of the case too. Public authority should stop beggars in cold piercing weather carrying out little children as mute appeals to the sympathy of the public. Dosed with laudanum, or schooled into obedience, these little ones shiver and die. But the entire subject wants full consideration. Why should we have a committee of Parliament on coals and not have a committee on cruelty? It would tell on rich and poor alike; on merciless pigeon-shooting and detestable steeple-chasing, and on wife-beating and cruelty to dumb animals in general. It's all very well, Martin, to say that this is my 'craze' just now, and that keeping one subject before the eye for too long a time shuts out others; but the difficulty in this England of ours, is to keep one subject before the public eye long enough to make us energetic and active enough about it: and then, to hinder all, we have gentlemen of ability like yourself depressing all efforts by your elaborate theses on the ultimate principles of liberty. The everybody-doing-as-they-like principle is likely enough to end in disaster some day. You cannot attend a court of justice, great or small, without noticing that there is a multitude whose motto, in cases of wife-beating is, 'One's as bad as the other,' and who hope the accused will get off. How these fellows who have half-murdered their wives wince and howl if they get the 'cat!' and how seldom they do get any such measures of justice at all! I tell you what, Martin, the path of England must be in the line of social regeneration, or else all other measures to ensure progress will be delusive and ineffective. These measures are all right enough and wise enough in their place; but we must not shut our eyes to the fact that inhumanity may continue to exist, and may develop in the most atrocious forms of cruelty, unless the public conscience is quickened to make cruelty of all sorts a heinous crime. I know law cannot touch the worst forms of cruelty—such as neglect and contumely, and inward heart-breakings; but it can and ought to be severe upon the rampant cruelties of the present day. 'We are not so bad,' you say, 'as in the old Coliseum and gladiator days of Rome.' Very likely not, my friend, but ONE has been born into the world since then, who has taught humanity that 'blessed are the merciful,' and whose ancient prophets declared that 'they shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain.' There is a reporter behind who has heard our Private and Confidential, but as there is nothing that reflects on you personally, my true and most kind-hearted friend, but only on your 'least possible' of law, we need not mind his reproduction of our talk. My only hope is that multitudes more will do their best to chide, to check, and punish cruelty whenever they have opportunity—for in a Christian sense every woman is our sister, every child is our own, and the cattle in a thousand streets are God's."

SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

MARY OF NAZARETH.

"Blessed art thou among women!"—Luke i. 28.

BLEST among women, hail! We fear no shame
To mention thee with love and reverence meet,
Since the archangel from his bright retreat
Came down to breathe a blessing on thy name.
Imperfect were our roll of Christian fame,
Our women of the Bible, did not thou,
Whose lot it was above thy Christ to bow,
And teach His lips thy mother's name to frame,
Its ranks adorn. O blessèd, not above,
But womankind among; thy Babe adored
Brought joys unguessed, but brought the piercing sword
To chasten thy fond heart. Mistaken love
Hails thee Madonna. Our respect to prove
We name thee simply woman. Light and shade,
Just like our own, above thy pathway played,
Yet hovered over all Heaven's calm, peace-boding dove.

M. D.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SWENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XII.

HAVING done her best to secure the doctor's attendance, Una, burdened with the child, who lay a cold heavy weight in her arms, and impeded by her own wet, trailing garments, went on as quickly as she could to the cottage the boy had pointed out. The door was open, and she walked straight into a room, which even her first hurried glance showed her was singularly unlike, in all its arrangements, to similar apartments in the cottages she had already visited. Although the wide hearth was evidently used for cooking purposes, the remainder of the room was furnished and ornamented with a degree of meretricious luxury, which was strangely at variance with the appearance of the house and its size. Gaudy curtains hung on either side of the window, damask-covered sofas and chairs stood against the walls; gilt-framed pictures were placed around, and wherever there was a vacant corner it was filled up with great green boughs, evidently freshly cut, which made the whole place seem like a garden bower. Through an open door at one side, a little room could be seen, fitted up as a study with well-filled bookshelves on all sides, and a writing-table in the centre strewn with papers.

At the open window of the room Una had entered stood Ashtaroth, the gipsy wife of Edwards, engaged in stringing some glittering beads on a silken thread. She was a most striking-looking woman, both in her dress and personal appearance. Though splendidly handsome, with a richness of colouring which made the English girl look like a pale ghost beside her, she had an expression at once fierce and haughty on her scornful red lips and in her dark, flashing eyes. Her hair, of the most intense black, was gathered up in thick masses on the top of her head, and a ponderous gold arrow was thrust through it to keep it in its place. She wore a scarlet petticoat and purple jacket, both embroidered with gold, over a white garment, which was fastened at the throat with a jewel of some sparkling kind, and which had long hanging sleeves, revealing her brown arms covered with bracelets.

The moment Una's tired feet sounded within the room, Ashtaroth turned with a quickness of movement which showed that her hearing must have been singularly acute.

At once her glance fell upon the child; his head hanging over Una's arm, and showing, as his wet hair fell back, that his lips were blanched and his eyes closed. Uttering a wild piercing cry, the gipsy made one bound towards Miss Dysart, and literally tore the child from her hold, and pressed him frantically to her breast, exclaiming, "My boy! my treasure! he is dead—he is dead!" Then turning with an almost murderous look in her great black eyes upon Una, she exclaimed, "What have you done to him? If it is you that have killed him, I will strangle you where you stand."

"Why should I kill him?" said Una, quietly; "on the contrary, I have tried to save him. He fell into the river, and I swam out to him and caught him before he sank. He is not dead, I am nearly certain, for I could feel his heart beat as he lay in my arms; but unless we use means for his restoration at once, he is very likely to die. You are almost smothering him, and he needs air and warmth."

"Oh, save him! save him! I do not know what to do for him," said the woman impulsively. "Tell me how to restore him; I will do all you bid me, only don't let him die. My jewel! my Maurice!" and her chest heaved convulsively.

Una's prompt energy and good sense were at work in a moment.

"Get a blanket made hot to wrap him in, and some brandy, and I will take off his wet clothes. Lay him down on the sofa."

Ashtaroth obeyed without a word; and so quick and clever was she in all her proceedings, that in a very few minutes they had the child in a glow of heat, and Una was forcing a spoonful of hot brandy-and-water between his closed teeth, while his mother, by her direction, kept up an incessant friction of his limbs. Their efforts were soon quite successful; he began to breathe strongly, and moved under his heavy coverings, while the colour came back to his lips. Finally he opened his eyes, and after looking round for a few minutes in a bewildered manner, asked in a feeble voice where his boat was.

At the sound of the little, sighing voice, the gipsy woman went into an ecstasy of joy, as wild and impulsive as her grief had been fierce. She clasped the child in her arms, and showered kisses upon him, half crying, half laughing; while Una, who had been kneeling beside the sofa, rose to her feet, and stood looking on at the scene with a smile, well pleased that she had been able to restore such a deeply-prized child to the poor passionate mother.

Suddenly, just at this juncture, there came a voice, in breathless tones, hoarse with agitation, that exclaimed, "Is the child dead?—is Maurice Edwards dead?" and the next moment Humphrey Atherstone had crossed the threshold, with an eager, rapid step, and stood within the room.

He paused, stricken, apparently, with some strange emotion at the sight which presented itself to him. Una Dysart stood before him, her long hair, dripping with water, falling back from her charming face, which was now very pale, though her eyes were bright with excitement and pleasure. She had neither hat nor jacket, and her wet clothes clinging round her showed that she had been completely immersed in the river. The child was now sitting upon the sofa, laughing as his mother buried her face on his breast, while she held him in a convulsive embrace, and twisting his hands in her thick black hair.

(Drawn by R. Barnes.)

"No, he is not dead"—p. 554.

Ashtaroth had heard the new-comer's question, however, and turning round, without rising from her knees, she fixed her black eyes, glittering with a strange expression, upon Atherstone's face, and said, "No, he is not dead; he lives, and will live; but he would have been cold and dead—my little Maurice now—but for this dear beautiful lady, who saved him. Oh, you darling lady!—you darling! I will love you for it for ever! I will remember it for good to you as long as I live!" She had flung her arms round Una as she spoke, and was kissing her hands with impassioned ardour. Presently, however, she glanced from her to Atherstone, her forehead contracted in a frown, and she stopped suddenly in her vehement gratitude; but as the little child, feeling quite restored, slid off the sofa and stood laughing beside her, wrapt in his blanket, her face softened, and she said, with a concentrated determination which seemed almost too great for the occasion, "Yes, I will remember it for good to you—whatever you may be one day."

Atherstone, meanwhile, had seemed for a moment unable to understand the scene on which he had so suddenly entered; but when the whole truth became plain to him, he said in a low voice, and as if half unconscious that he was speaking aloud, "You have saved him, Una Dysart!—you!"

Una felt that there was more in his tone than she could understand; but she answered lightly, "I suppose you are surprised at the extent of my accomplishments; you did not know that I could swim. But I am so thankful I was at hand to rescue the poor little fellow. Little Maurice, you must not go and play alone by the river-side any more," she continued, stooping down and kissing the child, who caught hold of her wet hair, and held her face close to his with a merry laugh, saying, "Lady's all wet, too; lady went in the river with me."

Then Atherstone started, like a man waking from a dream, exclaiming, "Miss Dysart, you are running a terrible risk by remaining in your wet clothes; you may get some serious illness. You must change at once; I dare say Mrs. Edwards can supply you with some temporary dress, and I will go and bring the carriage to take you home."

"It will be better for me to walk," said Una; "I shall get warm much quicker—and I do believe that good boy has found my hat," she added, "which is better fortune than I expected;" for the lad she had sent to the doctor's walked in at the same moment, holding it with her jacket in his hand.

He went stolidly up to Una, and pointing to Atherstone, said, "I could not get the doctor, so I sent he."

"It is true," said Atherstone; "I met him coming away from the doctor's door, much disappointed, and he asked me to come here because Edwards's child had been drowned; but he did not mention you, so I was struck by surprise when I saw you."

"I found these atop of the bushes by the river; I expects they're yourn," said the boy to Una.

"Yes, indeed, they are," she answered, taking possession of her goods very gladly; "and you must come to Vale House this evening to be rewarded for all these good deeds. Now, Mrs. Edwards, can you give me something to put on for a few hours, till I can reach home?"

"You may have everything I possess," said the gipsy impulsively, and catching hold of Una's hand, she drew her away into another room.

Atherstone sat down to wait for her, and leant his head on his hand with an air of the deepest despondency. The child had placed himself on a stool just opposite, his sharp eyes peering out from the blanket in which he was enveloped, and his two little brown hands planted on his knees. He stared fixedly at Atherstone, who seemed scarcely conscious of his presence, and after having maintained this deliberate contemplation for some time, he advanced his shrewd little face nearer to him and said, "I aint dead, Mr. Atherstone."

Atherstone started, and then looked gravely down at the odd, elfish child who had made so strange a remark.

"So it seems, child," he said; "the fates have reserved you for some purpose; whether of good or evil remains to be seen." Then rising, he walked moodily up and down the room till Una reappeared, half laughing, half blushing at her own strange costume, in which, however, there could be no doubt she looked very bewitching; a scarlet dress of Mrs. Edwards's was relieved by her own black velvet jacket and hat, and her rich chestnut hair, spread out on her shoulders to dry, framed in her fair face, on which there was now a brilliant flush, and the soft, bright smile which was one of her greatest charms.

Atherstone fixed his eyes upon her with a look of the most intense, wistful sadness, and followed her every movement as she knelt down beside the child and playfully took leave of him.

"This little man ought to go to bed, I am sure," she said, looking up at Ashtaroth; "his hands are hot, and I am afraid he is growing feverish."

"He shall go," said the mother; but her eyes were fixed on Una, not on the child. "You are a sweet, kind lady," she continued, "and it is your good star brought you to Ashtaroth's door to-day with her son, rescued from the dead, in your arms; there will come an hour when I shall repay you. The daughter of the wandering people knows how to curse," and she glanced at Atherstone, "but she knows also how to bless."

"It is enough that I have been of use, I am very thankful for it," answered Una, putting her hand into Ashtaroth's with the bright frankness peculiar to her; "I hope the dear little fellow will not suffer from his accident. I will come some day soon to see how he is."

"Ay, do; I will make you welcome, and so will the child's father. It is not every one whose foot he would allow to pass his threshold, but for you there will always be an open door."

She bent forward and kissed Una on the forehead, but she drew herself up, silent and motionless, when Atherstone passed her to follow Miss Dysart; and he, too, merely bent his head without speaking.

CHAPTER XIII.

ATHERSTONE walked on by Una's side, uttering no word for some time, and she did not like to break the silence—only looking up furtively at the face she was learning to love too well, and feeling a great pang at her heart as she saw the deep sadness that overshadowed it. At last Humphrey gave a heavy sigh.

"Life is very inexplicable," he said; "that child rescued from almost certain death—and by you, of all people!—this is mysterious enough, but it is a darker mystery why persons continue to exist whose influence is baleful as the poisonous blasts of the desert that blight and burn up every living thing. Why is it not a duty instead of a crime to destroy such an evil power, and cast it out from the earth—as one would root up a noxious weed, and trample it under foot?"

"You are thinking of the man you hate," said Una.

"Yes, of Edwards—the bane of my whole existence; there is not room enough in this world for him and me to breathe in."

"I wish you did not feel this terrible hatred," said Una, very softly; "it seems to me to warp your true nature, and make you very different from what you would otherwise be."

"It does; you are right, it transforms me almost into a demon at times. And how kindly I once felt to all the world!—unreserved, trusting, believing the best of every one. Can you wonder that I should hate this man," he continued vehemently, "when he has been my actual destroyer, making earth a barren wilderness for me, instead of the bright home full of love and joy it can be to other men? Why is all the sweetness of life to be for ever withheld from me by his cruel hands? Do you think it is easy to look on happiness which never can be mine? I tell you I should have liked to have died to-day when I saw your tenderness to that child."

The vehemence of his tone scared poor Una, and she drooped her head, literally trembling. Atherstone saw it, and in a moment his mood changed completely.

"Forgive me, Miss Dysart," he said in the softest tone; "I was inexcusable in saying that to you; but indeed the events of this afternoon have so greatly moved me that I have not been master of myself. I will never so offend you again. I trust you forgive me?"

"Oh yes," she said, looking up brightly; and smiling back upon her, he began to talk on other subjects, exerting all his powers of pleasing to such good purpose, that she secretly regretted intensely when their walk came to an end at the gate of Vale House.

Colonel Dysart and Mr. Cunliffe were sauntering up and down the terrace in front of the house when Una and her companion reached the gate, and the shrewd Australian watched them rather critically as they took leave of each other. Atherstone walked away at last with a very lingering step, and Una, unconscious that she was observed, stood with her gaze fixed on his tall, stately figure, till he disappeared from her sight. Then she turned and came slowly along the avenue, apparently in deep thought.

"It seems to me, Colonel Dysart," said Mr. Cunliffe, "that even if the duration of your life should be much shorter than I trust it will be, the period of my guardianship would be likely to be extremely brief—little likely indeed to come into action at all."

Colonel Dysart looked round at him inquiringly, and by a glance, Mr. Cunliffe indicated Una, who seemed hardly advancing, so very slowly did she move, with her eyes fixed on the ground.

"That young lady," he said, "is at this moment thinking very kindly indeed of the gentleman who has just parted from her."

"Atherstone! do you really mean——" then the Colonel checked himself.

"I mean that I think she is likely to be Mrs. Atherstone as speedily as possible, provided you have no objection."

"I am by no means certain that it might not be necessary I should object," he answered.

"Surely it is not the first time the idea of such a possibility has occurred to you; it is clear that they have arrived at a point far beyond being mere acquaintances already," said Mr. Cunliffe.

"I thought Atherstone admired her, undoubtedly—every one must have seen that much; but I did not contemplate any serious result, because he asserts so positively, as I am told, that he never intends to marry."

"My dear sir! have you lived half a century in this world and still feel able to give credence to a declaration of that kind? Such resolutions only exist to be blown to the four winds of heaven by the least breath from the lips of a charming girl like your daughter."

"Of course, that would be one's general idea of the matter; but there seems to be something peculiar in the case of Atherstone. He has systematically published this intention ever since the death of his uncle, which has, I believe, caused a great change in him in all ways, and roused some unpleasant suspicions concerning him."

"Suspicions! of what?"

"I cannot tell, nor can any one, I think; only a general sort of impression that everything is not straight and aboveboard in his life."

"Is there any foundation on which to rest such a charge?"

"None whatever that I know of; excepting, that after having been as gay and frank as any young fellow could be, he suddenly changed into a cold, reserved man, who shunned society and amusement, and declared that he was irrevocably bent on a life of celibacy."

"About the vaguest grounds for a criminal charge I ever heard of," said Mr. Cunliffe.

"Nevertheless, those undefined suspicions made me feel, when you first broached the subject, that I might hesitate to give him my daughter."

"Is his position in other respects suitable?"

"Entirely; he has a large income, and a splendid old place, to which my Una, as it happens, has taken a great fancy."

A smile passed over Cunliffe's face. "You will see her installed as mistress there, or I am much mistaken. But, of course, before that comes to pass, it behoves you to make him yield up his secrets for your satisfaction; perhaps it might be possible to make a good guess at them now. Is he likely to come here while I am with you?'

"He often calls, and he has come more frequently of late, which fact supports your theory as to his feelings. But by the way, I think Northcote said this morning that he had asked him to meet us at dinner to-morrow, so you will see him there. I was rather surprised to hear he had invited him, for Mrs. Northcote maintains most strongly that he must have committed some hidden crime."

"Probably she has a private spite against him," said Cunliffe; "women cannot reason upon general grounds; they always have some personal motive."

"Una, my child, you arrive just in time to hear Mr. Cunliffe making the most ungallant speech," said Colonel Dysart, as his daughter came up the steps which led to the terrace. "You must take up the cudgels on behalf of your order. But, my dear, what in the world is the meaning of your extraordinary costume? surely you do not habitually go about in a scarlet robe trimmed with yellow, and your hair streaming on the wind in this extraordinary fashion?"

"Do you not think it makes a pleasant variety?" she said, laughing; "but if you want to know the exact truth, I borrowed my dress from a gipsy."

"From a gipsy! what have you been about, child?"

"Swimming in the river," she answered; and then very briefly and simply related the circumstances of the child's rescue, somewhat to Colonel Dysart's horror, who saw very clearly what a risk she had run. He manifested great anxiety about her all the evening, dreading that she might suffer from the chill. But his fears were dispelled the next morning. She came down looking bright and well, and in no-wise disposed to forego the party at the Northcotes', where she well knew she should see once more the face, whose haunting beauty came now between her and all the brightness of the world she once enjoyed so freely. Her father wished her to ride out with him and his guest, so she had no opportunity of going to see how the gipsy's child was; and it was the first question she asked Atherstone when they met in the Northcotes' drawing-room. He answered that he had not gone to the house, but that he had sent to inquire as to the boy's health, and had been told that he was perfectly recovered. When Atherstone had repeated the message, he went back a few steps from the post he had at first occupied with great eagerness, by Una's side, and leaning against the wall silent and motionless, he seemed to resign her to Hervey Crichton's very demonstrative attentions. Mrs. Northcote glanced at him once or twice, with, as Will expressed it, "all manner of thunder and lightning in her aspect," while Mr. Northcote, who was looking extremely meek and depressed, moved uneasily in his vicinity, and was evidently greatly relieved when Mr. Cunliffe asked him to make him acquainted with Mr. Atherstone. The two men conversed together till dinner was announced, and then, as the party was not large, found themselves side by side once more, with Una, whom Hervey had succeeded in bringing in, seated opposite to them.

Cunliffe was very agreeably impressed by the man of whom he had heard such doubtful accounts. He soon satisfied himself that he had a mind of no small depth and power, and as he glanced at the dark noble face, he found it impossible to believe that he had ever acted in any mean or unworthy manner. Nevertheless, he was bent on testing Atherstone, so far as he could, and he gradually led the conversation round to the case of a man whose crimes, long marvellously concealed, had originated one of the most remarkable trials of a few years previously. The criminal had been in a high position —known and esteemed in the best society, and with a reputation which seemed in every way perfectly unassailable. At last, however, an accidental circumstance betrayed him, and it was discovered that he had been carrying on a gigantic system of fraud, and finally it was proved that he had not stopped short of murder, in order to put an end to an existence which was dangerous to his own safety.

After they had discussed the case for some time, Atherstone talking of it with entire ease and freedom, Mr. Cunliffe mentioned that he had heard of it when he was in Melbourne; "and," he added, "I must say, what struck me most was the idiotic blindness of those who were connected with him in business matters for so many years. I do not know if you recollect that, on one occasion, almost at the very commencement of his career, they were aware that in some one matter of no great importance, he had acted falsely; not so as to involve any serious result, but falsely; definitely and distinctly. After that, they ought, not only never to have trusted him again, but to have been prepared to see him reach any amount of fraudulent villany."

"A hard doctrine, indeed!" said Atherstone, "harder than any which I should have imagined had ever been promulgated by the most intolerant sects. Does not every system admit the possibility of a man repenting of a first misdeed, so thoroughly as to maintain his integrity unimpeached ever after?"

"It is not a question of ethics but of facts. All my experience, which is not small in such matters, goes to prove that unless a man holds with indomitable grasp to the idea of the absolute necessity of inviolate honour, and unswerving truth, there is really no barrier whatever between himself and the lowest depths of falsity and baseness. A fortunate concurrence of circumstances may keep him from taking the descending track; but if he have once fallen from the pure pinnacle of unblemished principle, and lost his own self-respect, the chances are that he will speedily go down hill with as much ease as rapidity."

Atherstone was quite silent for a few moments, then he resumed, "There is another side to the question, Mr. Cunliffe; moral laws are after all to a certain extent arbitrary. Can you not imagine the possibility of a man, perfectly upright and honourable, finding himself in such an extraordinary conflict of duties that the boundaries of right and wrong are wholly confused, and an offence against the received code as to truth and justice becomes a higher virtue than the maintenance of a principle which could only cause serious and extensive evil?"

"The end justifying the means, as theologians define it. No, Mr. Atherstone, such a course can never be either excusable or successful; it is only a warped judgment, biassed probably by some strong personal consideration that could ever imagine confusion in the well-defined lines of right and wrong in matters of equity; and unless the offender could control all the events of the future and bring them into harmony with his crooked policy, he would be quite certain to see his purpose overthrown by some combination of circumstances on which it was wholly impossible he could have calculated; whereas actions flowing from a simple sense of right and justice are as certain to reach their due and logical result as rivers are to run into the sea."

At this moment the ladies rose, and as Atherstone moved to open the door for them, Cunliffe looked after him muttering, "He is a very fine fellow, with a high-toned mind, and the pride of Lucifer; but he has his secret, and it is not altogether an innocent one. If he gets little Una, however, I believe she may set him straight. She is safe to find it out, and she is as pure-hearted a girl as ever breathed;" and with that Mr. Cunliffe sat down to his wine, fully determined that neither then nor at any future time would he be an adverse influence between Atherstone and Una. (To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No 15. CHRIST. PART XII. CHRIST TEACHING BY PARABLES.

Scripture to be read—Luke xviii. 1—14.

TWO kinds of parables have already been spoken about—those describing natural objects, and those taken from life-stories. What did the last set of parables teach? When the penitent does return to God, what does he do? Which parable taught the kind of prayer used? To-day shall speak of two more parables about prayer.

I. PRAY WITHOUT CEASING. (Read 1—8.) Ask the children what a parable is—given last lesson. This is just such an earthly story as might happen any day in the East. Remind of Samuel's sons (1 Sam. viii. 3), who took bribes;—of Pilate who crucified Jesus to please the chief priests (Matt. xxvii. 22, 23). Now question upon the story. Picture the widow with no one to take up her case; oppressed by her adversary—perhaps sued wrongly for some debt—coming to the judge day by day; the judge surrounded by friends, officers, flatterers; the woman finding it difficult to get near; at last obtains a hearing; but, to her dismay, judge refuses to help her—too much trouble; perhaps her adversary a friend of his own. She, not daunted, comes again; pleads again; at last not only heard but helped; why? because judge getting tired of her coming, wearied by her. Let children contrast this judge with God. For texts speaking of God as judge, see Gen. xviii. 25; Ps. vii. 11; ix. 8; Acts xvii. 31, and many others. These will show the nature of God's judgment as being certain. No doubt as to whether God will hear us, He delights to hear (Ps. xxxiv. 15), His ears spoken of as always open; He never tires of hearing; longs for us to come and tell all our tale; also His judgment is just; ask if this is always so with earthly judges. Why cannot God make mistakes? Read Ps. cxxxix. 1—4. We only know part—not whole. Remind of Solomon—wisest man—who had to devise a scheme to find out the true mother of the babe. God knows all, and judges right; show how this is an encouragement to prayer. We do not know what is good for us; might ask for wrong things, but if pray, saying, "Thy will be done," God will hear and answer. God's judgment also is helpful. This judge at last took the woman's side against her enemy; so will God avenge His elect. What do they often receive now? Remind of persecution of Stephen, Peter in prison, Paul in stocks, &c. All Christ's people must suffer with Him, but at His coming all shall be avenged. The Judge on their side will Himself destroy their enemies; show how this is also true now; how God, by His Spirit enables to overcome man's enemies of the flesh and the devil, so that does not wilfully sin (1 John iii. 8, 9). So must pray constantly and earnestly, and will obtain help in time of need.

II. PRAY WITH HUMILITY. (Read 9—14.) Picture the two men—the Pharisee in a prominent place, where all could see him; praying aloud in boasting manner; going home thoroughly self-satisfied. The publican in a corner, not daring to look up; feeling his sin; praying for pardon; going home happy, because forgiven. Question on this well-known story, so as to show the resemblance and difference between these two men; notice that both were Jews accustomed to daily service; both wished to pray; went to the Temple for that purpose; both thought they were praying. Now show the contrast—the Pharisee did not pray at all. Ask what his speech was: a boast of his good deeds. Remind how fasting and alms-giving are two of the Christian duties, but show wherein he was wrong. How are they to be done? also show carefully what must always come first in worship of God—viz., confession of sin and prayer for forgiveness. Ask who brought a thank-offering without a sin-offering, and was not accepted. Then show how the publican's prayer was a true prayer, because he confessed his own unworthiness; acknowledged God as Saviour, and asked for pardon. How did he go back home? Explain justified to mean "being declared just or righteous" before God, not because of his goodness, for he was a sinner, but because of mercy of God who forgave. Press upon the children the nature of true prayer—show how they are sinners daily, in thought, word, and deed; have no real goodness; even when done all they can are but unprofitable; because best deeds mixed with sin; must therefore plead for mercy through Christ's merits, and so pleading, will obtain; none who so come ever sent empty away.

Questions to be answered.

1. What two great lessons are taught by these two parables?
2. Contrast the conduct of the unjust judge with that of God as Judge.
3. Name three characteristics of God's judgment.
4. What are the points of similarity between the Pharisee and the publican?
5. Why was the Pharisee's prayer rejected, and that of the publican accepted?
6. What does the parable teach us?

BLIND BIDDY'S STORY.

BY MRS. STANLEY LEATHES, AUTHOR OF "PENELOPE," "LETTIE DEAN," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

"I AM still ashamed to think of the trouble I gave my aunt. The few first weeks I used to be always crying and complaining, and very little work I got through, for my eyes were blind with tears, and my hands I declared never clean in that dirty place. My aunt had just said, 'Well, Biddy, my child, if you can't make yourself happy here you had better go home again, though I do wonder that a well-brought-up girl like you should not have the sense to bear a little inconvenience and discomfort in a better temper.'

"That day a letter came from my home; it was in the dear mother's handwriting, and told of fresh troubles. The gamekeeper at the hall had told father that some one had been persuading Sir Geoffrey to throw two or three small farms into one, and that ours was one of the number. It was thought that Job Smith was at the bottom of it; and there was a postscript, saying that father had had notice to leave the farm. I knew what this would be to father, and I felt so ashamed of myself, that I should have been fretting over my own troubles. I felt humbled, for I saw that though I had been thought unselfish and patient at home, new circumstances had shown me that I was neither—indeed, I felt that my aunt had said the truth when she called my conduct temper. 'Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.'

"From that day I set to work in earnest. I got up very early the next morning and cleaned the little room thoroughly. I blacked the grate, cleaned the window, and polished everything that could be polished; and then I sat down to my work. I was rewarded by my aunt saying, when she awoke,

'Well, Biddy, that is comfortable,' and I felt happier than I had been since I left home.

"My aunt was employed in a large outfitting warehouse. She was a beautiful worker, but her eyes were beginning to fail, so she was glad for me to take the stitching and the more delicate parts. My work was greatly praised at the shop, and I soon found I could have any amount I chose. The finer the work the better it paid, and I undertook the best shirts, and earned a good deal in the first fortnight. I worked now with a will, and it was strange how differently things appeared to me. My mother had often said to us, 'Work with a will, girls, and you'll find pleasure in your work; but if you take it up as a burden, it will be a burden indeed, and of your own making.'

"I began now to really take a delight in my work, and a pride in keeping our little room as clean as possible. It seemed heartless work at first; but difficulty after difficulty disappeared before determination and perseverance, and my aunt sometimes said I was making the room a little palace. With some of my earnings I bought a cheap paper, and one morning I got up as soon as it was light, tore down the dirty one, and made a bonfire of it; scrubbed the walls with a broom, and put up my pretty fresh one. My mother had been handy at all such things, and we had often helped her to paper the rooms. A little whitewash and paint, which cost but a trifle, soon made our room very smart, and I also learnt that in London everything must be washed; and by this means all the dusky old furniture, after a little time, both looked and smelt clean. I got a box full of mould, too, and planted such flowers in the window as will grow in London; and early in the morning, before people were passing underneath, I washed their leaves thoroughly with a watering-pot, so that they really grew and looked fresh. I had scarlet runners, nasturtiums, creeping jennies, stocks, wallflowers, London pride, and white allison, and all were bought for a few pence; indeed, all my improvements, paper and all, cost but a few shillings, and the comfort was worth a great deal. And though it may sound as if these things must have taken up a great deal of time, they really did not; and any poor woman may do them, if only she will work with a will, not lose heart, and get up early in the morning.

"Well, to my story. My next news from home was that father had left the dear old place, that Ben had gone out to work, and that Mary had taken a place as a lady's-maid at the Hall. Jessie, they seemed to think, was very delicate, and they had had to call in the doctor to her, just when a doctor's bill could ill be afforded. Father's health and spirits had quite broken down under his troubles, so that he seemed quite unable to work, and so they lived as best they could on Ralph and Ben's earnings. They had taken a cottage near Warbridge, and father hoped soon to get employment as a milk-carrier, if only he got stronger.

"It seemed a sad come-down, and I felt that, though poor mother wrote cheerfully, she was feeling very deeply the trial for father's sake.

"I now sat myself to gather together a little purse of money to send to my mother at Christmas to buy flannel and warm clothing, or whatever might be needed. It gave me a new zest for my work, and I rose early and sat up late to get through the more.

"I paid my aunt for my board and lodging, so to lay aside much it was necessary that I should work hard.

"One day when I went to the shop, the foreman asked me if I would undertake all the fine button-holes, for they could not get them done to their mind. He offered me good pay for it, and I was tempted by this, and immediately said, 'Yes.'

"When I returned home I told my aunt, and she said, 'Oh, Biddy, my child! I am very sorry to hear it; why, you'll ruin your eyes before you're thirty.'

"I only laughed and said, 'I never met trouble half way.'

"'If you take my advice, you'll go back and say your friends don't wish you to do so much fine work. It's penny wise and pound foolish.'

"'No, aunt, it won't hurt me, I assure you. My eyes are good enough. Let me try for a while. I want to earn money, and I can earn more at this than at anything else.'

"'Biddy,' she said in a grave voice, 'this is self-will, though it may be in a good cause; still it is self-will; and it will bring you into trouble: I never knew when it didn't.'

"I felt the words, and never forgot them; but I quieted my conscience by saying to myself, 'It is not for myself I am doing it; it cannot be wrong.' And I had great pleasure in sending off my parcel of nice warm clothing and my little packet of money; and when it was gone I set to work afresh to earn more. I would, I thought, this time send a sum sufficient for Jessie to go to the sea-side, for she was still very sickly, and mother seemed to be fearful she would not get better.

"Well, to cut my story short, I worked on in this way for five years. I paid several visits to my home in this time, and found them very poor; but my mother never lost her trustfulness or her contented spirit. My father could do very little, for he had become very infirm and feeble; and Jessie earned a little by her needle, but not much. It was still a very happy home, though there were many comforts missing, that it was my ambition to supply. I had been in London about five years, when one day I received the news that my father was very ill. It was the height of the season, and I could not well be spared from the shop, for I was the best hand; so I delayed going from day to day, hoping to hear better news. But, instead of that, tidings came to me of his death, and also at the same time I heard that Jessie was very dangerously ill.

"Mary was in Scotland with her mistress, and all the boys out at work, therefore I could not now delay going; so I went as quickly as I could in those days, and when I arrived I found mother so broken in health, and Jessie so very ill, that I could not return again, as I had intended, in a few days. Poor Jessie, she lingered several weeks, and then died; and we laid her by the side of our father, in the same grave. I was now alone with my poor mother, and I felt I could not leave her. I had it on my mind to propose that she should return with me to London; but I waited for a while, till her sorrow should be somewhat softened.

"It was during the nursing of my sister that I first felt a strange sensation in my eyes. For a moment my sight would entirely go away. I mentioned it to my mother, and she (I found afterwards) spoke of it at once to the doctor. So when I made my proposal of going back to London, and taking a room in the same house as Aunt Elizabeth, she said, 'No, Biddy dear, the doctor says you must not return to fine needlework, or you will lose your sight. At any rate, he says you must give your eyes six months' entire rest, and at the end of that time we shall see. It will be all right, Biddy dear,' she said, when she found that I took this greatly to heart; 'God has provided for us hitherto, and He will to the end. Biddy, we shall never want bread.'

"We shall see! Indeed! why, at the end of six months I could no more have made a fine buttonhole than a shoeblack: and gradually my eyesight went from me, till I became quite blind; and the dear mother smiled on, and trusted on. It was still 'all for the best.' She took in washing, and toiled for me, and the boys and Mary helped us, and so we got on. I earned a little by knitting stockings; but I had no great sale for them. Oh! how often, when I felt so helpless and useless, did I remember Aunt Elizabeth's words. Self-will had brought sorrow indeed.

"At last, after I had been blind ten years, my mother died. Mary and all my brothers were married, and I scarcely knew where to go, when good Aunt Elizabeth wrote and asked me to go back to her again, and I went. She was very old and infirm, and lived on a very small pension allowed her by the firm for which she had worked all her life. Through the interest of a clergyman who visited us, I got the small pension for the blind, and so we lived together till she died.

"And now, miss, you understand why I said to you, 'Take care how you are self-willed, even in a good cause.'"

"Yes, I do indeed, and I shall not forget your story. "Good-bye; I have had such a happy evening!"

"And so have I, miss. God bless you! Good-bye."

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

232. Which one of the Evangelists gives the healing of the leper as the first of Christ's miracles?

233. State how long David reigned respectively over Judah in Hebron, and over the whole kingdom in Jerusalem, and give his age at death.

234. In speaking of Himself to His disciples, the Saviour uses one uniform designation. What is it?

235. Give a passage to prove that at least on one occasion, Jesus evinced His power over wild animals.

236. The names of only three women, besides Eve, who lived before the Flood are recorded in the Bible. Give them, and state who the women were.

237. Our Lord very frequently told those whom He cured to keep the fact a secret. Give an instance in which He enjoined a publication of the miracle.

238. Where do we first meet with the use by our Lord of the words "verily, verily?"

239. Reference is made in the Acts to the foster-brother of a certain Jewish king who embraced Christianity. Name him.

240. Quote the exact words the Saviour used when He first clearly announced His Messiahship.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 528.

217. That of Ephraim (Judges viii. 1).
218. Heb. i. 10; Ps. cii. 25—27.
219. Gen. xiv. 13; xxxix. 14, 17; xl. 15; xli. 12.
220. St. Mark (i. 23—26) adopts the same order.
221. See Acts xv. 36—40.
222. Luke iv. 42; Matt. viii. 34.
223. Ps. xvi. 10.

A PRAYER FOR A LITTLE CHILD.

OH, gracious God, too small am I
As yet to praise Thee as I ought;
My little tongue can only try
To say to Thee what it is taught:
Yet little ones to Thee are dear,
And Thou my childish words wilt hear.

Oh, what shall be to Thee my prayer?
Shall it not be that, all above,
I still may love Thee, and may care,
Beyond all else, for Thy dear love?
That all Thy words my heart may heed,
And Thou my steps may'st always lead?

Oh, give me, Lord, the will to know
That Thou, our Father, canst but be,
Even should I grieve in pain and woe,
But, in Thy wisdom, good to me;
Safe in the trust, oh, let me rest,
That Thou knowest what for me is best.

W. C. BENNETT.

THE COMET AND THE GLOWWORM.

ON leaving home, and not far from it,
To get a good view of the comet,
A trembling glowworm in the way
Occasioned me some short delay.

"Good sir," said she, "mind where you tread,
Or you may chance to leave me dead.
'Tis true my little lamp might not
Be missed far round this shady spot;

But gladly do I guide and cheer
Whatever comes within my sphere.
Besides, you know, the hand Divine
Which fires the comet makes me shine;
Then sure you would not willingly
Set foot upon a worm like me."

With thanks for caution, then I sought
The mountain-top, and thus I thought:
"Few, like this comet blaze along,
Admired and gazed at by the throng;
'Tis well, if in a dark place shining,
I do God's work without repining."

D. G.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

HOW HERCULES WAS NEGLECTED.

MARGARET sat in the long gallery of the British Museum. It was Monday, so not a students' day, yet here and there a stray easel was to be seen, and a diligent worker before it. Margaret was thinking of, rather than drawing, the face of Hercules, which stood on the shelf to her left. It was afternoon, the day was dreary and the light bad, so the excuse for idleness was good. She got up, stopping for a moment to gaze at the sweet face of Clytie and at the fearless one of Diana, and sauntering on into the hall as the clock struck three, met Stephen Bowden.

"I have only half an hour," he said; "I can't stay to take you down to the Temple."

"I know," she answered: "my father is coming at four, and I am going with him."

They went past the reading-room, up the stone staircase, past the grotesque line of animals, "so like Noah's ark," as Maggie said, through the courts and half way down another flight of stairs, and stopped to lean over the railing that bounded the space between them and the huge bust of the Colossus of Rameses which is placed over a doorway leading into some unfrequented department. They had often lingered there, talking over books and pictures and things in which they took a common interest. They talked about themselves to-day, however.

"Margaret," he said, as they leant over that convenient railing, "I am going to Marlow next week, and I should like to tell my mother about you."

"Yes," she said uneasily.

"But," he continued, "I should like your father to know at the same time."

"No," she said; "not yet, Stephen."

"I cannot think why you object; you say you like me, and you are not ashamed of me."

"Oh no!"

"Well then, why not—why not trust me? Is it anything to do with your father's affairs?" he asked gently; "I've thought so sometimes, and Herbert seemed to hint at his being in some difficulties, but that would make no difference. I have a great respect for your father, Maggie," he went on; "and he was telling me only the other day how many chances he has lost of doing great things, simply from want of money; if he knew of our relationship we could talk more freely, and I might be able to help him in some way."

"I detest speculation," she said.

"So do I; but a man who has talents, and only wants means to display them——"

"Oh, it is not that." She sighed wearily. "But let it be a little longer as it has been—say till Christmas"—she thought something might turn up by then—"that is not much more than two months. You will, won't you?" and she put her hand through his arm, and he was conquered again, for he was very fond and proud too of the fair woman who stood by his side, and so he answered, "Yes, Margaret, it shall be so if you like;" and then he added with a half smile, "don't go flirting with all your might with poor Campbell though, in the meantime. I believe you do. I think sometimes you feel I am too old for you." He always remembered the ten or twelve years' difference between them, and had a lurking doubt, not of her, but of his power to keep her love.

"I hate boys," she said; "and as for Charley, it is simply friendship on both sides."

"Humph! your friend is always hanging about you anyway."

"Don't be jealous," she laughed. "Besides," she added, for she was something of a coquette, "it is too bad of the sun to grudge the sky its stars."

"No," he laughed back; "but to answer you after your own fashion, the stars have a way of doing a little shining on their own account when the sun is out of the way."

"Then the sun should keep in the way,"

"That is not always possible. Why doesn't Campbell study more? he never seems to do much but go to parties and make himself agreeable to young ladies. I thought he was a civil engineer."

"So he is, but on the whole he is very much civil and very little engineer, I fear."

"So do I," he said, lazily looking at the dust which disfigured the huge ears of the Colossus. "But it's just upon four, and you have your easel to put away, so we had better say good-bye to our friendly myth for to-day."

"Good-bye, dear myth," and she made it a curtsey, and he took her hand and made her run down the wide stone steps, and laughed at her fear of falling.

"Why don't you learn to jump?" he said.

"I can," she answered, halfway, "but not off stone stairs, because they would be so hard if one did have a tumble." She lingered a moment, looking at him. What a mercy it was for those two foolish people that on dull October days the British public seems to ignore its Museum in Bloomsbury! "Whatever made you ask me if I was ashamed of you?" she asked.

"I thought you might be; I've not at all an exalted opinion of myself."

"I have then," she said, while the light flashed from her eyes; "I think there's no one like you—no one in all the world!"

"You silly little woman," he said, and drew nearer to her for a moment; "I hope you will never grow wiser on this point."

"I never shall," she said, "never as long as I live," and then they went back to Hercules. A pair of high shoulders and a disappointed face were beside the easel, and their owner darted forward as he beheld Margaret coming.

"Charley!" she said, while a flush dyed her face, "I did not expect you."

"Didn't you get my note?" he asked ruefully.

"No."

"Well, I wrote one to say aunt hopes you'll come to-morrow, and she's thought over what you said."

"Oh;" and she coloured up again.

"Hetty's here," Charley went on, "she and I came to fetch you. Your father asked me, as he has an appointment which will keep him till half-past four, then we are to meet him in Covent Garden and go on to the Temple; I suppose you'll come too?" he asked, turning to Stephen Bowden.

"No," he answered; "I'll join you all at the Temple. Did you say Miss Hetty was here?"

"Yes, she's poking about among the Elgin marbles—don't they look like tombstones?"

"Very," the other answered with a glimmer of amusement in his brown eyes.

"Well?" asked Margaret, turning to her future lord and master, while Charley went to look for Hetty.

"Well, I didn't know you were such a coquette," he said, teasingly.

"Oh, indeed I'm not one at all," she answered, almost tearfully.

"No," he said soothingly, "you are only a woman, dear, a perfect woman; but I must go now, and here come your friends. I shall see you again presently." He went away satisfied; but when he got a quarter of a mile off he pulled up. "I wonder what on earth she coloured up so for when she saw Campbell. I don't understand what she's always going to the aunt's for either. She surely can't like him without knowing it."

"Why don't you work at your profession, Charley?" Margaret asked, on their way to Covent Garden. "You seem to have lost all your old love of it."

"It's such a grind, I like hanging about better, and it's no use bothering my head with a lot of things I don't care for. Then some one is always wanting me to do something or other, or go somewhere, and the days slip away like anything."

"Yes, they do," said Hetty, simply; "especially the nice ones."

As they entered the centre avenue of Covent Garden Market they met Mr. Ashbury; a flush was on his face and an uneasy expression in his eyes. He greeted his niece and Charley Campbell with the politeness in which he never failed, but walked with Maggie, saying he wanted to ask her about her work. True to his character, he did not speak first of that which was uppermost in his mind, but listened to her gossip, and seemed amused and interested.

"By the way, my dear Maggie," he said as she finished, "if you have an opportunity give your cousin Herbert a hint not to speak to me about money matters to-night. It vexes me; and if he asks me again for the sum I unfortunately owe him, I shall tell him plainly what I think of his conduct."

"Yes, daddy."

"I have been greatly annoyed this afternoon," he went on, "greatly. There was a committee meeting at the Atalanta" (the name of the company to which he held the post of secretary)," and in consequence of some disagreeable remarks, I handed in my resignation for the end of the month."

"My dear father!" she said in consternation," it was your chief source of income, was it not?"

"That and some commission agencies; but I must try and get into something new," he said. "I'm tired of all these things. I wish I had never left the army; all my heart was in that profession."

"Poor daddy," she said; "it must have been hard to give up what you liked best. We have no certain income then after the end of the month?" she asked, recurring to the subject of money.

"No, dear," he answered. "But when I have thought over my plans, I dare say I shall hit on one which will succeed."

"I hope you will," she answered, and the tears were standing in her eyes; but he said nothing, and they went on in silence.

(To be continued.)

EXTRACTS FROM AN EXPOSITOR'S NOTEBOOK.—VI.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, NOTTINGHAM, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC. ETC.

JESUS SEEN OF THE FIVE HUNDRED.—Matt. xxvi. 32; xxviii. 7, 10, 16—20; 1 Cor. xv. 6.

THE Lord Jesus made an appointment with His disciples before His death, and kept it after His resurrection. On the night on which He was betrayed, He said to them, "After I am risen again, I will go before you into Galilee." They had followed Him from Galilee, and as they followed Him, He had forewarned them that He must be delivered into the hands of men who would put Him to death. And now that His death is at hand, He promises them that before they have returned to their cottages by the Galilean lake, He will have risen from the dead and will be there before them, ready to resume His intercourse with them. Nay, as we learn from St. Matthew, He appoints the very place of meeting, names the mountain on which He will rejoin them. "Go," He says to them, "go to that mountain in Galilee"—perhaps the Mount of Transfiguration—"where we have often walked together; and though I have now the sentence of death in myself, yet I will be there before you. Once more we shall meet and talk together of the things of the kingdom of God."

It adds to the beauty of the promise if we connect it with the words that immediately precede it. He had just told them that He, the Shepherd, was about to be smitten, and that they, the flock, would be scattered abroad. And the pastoral figure is carried on into the promise. "I will go before you into Galilee;" for the verb implies, "I will go before you, as the Shepherd goes before his sheep, calling them by name, that they may follow him." The disciples had followed Him, hearing and knowing His voice; and, though He was now about to lay down His life for the sheep, He would still be the Pastor of their souls: He would still go before them; they would still go after Him.

Now we should have thought that the disciples could never have forgotten so precious a promise as this. We should have thought that, so soon as He was dead, or, at least, so soon as the Paschal feast was over, they would have hastened back to Galilee, and have climbed "the mountain where Jesus had appointed them," in order to renew their intercourse with Him. But just as we forget many a word of command or promise when we most need to remember it, so the Eleven forgot their promise. And just as we suffer for our forgetfulness, so also they suffered. For joy they had grief, for hope despair. Instead of travelling to the appointed mountain, they lingered in Jerusalem; and therefore, instead of rejoicing in a living and present Lord, they mourned and wept as over a Lord, absent and dead.*

But though they forgot His promise, Jesus did not forget it, or them. That He might keep it, He was even better to them than His word. First, He reminded them of His promise. On the morning of His resurrection, the angel, who had rolled away the stone from His sepulchre, charged the holy women, who came to embalm the body of their Friend, "Go quickly, and tell His disciples that He arose from the dead; and, behold, He goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see Him:" nay, as if this were not enough, Jesus Himself appears to the women as they leave the garden, and repeats the charge of the angels, "Go, tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me." And then, when the words of the women seem to the Eleven as idle and incredible tales, Jesus appears to them also. He is seen of Cephas. He appears in another form to two of them as they walked and went into the country. Even this does not suffice. The "residue" believe neither Peter nor the two travellers to Emmaus. But Jesus will not suffer their unbelief to make His promise void. And so He passes through the closed door of the chamber in which the Ten sat at meat, shows Himself to them, and upbraids them with the hardness of their hearts. Nay, more: because one of the apostles had been absent when He came, "an eight days afterwards" He appears to them again, convincing even sceptical Thomas, permitting them all to see that they may believe. It is only then, when every doubt of His resurrection has been removed, that the Eleven leave Jerusalem for Galilee.

But even yet they do not go to the mountain where Jesus had appointed them. They linger about the shores of Gennesaret. They go a-fishing. They keep Christ waiting still. It is only when the Seven, wearied with a long night's fruitless toil, behold Him standing on the beach, and once more hear the familiar command, "Follow me," that they ascend the mountain, and there receive the great commission, "Go ye, and teach all nations . . . to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

But what have the "five hundred brethren"

* These points—the appointment made with the apostles in Galilee, their forgetfulness of it, and what they lost by forgetting or omitting to keep it—are not sufficiently emphasised by the commentators: I have never seen them insisted on.

to do with all this? Were they also on the mountain?

In all probability they were. For only in Galilee could so many as five hundred of the Christian brethren be found. In Jerusalem, we know that "the number of the names" on the roll of the Church was only "about a hundred and twenty," all told. The risen Saviour could not, therefore, have been seen of more than five hundred of the brethren there; and, if not there, there was only one other place on earth in which any considerable number of them could be found. Only in Galilee, where He had won many hearts by the gracious words which proceeded out of His mouth, could five hundred men have been gathered to greet and worship the Victor over death.

And if the meeting took place in Galilee, it is reasonable to believe that it took place on the mountain in Galilee on which Christ had promised to meet the Eleven: for, when they returned from Jerusalem, the apostles, as they lingered about the shores of the lake, would naturally speak to as many as had believed on Him, of the marvels which had transpired in Jerusalem—of the earthquake and the angel, of the empty tomb, and the successive appearances by which they had been convinced that Jesus had risen from the dead It would be natural, too, that the Galilean disciples, like the Eleven, should not at first believe, for wonder,—that they should hold the news to be too strange and good to be true: and it would be natural that, in response to their doubts, the apostles should speak of the interview which they were yet to enjoy with Him on the mountain, and invite their brethren to come and see Him for themselves. They must have spoken about these things, or how should the "five hundred" have been gathered to meet Christ anywhere? And, therefore, we may well believe that the Galilean disciples resolved to go with the apostles to the appointed mountain; and that, as they climbed it, they saw Jesus in the new glory of His spiritual body, alight upon it, and found all their doubts melt away as He drew near and talked with them.

Many thoughts are suggested by this strange interview of the risen Lord with the disciples who had known Him before He saw death. But let us select only three of them.

1. It suggests that Christ constrains us to meet and see Him, in order that we may know that He is always with us. It was not of their own motion or goodwill that the Eleven came to the mountain in Galilee. It was not simply because they had been asked to come, or because they had been promised that, if they came, the fellowship with Christ, which death had broken, should be renewed: they never thought to see Him again. They forgot His promise to meet them, and neglected to act upon it, even when they were reminded of it. It was only because constraint was laid on them, only because He pursued them with His forgotten word, only because He showed Himself to them again and again, and would give them no rest till they obeyed His command, that they now stood on the mountain to which He had charged them to come. And what was His motive in thus graciously and patiently compelling them to meet Him? It was simply this,—that He might bless them and do them good. They are constrained to enter His presence, that He may teach them they can never wander from His presence; He iterates and reiterates His command, "Go into Galilee," that, when they do go, and while they worship Him, He may assure them, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." They had thought it incredible that He should return from the gates of death to meet them even once; He compels them to meet Him once, that they may know He is always with them.

And in this gracious motive we have the key to many of His dealings with us. He is ever seeking to win us to His presence, to a sincere and open recognition of Him as our Lord and Saviour, in order that we too may have the comfort of knowing that He is always with us, and for us. In our childhood He is present and real to us, as we read the Gospels or listen to the story of His love. Our sensitive hearts and quick imaginations vivify and give colour and warmth to the scenes recorded in the Sacred Narrative. Our ready faith apprehends the Divine beauty of the life which found its earthly close on Calvary. We have no doubts then; we ask no sceptical questions; we may, indeed, have no large or complete conception of Him, any more than the apostles had before He left them and went up on high; but the conception we have is a sacred reality to us. We speak to Him in our prayers with the most entire confidence that He hears us, and can almost see His kindly form bending over us as He listens to our words. But, as the years pass, and new desires and ambitions arise within us, they obscure, if they do not obliterate, the Divine Image reflected in our souls. We lose our early faith. The Christ formed in us dies out of us, or lies buried under a growing weight of cares and labours and pleasures. He no longer speaks to us, or we no longer recognise His voice. We no longer speak to Him, or we speak only in cold formal petitions, not expecting that He will hear and respond. The thronging solicitudes and schemes of our daily life crowd out the living conception we once had of Him. His messengers come to us, as the angels came to the women and the women to the disciples, repeating the invitation and command of His love, "charging us" in His name to climb a loftier eminence of faith, that we may behold a Christ more glorious and perfect than our childhood knew, and assuring us that we may now know Him "after the Spirit," instead of after the flesh. But we give little heed to them. Their words seem to us as idle tales; or, if at times, we listen, we do not act upon them. Like the Eleven, we doubt, and we forget; nay, like them, even after we are convinced that Christ has risen, and that He is the Life of men, we sink back into our old round of habit, and do not suffer our conviction to shape our lives.

And still Christ does not forsake us. He comes to us again and again, comes invitingly in our joys and prosperities, comes rebukingly in our adversities and griefs; He gives us glimpses and foretastes of the blessedness that will be ours when once we have seen Him as He is; He gives us the proofs our doubting hearts demand, or He constrains us, despite our doubts, to seek for Him if haply we may find Him. And His motive is the very motive that inspired Him to frame a similar discipline for the apostles. He will bring us to the Mount of Vision and Adoration; but it is that we may ever find Him on the dusty plain on which our lives have to be spent and our work has to be done. He compels us to meet Him, to recognise Him as our Saviour and King; but it is that we may be sure that He is always with us, and always blessing us.

2. The incident suggests that the Lord Jesus manifests Himself to us in order that we may bear witness to Him. To the "five hundred" disciples, as well as to the eleven apostles, He showed Himself on the mountain. And why?—why did He meet them, and constrain them to meet Him? It was that they might testify of Him, that they might teach all nations "all whatsoever" He had taught them. They are permitted, they are drawn, to fall at His feet and worship Him; but this worship of adoration is designed to lead to the higher worship of active service. While they worship Him, they receive the commission which bids them go out into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature.

And if Christ manifest Himself to us, if through the glass of the Word or the worship of His house we see Him who is invisible, and reach the conviction that He is our Redeemer and Friend, it is that we also may bear witness to Him. Whenever we stand on the Mount of Communion the command comes to us that came to the disciples, "Go and teach what I have taught you." Public witness—or rather, the witness of public speech—may not be required of us. Though the apostles, though, perhaps, some of the five hundred, came down from the mountain to stand before kings and nations, and to announce to them the good tidings of great joy, we have no reason to think that all of them became missionaries and ambassadors of the truth. Yet even those who did not go forth to preach the Gospel bare their witness to Christ—the witness which shines through every spiritually-toned and kindly life. If not by many words, or words spoken in public, yet by the actions which speak louder than any words, they testified to the reign of the crucified and risen Lord. And this is a testimony which we should all bear, which we must bear, if we have really seen the Lord. To see Him is, in some measure, to be changed into His image. We cannot enter into any true fellowship with Him without having our lives raised toward the level on which His life moved. Every act of spiritual worship should, and must, prepare and strengthen us for His service. If when we come to His house, we take nothing from it but a little personal comfort and enjoyment, we may be sure that our worship has not been in spirit and truth. There must be some secret and fatal insincerity in the worship which does not impel us to lead a better life and to show a more genuine kindness to our neighbours. To see Christ is to receive of that Spirit by which we are created anew; to listen to Him is to learn the truth by which we are to live. We cannot have seen Him, and have sat at His feet, if we are not trying to shape our conduct by His word and to carry on His work of mercy in the world. We cannot have learned of Him unless we are teaching Him. Not that we are all to be speakers and preachers. Like many of the five hundred, we may simply have to return to our old round of toil in a new spirit, and so to fill it as to show that we have been with Him. But in some form every true worshipper must bear witness to Him. Prayers and praises that lead to nothing are worth nothing. Any acts of worship are vain which simply give us a little pleasure or a little ease, but which do not raise the tone of our life and make us more zealous in good works.

3. The incident suggests that Christ bids us serve Him because His service is helpful to us. The apostles and the brethren when at last they reached the mountain, found that the blessing which Christ had promised them was a commission which empowered them to go and teach, by word and life, whatever Christ had commanded them. Was this the reward of their obedience? Yes, even this. For, what higher reward could they receive? In publishing the truth to others, they will make it more entirely their own. In living and obeying the truth, they will not only gain a firmer grasp on the truth they have, they will also advance to other and larger truths. For all truth is one; and wherever we begin our study of it, and in proportion as we master and appropriate that with which we begin, we shall be led on to new discoveries, and find in every truth we hold a clue to truths that lie beyond it. Even the apostles did not know much of the truth, although they had been taught

(Drawn by the HON. E. PLUNKET.)

"Lapped in the languor of a sweet delight
Of sound and scent and glow of summer noon."

"A MIDSUMMER'S-DAY DREAM."—P. 567.

by Him who was "The Truth," when they came to the mountain; nor was their grasp of what truth they knew very strong. Peter had just denied Christ; Thomas had just refused to believe that He had come back from the grave; they had all abandoned Him before He was condemned, although but a few moments before His arrest they had pledged themselves to die with Him. They were little better than silly sheep, who are scattered the moment their shepherd is struck down, and stand staring afar off, with wistful dubious faces, even when he rises again from the ground. And if the Eleven were weak and ignorant, we may be sure that the five hundred were still weaker and knew less. How shall they ever know more, or hold what they know with more resolute grip, unless they learn by teaching and grow strong by obedience? But if they obey Christ, if they do His will and engage in His service, what then? Why then, not only shall they increase in wisdom and in strength, as the natural result of their obedience, but before many days are past there shall come down upon them a Spirit who will lead them into all truth, teach them what to teach, and confirm their word with signs following—a Spirit who will give them the very wisdom and energy they now worship in Christ their Lord.

And is it not thus with us? When Christ calls us to Himself, when we take Him for our Master and engage in His service, are we not apt to suspect that a mysterious and happy change is to pass over our whole life? Are we not saddened as we learn that we must descend from the Mount of Communion to the dusty plain where the common work of life is done, and see a scene of samely and wearisome duties stretch out before us? Are we not tempted to ask, "Is this all? Is this the reward, the blessing, I was taught to expect?" Yes, it is even this; for only as we do the common work of life well can we rise to the full height of Christian manhood.

Christ calls us, He compels us, to His service; but it is because He loves us, because He knows that His service will be helpful to us, because only as we serve Him can we become wise and good and free.

Let us try ourselves, therefore, by this test. We must not build our hopes on our careful observance, or even on our sincere enjoyment, of the forms of worship. What are we the better, what is Christ the better, what are men the better for our worship, if we are not strengthened by it, and consecrated for an active and patient service in our daily lives? It is not by what we do and feel in the sanctuary, but by what we are and do in the home and in the world, that Christ will judge us, and that we should judge ourselves. If we cannot keep our temper when we are provoked, if we cannot be of "an incorrigible and losing honesty" when a slight deviation from truth and integrity might bring us much gain, if we cannot do a kindness when we can hope for no return, what, after all, is our worship worth? How can we go and teach the things which Christ has commanded us, when we ourselves are not keeping His commandments?

Let us try to keep them, to live His life, to breathe His Spirit; for our obedience will be our best service, our most eloquent and persuasive testimony to Him. As men look on our lives, they will see what His commands are, and see also how good and how pleasant it is to keep them. If we have received the light of life from Him, let us allow our light to shine before men, that they, seeing our good works, may glorify our Saviour who is in heaven.

A MIDSUMMER'S-DAY DREAM.

IT fell upon a day in summer fair,
When sunlight filled the cloudless sky in June,
And through the hyaline the luminous air
Was throbbing in the heat of drowsy noon.

Scant sound to break the silence of the hour,—
The chirp of grasshopper; the chant of bee
In honey-labour amid gorse and flow'r;
Music of waters babbling slumberously.

From flow'r-beds gemming the trim-shaven grass,
And aromatic shrub and evergreen,
Through the half-opened door of panelled glass
The odorous air flooded the room within.

There, in her chamber, mid the mellow light
Diffused around her on that day in June,
Lapped in the languor of a sweet delight
Of sound and scent and glow of summer noon,

Sate a fair maiden, slumber-thralled. The spell
Stole on her while a-reading, it may be,
Love-tale or poet-song, until she fell
A-musing, lost in pleasant reverie.

And so she passed from reverie to sleep,
And then from sleep to dream. Ah me! I fain
Would know what phantom-things their revels keep Within her happy heart and busy brain.

Haply the glamour of some quaint romance
Conjures up visions of Arthurian days,
The gentle knights a-tilting with the lance,
To win from ladies fair or love or praise.

"Lapped in the langnor of a sweet delight
Of sound and scent and glow of summer noon."
"A MIDSUMMER'S-DAY DREAM"—A. 567.

XUM

Haply the form that meets her sleep-sealed eyes
  Is nearer, dearer than those knights of old,—
Who seeks to win her as his noblest prize,
  With soul as chivalrous and heart as bold.

Dream on, fair dreamer. Life is but a dream,
  So sings our Shakepeare * and Spain's Calderon.†
And men like shadows come and go, and seem
  But phantoms fleeing at the rise of sun.

Dream on. Thy soul, perchance, in dreams may be Awake more truly than in waking hour,
From bondage of the physical set free,
  To seek the fountain-life of psychal pow'r.

So, in our world of dreams, this comfort take,
  That there's a waking world to mortals given,
And they that fall in sleep shall yet awake,
  From dream-life here to waking life in heaven.

* "We are such stuff as dreams are made of." † "La vida es su eno." J. F. WALLER.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XIV.

MR. NORTHCOTE never dared to remain long absent from the stately lady who ruled his life, and the party were soon all re-assembled in the drawing-room. Miss Dysart was singing when the gentlemen came in, and the well-known song she had chosen, "In questa tomba oscura," was particularly suited to her rich contralto voice, with its pathetic timbre. Atherstone came and stood behind her, his eyes growing dark with intense feeling as he listened. When she had finished, Una rose and retreated to the window, where she stood looking out that she might escape from Hervey Crichton's enthusiastic plaudits, and Atherstone joined her at once.

"I want you to make a very pleasant dream in which I have been indulging for a long time into a reality, Miss Dysart. You promised once to come some day with your father to spend the whole afternoon at Atherstone, to study the pictures at your leisure, and I see no reason why there should be any further delay. Will you not come this week?"

"I should like it excessively," exclaimed Una, "and I am sure my father would enjoy it too; but we must ascertain what day would suit him best."

"I will find that out before he leaves the room to-night," continued Atherstone. "You do not know how I look forward to it, Miss Dysart; there is so much I am anxious to show you."

"Yes, there is a great deal for me to see, and I ought to have seen it long before." The voice that said these words was not Una's; and Atherstone, turning round with a start, met the merry glance of Will Northcote's bright black eyes, who had come unperceived quite close to them. She put her arm round Una's waist, and leaning her piquant little face against her friend's shoulder said composedly, "You did not know I was coming too, did you, Mr. Atherstone? but I am; I have been dying to go over the Abbey for a long time past, only my mother objects to my calling anywhere by myself—a curious superstition, is it not? and she declined to accompany me. You have failed to win her affections, as you are probably aware. So now I have simply to say that I will take means to prevent Una going, unless you invite me too. The matter is quite in your own hands."

"Then I shall decidedly beg you to come," said Atherstone, smiling. He had felt somewhat annoyed at first, but Will's absurd speech had given him time to reflect, that he should be much more likely to get Una to himself, if they were a large party than if she came alone with her father. "The more the merrier, Miss Northcote; so pray bring any one with you who might care to see the old Abbey."

"In that case, might we come before Mr. Cunliffe goes away, and let him accompany us; I should like to show him what a real old English castle can be?" said Una.

"By all means," said Atherstone; "any friend of yours will be most welcome."

"Then, of course, you will invite Mr. Hervey Crichton," said Will, with great apparent innocence.

Atherstone frowned darkly, but Hervey, who was hovering near, had so evidently overheard Miss Northcote's speech, that Atherstone was obliged to invite him then and there, with as good a grace as he could, greatly to the malicious little lady's amusement. Hervey, of course, accepted with alacrity, and when Humphrey spoke of the plan to Colonel Dysart, including Mr. Cunliffe, who was sitting beside him, in his invitation, both gentlemen agreed to his proposal, with a satisfaction which was due to somewhat more far-seeing prognostics than he at all suspected. It was finally arranged that they were to go two days later, if the weather was fine.

The grand old Abbey was looking its very best under the glowing radiance of the powerful July sun, as Una, with Mr. Cunliffe and her father in the carriage beside her, brought her spirited ponies clattering over the ancient drawbridge to the door. The strong lights and shadows brought out the massive proportions of the grim, grey building with wonderful effect, and showed the lovely sweeping lines of the magnificent cedars on the lawn to perfection, while the park-like grounds were in the height of their summer beauty, and the deer, seldom disturbed by a stranger's foot, had taken up their positions close to the house in every variety of picturesque attitude.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"The matter is quite in your own hands"—p 568

Humphrey Atherstone certainly looked well worthy to be the master of so stately a dwelling, as he came down the steps to receive his visitors. His face, always undeniably beautiful even in his saddest moments, was now lit up with an intense pleasure which dispelled every trace of the gloom that sometimes overshadowed his noble features and dark, expressive eyes. He greeted Colonel Dysart and Mr. Cunliffe with the utmost courtesy, but it was a mute, though more eloquent welcome that he bestowed on Una, as he retained her hand for a moment, after he had helped her to alight and looked down with deep tenderness into her sweet brown eyes.

They had scarcely entered the courtyard when the sound of horses' hoofs on the bridge announced the arrival of Mr. Northcote and his daughter, with Hervey Crichton. Little Will at once cantering in on a mettlesome steed, which seemed indisposed to stand still, long enough to let her even dismount, Humphrey of course went to her assistance, along with his servants, while Crichton precipitated himself off his horse in his hot haste to reach Una's side.

Meanwhile Mr. Cunliffe and Colonel Dysart had gone back to a corner of the courtyard, where they could get a good view of the ponderous keep, which was the most ancient part of the building, and excited the Australian's enthusiastic admiration.

"Well, really," he said, "if a daughter of mine had a chance of becoming mistress of such a glorious old place, I doubt if I should have the courage to inquire too curiously into the antecedents of the man who could give her that position. It is enough to make one compound a felony to think of obtaining possession, even indirectly, of this undecayed, unblemished inheritance of ages."

"The man does not exactly look like a felon just now, does he?" said Colonel Dysart, directing his friend's glance towards Atherstone, who was standing bareheaded at the door of the entrance hall ushering in his guests.

"No, indeed. If he is one, Lavater is completely at fault as a physiognomist, for a finer face I never saw, or one indicative of nobler qualities. I believe that the secret which mars his life and subjects him to such evil report, partakes more of the nature of a mistake than of a sin—a mistaken sense of duty probably. Anyhow, I believe your sweet little Una would be entirely safe in his hands."

"I must be well assured of that before I let her go to him. I cannot have the fair promise of her life destroyed; but I quite agree with you in your opinion of Atherstone, and I have little doubt, if for her sake he gives up his celibate tendencies, that he will be able to give me satisfactory explanations."

Of course luncheon was the next feature in the small entertainment of that day, and to please Una Atherstone had ordered it to be served in the huge banqueting-hall—where the table and the small party seated around it seemed like an oasis in a perfect desert of black oak flooring, while the grim old Atherstones for centuries back, looked down with apparent scorn on the ephemeral beings who were living out their little day in the world they had so long since spurned with their upward-flying feet, as they passed to purer realms. Una's bright eyes glanced with keen interest along the pictured row of mute, dim faces as she sat by Atherstone's side, and noting her every look, he told her the names of those that most attracted her.

"You must examine them systematically afterwards," he said.

"Yes, I shall like to do so," she answered; "but more than all these, I want to look once more on that one picture—you know which I mean."

"Yes; but we must be alone when you see it again. I cannot look on that portrait now in company with any one but yourself;" and Atherstone changed the subject.

Will Northcote was the first to start from the table, exclaiming that she could not possibly remain within those four walls any longer, wide as they were, while such glorious sunshine was wasting its beauty outside. She wanted to explore the gardens, she said, and conservatories, and the lake with the island, and all the other reported wonders of Atherstone; and she would go by herself if no one else chose to come. They were, however, all as willing as she was to go out into the lovely summer air, and soon they were dispersed in groups over the grounds. Atherstone found himself, somewhat to his dismay, obliged to pilot Mr. Northcote over some new stables he had recently built, while Will Northcote took possession of Mr. Cunliffe, whom, to his amusement, she persisted in calling a Maori, and went off to the lake. Meanwhile, Una succeeded in detaining her father by her side, in order to avoid being alone with Hervey Crichton, who kept as usual close to her, and seemed exceedingly anxious to draw her away from the others, as they walked on to the conservatories, which Colonel Dysart wished to see. These were very extensive, with doors at either end, and they soon encountered a gardener, with whom Colonel Dysart remained discussing a green-house he proposed erecting, while Una, in the narrow space, was perforce obliged to pass on with Hervey. She hurriedly began to talk to him: "Tell me how Lilith is," she said; "I cannot help feeling very uneasy about her. I do not understand her state."

"Nor do I; she is very inscrutable."

"I fear, whatever may be the cause, that she is quite unhappy. Does she seem at all better?"

"Not in the least. She is like a white marble figure, sitting perfectly still and silent, excepting when she thinks she has some duty to perform, and then she goes through it in an entirely mechanical way."

"Poor dear little Lilith! I am so grieved at her suffering; I wish I could do anything for her."

Steps advancing in the distance, which could be heard at that moment, seemed to precipitate Hervey into action; for Una had so often successfully evaded his wish to be alone with her, that he could not afford to lose this rare opportunity; he seized hold of her hand, exclaiming, "Miss Dysart, you might do much for Lilith, and everything in the world for me! If you would only let me give you to her as a sister! I have been trying to speak of this for weeks, though in truth I have longed with my whole heart to win you from the day I first saw you. Do not turn away from me; no one can love you as I have done." But even as he spoke, the door of the conservatory near which they were standing was pushed hastily open, and Una had only time to say, "Mr. Crichton, it is impossible; I entreat you to forget that you have ever spoken those words to me," when Atherstone came hurriedly forward.

"I have been looking for you everywhere, Miss Dysart," he said. Then he stopped abruptly, and a darkness came over his face which made him resemble so exactly the portrait of Fulke Atherstone that Una almost trembled. She well understood the cause of that ominous gloom; he had seen her draw her hand out of Hervey's grasp, whose agitated manner as he turned away would alone have betrayed the nature of the conversation which Atherstone had so unexpectedly terminated. "I thought you were waiting for me; but I have interrupted you," he said, in a low tone.

"No—no!" exclaimed Una; "I am ready to go and see the picture now, if you are at leisure."

Hervey Crichton had already disappeared, and without a word Atherstone held the door open for her, and she passed out.

CHAPTER XV.

Atherstone and Una in silence traversed the lawn in the dazzling sunshine, and entered beneath the dark archway into the shadows of the stern old Abbey. Together they walked through the outer hall, where the suits of armour carefully set up on all sides looked like the rigid figures of long-dead knights, passed up the wide oak stairs, and along the echoing corridors to the picture-gallery, and there the heavy door closed after them with a hollow sound; but never a word did Atherstone speak all the way as they went, and Una found it utterly impossible to break the meaning silence. At last they stood side by side before the picture, and with a movement that was almost fierce in its violence, Atherstone tore aside the veil that shrouded it, and let Una look once more on the ghastly scene it represented. Ghastly it did indeed appear to her, for she knew now what had been the true nature and duration of the remorse that had eaten like fire into the heart of the dead man whose image was before her, and fixed such a look of intolerable anguish on the worn, haggard face—such an indescribable pathos of supplication in the uplifted, pleading hands. And ghastly it was, too, in another and deeper sense; for since she last had looked upon the pictured face of Fulke the murderer, she had learnt to know the lineaments of the living Atherstone so well, that she could see it needed but such a stamp of inward pain to make him perfectly resemble the unhappy ancestor who lived and died in expiation of a mortal crime. A glance from his face to the picture showed the current of her thoughts, and Atherstone responded to it. "Yes," he said, "I am like him—like him not in features only; I should be so altogether but for one point in which he is happier than I am."

"Happier! it seems as if the idea of happiness would not apply to him at all—he looks the very embodiment of bitter pain."

"True, in all save this—that he is dead. In that respect he has the advantage of me, and had it, even when he still lived and breathed in misery, for he was dead to all things earthly then, and knew no hope, nor wish, nor fear, so far as this world was concerned; while I, cut off like him from every human tie—solitary, loveless, even as he was—I pine for the joys that are denied me; I crave for the love—the treasures of existence—that might have been mine, as men dying in the flames long for a draught of cold water."

He spoke with such vehemence that Una hardly knew how to answer him, and only raised her eyes towards him with a look which showed the depths of sympathy he had awakened in her. Atherstone turned away from the tender pitying gaze, as if he could not bear it.

"Hide your eyes from me," he said; "I believe it would be best for me to look on them no more; for their sweet compassionate gaze has but led me to try and satisfy my hungry heart with a delusive mockery of that it most desires."

"You cannot think that I have mocked you in any way," said Una, in a low tone of pain.

"I have this day feared it; but the time is come when I must know the truth. I cannot go on feeding on hopeless dreams, if they are nothing more. I will ask you to tell me now in so many words what I may expect from you."

With a grave courtesy he took her by the hand, and placed her in an old oak chair that stood in the recess of the window. She made no resistance, but folded her little white hands and drooped her head beneath his earnest gaze, while gleams of sunshine fell upon her graceful figure, and made her the one bright object in that sombre gallery.

When Atherstone spoke at last it was with a depth of strongly-suppressed feeling which made his tone almost harsh.

"Did you not tell me, Una Dysart, that you would be my friend—not in the ordinary sense of the word—but my special, constant friend—nearer and dearer than any other, filling at least to some extent the terrible void of love to which my strange fate has condemned me?"

"Yes, I said so—very truly—very really," she answered, lifting her soft eyes to his face.

"But what did you mean when you made that promise? this is what you must tell me now. Did you mean," he continued, growing almost fierce as he spoke, "that you were to give your whole heart to some other man, blessing him with all the riches of affection of which you are capable, living in his very life, belonging to him absolutely—his own, his wife—while to me you were to dole out only the measured pittance of friendship which would be consistent with such a position: was this what you meant?"

Tears gathered in Una's eyes, and she pressed her hands together as if in pain. "Mr. Atherstone, I had but one thought—that you were lonely and suffering, and I longed to comfort you. I did not limit the friendship I offered you in any way in which I could lawfully give it to you."

"But only while you were free, I conclude? Were you not well aware that some other was soon to stand utterly between you and me, cutting you off from me as completely as if you had never consoled me with delusive hopes that already are only torture? Is not Hervey Crichton standing between us even now?"

"Mr. Crichton is nothing to me," said Una with a quiet dignity, "and never will be."

"He does not think so; he is open-mouthed in his desire to win you, and full of hope that he will do so."

"He is not so now," she said in a low tone. A gleam of satisfaction lit up Atherstone's face, but it as quickly faded.

"If not he, then another," he said; "I do not know with what kind of friendship you flattered me you would console me, if your whole heart's love was to be all the while in the possession of some man who could not value one look from your dear eyes as I should."

"Mr. Atherstone, what is it you wish?" said Una, lifting up her head and showing her sweet face, usually so bright and smiling, filled with an expression of bewildered pain.

"What is it I wish!" exclaimed Atherstone, his whole manner softening and his voice growing tremulous with emotion; "oh, my darling! I well know what it is I wish—what I would give years of my life to win! I wish to have you for my wife—my love, my joy, my priceless treasure! I long for you with all the love of which my heart and soul are capable. I struggle in my bonds with a very madness of yearning to gain you for my own—my one sweet comforter—for ever; and yet I dare not ask for you. I am fettered in chains of iron, which hold me down like Prometheus on the rock, in the very sight of that for which alone I care to live, without the power to lift up so much as a hand to win it—this is my cruel torture! Una, you are more inexpressibly dear to me than words from human lips could ever say, and but for the bitter irony of fate which holds you before my eyes—so near and yet so hopelessly unattainable—I would fling the whole powers of my being into the one effort to draw you home to my heart, and win you or die. But, as it is——"

His voice became choked with emotion—he could not go on; and burying his face in his hands, he leant his head against the wall and remained silent, his broad chest heaving convulsively.

The sight of his anguish was unendurable to Una Dysart, for she loved him. Poor child! she knew it but too well; she loved him with the deep overwhelming devotion which a woman feels in actual truth but once, however often her fancy may be caught by passing feelings of a lesser kind. Her heart throbbed almost to suffocation, and the intolerable longing to comfort him sent impulsive words to her lips, which at another time her timidity might have shrunk from uttering.

"As it is," she said, "tell me what I can do for you. Tell me what there is, short of that which may not be, which I can still do to brighten your sad life, to make you feel and know that there is one at least whose whole heart's sympathy is yours; all that is yet possible for me to do I am ready to perform to the uttermost, if only you will tell me how best I may give you rest and consolation."

He turned to her, deeply moved, and caught her hands in his. "Sweetest—dearest child!" he said, "I fear I love you too intensely to be satisfied with any friendship or even affection you could give me, while I have the bitter misery of knowing that you are certain to become to some other man all that I would have you be to me."

"If it would make you happy," she said in her low, soft voice, "I should be content to promise you that what you fear should never be; that I would be your friend only, and nothing else evermore to any one."

"My own darling! can it be possible that you would indeed make such a sacrifice for me? that you would really forego all the happy ties of wife and mother to be the friend and comforter of a solitary, hopeless man, driven by a cruel fate into a barren life of cold endurance? Could you so bless me to your own infinite loss?"

"If it would make you happy," she repeated.

He let her hands fall, and turned away in uncontrollable agitation; but while he paced hurriedly to and fro in the gallery, battling out once more the terrible problem of his life, the sound of approaching voices warned him that they were about to be interrupted. He flew back to Una, and bending over her whispered hoarsely, "My sweetest, I feel as if I dared not accept such a sacrifice; but I must look my destiny in the face, and fight out the whole momentous question in my mind this night; some solution I will reach before I see you again; let me come to you to-morrow, and then my whole heart shall be laid bare before you."

Una's eyes rather than her lips gave assent, for already the gallery door had opened, and Miss Northcote with Mr. Cunliffe and Colonel Dysart came in to examine the art treasures it contained.

Soon after the guests departed, and the master of the Abbey remained in it alone.

Toiling up the steep cliff that led to the Eagles' Nest, with straining sinews and panting breath, as if on some desperate enterprise, went Humphrey Atherstone that same night; when the gay voices that had filled the old Abbey for a time with the echoes of life had died away within its walls, and silence and gloom had fallen upon it once again. He gave himself no respite from the violent exertion needful to scale the difficult ascent, till he had reached the doorway of the lonely tower, where from the dying eyes of his unhappy ancestor the living world had flashed away as they closed in the night of death, and on his own had dawned the vision of that human love, in all its unutterable sweetness, for which his strong nature was craving now with a yearning hunger that could be stayed by no lower aliment.

He stood on the narrow platform of rock which alone separated the ancient building from the precipice, on the brink of which it stood. A few rough stones had been thrown together in front of the doorway as a species of wall to lessen the risk of an unwary step at so perilous a height, and to these Atherstone went forward, instead of turning into the dark cell, and leant upon them with his folded arms while he looked out into the calm night in which the earth was steeped. Above, the heavens were dropping light from myriads of unclouded stars, while below, the vast far-spreading landscape was veiled in a dim soft gloom that seemed to give it the vaporous unreality of dreamland scenery.

There was not a sound excepting the faint mysterious whisperings that rose up from the pine-wood in the hollow of the deep abyss, and the sighing breath of the night wind as it passed him moaning, ever dying away on the dark air only to wake again like the wail of a sorrow that could not sleep; and of that which was or had been human, there was nothing save himself quivering with strong, insatiable life, all gathered up at this moment into one intense overpowering craving for earthly happiness, and the silent corpse of the man whose life agony, far worse for him than the agony of death, had worked itself out in this spot, and over whom since then long centuries had passed in all their chance and change, without the power to stir his cold, dead ashes with even a thrill of feeling.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. Second Series. No. 15. Christ. Part XIII. Christ Teaching by Parables.

Chapter to be read Matt. xxv. (parts of.)

ASK questions about the parables already spoken of, and the lessons taught by them. Those speaking of God's love to sinners, repentance, fruit to be brought forth, &c. Ask what these parables were intended to show—viz., the nature and object of Christ's kingdom, its rise, and progress, hindrances and helps. To-day have parables looking forward to the future, when the King shall come to enter in His kingdom. The Ten Virgins speaks of the preparation for His coming; the Talents, of the honours attending the same.

I. The Ten Virgins. (1) The story. (Read xxv. 1—13.) Marriage always an interesting and joyous event—commencing of new life. Eastern customs differ much from ours. Describe the bridegroom with his friends (John iii. 29) going to the bride's house, and fetching her, accompanied by her friends (Ps. xlv. 15), while others—as the virgins—meet and join the procession on the road. Now point out the similarity and the differences. All took lamps, because marriages generally at night; all made what preparations they considered necessary, and then quietly in sleep awaited the summons; but—five had the necessary oil and five had not. Till the bridegroom came no difference noted. Then picture the scene; the crowd in the streets; the shouts of joy; the midnight procession with torches and lamps; the bridal party coming near; the virgins suddenly awakened; the calm composure of five trimming their lamps; the confusion of the foolish ones at finding their lamps "going out" (not "gone out" as in Authorised Version); their excited appeals to their friends for aid; the courteous refusal; the running about to buy oil; the return too late after the wedding party had entered the house; their being "shut out" into outer darkness.

(2) The application. Take the following points: the virgins as nominal professors of religion—all alike professing to hope for heaven, to look for coming of Christ the heavenly Bridegroom, all with lamps—i.e., means of grace, and taking things quietly till He comes. From examples of destruction of Sodom and the Flood, &c., show the suddenness of Christ coming as a King to destroy His enemies and save His friends. To explain the oil, ask who were formerly anointed, and what the oil was a type of, reminding of the great Prophet and Priest anointed not with oil but with the Holy Ghost (Acts x. 38). Point the obvious lesson as to the time when this Holy Ghost must be sought and used, and the danger of deferring the seeking for it till took late.

II. THE TALENTS. (1) The story. (Read Matt. xxv. 14—30.) Observe word "for" connecting the two parables, must watch and be ready at all times, for Christ comes suddenly back like a king to reckon with his servants. Describe the king on eve of journey distributing his money to each servant according to his ability—their setting to work at once to trade, each just doubling what he had received, except the servant with one; their welcome to their lord at his return, each giving in his account, receiving approving words and reward. Then picture the other coming up with nothing to show. What excuse did he offer? Explain what a wrong view he had taken of his master, afraid to venture to trade with one talent (lest he should lose it) for a master who could gather without having first sown. Notice how his master condemns him. So far from this being excuse, he ought much more to have put out his money to trade, therefore he is punished, and his talent given to the one with ten already.

(2) The application. Ask the children to name some of God's gifts to them—such as vigour of body and mind, time, health, power to please, &c. Show how all are from God (James i. 17), and to be used to His glory (1 Cor. x. 31). Remind of those on the left hand (Matt. xxv. 42),—condemned, not for what they had done, but for what had left undone. Point out ways in which can be "ministering children," according to varying circumstances, and warn of the danger of selfishness. Let the parable be encouragement to others who are doing best. (a) God notices: no effort unseen. (See Matt. iii. 16.) (b) God rewards: each has according to ability here, but full reward hereafter. (c) God increases gifts. No standing still, each using his talents well, receives increase of good gifts: thus Christ increased in wisdom (Luke ii. 52): so shall all. (1 Thess. iv. 1) Let each ask, How am I using God's gifts?

Questions to be answered.

1. What are these two parables intended to teach?
2. Point out the similarity and difference between the two sets of virgins.
3. What is the oil? Prove this from Scripture.
4. What important lessons does the parable of the Ten Virgins teach?
5. Explain what is meant by the Talents.
6. Name three encouragements the parable gives.

MAGGIE'S SCRAPES.

A STORY FOR GIRLS. IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

"MISS AMY and Miss Margaret, come in to your teas. Miss Amy—Miss Maggie! Dear, oh dear! wherever have those children got to?"

The speaker, a tall middle-aged woman, dashed out of the door, with sleeves tucked to the elbows and arms besmeared with flour, in search of the two children. She ran along the garden paths, for she was very busy and grudged the time she was losing, and peeped into every odd nook and corner. Presently she lighted on a small figure, curled up in the little arbour, fast asleep. "Miss Amy!" she cried, giving the sleeper a little shake, "come, wake up; it's tea-time. I've been calling to you with all my might. It's a fine thing, indeed, for me to be wasting my time in running after you children, when I've got my hands so full already that every half-hour ought to be an hour, to give me time to do it all. Just run and fetch Miss Maggie in, there's a good child, and be quick, for your tea's waiting."

Amy let herself slowly down from her comfortable quarters, indulged in a stretch and a yawn, and then walked off in search of her sister, while Susan, the servant, returned to the house and her interrupted work. But the task of finding Maggie was not by any means an easy one. She was a child who had the most extraordinary aptitude for getting out of the way when she was wanted, engaging in the most unheard-of pursuits, hiding in the most out-of-the-way corners. Amy wandered all over the garden, but without discovering a sign of Maggie's presence. At the further end was a ditch and hedge, separating the kitchen garden from a large field. As Amy went along the path by the hedge she suddenly noticed a gap, as if some one had pushed a way through. A little bit of stuff was hanging from a bramble that she recognised directly. She peeped through the gap, and there sure enough in the distance was Maggie and a little boy. Amy called as loudly as she could, for she had no desire to push her way through the hedge, and climb down into the ditch and up again into the field, as Maggie evidently had done.

After a few minutes' screaming to her, Maggie came running along. She scrambled up into the garden with the utmost ease, and catching hold of Amy's hand pulled her along at a furious rate towards the house. Amy looked at her in dismay, wondering whatever Susan would say when she saw her. Her pinafore, that had been clean and white an hour or two ago, was grass-stained and muddy; her frock hanging in a deep festoon on one side from a long rent; her hat swinging at the back of her head; arms, hands, and face black and besmeared; a tangled mass of hair hanging down over her eyes, making her look like a little terrier—this was the picture that Maggie presented.

Susan turned from her paste-board when the children entered the kitchen, and then, as her eyes fell on Maggie, she exclaimed in consternation, "My goodness me, Miss Margaret! wherever have you been? Was there ever such a child? Whatever will your mamma say when she comes home?"

"It was the stupid hedge tore my dress," said Maggie with dogged unconcern.

"And whatever business had you with the hedge?" asked Susan, sharply.

But Maggie did not answer. She rightly judged that Susan would not be the better pleased to hear that she had been setting traps for the sparrows with Dick, the gardener's boy. She submitted quietly to a sharp, quick washing and rubbing, had her rough locks brushed into some sort of order, her torn dress replaced by a clean holland one, and then she and Amy went in to their tea.

It was nearly cold, for the mugs had been filled by Susan ever so long ago, and Maggie was not at all well pleased. Amy certainly had the most right to complain, as it was by no fault of hers that she had been kept waiting for her tea; but she said nothing, eating and drinking quite contentedly.

"What a nice smell there is all about the house," Maggie presently remarked.

"Susan's baking tarts and things for the party," replied Amy.

"Tarts and things, is she?" said Maggie, her eyes sparkling at the very mention of such delicacies. Then she slipped down from her chair and rung the bell.

Presently Susan came steaming in from the kitchen. "What is it you want?" she asked hastily.

"I want one of those tarts," said Maggie, "do give me one Susan; I know mamma would if she were at home."

"I might have known better than to answer the bell," said Susan, angrily, and then, determined that her journey should not be in vain, she caught up the tray and whirled it away, regardless of the fact that neither mugs nor plates were empty.

"Nasty mean thing!" cried Maggie, wrathfully, half inclined to cry at the loss of her bread-and-butter.

It was too hot to spend the evening in-doors, so the two children went back to the garden, Susan calling to Amy to look after Maggie, and let her know if she was after any more mischief. But Maggie was put out, and not in a humour for play, so she went and sat in a sulky fit on the swing seat, letting the ropes sway gently to and fro. Amy, seeing her thus, returned to the arbour and the book she had been reading when she fell asleep.

Maggie did not stay long on the swing. The tarts dwelt on her mind, and she was very curious to know exactly what Susan was making. She had seen, when in the kitchen, that Susan had got the table right against the open window, for the sake of keeping herself or her pastry as cool as possible. So Maggie crept round to the kitchen window, and crouched down underneath it. She waited till the servant went into the other kitchen to fetch something, and then she raised herself to have a peep. There were ever so many dishes of nice things standing on the table to cool, for Susan had just emptied the oven. Maggie had time to see a pile of cheese-cakes, another of jam-puffs, some little golden cakes, and an enormous plum-cake standing ready to be crusted over with some icing that was there in a plate, and then she was obliged to bob down again, for Susan was coming back. She thought how easy it would be to help herself to one of those cheese-cakes or puffs, for they were very carelessly piled, and there were so many Susan could never miss one. As she was thus thinking Susan again turned away from her paste-board.

Maggie jumped up quickly and quietly, and stretching her hand over the low window-sill secured a cheese-cake. Susan was engaged at the pantry, and Maggie determined to have another try for a puff. She was successful again, and managed to bob down before Susan turned her head. She gathered up her frock with the tarts in it, and crept quietly away, for she did not care to risk eating them just under the window.

"I'll go halves with Amy," she said to herself, for she prided herself very much on not being mean. "Look here, Amy!" she cried, running into the arbour; "see what I've got!" and Amy, who was just as fond of tarts as her sister, threw down her book at the sight of Maggie's treasures, in delightful anticipation.

"You shall have the puff, and I'll have the cheese-cake," she said, giving the puff to Amy, after a great deal of consideration on the matter. She did not eat the cheese-cake, however, but sat turning it round, and eyeing it not altogether contentedly. Presently an idea struck her. "Let's halve them," she said; but, unfortunately, Amy had already eaten the larger portion of her puff, so Maggie had to make the best of her cheese-cake. She was thinking, "I had all the trouble of getting them, and it's a shame I can't have a taste of both;" but it was no good saying that, so she had to keep her grievance to herself, and this made her feel very cross.

By-and-by she went into the kitchen to beg for a glass of water. "What's that grease on your frock?" asked Susan, eyeing her suspiciously. Maggie looked down, and found out for the first time that the rich pastry had left great patches on her clean holland frock. The cat was out of the bag now. "I thought I missed some tarts," said Susan. "And now, Miss Maggie, I won't be worried with you any longer;" so saying, Susan caught Miss Maggie up in her strong arms, carried her up-stairs, whipped off her things, slipped on her night-gown, popped her into bed, and left her there, locking the door behind her.

The next morning Maggie's mother called her to her, and talked very seriously about yesterday's bad behaviour; but Maggie listened impatiently. She hated being talked to like this; besides, she didn't see that she deserved it. She had only been amusing herself, and hadn't Amy been doing the same thing, only with a book? She didn't care for books, and so she must find some other way to amuse herself. And as for tearing her dress, it was just an accident, and accidents would happen. Susan had not said anything about the tarts, so she hadn't to find an excuse for that, though doubtless she would have found one to satisfy her own conscience, had the need arisen. She was an odd child—this Maggie, with some good points, we'll hope, but certainly with a very great many bad ones.

"Oh, Maggie—Maggie! you trouble me sorely," her mother said, when she had finished her "lecturing," as Maggie called it. "You are so wilful and headstrong, I don't know what I shall do with you. Why don't you try to be more like Amy?"

"It's the same thing over and over again," exclaimed Maggie, passionately, when she was by herself. "It's all Amy: why can't I be more like Amy indeed! I hate it. They don't like me; Amy's their favourite, and they all try to tease me as much as they can." This was always Maggie's cry; she allowed herself to be so blinded with passion that she could never see her own faults, but was ever ready to accuse others of unkindness towards her.

The day after this was the one fixed for the party. Amy and Maggie were dressed early, and told to keep out of the way, as both their mamma and Susan had plenty to do in preparing for their guests. They went out into the garden to drive in the arches and prepare the lawn for croquet; but Maggie, who was never satisfied with letting things be, was seized with a grand notion of moving the garden-seats to places from which the game might be watched. In the effort of dragging one along the seam of her thin muslin dress gave way. There was nothing for it but to go in, and beg Susan or her mamma to stitch it up, for it would never do to appear with a great gap in the body of her dress.

She went in reluctantly enough, and got her dress mended, but her mamma said she must stay in her own bedroom quietly till the young people began to arrive, for she was not to be trusted out of doors.

This did not suit Maggie at all; she pleaded very hard to be allowed to go into the dining-room and see the table laid out for tea, but this also her mother firmly refused. Then Maggie thought herself very badly used, and began to indulge in some of the wicked, jealous thoughts she was so prone to.

"It's a shame that Amy should be let to stay out of doors, while I am poked up here, just because that stupid seam burst; just as if I could help it. It wasn't sewn tight, I know—a stupid flimsy thing. They do favour Amy, and they hate me—I know they do. I wonder they don't grudge me the food they give me," thought Maggie, and her thoughts were as unreasonable as they were wicked, for her mamma had never punished her severely for any of her mad freaks, thinking that they proceeded more from thoughtlessness than wilful disobedience.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

241. Omitting that of Manasseh, point out the smallest of the twelve tribes of Israel, and what was remarkable about it.

242. Both our Lord and St. Paul speak of faith removing mountains. Give the passages.

243. Do the Scriptures ever use the expression "The righteousness of Christ," or "the imputed righteousness of Christ?"

244. The "disciple whom Jesus loved" evinced great affection for the Saviour on several occasions. Point out a few of them from St. John's Gospel.

245. The writer of one of the Epistles quotes Job and the prophets, not our Lord, as examples of patience. Give his name.

246. We read in 1 Tim. vi. 16 that God dwells in light that no man can approach unto. In what part of the Pentateuch is God represented as being in thick darkness?

247. In recording the transfiguration of our Lord one of the Evangelists uses a phrase totally different from the others. Point it out.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 544.

224. Once only. See Heb. xi. 1.

225. Twice. See Gal. vi. 9; 2 Thess. iii. 13.

226. Matt. viii. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5.

227. Rev. xiii. 10; Matt. xxvi. 52; Exod. xxi. 12; Lev. xxiv. 17.

228. The Samaritans (Acts viii. 5).

229. On Christ's rising from the dead (1 Cor. xv.)

230. John ii. 1—11; Matt. xv. 21—28.

231. John ii. 20; iv. 11, 33; vi. 42—52.

(Drawn by EDWARD HUGHES.)

WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN.

THERE'S a tall lean spectre draped in white,
With bony visage and hollow eyes,
That hovers around our couch by night,
And troubles our sleep with its ghostly sighs;
And when at the dawn it disappears—
For spectres in daylight may not be seen—
Its woeful wailing still haunts our ears,
For this is the ghost of what might have been.

It beckons and points with its taper hand,
As a bailiff might sue for an unpaid debt;
And it drags from the shades of the unseen land
Some deeds of the past we would fain forget.
Some friend we have slighted, some word escaped,
Bespeaking an anger we did not mean,
That the whole of our after life has shaped,
And left us to sigh o'er what might have been.

Is there no vow we have failed to keep?
No evil path we refused to shun?
Is there no heart we have caused to weep,
Or some good work we have left undone?
Is not childhood's innocence far from us now,
With a broad deep gulf of sin between?
And can we sit with unclouded brow
And balance what is with what might have been?

In every heart there's a tender spot,
With some sweet hope lying buried there,—
A faded dream that seems half forgot,
Like the secret drawer with its lock of hair.
The summers they come, and the summers they go,
But the grave of that hope shall aye be green,
And the hearts that cherish it only know
The grief lying under what might have been.

But a morbid fancy, forgetting deeds
And ever sighing, new grief begets,
And the loveliest lives will run to weeds
If left to brood over vain regrets.
Then let us eschew the heart's decay,
And escape from this spectre tall and lean,
Work while it is day, that each one may Fulfil in the end what might have been.

W. C. H.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.
THE CALL NIGHT.

THEY all met on the steps of the Middle Temple Hall—Mr. Ashbury, Maggie, Charley, Hetty and her mother, the two Morton girls, their mother and brother, and Stephen Bowden, "quite a large party," Herbert said, as, by dint of some previously arranged plan, he passed them all in, took them up the dark narrow winding staircase, under a heavy curtain, and placed them safely in the gallery overlooking the hall. They could see him "called" from there, he informed them, and added that he had to dine with his fellow-barristers afterwards, at one of the many already-laid dinner-tables on which they looked down. It was rather a pretty sight, Hetty thought (Hetty was as happy as a child when it first sees the Lord Mayor's show), but she soon tired of the glare and the heat up in the closely-packed gallery, and when she had had a long look at the glittering tables, and the barristers walking about, especially at those in wigs and gowns, and had managed to pick out Herbert for the first time in his, and when she had stared up at the hall and its ceiling and the armour, she tired of the whole thing. She could not hear what was said when at last the students whose names had been "screened" were called, it only sounded like some one grumbling a little at the other end of the building, and then there was a good deal of confusion, and they were all turned out while the lawyers took their places all round those many tables and fed.

"I think it was very disappointing," she said, as they groped their way down the dark staircase again.

"Did you think they were going to stand on their heads?" asked Charley Campbell, who, to tell the truth, had been disappointed too.

"No," she answered, "but I should have been delighted if they had." Then Stephen Bowden, who had put himself at the service of Herbert's guests, took them round to Coke Court, where tea was awaiting them, and over that Herbert's mother, Mrs. Henry Ashbury, presided. It was a little old-fashioned house with a sitting-room on each side of the street door, Herbert had one and Stephen Bowden the other. The latter showed them his. It was a different room from Herbert's, Maggie thought, rather cold at first by virtue of some oil-cloth which bordered the room, but in the middle there was a square of Turkish carpet, and there was a cosy easy chair in one corner and a couch in another, and books and papers everywhere. It was rather nice, Maggie thought, too, that getting a glimpse of the room in which her lover passed his days. Then they went in to tea, and before they had finished Herbert, who had hurried over his dinner, came.

Herbert was inclined to like Rose, the younger of the Morton girls, and the respective mammas were inclined to encourage it, so what with the piano and the people who paired off together the time soon slipped by. Poor Charley found it a little stupid at first perhaps, but he amused himself at last by sitting in a corner and talking to Hetty about Margaret, and Hetty was so animated and so happy in discussing the virtues of her friend, that once or twice Charley almost forgot the subject while he thought what a jolly little girl Hetty Ashbury was, "There's so much 'go' in her," he said to himself afterwards; "I don't wonder Maggie likes her."

They were soon disturbed from their tête-à-tête, however, for Mr. Ashbury, who always tried to make himself agreeable, had got up quite an animated discussion with Ellen, the elder Morton girl, on the women's rights question, and her sister Rose had come to her aid, and Herbert put in a word or two, and as Herbert strongly objected to waste his eloquence on unattentive ears, he took care that all the room listened. Seeing that the discussion was getting a shade too warm, Mrs. Ashbury asked for some more music, and Rose Morton sat down to the piano, and after a minute or two began in a voice which, though rather loud, was yet not altogether unsympathetic, to sing "When all the world is young;" and when she had finished Stephen Bowden looked across at Maggie, the face he loved while all the world was young, and saw that she was in close conversation with Charley Campbell.

CHAPTER VIII.

CONCERNING A ROSE AND ITS WEARER.

TEN o'clock came at last, and they all got ready to depart, Herbert went home with the Morton party, and Stephen Bowden with the rest. Mrs. Ashbury walked with her brother-in-law, Charley and Hetty together, and Maggie with Stephen. It was a long way to St. John's Wood, but they were all good walkers, so the idea of taking a cab never once presented itself.

"Now, Maggie, tell me why you have looked so grave all the evening," Stephen Bowden said. Poor Maggie had been thinking of her father's communication in Covent Garden.

"It was nothing," she answered, "only a little business of my father's."

"I like Mr. Ashbury so much," he said, not replying to her remark; "I am sure we shall get on together."

"Yes, I hope so," sighed Maggie, mentally hoping that her father would not borrow and lose Stephen's money. It worried her terribly, that borrowing propensity of her father's, against which, if only for pride's sake, she could not warn her lover. Then, too, she had had some difficulty in keeping Herbert and her father at a respectful distance through the evening, and there was the remembrance that her father had thrown up the secretaryship; and the last quarter's rent was not yet paid, and there were all kinds of odd sums owing for different things, and the prospect of paying was—nowhere.

"Maggie, my dear Maggie," said the old man, turning back to meet them, and speaking to his daughter with the old-fashioned politeness which characterised him, "how forgetful of me! before I met you to-day I purchased this rose for you in Covent Garden, thinking you would like to wear it this evening, and—will you believe me?—I put it into my great-coat pocket and forgot it entirely until this moment;" and he handed her the crushed blue paper containing his gift.

"Oh, daddy!" was all she said as she took it gratefully, and her eyes filled with tears while she thought, and could not help thinking, that it was very kind of the dear old man to give it to her, but that it was rather a pity to buy roses on a winter's day when the rent was still unpaid, and even the baker's bill was likely soon to be a consideration.

"Flowers are expensive at this time of year," Mrs. Ashbury said sharply, as she took the old man's arm again. She thought he might have been a little more careful of his money than to waste it in buying roses for his own daughter. Had it been for her even it would have been different. It is so easy to forgive a pleasant fault when one's own self has been the excuse for committing it.

"I do not consider expense, when I wish to give my daughter a trifling pleasure," Mr. Ashbury replied in his most stately manner, and the scant amount of affection between the two was not augmented that night.

"Stephen," said Maggie, "you will have to sit for Troilus some other time. I am going to make my father the subject of my first picture, and I shall begin it to-morrow."

"Well, I always felt an unworthy Troilus," he laughed, "so it is a load off my mind, and you had not found a Cresseide had you, excepting the one I suggested—yourself? It is just the face for it," he added, and he looked at her, and thought Chaucer must have had some fair fearless face like Margaret's before him when he put that beautiful confession into the mouth of his heroine—

"And as the new-abashed nightingale," &c.

"Oh no," she answered, "it would look so absurd and conceited to sit to oneself for anything of that sort. Besides, I hope I have not the face for it," she laughed, "for Cresseide was inconstant, you know."

"Ah, I had forgotten that, and Troilus forgave her too: I shouldn't forgive, Margaret, though I could understand you being so," he said, with the self-doubt creeping back.

"Do not let us talk about inconstancy," she said uneasily; "besides, if either of us distinguish ourselves in that way, perhaps it will be you."

"Well, and would you forgive me?"

"Yes," she answered quickly, "I would forgive you anything in the world."

"You are better than I, Maggie: I said just now I would not forgive you."

"Ah, it is different," she answered; "if I never saw you again after to-night I should not regret the past, but still be grateful that all that is now had been, and feel that my life was better for having known and cared for you." So Margaret Ashbury proved herself something of a hero-worshipper after all, in spite of the speech she had made to Charley Campbell about a middle pathway being the best one to tread.

"You'll come to Margaret Street in the morning, won't you, Maggie?" Charley Campbell said when they reached St. John's Wood.

"Yes," she answered, "I shall be there about eleven." There was no occasion to have told him the time, Stephen thought. Then Maggie and her father wished the two men good night (they had seen Mrs. Henry Ashbury and Hetty home) and entered the gate.

"I say, Maggie," exclaimed the irrepressible Charley, returning, "tell me which way you'll come in the morning, and I'll come and meet you. We haven't had a walk for an age, and we used to have so many." She gave a hurried look at Stephen, who stood watching them.

"No," she said nervously, "I like walking alone, I can think about my work then, besides Hetty would be jealous perhaps," she added, in a diplomatic manner, as she went into the house and shut the door.

"Hetty!" he exclaimed aloud, while Bowden still calmly looked at him, "well, she must know better than that anyhow."

(To be continued.)

COMFORTABLE WORDS.—VII.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK-ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that have set themselves against me round about."—Ps. iii. 6.

THERE is something remarkable in the tone of calm confidence which characterises this psalm. Remarkable—not in itself: for why should we not implicitly trust our God and Father?—but remarkable under the circumstances. Just recall those circumstances. Not long before, David, the writer of the psalm, had fallen into grievous transgression. He, the King of Israel—the man after God's own heart—the inspired singer—the head of the religious portion of the Jewish community—had done a deed, the criminality of which it is not easy to express in adequate terms. That crime had alienated his people from him. It had raised up a formidable antagonist in the person of Ahithophel. It had encouraged the reprobate Absalom to plot against his father's crown and life. The rebellion then which broke out, and nearly overthrew David's throne, was distinctly traceable to the sin in question: and when the Psalmist cried, "Lord, how are they increased that trouble me! many are they that rise up against me," he knew perfectly well that his own conduct was the true cause of the trouble which he was deploring before God.

Worse than this, he had caused the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme. It requires but little effort of imagination to picture to ourselves the effect which would be produced in the country generally when the news of the King's conduct came to be talked about. The inconsistency of religious people is often a sad stumbling-block to those whose minds are not made up,—who have had no personal experience of the difficulty of leading a godly life. David's fall would do mischief here. Young people especially would begin to think that there was nothing in religion. On the other hand, the open enemies of godliness would openly rejoice. They would laugh over the unmasking of another hypocrite. They would ridicule the apparent powerlessness of religion to preserve its adherents from the worst sins. Directly and indirectly, they would blaspheme the Lord God of Israel. And when David heard them say, "There is no help for him in God," there must have been a painful echo to the savage taunt in his own conscience. He must have felt, though not forsaken, how deeply he had deserved to be forsaken by the Lord his God.

And yet, under such circumstances as these, David, no longer blinded by passion, but realising to the full the evil and the mischief that he had done; no longer insensible and hardened, but feeling acutely the heinousness of his offence, and understanding all its exaggerations, could express himself confidently about God: "In spite of what men say, and say truly against me, Thou, O God, art a shield for me: my glory, and the lifter up of my head."

This state of mind is very surprising.

Now what brought it about? A full belief of—a full assurance of the Divine forgiveness. To be exempt from suffering, from punishment on account of his sin—David never expected. His days were to be darkened, down to the end by the shadow of that tremendous crime. The sword was never to depart from his house; and he knew this. But—he was a forgiven man. God the Father had generously extended pardon to His erring child. David had been received into favour again. The light of the Divine countenance was once more beaming upon him. Peace had dawned, after a black night of disquiet and mental distress. Yes, what stood between David and utter madness was just a simple word: "The Lord hath put away thy sin." David believed the word; and death passed away, and life came.

In all this we have an apt illustration of the effect produced upon the soul by an assured conviction of the forgiveness of sin. David, plunged into spiritual stupor, is a type of the soul before it is awakened by the touch of the Spirit of God to see itself as it is. David's condition in the psalm is a type of the soul rejoicing in the Lord. And just as with him, so with us. When the awakening has come, when we understand what it is that a sinful nature, and sinful practice have exposed us to, then that which interposes between us and the wretchedness of despair is the simple assurance, that God has put away our transgressions for Jesus Christ's sake. It is a word—a word believed—that makes the difference. But that word is a word of God. On one side of it is death—spiritual death; on the other side of it is life—life eternal.

Let us settle it then in our minds—that we have to begin, in the spiritual life, with a belief of the forgiveness of our sin. The "little children" of whom St. John speaks in his Catholic Epistle—the mere beginners in religion—have "their sins forgiven for His name's sake." The Divine order is—first peace, then holiness. Peace, through an assured conviction of being reconciled to God through Christ: holiness, as the product of the joyful filial obedience which results from reconciliation. And how are we assured that our sins are forgiven? As David was; by a simple, child-like acceptance of the Divine statement. To the eye of sense, we build a pyramid on a cobweb, when we trust to the bare word; but to the eye of faith, the word of the Lord is the only solid and trustworthy foundation. It is as indestructible as His omnipotence; as lasting as His eternity.

Let us consider also that, as with David so with us—a feeling of confidence flows from the sense of forgiveness. Soldiers, statesmen, councillors, were setting themselves against the Jewish king in a skilfully organised conspiracy. There was everything to be dreaded in the traitorous combination; and, probably, amongst the little band of tried veterans who still remained faithful to their allegiance there were few that could "take their rest," as their sovereign did, until the matter was brought to a decision. Few could say, as he did, "I laid me down, and slept: I awaked, for the Lord sustained me." And why was David so self-possessed and calm? Because he was forgiven; because the breach was healed; because all was right between him and his God. He could afford now to be calm. He could leave matters with the Lord now. "Salvation is of the Lord." What had he to do but to wait in quiet confidence and see that salvation, although ten thousands of the people, led on by skilful and unscrupulous chieftains, had set themselves against him round about?

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

IX.—WITH THE FEEBLE AND FAINT-HEARTED.

IS there any condition wherein we feel greater need of human help and true loving sympathy, than in the slow feeble creeping from sickness to complete convalescence, when the pulse of life beats low, and the failing foot yet lacks power to step across that dim barrier between health and sickness—not far from the valley of the shadow of death?

In this bright glowing summer-tide, when the sun warms bloodless creatures into renewed life, our English sea-coast abounds with visitors, among whom near and dear friends, parents, children, slowly and painfully winning their way back to health and strength are the objects of peculiar care. In all our large towns people who have money to spend are, at least, beginning to make up their minds where they shall take their autumn holiday;—in many quiet health-resorts wealthy invalids, and some who are not wealthy, have already passed the early spring and summer;—at a score of pleasant watering-places, where the cool sparkling waves break upon the "ribbed sea-sand," troops of children are already browning in the sun, scores of hearts feel a throb of grateful joy as the glow of health begins to touch cheeks lately pale, and dull eyes brighten under the clear blue sky.

Thousands upon thousands are on their way to that great restorer, the sea, if it be only for a few hours by excursion train. England might seem to have gathered all its children at its borders, and very soon we shall be hearing how empty London is, and a new excuse for a holiday will be that there is "nothing doing" and "nobody is in town." And yet throughout the busy streets a throng continues to hurry onward in restless activity. Only well-accustomed observers could see any considerable difference in the great thoroughfares of London. Shops and factories look busy enough, and if nothing is doing, there is a mighty pretence of work, while the nobodies are a formidable portion of the population when regarded in the aggregate. In another month or six weeks the census of our large towns will still further have diminished. Prosperous tradesmen, noting the decrease of customers, will begin to prepare to take part in the general exodus. "Gentlefolks" will have concluded bargains for furnished houses on the coast, and put their dining and drawing rooms into brown holland. In West End streets and squares the front blinds will be drawn, and all inquiries will be answered from the areas, where charwomen supplement the duties of servants on board wages. "London is empty," the newspapers will say, and in every large town in the kingdom the great outgoing will have left whole districts comparatively untenanted. Yet what a vast population will remain; what a great army of toiling men and women who go about their daily work, and keep up the unceasing buzz of the industrial hive. What troops of children, who, except for Sunday-school treats, would scarcely spend a day amidst green fields, or learn how to make a daisy chain, or hear the soft summer wind rustling the leaves of overhanging trees.

It would perhaps astonish us if we could have set down in plain figures how many men and women in England have never seen the sea; how many people have never spent a week away from home, or had a real long holiday in all their lives. It may be happy for them if they are not compelled, by sudden sickness or accident, to fall out of the ranks, and to leave the plough sticking in the furrow. It is not all for pleasure and careless enjoyment that the thousands of our wealthy brethren and sisters go to the terraced houses, or handsomely appointed mansions, which await them all round the English shore. Into how many eyes tears will spring, when the prayers for all who are in sorrow, need, or adversity are read in seaside churches next Sunday. By what sick-beds, and couches set at windows whence wistful eyes may look out upon the changeful glory of wood and sea and sky, anxious hearts are throbbing. What silent tears and low murmuring cries on behalf of dear ones on whose pale cheeks the July roses never more may bloom, mark the watches of the silent night, when the waves sob wakefully upon the beach. What thrills of hope and joy contend with obtrusive fears as, the golden spears of dawn break through the impenetrable slate-blue sky, and a touch of strength and healing is seen to have left its mark upon a brow on which the morning kiss is pressed with a keen throb that is itself almost a pang.

The first faltering footsteps back to life after a long illness or a severe shock, how they need careful guidance. Let the stronger arm, the helping hand, the encouraging eye be ready, or they may fail before the goal of safety be reached.

"All that is now wanted is strength, careful nursing, plenty of nourishment, pure air—the seaside if possible, and perhaps the south coast would be best." Welcome tidings, even though they herald slow recovery, inch by inch and day by day, while watchful patience measures out the time by meat and drink, and the money that will buy the means of comfort or of pleasure, becomes but golden sand running through the hour-glass, which marks each happy change.

Yes; but what of the poor and feeble, the faint-hearted who, having neither oil nor wine, nor the twopence wherewith to pay for lodging at the inn, must need lie there by the way-side, if no hand is stretched out to help them?

While at those famous health-resorts, the names of which are to be read at every railway station, and in the advertisement sheets of every newspaper, hundreds and thousands are coming back from weakness to strength, there are hundreds and thousands still who are discharged from our great metropolitan hospitals, to creep to rooms in dim, close courts and alleys, where all the tending care that can be given them must be snatched from the hours of labour necessary to buy medicine and food. How many a poor sorrowing soul has said with a sigh, "Oh! if I could only send you to the sea-side. The doctors all say fresh air's the great thing; but what's the use? they say the same of pure milk and meat and wine."

It may be the father who has met with an accident, and cannot overget the shock of a surgical operation—or rheumatic fever may have left mother, son, or daughter in that terrible condition of utter prostration, when it seems as though we were in momentary danger of floating away into a fainting unconsciousness, which not being oblivion, engages us in a struggle beyond our waking powers.

Alas! in the great summer excursion to the coast these poor fainting brethren and sisters are too seldom remembered. Here and there a building is pointed out as an infirmary, a sea-side hospital, or even as a retreat for convalescents, but the latter institutions are so few, and the best of them are so inadequately supported, that they have never yet been able to prove by startling figures the great benefits which they confer upon those who are received within their walls.

It will be worth while to pay a visit to the oldest of these truly beneficent institutions, the "Seaside Convalescent Hospital at Seaford," and to see how, in an unpretentious way, and without costly appliances, such a charitable effort may be worthily maintained.

Curiously enough, Seaford itself is an illustration of declension from strength to weakness, and of the early stages of recovery; for though it is one of the famous Cinque Ports, it has for nearly 200 years been an unnoted retreat. It is a chartered town nevertheless, having been elevated to that privilege in 1544, and is still governed by bailiff and freemen, or, "jurats," who solemnly administer justice in a quaint old town-hall, of about the size of a boat-house and the appearance of an old-fashioned tin tea-caddy.

Seaford is still a place of old, odd customs, such as the election of the chief of the municipality at an assembly of freemen at a certain gate-post in the town, to which they are marshalled by an officer bearing a mace surmounted with the arms of Queen Elizabeth. It is famous, too, for Roman and other antiquities, and its queer little church dedicated to St. Leonard, has some rare specimens of quaint carving and a peal of bells which are peculiarly musical, while the sounding of the complines on a still summer's night is good to hear. In fact, for a mere cluster of houses forming an unpretentious and secluded town, almost without shops to attract attention, with scarcely the suspicion of a high street, and destitute of a grand hotel, Seaford is remarkably interesting for its legendary lore, as a good many people know, who have discovered its greatest attraction, and take lodgings at the dull little place, where even the martello tower is deserted. The chief recommendation of the place, however, is its healthfulness, and the grand air which blows off the sea to the broad stretch of shingly beach, and the range of cliff and down-land which stretches as far as Beachy Head, and rises just outside the town into one or two bluffs, about which the sea-gulls whirl and scream, as the evening sun dips into the sparkling blue of the water. It is just at the foot of the boldest of these ascents that we see an old-fashioned mansion, once known as Corsica Hall, but now more distinctly associated with the name of the Convalescent Hospital, of which it is the temporary home, the London offices of the charity being at No. 8, Charing Cross, London.

The institution, which was founded in 1860, has for its president the Archbishop of Canterbury, and for its patronesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Duchess of Teck, and it has done its quiet work efficiently and well, under difficulties which must have required staunch interest on the part of its committee.

It is difficult at first to understand that the big many-roomed house just by the spur of the cliff, and peeping out to see over the shingle ridge, is in any sense a hospital; but here is a convalescent who will give us a very fair idea of the work that is being done; a tall fellow who is but just recovering from acute rheumatism, and is now able to go about slowly but with a cheery, hopeful look in his face. Presently, as one comes near the front door, a lad, who having come from a hospital where he has been attended for fractured ankle, has been sent here to recover strength, is hobbling across a poultry-yard, where a grand company of black Spanish, Polish, Cochin China, and other fowls are assembled to be fed, and beneath a pent-house roof in this same yard, on a bench, which would be well replaced by a more comfortable garden-seat if the funds would allow, there is a sheltered and comfortable corner for the afternoon indulgence of a whiff of fresh air. Twenty-five men and twenty-four women are all the inmates, besides attendants, for whom space can be found; and an inspection of the airy and scrupulously clean dormitories, or rather bedrooms, on each side of the building, will show that all the accommodation has been made available. It must be remembered, however, that as the period of each inmate's stay is but a month of twenty-eight days, fresh cases are constantly admitted during all the summer months; so that though as late as at the end of March only fourteen men and six women were distributed in the wards, the average number admitted during the last official year has been 511 (an increase of twenty-four over the year before), while the total number of cases received since the opening of the institution amounts to nearly 5,000.

SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

MIRIAM.

"Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and dances."

STAR of the Sea!—so lives thy name for us,
And fairer is thine olden history
Than hers whom fables name sprung from the sea.
'Twas thine upon the morn of exodus
To chant the sacred pæan, and inspire
The Hebrew maidens with thy sacred fire,
As forth they sent their strain harmonious.
"The Lord hath triumphed gloriously!" In days
Far distant from thine own, thy spirit lives
Where many a modest maid her talent gives
To swell the choir within God's house of praise.
He triumphs still. In diverse forms and ways
He cleaves the Red Sea wave. The maiden's heart
He consecrates to Mary's "better part,"
And gilds earth's sweetest gift with heaven's own saintly lays.

MAURICE DAVIES.

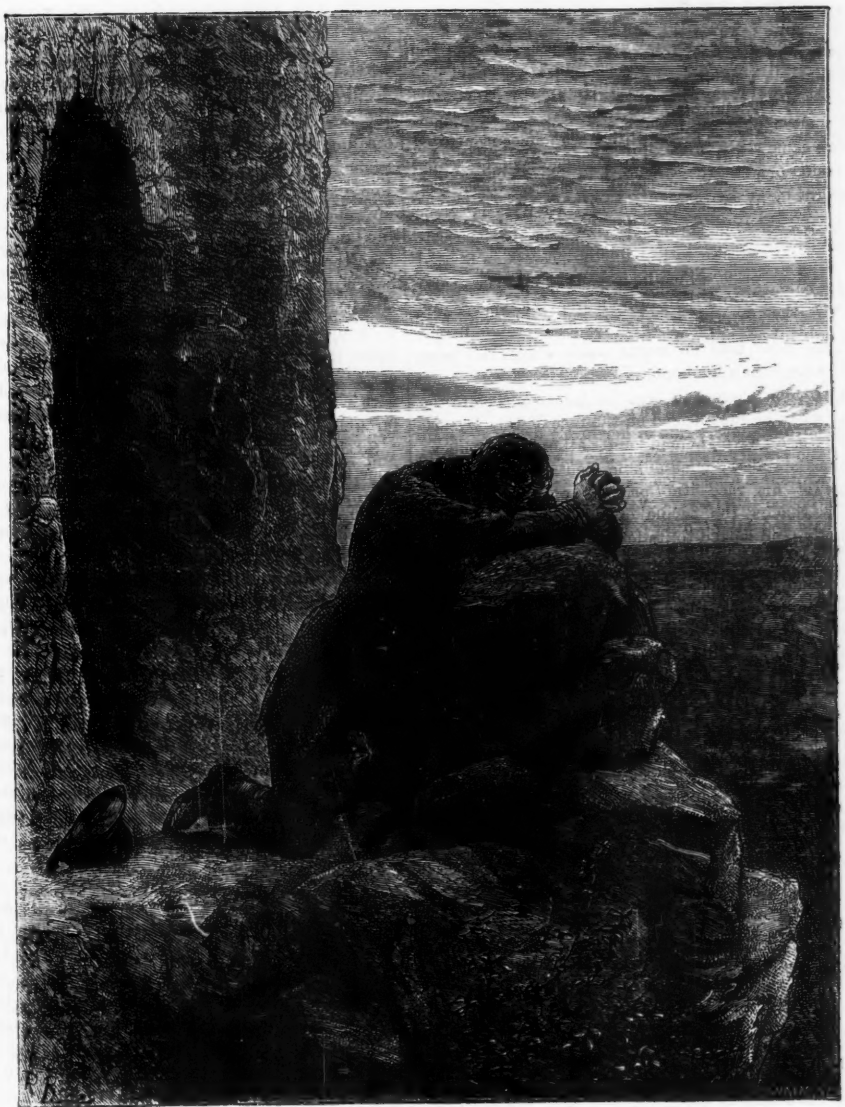
ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. P. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XVI.

T was a fit place, this Eagles' Nest, and a fit time, in the gloom and silence, for the work Humphrey Atherstone had come there to accomplish—a labour concentrated into one short night, which most men leave to the gradual development of years. He had come to meet his destiny face to face; to wrestle with it for the possession of that prize, which he already knew to be dearer to him than life—dearer than peace and safety, and which he must weigh in the balance now, that he might learn whether it were also dearer than his honour.

Two idols there had been for this man before the hour when he first looked on the face of Una Dysart, and these were honour and Atherstone Abbey; honour stainless, unassailable, and Atherstone, the home of his race—the princely old castle under whose shadow the people of the vast estate dwelt lovingly, and looked to its lord for all that concerned their well-being with a trust and fealty that had descended to them unimpaired from the ancient feudal times. To these idols he had done homage with a desperate worship, through all that thick darkness which had overspread his life and quenched the glory of his old inheritance obscuring even the light of honour, till he scarce knew if he had always rightly discerned it: and now for him a wondrous power had arisen, mightier in its intensely sweet and subtle fascination than all that claimed mastery over him before,—which swayed his whole being like a bulrush in the wind, and drove him to feel that he could trample even honour under his feet, to win that priceless love to be his own.



But could he—could he indeed let honour go? not honour only, but truth and justice—all for which he could respect himself? was he to become the object of his own utter scorn? In the one great struggle of his previous life, when he had been so sorely tossed between conflicting influences, that he felt as if he scarce knew at last the distinction between good and evil, he had seized hold of a compromise which seemed just to save him from the loss of honour, that would have been as moral death to him, and he had clung to it ever since, with a tenacity which had withstood the shock of many a temptation; but this last stronghold of integrity must be utterly thrown down if he was to yield to the craving of his whole being, and seek Una Dysart to be his wife.

All night long the struggle raged within him. There were moments when the lovely winning face of the first woman he had ever loved appeared to pass before his vision, with the sweet eyes full of wistful tenderness; the beautiful lips quivering with deepest sympathy. And it would seem to him that the far-off murmur of her low melodious voice came stealing up faintly from the abyss, whispering, "Come to me, my love,—my love, oh! come to me," and he would stretch his longing arms out into the empty air, and call aloud to Una that she was his only life, and he must win her to his heart or die; and then the remembrance of the oath he had so often sworn in his heart, that never wife or child should sit with him beneath the roof-tree of the Abbey, came back upon him in its strength, and he knew if he broke it for Una Dysart's sake, he would walk the earth a dishonoured man, a traitor to himself, and with a wail he would call out her name in accents of farewell.

So did he battle, vainly, fiercely, coming to no issue through the hours of darkness, and when the morning dawned it found him with his lofty head pillowed on the stones, prostrate, haggard, torn with the never-ending conflict.

He lifted up his weary eyes and looked towards the pearl-hued east, where the fair new day was gathering round her all her robes of light, and smiling on the earth that woke responsive with carolling birds and opening flowers, and dewdrops reflecting back the new-born glory; and something there was in the scene that brought before him the image of Una in her bright purity, her fresh unsullied youth, her fearless innocence, and he found the temporary solution of his difficulty in the resolve that he would leave the decision, of their mutual destiny to her,—he would tell her all that he could reveal of his cruel position, and that which she decreed for him he would accept, for weal or woe.

When Atherstone had come to this resolution, he rose from the stony couch on which he had been stretched, as on a rack, with his own soul for a torturer, and went with slow and weary steps down the rocky path where last he had gone with Una's little soft hand trembling in his own; the charm of her presence came back to him as he staggered on; her fair face seemed to gleam upon him from among the trees, her sweet voice was in every breath of wind, and the longing for her rose so imperiously within his heart that he could scarce restrain himself from turning even then in the direction of Vale House. It was, however, of course impossible to see her at that hour, and he knew it would be best that he should wait until the evening, when she was certain to be alone, as he had heard Colonel Dysart arrange to drive Mr. Cunliffe to the station in time for the night mail to London. He turned, therefore, towards the Abbey to pass the interval as best he might.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"Pillowed on the stones"—p. 584.

The sun was slowly sinking after a day of overpowering heat, when at last Humphrey Atherstone passed through the gates of Una's home and went slowly up the avenue towards the house. He walked languidly, like a man recovering from an illness, for a mental conflict such as that he had sustained the night before does more to weaken life and strength than any mere physical malady could accomplish; but there came a gleam of light into his eyes, and his expression of weariness changed to one of energy and eagerness, as he suddenly saw at a little distance the graceful form of the woman on whom his great deep heart had fixed itself with a tenacity which nothing evermore could shake. She was standing in a flower-garden, which lay at one side of the house, below the drawing-room windows, looking with thoughtful eyes at a group of tall white lilies which had just reached the perfection of their summer glory.

Atherstone stood still and gazed upon her with eyes that devoured every line of her lovely drooping figure and snow-white draperies. She seemed to him in her whiteness and grace to have a peculiar affinity with the spotless flowers over which she was bending; her hair had all been gathered back from her pure, pale face, glorified by its expression of nobleness and truth, and her whole form, bathed in the last golden gleam of sunset, seemed to shine out with a dazzling brightness.

Atherstone's heart sank as he gazed; for he felt as if it were impossible that this fair stainless woman could take part in a course which diverged in ever so slight a degree from purest honour. He went towards her, and it was new life to him to see the sudden rapture that flashed into her charming face when she perceived him. Without a word, but simply as a trusting child, she placed both her hands in his, and he held them fast a few minutes, as if he could never let her go; then he said quietly, from the very intensity of his agitation, "I have much to say to you; will you come into the house and sit down?"

He could see that she trembled, but she turned at once and went up the steps of the glass door which led to the drawing-room, while he followed her almost like a criminal going to his doom; for it might be—it might be that when he left that house he should be parted from her for ever.

Una took her place on an ottoman in a corner of the room where already the shadows were gathering, and he sat down beside her, leaning for a moment his head upon his hand, as if he lacked the courage to begin the conversation that might decide his fate. At last he spoke, in a voice whose mingled passion and pathos thrilled to her very heart.

"You know, my darling, from what passed between us yesterday, that every hope I can ever have on earth is irrevocably fixed on you. I had never loved any woman before I met you; but from the moment when my eyes first fell on your dear face, I have loved you with a daily increasing intensity, which makes me feel that to part with you now would be worse than death itself. That which for years has been the bane of my life, has, however, thrust itself between you and me, and so long as it was still possible for me to endure the thought of existence without you, I believed it must stand for ever as a fatal bar, shutting me out from the paradise of your sweet presence. That time is past; I cannot—I will not lose you! or brook for a moment the possibility of your ever being the wife of any other man. Nor do I any longer delude myself into the belief that your friendship, dear as it was, can in any sense stay the hunger of my heart. No! it would but sadden me, by holding perpetually before my eyes the perfect companionship which might bless my home, and I am very sure that the generous sacrifice you spoke of yesterday could only be a lifelong torture to us both, if I were base enough to accept it. Therefore I come to you, my Una—my life's angel—to ask that you yourself would set aside the obstacle between us, and tell me that I may redeem my existence from the ban under which it lies, for it cannot be that one so pure and noble as yourself should err in your decision, and you shall be to me a conscience, better and safer than my own."

As he ceased she looked at him with an uneasy bewildered expression. "You must explain to me exactly what you mean," she said; "it is all incomprehensible and vague to me at present."

"So far as I can I will, my dearest; but it is one of the painful complications of my position that even to you I cannot reveal the real nature of the difficulty which has caused me such deep misery. This much, however, you can understand. Some years ago, by no fault of my own, I found myself in a position of the cruellest perplexity, in which it seemed impossible that I could hold to the laws of human justice, in the strictest sense, without originating such an amount of evil, widespread and malignant in its results, that I could not think it otherwise than criminal to bring it it into existence. There appeared to be but one compromise which could satisfy my own sense of honour, and that was the resolution which I then formed to live a solitary life, unblest by wife or child. The matter was known to no human being but myself, and the decision wholly in my own hands. I could have been called in question by no earthly power if I had resolved to avoid the tremendous evils involved in an adherence to the strictest letter of the law, and yet made no sacrifice of my future happiness; but to satisfy my own internal standard of right, I determined to forego marriage, and if I could now convince myself that I was the victim of too rigid a code of honour, there is nothing to prevent me from giving my Quixotic resolutions to the winds, and taking freely of the happiness which is not denied to the poorest man on earth. You can never know, my darling, how terribly I was tempted to do this yesterday, when you spoke those sweetest words which, happen what may, I shall be thankful I have lived to hear; for I could so easily have kept back from you the impalpable obstacle which my own definition of highest rectitude alone has placed between us; but I dared not settle the question in my own favour which another might conscientiously decide for me, and therefore I come to you, my dearest, to ask you to absolve me from the fancied necessity of sacrificing my whole existence to an ideal code of honour; if you will but tell me your own happiness is involved no less than mine, it will altogether outweigh the seeming obligation of any self-formed law, and then without a doubt or fear I will fling aside the weight which so long has crushed me, and ask from your hands the perfect happiness which you alone can give me."

He ceased, and there was perfect silence for a few minutes, while the destinies of those two living beings hung in the balance.

CHAPTER XVII.

Una had listened to Atherstone with varying expressions of hope and fear and disquietude chasing each other over her mobile face, and when he paused and seemed to devour her with his eyes in breathless anxiety for her answer, she turned to him with an almost piteous look of distress. "I still can hardly understand what it is you mean me to do; surely you do not ask me to pronounce on a question of right and wrong without knowing to what it refers."

"My darling," he said eagerly, "the matter is so simple that I am sure you need not hesitate to decide upon it, merely to relieve me from the responsibility of seeking my own happiness at the cost of ever so fanciful an idea of almost impossible honour, for since I have learned to love you so utterly, so wildly as I now do, I have lost the power of being a law to myself, or seeing clearly where the line of justice may be drawn. Therefore it is that I have staked the whole issue on your decision, and if you will but say to me that your own precious life would be saddened by our separation, I should feel amply satisfied, that I am not bound to strain after the romantic chivalry of less enlightened days at such a cost."

Still the large eyes looked wistfully in his face and the sweet lips trembled, but were silent.

He caught her hands in his. "My darling Una! it would be for your happiness as for mine that you should come to me, would it not? say only that I have not deceived myself in this?—you do love me?"

"Oh yes," she whispered softly.

"Then come to me," he said, drawing her closer to him, "let us for ever forget all doubts and obstacles. I do not now ask of you any decision as to right or wrong, I only beseech of you to let me love you all my life, to come home to my heart for ever!"

She had been confused and bewildered by his ambiguous words, by his half-defined hints of some deviation from truth and justice which would be involved in a union with him whom she loved with the whole power of her being, but there was no mistaking the meaning of this last earnest prayer—he was but asking her to crown herself no less than him with uttermost joy; to receive, at the same moment that she gave, the highest happiness she could imagine on this earth; to secure herself for evermore from the dreary, hopeless wretchedness of life apart from him, and she all but yielded. The longing to chase away all clouds of sadness from that beloved face impelled her irresistibly to utter the glad consent already trembling on her lips; but suddenly, at this crisis of her fate, the strange sentence of warning once spoken to her and half forgotten, came echoing back upon her inner sense: "Remember, you have one life only, for good or ill," and with the words came the recollection of her own bold, confident assertion, that she would make this one life noble, whether happy or not—that it should be great and pure at any cost. And was she now about to decide for herself and another, that they should tamper with justice in any shape or way to gratify themselves? was she going to drag this man down from his own high standard as well as from hers? At the bitter thought her heart stood still, a struggle rose within her which was almost unbearable, and faintly she gasped out, "My happiness is bound up in yours, I do not deny it; but did you not say that until now you have believed the highest honour held you to your resolution?"

"Oh, Una, let it go! it was but a visionary fancy, it can weigh nothing against your life and mine; do you think I can endure to lose you now?"

"I cannot lead you to fall from principle," she said; "you yourself would one day hate me for it."

"Never, darling—never!" he exclaimed, clasping her hands almost fiercely in his own. "Let me but have you, and the whole world, with all that men deem best and greatest in it, were well lost to me!"

"Not honour—not honour," she said, "keep honour and let me go. Yes! if need be let me die! but never let me be to you a source of wrong or failure;" and with a violent effort she tore herself out of his grasp and rushed from the room.

Whatever might have been the obligations by which Humphrey Atherstone believed himself to be bound previous to this last interview with Una Dysart, they were now all swept away, as though they had never been, by the fierce tide of feeling which had completely overwhelmed him, and drowned all thought or care for anything on earth, but to win her swiftly and surely as his wife, from whom nothing in the whole wide universe should separate him more.

He was too completely overwhelmed by her sudden disappearance when she struggled out of his grasp and fled away, to give a moment's consideration to the motives which impelled her thus to do violence to the love she had confessed, he only knew that he would not give her up—that she was and ever should be his, by all the strength of his will, and he could not even bring himself to leave the house until he had seen her once again, and forced from her lips the promise that she would fling aside all scruples as completely as he had done himself. He sent message after message to entreat that she would come and speak to him for but one moment; and at last when the astonished servants quite failed to satisfy him with the answers they conveyed, Una's own maid brought him a note, which contained these words: "Do not ask to see me again—at least to day; I cannot bear it." Then slowly and reluctantly he left the house, but it was with the indomitable resolution that the obstacle he himself had been mad enough, as he now thought, to raise in her mind, should not have the power to separate them ultimately, happen what might.

Meanwhile Una, flung across her bed with her face buried on the pillows, was giving way to a passionate agony, which was making her feel, almost with despair, the great power of the love which had taken possession of her whole being. By a desperate struggle in that last critical moment of their interview, she had retained her hold of the nobleness and rectitude which she had resolved should at least glorify the only life she had to spend, by whatever else of joy or sorrow it might be marked; but now she felt like one who comes out of a great battle wounded and bruised, and knows that all strength is gone to carry on the fight, or even almost to retain the victory won; it was nothing to her comparatively that she had doomed her own self to desolate wretchedness for the rest of her days; but it seemed simply impossible to endure the consciousness that she had at the same time condemned to hopeless solitude the man for whose happiness she would have died.

What need to describe the terrible night the poor child passed? is there one amongst us who has not known at some time or other what it is to lie down at night, dead beat—not with physical fatigue, but with some heavy wave of life which has gone right over our head, and knocked us down, shattered and exhausted, to feel only the weary longing to close our eyes for ever on the light of day?

How many such nights are passed in secrecy and silence by those who, with the dawn of morning, find just so much of returning courage as enables them to tie on their mask once more, and go out into the world without revealing the hidden fox gnawing at their heart-strings! The call to do this came next day to Una, almost before she had brought herself to feel that it was possible to live again at all.

When her maid came into the room, ostensibly to awaken her who had not known even a moment's forgetfulness in sleep, she told Una that Colonel Dysart's valet had been startled that morning at finding his master in a fainting-fit, and that it had been some little time before he could restore him to consciousness.

This account altered completely for the moment the whole current of Una's thoughts. She was greatly attached to her father, and had of late more than once felt some uneasiness at indications of failing health, which Colonel Dysart, however, always tried to conceal. Without waiting even to finish her toilet, she flew away to his room, in her long white dressing-gown, with her beautiful hair hanging round her like a veil. She found her father dressed and sitting at the open window, looking much as usual. He seemed somewhat troubled at the evident alarm which had brought her so hastily to his presence, and animadverted with a good deal of irritation on the gossiping propensities of servants.

"I particularly wished that you should not be disturbed, Una. It was a mere temporary faintness, which is quite gone, and I would rather you had heard nothing about it, especially as you are looking very ill yourself, child. What is the matter with you? I never saw you with so white a face or such heavy eyes. They told me last night you had gone to bed with a headache, but it must have been a very bad one to alter you so much."

"My head does ache, and I have not slept well, but that is nothing; I want to be sure that there is no serious cause for your fainting-fit. What can have brought it on? are you sure you are well again now?"

"Can you not see that I am?" he answered. "Do not think any more about it; I feel nothing but the wish to get as much fresh air as I can. You shall drive me out in the pony carriage after breakfast, and we will go a good long way and spend the day out of doors; you need it more than I do. I hope a good breeze will bring the colour back to your face; I do not like your appearance at all to-day—your very lips are white."

"I shall be pleased to go with you, dearest father," was all she said as she stooped over him and kissed him, and then went back to her room to dress, and she was glad at the prospect of being out all day, for it would at least defer a few hours longer any renewal of the struggle between herself and Atherstone—or rather, in truth, between herself and the love that had become almost too powerful for her strength. Breakfast was soon over; Colonel Dysart appeared to have little appetite, and Una, with her parched lips and heavy head, had none. But it was a glorious summer day, with a fresh wind blowing, which seemed to excite Una's skittish ponies to a superabundance of high spirits, that caused them to prance and curvette at the door, till she and her father were ready to start, and then compelled her to give her whole attention to restraining their impetuous gaiety.

Colonel Dysart had arranged that they were to go to a picturesque village, some ten miles off, and have luncheon there, returning home in the evening, and Una had acquiesced without a word; she only so far regretted his choice of a route that it led them past the gate of Atherstone Abbey, and she dreaded beyond words the possible pain of a chance meeting with its master. None such occurred, however. As they skirted the massive old wall which separated the beautiful grounds from the road, she incited her willing ponies to their utmost speed, and they bounded past so quickly that it scarcely flashed on her sight till they were far beyond it. Then she slackened her pace and went on to the distant village. It so happened that her precautions had been only just in time, for the echo of her wheels had hardly died away when Humphrey Atherstone rode through the gate, and put his great black horse to its swiftest gallop in order to reach Vale House; whence he returned, however, moody and miserable, to wait with impatience for the evening, when he meant to try his fate again, and make another determined effort to see Una.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XIV. CHRIST TEACHING BY MIRACLES.

Scripture to be read—Mark i., ii. (parts of).

TO THE TEACHER.—Four lessons have been given on the parables, as illustrative of our Lord's manner of teaching by word of mouth; four will now be given on the miracles, to illustrate His teaching by acts of love. A few lessons will follow on the discourses.

I. THE LEPER. Read Mark i. 35—45. (1) The circumstances. Our Lord staying at Peter's house at Capernaum, had just healed his mother-in-law (ver. 31); the story spread in the little fishing-village; the sailors coming up to the house, standing about in groups and talking it over; many sick people healed in the cool of the evening. Peter's wife and her mother gladly ministering to Christ; cooking supper, &c., like Martha of Bethany (Luke x. 40). Next morning Peter and Andrew, accustomed to early hours, rise; find Christ before them; seek Him; tell Him of the crowds seeking Him. How does He take it? Not puffed up; does not stop there to make further sensation; must go on, to do Father's will in other places. Here a lesson to all. Christ always just went on doing His work unaffected by public opinion, good or bad: regarded neither applause nor contempt; knew His duty and did it. (2) The miracle. Ask about lepers; referring to Lev. xiv., to show the fearful nature of the disease. Three points may be noticed. It was foul; the man had to call out, "Unclean!" as he walked along; it was infectious, and therefore lepers had to live alone: and it was incurable by ordinary means. All this moved our Lord's pity. Make the children see the qualities exhibited by Christ. None might touch him; perhaps for years had touched no one; therefore Christ not merely spoke the word, but touched him. Showing sympathy: and His curing him at once showed the greatness of the man's need and of the Saviour's willingness and power. What might we have expected the man would have been told to do? Why did Christ not want these cures to be blazed about? What did the man do? What was the effect upon Christ (ver. 45)? What had the man to do? Why were these offerings made (Lev. xiv. 10)? Remind of the nine lepers who were ungrateful (Luke xvii. 17), but also of thank-offerings after deliverance, such as Noah's sacrifice (Gen. viii. 20).

Practical. Remind of that other leprosy, foul (Ps. li. 5; Isa. i. 5), infectious. See the spread of sin in the world (Gen. vi. 5); and again, after the flood, the cities of Sodom, &c. So with each child, by example and influence leads others astray; makes them sin or offend (Matt. xviii. 7); incurable by man's own effort (Hosea xiii. 9). But remind of Saviour's willingness (Isa. lv. 1) and power to save (1 John i. 9). Ask for instances of His forgiveness—Mary Magdalene, the dying thief, &c. So will forgive all who ask pardon.

II. THE SICK OF THE PALSY. Read ii. 1—12. By means of a picture or description bring the scene vividly before the children. Describe an Eastern house—three sides of an open courtyard with a staircase outside communicating with roof; the courtyard covered with tarpaulin to protect from sun; under this Christ with large crowd assembled, filling every corner even to doors. Now picture the sick man on his mattress, carried up the stairs by his four friends; the tarpaulin drawn aside; the man let down before Christ. What was he brought for? But what did he most want? Why forgiveness? Which is of most consequence, the soul or body? Which, therefore, did Christ give first? Who forgives sins? Then who did Christ claim to be? Explain ver. 9: ask children which is easier to say. Show that it is easier to say, "Thy sins forgiven," because cannot see whether results follow; but if say, "Arise and walk," and the man did not,

He would be shown to be an impostor. Christ, therefore, showed one almighty power by healing, which showed He might claim the other power of forgiveness. The result, as before, that God was glorified.

Practical. Ask what the sick man showed. (a) Faith: had heard of Christ; could not come; persuaded friends to bring. (b) Eagerness; he took trouble about it. These two things necessary for all. Must believe, but also must be in anxiety about our spiritual healing. Like Jacob, not depart without receiving a blessing (Gen. xxxii. 26). From the conduct of the four men, show how we may take our friends to Christ in intercessory prayer, and be sure of a welcome. From the miracle show Christ's power and willingness to receive and help all who come in faith, and realise in Him the Son of God.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the condition of a leper.
2. What qualities did Christ show in healing the leper?
3. How is leprosy a type of sin?
4. Explain the uncovering of the roof.
5. Explain "which is easier to say," &c.
6. Give any practical lessons taught by the second miracle.

WAITING.

I STAND upon its brink, and hear the fall
Of the dark river as it rushes by;
I stand and wait, and listen for the call
Of Him that draweth nigh;
And watch the shadows in the dreamy west
Fold weary day into their peaceful rest.

The active service of my life is o'er,
Passed is its morning glow, its noontide heat;
And now I know that I shall never more
Taste of its bitter-sweet—
The sweet of joys that quickly fade away,
The bitterness that savours of decay.

Dear memories of my life do I unfold,
Not that my heart would to its ruins cling,
But only to discern things new and old
Which from God's teachings spring—
New, as these feelings of my bosom are,
Old, as the brightness of "the Morning Star."

Lo! not one step my God has led me on
Would I that I had missed through all the way;
Firm is the staff that I have lean'd upon;
Thy rod has been my stay,
O Helper of the helpless! who art near
To quench all doubt and vanquish every fear!

No more my feet sink in the shifting sand,
They on the Rock of Ages firmly rest;
And through the waters I shall reach the land—
There to be ever blest—
Where Thou shalt wipe all joyless tears away,
O God, O King, O Light of endless day!

JEAN CURRIE.

MAGGIE'S SCRAPES.

A STORY FOR GIRLS. IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER II.

MAGGIE'S enforced imprisonment came to an end at last, and she was one of the liveliest of the happy group gathered on the lawn. Everything went smoothly and well during the afternoon, and the tea was announced. The dining-room had been prettily arranged with fresh white curtains, and ornamented with an abundance of flowers. The tea-table was as tempting with cakes and fruit as it possibly could be, and everything would have been delightful, but for one unlucky incident. Maggie's jealous temper had already been roused once to-day, and although the little storm had passed over, clouds were still hanging about, and something that occurred during tea-time brought to mind the old grievance with disastrous effect. There was a dish of cup-cakes on the table that met with especial favour. When they had been handed to each little guest one only remained; Maggie watched the dish with intense interest, longing to taste the cakes, but of course not daring to ask. She wondered whether her mamma would think of dividing it between her and Amy: but no such thing, for presently Susan took up the dish and handed it to Amy, who was sitting at the other end of the table. Now Amy was not at all a selfish little girl, and if she had thought that Maggie wanted the cake, she would have given it up willingly; but such a thing never came into her mind, for she was chatting away with her companions, and did not even notice that Maggie had not one.

But Maggie's peace of mind was gone. Why should Susan have taken the cake from her to give it to Amy? for Susan had borne the dish away regardless of Maggie's longing eyes and half-outstretched arm. It was the old story over again—every one favoured Amy and neglected her. For a long time she would take nothing, but when she saw how quickly the dishes were emptied she thought better of it. The strawberries were nearly all gone, and she determined that she would not be served with them as she had been with the cup-cakes, so she stood up and stretched her arm across the table to pull the dish towards her, and in doing so gave the table a sudden jerk. Amy was just in the act of raising a cup of hot tea to her lips when the abrupt movement overturned her cup, emptying its contents into her lap. Her left arm, over which the tea fell, was very much scalded, and caused her so much pain that she was obliged to go to Susan to get it dressed with oiled rags. Of course there was no more enjoyment for her that evening, although she entered into the various amusements as cheerfully as she was able; but although Maggie must have known this, she did not choose to offer any apology, but on the other hand was very much annoyed at the fuss every one was making over Amy and her scald, and the little notice that was taken of herself.

But the matter did not drop quietly. When Mr. Oldfield, Maggie's father, came home and saw Amy's arm swathed in rag, he requested an explanation. Mrs. Oldfield, who had noticed Maggie's conduct much more closely than the little girl had any idea of, gave him an account of the whole affair. He was terribly grieved with Maggie, and calling her apart, pointed out to her how wicked and unkind she had been, and telling her that he could not let such conduct pass unpunished, sent her to her own room for the rest of the evening.

She dared not disobey, but went with no very good will. The merry voices of the children came to her through the open window, sounding so happy and pleasant, that her longing to be with them became so great she could hardly bear it. She rocked herself to and fro, screaming and crying with anger and disappointment; but no one heard her, for all were out in the garden. No one missed her, no one cared for her. The group on the lawn were enjoying themselves quite as well without her as they did when she was there—perhaps a great deal better, she thought bitterly. Not even Amy, with all her talked-of kindness, cared to beg for her that she might be let off her punishment. No, they all hated her, and liked to get her out of the way. She did not know that Amy had pleaded for her, but had been sternly refused. Maggie's naughtinesses were of such frequent occurrence that her father and mother began to think she was insensible to kindness, and required severe treatment to eradicate her great faults.

After supper Amy would gladly have taken her sister some of the good things she had been enjoying, but this her father and mother strictly forbade. When she went up to bed she found Maggie lying on the outside of the bed, asleep, her face showing the traces of many tears. Not wishing to disturb her, she put out the light, and undressing in the dark, crept into bed as softly as possible. She slept fitfully during the night, for her wrist pained her badly, and the next morning she woke with a feverish headache. Maggie attributed her silence to ill-feeling, and all her bitter fancies rose up with renewed force. It was a bad beginning to the day.

At breakfast both Mr. and Mrs. Oldfield noticed with concern Amy's pale, haggard face. She was naturally a very delicate child, and the pain of the scald had been much greater than any one had guessed from her manner of bearing it; but now the strain was beginning to tell, and she was really feeling unwell. She could eat nothing, and seemed too listless to care to amuse herself in any way. Her mamma made her lie down on the drawing-room couch with a book, and told her to try and read herself to sleep. But sleep would not come. The intense heat of the weather added to Amy's restlessness, and the result was that when her father returned home she was so feverish and unwell as to cause her parents much anxiety. Maggie, who had never known a day's illness, not even having made acquaintance with a headache, could not understand the effect of the scald on Amy's delicate constitution. The care and anxiety her parents displayed roused all her jealousy, for she could never remember to have been tended in like manner. She slipped away unheeded to her favourite resort, the field at the end of the garden, there to indulge in her bitter feelings. No one cared for her, she thought again and again with the old passionate hate filling her heart. She forgot how little she deserved to be loved. She wondered whether any one would make a fuss over her if she were very ill. Not unless they thought she was going to die, she believed; and this thought giving rise to others led to an idea so wild and wicked that it seems almost impossible a little child could have thought of it, if we did not know that passionate, revengeful feelings when indulged in overcome reason itself. She determined to frighten everybody by throwing herself into the big pond over against the road. She knew very well that people were sure to be passing, and that she would only have to cry for help in order to get fished out. She pictured to herself with a great deal of satisfaction the moment when she should be carried into the house, all dripping and bedraggled, perhaps half insensible. What a fright it would give them, if they cared at all for her. Perhaps they would learn to be kinder after that.

Her rebellious thoughts had gained so complete a mastery over her, that she was hardly conscious of her own actions. You must remember that she was no ordinary child, but one who had from her babyhood displayed passions of unusual violence, and her actions were as much worse than those of other children as her disposition was different.

She ran furiously across the field, and plunged into the cool deep water without pausing for a moment to think what she was really going to do. But the pond, which was a very large one, was much deeper than she had any idea of. She lost her balance directly, and began drifting with the gentle current towards the middle. She had never bargained for anything like this, and beginning to feel really frightened, she screamed loudly for help, but no one came to her assistance; all was quiet as death. She screamed again and again, but no one passed just then, the fields being deserted, with the exception of a few cows grazing on the edge of the pond, that lifted up their heads to stare lazily at her. She struggled to get back to the bank, but her feet were caught in the weeds that grew luxuriantly at the bottom, and her limbs were weighed down by her wet clothes. A frantic terror seized her that she would really be drowned. In vain she struggled; in vain she screamed; no one came to her, nor could she free herself; she could not even keep her head above the water. It bubbled in her ears, and rushed into her nose and mouth, nearly suffocating her. Her limbs began to lose their power; she felt that she was really and actually drowning, without a soul near to save her. In the horrible anguish of those few moments a thought flashed into her mind of how dreadful it would be to die like this. What would become of her? All her evil thoughts and deeds stood out clearly before her now, and she saw for the first time how wicked they were. She could not remember one good thing she had done; all she could look back upon was as bad as bad could be. Oh! if God would only save her, she would try and do so differently. Was He so angry with her for that last dreadful thought of hers, that He was going to punish her by letting her die while she was so unfit, and she prayed almost frantically that He would send some one to help her.

Presently she heard a bark, and then in another minute she felt her dress seized hold of, and herself pulled at violently. God had answered her prayer, and sent Nero, the large Newfoundland dog, to her assistance. He was a great strong fellow, and succeeded in dragging Maggie to the bank; then, after having wagged his tail and licked her hands, to assure her of his sympathy, he trotted off to tell his story. Maggie, who had not been in the water long enough to be insensible, managed to get on to her feet and tried to walk home; but it was dreadfully slow work, for her limbs felt as heavy as lead, and she trembled violently from head to foot. She had managed to get half way across the field, when Nero came bounding along, and presently she espied her father following behind him.

He stood for a moment looking in bewilderment at the odd little bedraggled figure, then caught her up in his arms and carried her swiftly home. She was thankful he did not say anything to her, though even if he had met her with the sternest anger, she would have felt that it was only what she deserved, so complete a change had been wrought in her.

She was placed in bed and tended with all the care her exacting nature could have required, and the next day found her but little the worse for her exploit. It brought with it a painful task, for Maggie had to tell her parents the whole sad story of last night's event. She managed to do it, though it was indeed terribly difficult. They were very kind, and helped her very much with her tale, guessing many little points that she hardly knew how to mention; and then, when it was all told, they forgave her so freely, and seemed so pleased and grateful for the change in her, that she wondered how she could ever have thought they hated her, and took a pleasure in punishing her.

With the change in herself Maggie found every one changed. She had no longer any need to accuse her father and mother of any partiality towards Amy, for now they knew she was trying to do well, they never punished her in the old way, an allusion to her narrow escape and a little earnest conversation being all that was needed. Amy, too, was as affectionate a sister as could be, all her companions learnt in time to love her, and even Susan declared that since that accident there wasn't a nicer child anywhere than Miss Maggie was now.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

248. The expression "shadow of death" occurs twice in the New Testament. Give the passages, and state in what sense the words are used.

249. Show that David, "man of war" though he was, and of undoubted courage, was not insensible to fear.

250. From what passage may we infer that our Lord meant to imply that He was Himself a Comforter?

251. "Rejoice," said our Lord, "that your names are written in heaven." Where do we read that those who forsake God shall be "written in the earth?"

252. Give the name of a king of Judah to whom it was revealed, several hundred years beforehand, that the Redeemer should be born of a virgin.

253. St. James says that "God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble." Give a parallel passage from Solomon's writings.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 560.

232. St. Matthew (viii. 2—4).

233. See 2 Sam. v. 4, 5.

234. Son of man. See Matt viii. 20, &c.

235. Mark i. 13.

236. Adah and Zillah, the wives of Lamech, and his daughter Naamah (Gen. iv. 19, 22).

237. See Mark v. 19; Luke viii. 39.

238. John i. 51.

239. Manaen (Acts xiii. 1).

240. "I that speak unto thee am He" (John iv. 26).

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS.)

"May hear her babe sigh"—p. 594.

THE STORM-WIND.

WHEN the swift-rolling brook, swollen deep,
Rushes on by the alders, full speed,
And the wild-blowing winds lowly sweep
O'er the quivering leaf and the weed,
And the willow-tree writhes in each limb,
Over sedge-reeds that reel by the brim—

The man that is staggering by Holds his hat to his head by the brim;
And the girl, as her hair-locks outfly,
  Puts a foot out, to keep herself trim,
And the quivering wavelings o'erspread
The small pool where the bird dips his head.

But out at my house, in the lee
  Of the nook, where the winds die away,
The light swimming airs, round the tree
  And the low-swinging ivy stem, play
So soft that a mother that's nigh
Her still cradle, may hear her babe sigh.

W. Barnes, M.A.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

HOW MARGARET WORKED AT HER PICTURE.

"WHERE did you meet Mr. Bowden, daddy?" Margaret asked, the next evening, as she sat working before her easel. She had commenced her great picture, and the "old man" had given her his first sitting, while he told her his day's news.

"In the Strand. I was telling him of an idea I once had for originating a company on the same plan as the Atalanta, only on a smaller scale, and how I believed that the reason they made me secretary was that they somehow got wind of my idea. A few hundreds to start with, and I'd make a fortune by it yet, only I'm getting old, dear—getting old, and cannot stand fatigue as I used in the old marching days. Herbert is away," he went on, rising, "and I promised Bowden I'd go down and have a business chat with him."

"A business chat, daddy, and you are going to him to-night! What business does he want to talk over, and why couldn't he come here?" she asked, uneasily.

"I told him I knew you would be busy, and I thought it would be a change if I went to his rooms. I do not have much pleasure," and he looked up with the weary, worn look upon his face, which was always an appeal to his daughter's feelings.

"No, you do not, you dear old man," she answered, and she went down-stairs with him, and saw that his coat was buttoned up, and his throat protected against the night air. "Take care of yourself," she said tenderly, and then she added gently, "and don't enter into any more 'specs,' daddy dear. And, oh," and her tone became almost entreating, "don't let Mr. Bowden join you, or invest money, pray don't!" And then the old man sallied forth, and Margaret returned to her work. She did so hope that her father would not attempt to borrow of Stephen; it was to prevent this she had kept her engagement secret. She sighed as she worked away at her picture, the picture of the daddy of whom she was so fond; that weak, foolish daddy of hers, she wanted to put her very best work into his portrait.

Suddenly she heard a double knock, and remembered that Miss Campbell had promised to send her nephew round, to tell her about the Frasers. It was a good thing her father was out, she thought, or it might have been difficult to have spoken to Charley alone.

"Mrs. Fraser seemed quite pleased at the idea of your giving the girls lessons, and wants you to call on her to-morrow. She would come to you, but is feeble, and does not get out," he told her. Then Margaret took up the brush again, and he sat and lazily watched her. He wanted to talk about something, but, as usual, did not know how to begin, till a bright idea struck him. "I say, Maggie," he asked, "what time will you go to the Frasers to-morrow? because I'll come and fetch you."

"No; I'll ask Hetty to go with me."

"Oh—jolly little girl, Hetty, eh?"

"Yes," she laughed; "that's just what you said yesterday."

"Well, you are not jealous?"

"Jealous!" she said merrily; "oh no;" and she went on industriously working for some twenty minutes, forgetting him and Hetty and everything else but that portrait upon which she was intent.

"I wish you were," he said presently, with a big sigh.

He had been carefully looking at the top of Margaret's head until he made this brilliant observation. Her hair was such an awfully nice colour, he thought. She got up and altered the position of the light and reseated herself.

"You wish I were what?—oh, jealous! What on earth for?" and she took up the brush again.

"Oh, do put down that thing," he said disrespectfully and impatiently; "I want to talk," he added, almost imploringly.

She put it down, half amused, half surprised, turned away from her easel, folded her hands meekly one over the other, and facing him, asked, "Now then, sir, what have you got to say?"

He was nearly disconcerted already.

"Well, I say, look here, Maggie, I want to know what's this teaching for? There's no occasion for you to do that sort of thing, you know."

She began to get uneasy, for it was beginning to dawn upon her somehow that Stephen Bowden was wiser in his generation than she was in hers, and that Charles Campbell was not altogether brotherlike.

"Oh yes," she answered brightly and defiantly, "there's a great deal of occasion, and I want the money."

He waited a moment or two before he spoke again, then he made a plunge. "Maggie,"—he did not dare look at her, only put out his hand and groped like one in darkness, seeking to take hers, yet failing to touch it,—"Maggie, don't do it," he said passionately. "Couldn't you settle down and marry me, darling?"

"Marry you!" she exclaimed, rising in dismay.

"Yes, why not? I'm so fond of you, Maggie—I always have been. And look here, you are cleverer than I am, and all that; and you shall have everything just as you like:" but she only shrunk away from him, and going up to the fire-place, hid her face in her hands for a moment. "Aunt is all for it too, and—oh, Maggie, do speak!"

"What! does Miss Campbell know?" she said, huskily and breathlessly.

"Yes, she has all along. She found it out—I didn't tell her," he said in a voice of acute pain; for though she had not said a word as yet, there was no mistaking her manner. "Oh, Maggie!" he exclaimed again, "is it all up, can't you think about it?"

Then she put down her hands, and went up to him.

"Charley," she said quietly, "I would give the world if you had not said what you did just now. You have always been like a brother, and I have never thought of you in any other light; why, we've known each other since we were five——"

"But can't you think of it?"

"No," she answered, gently but decidedly; "we can never be more than we have been." She hesitated a moment, thinking that perhaps she had better tell him why, but remembered that there was no occasion to inflict extra pain upon him then. "Forget it all, Charley, as I will, and let us be friends still; no one need know of this."

"I don't care who knows," he said doggedly; "no," he added, "I shouldn't like Herbert to know, he's so precious sarcastic; or Bowden, he'd think me such a fool." He had no liking at heart for his rival. "Are you quite sure, Maggie?" he began in his almost boyish, crestfallen manner.

She went up to him again, and put her hand upon his arm; they had known each other all their lives, and she felt so perfectly sisterly towards him, that it seemed only natural. "Oh, quite sure, Charley; but try and forget it all, and let us be friends still."

"Yes, Maggie," he said dubiously, and he took her hand and held it idly for a moment, looking at her face, and as he did so the door opened softly, and in walked Stephen Bowden, followed by the old man.

They darted away from each other with a haste which was in itself a betrayal.

Stephen Bowden paused upon the threshold. "I fear we took you by surprise," he said.

"Oh no," Maggie said, sitting tremblingly down before her easel.

"Hulloa, Campbell! I didn't know you were coming, or I wouldn't have gone out," the old man exclaimed.

"Maggie expected me," Charley blurted out innocently enough, and hardly knowing what he was saying.

"Yes," said Maggie, while her hand trembled, and her face became scarlet, "but I forgot it."

"Ah," said Stephen Bowden, coldly and distantly. "Well, Mr. Ashbury, I only came for a stroll, so I'll say good night."

"Oh, do stay!" and Maggie looked up quickly, and said the words in a tone that made her hearers turn towards her, but he only answered politely and distantly, "Thank you, not to-night," and Maggie, powerless to rise, allowed the old man to see him down-stairs, while she and Charley blankly looked at each other.

(To be continued.)

"TO BE CONTINUED."

THE other day I took up a number of a popular magazine, and read the opening chapters of a tale; at the close, between parentheses, and italicised, were the words, "To be continued." Of course, I had seen the like hundreds of times before, yet never thought of their suggestiveness. But, somehow, whether it was the emphasising italics or not, all at once they set me thinking. To be continued—many things besides this are to be continued; some that we like, and some that we don't like; and no effort of ours can alter it.

For instance, we ourselves are to be continued. What a pregnant thought! Death makes an end of many things, but not of us. It is an awful moment, even though it were but the last scene in the panorama of existence, or rather the rolling-up and closing of it for ever—to take our last look at the heavens and the earth and all familiar things,—to speak the last word to our friends, and hear their voices for the last time, then have the senses shut, and—no more! But there is more, for we are to be continued. This is what makes life so momentous. Death is only a name we have for what we know little about. Speculation on the subject is idle; for we know nothing, and have no means of knowing anything, beyond what is revealed in God's Word. We do not even know what life is; and as little can we tell what has happened when that mystery ceases to move and have its being in its material dwelling. Protoplasm, or anything else, gives no explanation. The oracles are dumb; curiosity searches in vain; it can only peer into darkness and be baffled. The most delicate tests of physical science cannot detect the immaterial part, or account for the vanished something. Psychology has no data to draw deductions from, and can point us to nothing except the common instinctive desire, which in some of the noblest minds was reasoned, or grew, into a certainty, that the dead were but seed sown to spring to life again, or that the self did not die at all.

The Word of God never extinguishes any purely human instinct, or any desire that grows out of conscious or unconscious need, but only those that are the offspring of inhuman or vitiated qualities. All others are of His own implanting, and naturally require to be satisfied, as the stomach requires food. And the desire that prompts the question, "Shall I continue to exist after death?" and to which the soul itself and the analogy of all things seem to reply, "Ye shall,"—that desire is answered and satisfied by Revelation; and with some additional information as to how we may prepare for the life to come, and how it may be made an incentive to noblest living in the present; some very plain statements about the consequences of neglect in those important matters, and some equally plain statements of the rich reward proper attention to them will yield. Not much information is given; only a momentary lifting of the fringe of the dark veil; a few aurora-like, tremulous lights, shooting up from the dim horizon; a few lightning flashes, making momentary rents in the thick cloud; a few dim revealings of the magnificence and awfulness of things that our spirits can as yet only blindly touch, and the subject is dropped. There is enough for our guidance, for our warning and encouragement; any more would probably bewilder or stun us. The light of the Love Divine is there, and it is enough for faith and hope. When we seem to be beaten in the battle of life,—when we are ready to say that it is a fruitless struggle, that the righteous suffer and perish just like the wicked,—that we have "cleansed our hands in vain," let us take heart from the reflection that we have not yet seen the end of it, for we are to be continued.

Another thing to be continued is evil. Not in the form of enjoyment, for those who have an inclination that way; but in the form of retribution, which is only the same thing in an advanced stage. "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death"—a condition fearfully different from the mere cessation of the animal functions—is an expression which may be called scientific, for it gives the result of the working out of natural law. It is of the same import as, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap;" and, "The wicked is snared in the work of his own hands." Stern law will take vengeance on the transgressor. We often see that in nature; and as moral law is the higher natural law, we may imagine what a reaction will come when the violator, by his own acts, has unsheathed the glittering sword against himself. He cannot sheathe it again; for evil is to be continued, though he did not calculate on that, with all his shrewdness. When a man has taken in another in some transaction, and is chuckling over his bargain, he has not seen the last of it; it is to be continued. When he gives way to a hot temper, and in blind fury wrongs another, he may by force of passion get his own way for a time; but it is to be continued. When by fraud he screens himself, or makes gain, or obtains some advantage, and congratulates himself that it is neatly done, he has not counted the cost of his sharp practice; for it is to be continued. When he rides roughshod over the weak and defenceless, and can hardly bear that the vulgar throng should come "betwixt the wind and his gentility," gratified pride and vanity may be pleasant, and his sense of power may sing a song of security; but it is to be continued. When he shams his work, or idles his time, because the eye of his employer is not on him, he may think he is "knowing;" but he ought also to know that it is to be continued. When he makes money by a questionable business, or by questionable practices in any business, and his golden key opens the doors of "good society," which receives him with open arms, and crowns him with honours, it may be highly gratifying; but it is to be continued. When he decorously attends church on the Sunday, and then scrapes and screws and cheats with wary skill on the Monday, the world may think him a very good saint; but it is to be continued. When he panders to his lower propensities, and fancies that no eye sees him, his "bread eaten in secret" may be pleasant, while he can wear his robe of innocence in the open day; but he did not count on the eye of God, and that is to be continued. He may drug his conscience, and forget God, and be at peace; but it is to be continued.

But who among us is faultless before God? And by this terrible continuance all hope of escape from punishment would seem to be taken away. So it would; but what is impossible with men is possible with God; He can both "be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus."

We know that the laws of Nature are rigid in their action; that the violation of them will entail a corresponding penalty. Such knowledge leads us to believe that it will be the same with the higher law, even were it not revealed, which it is. But law is not the master for all that; the engine is not the engineer. But because every natural law is so certain in action that we can depend on it, we, with our limited knowledge and power, can so manipulate laws and bring them to bear on one another as to produce almost any result we please; and yet without breaking any, for that cannot be. And so God, who by infinite knowledge is unlimited in His freedom of action, and whose benevolence is also infinite, has devised a way by which we may be delivered from "the law of sin and death," and brought under the power "the law of life." This is the only way in which we can escape the consequences of evil. The inexorable law grinds on, and whoever remains under its force, is in the nature of things so to be continued.

But though by taking refuge in Christ we are free from the condemning power of the law, whenever we do what is wrong we painfully find that it is to be continued, longer or shorter, lighter or heavier, as the case may be. It is not then as punishment pure and simple, but as chastisement "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth." We may fall in such a manner that conscience will cause us days and years of bitterness and sorrow. We may say hard things in a moment of passion that will cause long and unavailing regret. We may even thoughtlessly be the cause of suffering to those who love us, the memory of which will be painful and long. Who does not know these things from experience? Who does not wish that he had never given utterance to that idle word, or that that action could be undone? But he knows that it can never be. The injured one may forgive him, but he cannot forgive himself. He knows that as far as he is concerned it is to be continued, and he must bear it. How much it may affect others he knows not; where its influence will end he cannot tell—for anything he knows it may, in some subtle form, be continued for ever! What an earnest cry this is, for the sake of ourselves and others, to keep a conscience void of offence toward God and man.

From such painful reflections thought at once reverts to their opposite, that good also is to be continued. "He that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting;" and kindness and love to others give a return that is beyond measure and without end. Everything that is beautiful and bright above our brightest dreams of earth, everything full of happiness and joy, is associated with the life to come. No philosophy can go higher. It has given inspiration to our great poets in their loftiest flights, and touched the chords of our greatest composers with celestial fire. It has lifted the hearts of thousands from the darkness of death to the light of immortality, and changed their weeping into song. It has upheld the stricken heart under loss and trial worse than death; and ennobled the lives of many whose portion would otherwise have been shame and everlasting contempt. It has given heart to the weary and the hopeless by the refreshment of its undying hope, and enabled them to "endure as seeing Him who is invisible." Things often bewilder us here, and cause us to fear and doubt. On the right hand we see injustice triumphant, and its victims fall without aid or pity; on the left we see the wicked flourishing, and the righteous brought low by adversity; and we begin to cry, "Where is God?" Dishonesty and pride and vice may ride on the high places of the earth, and the pomp of an ungodly world may sweep by in long procession as if it would bear all before it; but let us remember that God does not square up His accounts with men at every Whitsuntide or Martinmas. This life is not all; let us take courage, and have trust and patience till we see the end of it; for surely and certainly, though it may seem to us slowly, good is to be continued.

God Himself is the supreme good; and He loves to see everything that partakes of His own nature prosper. All His laws, that are so inexorable and resistless, are framed for the protection and free action of what is good. In our ignorance we often wonder and waver; but they all work, as He wills, in harmonious complexity for the furtherance of good; and when His plan is finished we shall see and admire. The coming of His Son to fulfil the law and rescue us from "the wrath to come" is the strongest proof we can have of His goodness and love, of His regard for what is just and pure and true—and while He continues good shall be continued. If we are joined in Christ to His life of goodness, then for ever and ever it is to be continued. Such a view of our destiny gives an exceeding grandeur to the life that now is; and with ever-increasing nobleness it shall be continued.

But this is not all. Every Christ-like act we perform is also to be continued. We are told that even the giving of a cup of cold water for His sake shall in nowise lose its reward. Much of this we know by experience. When we speak a kind word to those whose hearts are sore, it is to be continued. When we comfort the sorrowful, it is to be continued. When we give hope to the downcast and encouragement to the weary, it is to be continued. When we clothe the naked, feed the hungry, soothe the suffering, and smooth the pillow of the dying, it is to be continued. When in any way we lessen the woes of humanity, or add to its real happiness, or ever so little raise the sin-worn and grief-worn nearer to God by leading them to rest in the love of Christ—when we ever so little endeavour to make the world around us better by making it more Christ-like, it is to be continued. It will be continued in the reflex joy it gives to ourselves, in the sweet memories it will store up for us, in the love of those around us, and in the smile and approbation of God; and it will be continued in a still more substantial form when we hear the Master say, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

And within ourselves—when we stem the tide of ungenerous and malevolent thoughts, and cultivate a benevolent and charitable spirit, it is to be continued. When we trample on our selfishness and pride, and develop love and humility, it is to be continued. When we make war on the hosts of evil passions, when we fight the dark forms of temptation, it is to be continued. With God on our side the victory is sure; and it is followed by the "peace that passes all understanding," and the "rest" that "remaineth," and the peace and the rest are to be continued.

Such a prospect of continuance, while on the one hand it is a deep-toned voice from the future crying, "Beware!" is on the other a voice of encouragement, sounding in our hearts the music of hope and gladness—a song that will rise higher and higher for ever.

Here we are, sentient and responsible beings, raying out influence, it may be for the most part unconscious influence; and we know little of how the invisible gleams may go, or where their motion will end, unless they be neutralised by some adequate opposing force. But we know that as our character is built up and completed, for better or for worse, so is it to be continued.

J. Huie.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

IX.—WITH THE FEEBLE AND FAINT-HEARTED—(concluded).

THERE are evidences that in this old house, with its long passages, and little supplementary stairs leading to the bedrooms, economy has been studied, and yet all that can be done to adapt the place to its purpose has been effected. The sense of fresh air and cleanliness is the first noticeable characteristic. There are no slovenly corners; and in the dormitories, whether they be little rooms with only two or three beds, or either of the large apartments, with their wide bay-windows looking forth upon the sea. Plainly and even sparely furnished, they have an appearance of homelike comfort, and it is pleasant to note that in the larger bright cheerful room devoted to women patients there are evidences of feminine taste and womanly belongings, even to the egg-cups holding little posies of wild flowers and common garden blooms that deck the broad mantelshelf in front of the toilet glasses. The same home-like influences are to be observed in other departments, and though this old country house—of which the institution holds only a short term as tenants—is not altogether suited for the purpose to which it has been applied, the arrangements are not without a certain pleasant departure from the too formal and mechanical routine which is observed in some establishments to have a peculiarly depressing influence on the sick.

The kitchen is like that of some good-sized farmhouse, with brick floor, an ample "dresser," and a big range, flanked with its pair of ovens, and just now redolent of the steam of juicy South-down mutton and fresh vegetables about to be served for the patients' dinners.

It is a property of the Seaford air to make even persons with delicate appetites ready for three plain meals a day, with a meat supper to follow, and the convalescents are no exception to the rule. Tea and bread-and-butter for breakfast, bread-and-cheese and ale for the men, and cake and ale for the women as a snack in the way of lunch, good roast meat and vegetables for dinner, with occasional pies or puddings, with another half-pint of ale; tea as usual; and a supper consisting of a slice of meat, bread, and another draught of beer—this is the most ordinary diet; but in many cases milk is substituted for ale, and there is also a morning draught of milk, or rum-and-milk, a lunch or supper of farinaceous food, and wine or special diet, according to the orders of Dr. Sangster, the house surgeon, who visits the patients daily, or as often as may be required. Following the odour of the roast mutton, we see the male patients preparing to sit down to dinner in a good-sized room, where, to judge from the pleased and grateful faces of men and lads, they are quite ready to do justice to the repast. Barely furnished, and with table appointments of the plainest kind, the dining-room is not indicative of luxury; but the sauce of hunger is not wanting, and as we bow our leave-taking, there are signs that the money spent at this Seaford Hospital is well represented by the wholesome but expensive medicine of pure food and drink in ample quantities, prescribed under conditions which build up the strength, and restore life to the enfeebled frames of those to whom a month of such living must be an era in their history.

The women's dining-room is, I am glad to see, more ornamental than that of the men. The walls are bright with gay paper, containing large and brilliantly coloured scenery, while the wide windows look seaward, and fill the large room with cheerful light.

This is all the more essential as there is no other sitting-room for the female patients, and the more convenient furniture, especially a low wooden couch covered with a mattress, is adapted to the needs of those who require indoor recreation as well as frequent rest. The men have a separate sitting-room in the basement, not a very cheerful apartment, but one which in the warm summer-time is cool, and adapted for the after-dinner doze, or for reading a book when the weather is not quite favourable for sitting out of doors.

There is, by-the-bye, a very decided need of entertaining and pleasant books for the patients' library at Seaford, the few which are on the two or three shelves being mostly old, and of a particularly dreary pattern. It is obvious that, in an institution where, in order to meet the constant needs of those who seek its aid, every shilling must be carefully expended, only a small sum can be devoted to literature; but it may only have to be made known that the convalescents really need a few cheerful volumes to help them along the road from sickness to health, and out of the abundance of some teeming library the goodwill offering may be made. It is time that we—that is to say, the kindly and judicious secretary, Mr. Horace Green, the examining physician, Dr. Lomas, and the present writer—should yield to the influences of the grand appetising climate of this airy nook of the English coast, and after a short turn into the poultry-yard, a glance at the deliberate cow, and a passing greeting to the great black cat with collar and bell, and a mew that is almost a deep bass roar, and to the most exacting, ugly, and voracious pet dog it was my lot to encounter, we accept the invitation to test the quality of the Southdown mutton and other Seaford fare, with a following of that delicately boiled rice and jam to which the healthy palate returns with childlike appreciation.

On hospitable thoughts intent, Miss Mary Young, the bright and active lady who is superintendent matron of the hospital, has for the time adopted us into her hungry family, and with a knowledge of the effects of the breeze blowing over that high bluff, and curling the waves along the shingle ridge, has set out a repast in her own pleasant parlour, where she does the honours of the institution with a simple cheerful grace that speaks favourably for the administration which she represents. For it is not always easy to maintain a serene and yet a firm temper in an institution where the inmates come and go so quickly, and exhibit such varying characteristics.

In order to maintain the objects of the charity, and to ensure the comfort of those for whom its provisions are intended, some well-considered regulations have to be adopted and enforced; and the most discouraging circumstances with which the committee and their officers have to contend, are those which arise from the negligence of subscribers nominating patients, or from the demands made on the charity by those who constantly demand more benefits from the institution than their contributions would represent even if they were paid three times over.

It is, perhaps, not to be wondered at that people, anxious to secure for their protégés the advantages of such means of recovery as are represented by a temporary hospital where there has only been one death in five years, should readily contribute their guinea for the sake of gaining the privilege, even though they may add to that small subscription the five shillings a week which is the sum required with each patient. What has to be complained of, however, is that constant attempts are made to introduce cases which are so far from being convalescent, that they are still suffering from disease, and require constant medical or surgical treatment. In order to do this, nominations are frequently obtained from country subscribers, and it has required the constant vigilance of the examining physician and the committee to avoid the distressing necessity of obtaining for such patients admission to other hospitals, or sending them back to their own homes, not only without having received benefit from the institution, but perhaps injured by the journey to and fro when they were in a weak and suffering condition.

It should be remembered that the Seaford Hospital is not for the sick, but for persons recovering from sickness,—those for whom the best medicines are regular and ample meals, grand bracing air, sea-baths, long hours of quiet and restorative sleep, and that general direction of their daily progress towards complete recovery, which will often make them strong and set them up completely, even in the twenty-eight days of their sea-side sojourn.

To send patients who require the medical care and attendance which can only be provided in a hospital for the special disorders from which they suffer, or who are afflicted with incurable diseases, is unjust, both to the poor creatures themselves and to the charity which cannot receive them.

For consumptive patients, except in the early or threatening stage of phthisis, Seaford is unsuitable, but a month at the hospital for patients of consumptive tendency has been known to produce remarkably beneficial results. It is in cases of recovery after rheumatism and rheumatic fever, or when strength is required after painful or exhausting surgical operations, in nervous depression, debility, pleurisy, and recovery from accidents, that the fine air is found to be wonderfully invigorating; for Seaford is high and dry, the subsoil being sand resting on chalk, so that there is little surface evaporation, while the shelter afforded by Beachy Head screens this little bay of the coast from the east wind.

It is not to be wondered at that the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the late Bishop of Winchester should have joined many of the London clergy, and more than eighty of the most eminent physicians and surgeons connected with metropolitan hospitals, to recommend this charity as one especially deserving of public support. Those who are ever so superficially acquainted with the homes and difficulties of the poorer classes in London know that the period of debility after sickness, when the general hospital has discharged the patient, or when the parish doctor has taken his leave, is a terrible time. Too weak to work, without means to buy even common nourishment at the crisis when plentiful food is requisite, and stimulated to try to labour when the heart has only just strength to beat, men and women are ready to faint and to perish unless helping hands be held out to them. Try to imagine some poor cabman or omnibus-driver, lying weak and helpless after coming from a hospital; think of the domestic servant, whose small savings have all been spent in the endeavour to get well enough to take another place; of the poor little wistful, eager-eyed errand-boy, scantily fed, and with shaking limbs, that will not carry him fast enough about the streets. Try to realise what a boon it must be to a letter-carrier, slowly recovering from the illness by which he has been smitten down, or to the London waiter, worn and debilitated by long hours of wearying attendance to his duties, to have a month of rest and reinvigoration at a place like this. In the table of inmates during the last official year are to be found 124 domestic servants, 72 mechanics and apprentices, 56 warehousemen and labourers, 36 housewives (there is much significance in that word, if we think of the poor wife or mother to be restored to her husband and children), 46 needlewomen, 19 clerks, 15 teachers (mark that), 41 school-children, 9 nurses, 1 policeman, 3 seamen and watermen, 1 letter-carrier, 4 errand-boys, 7 Scripture-readers, and others of various occupations.

It is no wonder, I say, that the general hospitals should regard this Convalescent Home at Seaford as a boon; but, unfortunately for the charity, the appreciation which it receives from some of those wealthy and magnificently-endowed institutions operates as a very serious drain on its own limited resources, which are only supplied by voluntary subscriptions, contributions, and legacies. Every subscriber of a guinea annually, and every donor of ten guineas in one sum, has the privilege of recommending one patient yearly, with an additional recommendation for every additional subscription of one guinea, or donation of ten guineas. The payment of five shillings a week by each patient admitted is also required by the guarantee of a householder written on the nomination paper, and the travelling expenses of the patient must also be paid, the Brighton Railway Company most benevolently conveying patients to the hospital by their quick morning train, in second-class carriages at third-class fare.

Now it is quite obvious that the five shillings a week, though it removes the institution from the position of an absolute charity, goes but a very short distance in providing for the needs of the inmates, and when the guinea contribution is added to it, there is still a very wide margin to fill before much good can be effected. Let us see, then, what is the effect of every subscription of a guinea representing a claim, as in the case of the patients sent from the wealthy general hospitals.

The cost of those admirable medicines, food and drink, wine and milk, and sea-baths, together with the expenses of administration, and the rental of the present house, will represent £4 8s. per head for each patient, and as Guy's, Bartholomew's, St. Thomas's, and the London Hospitals, each subscribing their ten guineas annually, demand their ten nominations in exchange, the account stands thus:—

For each case, five shillings per week for four weeks, and one guinea subscription=£2 1s., which, deducted from the actual cost (£4 8s.), leaves £2 7s. to be paid out of the funds of the Seaford Institution, which, on ten patients a year, represents £23 10s. as the annual contribution of this poor little charity to each of the four great charitable foundations of the metropolis.

But there will soon be an opportunity for acknowledging this obligation, and for recognising the useful career of this really admirable institution. In another year the lease of the present house will have expired, and the committee will be obliged to give up possession. It is therefore necessary to build a new hospital for those who need the aid that such a charity alone can give, and the ground has already been purchased, only a few yards further in the shelter of the bluff, where it is intended to erect another home. With a commendable anxiety to keep strictly within their probable means, the committee have decided not to imitate a too frequent mode of proceeding, by which a large and splendid edifice would saddle their undertaking with a heavy debt, and perhaps cripple resources needed for carrying on their actual work; but they have obtained from Mr. Grüning, the architect, a plan of a building which will provide for their needs for some time to come, and may be afterwards increased in accommodation by additions that will improve, rather than detract from, its completeness. A great establishment, with 100 beds, laundries, drying-houses, and hot and cold sea-baths on the premises, would cost £13,000; and as the actually available funds in hand for building purposes are now not more than £5,000, with another probable £1,000 added by special donations expected during the year, the committee, however reluctantly, have folded up the original plan, and estimated the cost of a plain unpretentious building, calculated at first to receive thirty-three male and thirty-three female patients, but capable of additions which will raise its usefulness and completeness to the higher demand, whenever there are funds sufficient to pay for them. The expenditure for the new hospital to be erected next year will be £6,503, and, should the anticipated donations be increased fourfold, there will be no difficulty in crowning the work, by such provisions as will include the full number of a hundred faint and failing men and women within the retreat where they find rest and healing.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"I think there is a change"—p 604.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XVIII.

MEANWHILE Colonel Dysart and his daughter strolled about on the fair little English hamlet where they had lunched, and at last sat down on the banks of a sparkling streamlet flowing through it. Una was too wretched to notice the charming landscape, and she felt as if she had scarcely energy to answer her father when he spoke to her. He too, however, was unusually silent, and when he did speak it was entirely on the subject of the early days of his married life, to which he had never before alluded since the death of his wife. Even through all the heavy load that hung over her heart, Una noticed with some surprise the vivid manner with which he recalled the most trifling incidents of his wedding-day, and the pleasure which he seemed to find in lingering over his description of them.

"You cannot imagine how lovely your mother looked," he said, "as she walked down the churchyard path over the flowers the village people had scattered beneath her feet, her white robes glittering in the sun, and her beautiful veiled face seeming like a star shining through a silver mist. She had orange blossoms in her hair, and a little sprig fell down just at my feet, when she stopped at the carriage door to speak for a moment to the crowd that had assembled to bid her farewell; and she smiled when she saw me pick it up and take possession of it. But Una, I have it yet." His voice faltered, and his daughter looked round at him in utter amazement. Could it be her nonchalant, cynical father who was speaking thus? Colonel Dysart noticed her surprised glance and understood it. "You did not think I could be so sentimental, did you, child? but you will learn some day, as all living mortals do learn, that it is not over the dead alone the words 'dust to dust' ought to be sounded. Whatever theoretic possibilities of greatness or glory there may be for our complex nature, it is to human love alone, in its shrine of perishable clay, that, in this world at least, we cling, one and all, as to the very essence of life; and when it is gone from us into the grave, or the yet colder regions of betrayal and oblivion, there is nothing left but a mere empty husk of existence which is as valueless to ourselves as to others."

His voice died away, as if he had finished with the subject, and he remained apparently in dreamy contemplation of the stream that was rushing swiftly past them with its murmuring song, and Una could not rouse herself to break the silence, for the dull pain gnawing at her own heart was becoming almost unbearable. She could not face the future; she dared not let her thoughts rest on the present, which showed her but one image, that of Atherstone, hopeless and wretched in his lonely home; and the past, before she knew him, was as though it had never been. Where could she turn, poor child, to deaden the keen anguish that was consuming her?

"It is getting late, dear father; had we not better turn homewards?" she said. He slowly lifted his eyes and fixed them on the glowing western sky, where the sun had just sunk behind the soft clouds that had caught the radiance of his departing glory.

"Yes," he said, "it is time. I will go home."

The carriage was waiting for them at a little distance, and Una beckoned to the groom to bring it near. Colonel Dysart took his seat in silence, and by the time she had gathered up the reins and driven off, he seemed to have relapsed into the reverie from which she had awakened him.

The ponies, well aware that they were on their way home, carried them along the road at a rapid pace, and soon Una's heart began to beat fast with the consciousness that she was once more rapidly approaching Atherstone Abbey. It was still quite light, and the chance of a meeting with Humphrey was even greater than it had been in the morning, so that her whole mind was occupied with this one possibility, and she had not for some minutes glanced towards her father, when the groom, who sat behind her, bent forward, exclaiming, "Oh, ma'am! you had better stop; I think my master's very ill." Then she looked round in terror and saw that Colonel Dysart had fallen back, with his head drooping to the side, perfectly insensible. His face was ghastly; his whole appearance lifeless; and the terrible conviction came upon her like a thunder-bolt, that he was even then dying, if not dead. She let the reins fall, not knowing what she did, and had not the groom sprung to the ponies' heads, there might have been a serious accident; but he succeeded in checking them, and she busied herself in loosening her father's cravat and raising his head, while she called upon him by every endearing name to wake up and speak to her. There was no answer or movement from the unconscious man. The servant saw that she was in too wild a state of alarm and consternation to be able to think calmly what course it would be best to take in the emergency, and he therefore merely said hastily, "I had better drive up to the Abbey, ma'am;" and jumping on the footboard he seized the reins and shouted "gate" so vigorously, that the lodge-keeper ran to open it without a moment's delay; and Una, holding her dying father in her arms, had reached the door of Humphrey Atherstone's home, before she knew in the least where she was. But even when she did perceive that she had been brought to the very spot where she had most feared to come, she could think of nothing but her father, who only by a faint occasional gasp showed that he still lived.

Humphrey Atherstone had been walking up and down the courtyard, waiting for his horse, with the intention of going once more to Vale House, and remaining there doggedly till, by fair means or foul, he had obtained an interview with Una, when suddenly, as with folded arms he strolled moodily from side to side, there was a sound of wheels coming slowly over the bridge, and in another moment she was borne into his very presence; the soft glow of the twilight showing her pale beautiful face, bending with a look of agony over the prostrate form of her father.

Atherstone understood it all in a moment. Calling hastily for his servants, he was by Una's side before she had time to look up. "Courage, darling," he whispered, "trust all to me; we will do the best we can for him, in every way." And without another word he lifted her with the utmost tenderness out of the carriage, keeping his arm round her as she stood trembling and faint with fear by his side, while under his directions the servants raised Colonel Dysart and carried him into the house. The sense of help and protection was unspeakably soothing to Una; but she could neither collect her thoughts, nor realise anything but the death-like face from which she never removed her eyes. She followed with Atherstone as her father was borne into the nearest room, which happened to be the very same old hall in which they had so lately all been assembled, in careless enjoyment. Long couches covered with red velvet lined both sides of this vast room, and on one of these the helpless man was laid, while Una falling on her knees beside him tried once more to rouse him by every means in her power. The carriage had at once, by Atherstone's orders, been sent back for the doctor, and the groom made such good speed, that it was not much more than an hour before he returned with Dr. Burton.

During the interval every possible effort had been made by Atherstone and his servants to restore consciousness; but Colonel Dysart remained in the same state apparently, just breathing, and no more. When the doctor at last came in, Una rose from her knees and turned to him with a look of dumb piteous appeal, utterly unable to speak. He gave one quick glance to the patient and then whispered to Atherstone, "Take Miss Dysart into another room." Humphrey went towards her, and taking her hand, drew her gently away. She had not strength to resist, but she looked up at him beseechingly, while her pale lips moved with an inarticulate murmur; then he passed his arm round her and whispered, "My own darling, trust me;" and without an attempt at further remonstrance, she followed him into the next room. He placed her on the sofa, and still holding her hand, sat down beside her. She did not move or speak, but remained in an attitude of the utmost dejection, her graceful head drooping like that of a broken flower; and it was with no small difficulty that Atherstone restrained himself from pouring out to her all the thoughts and feelings which had filled his whole soul since he last saw her, and of which she herself had been the sole object. But he had too much chivalrous delicacy to breathe a word of love to her at such a moment, so he merely bent down and kissed repeatedly the little cold hand that lay so helpless in his own, till Dr. Burton at last appeared at the door and made a sign that he wished to speak to him.

"Colonel Dysart is dying," he said in a low voice, drawing Humphrey into the deep embrasure of a window, where Una could not hear him; "the case is perfectly hopeless, and his condition is no surprise to me, for he has been consulting me unknown to his daughter for some weeks past, and I quite anticipated a sudden termination to his malady."

"Is the end very near?"

"Very; I feel sure he will not pass the night. I dare say you are aware of the fact that from two to three in the morning is the most fatal hour for the dying. I think I may safely predict that he will not live beyond that time."

"Ought we to attempt to move him?"

"It could only hasten his death. I have placed him in the position in which he can lie most easily, and there is nothing whatever to be done but to let him remain undisturbed while life ebbs away. Attempted remedies would only torture him; but it would be well if you could get Miss Dysart to go to bed and spare herself the last painful scene."

"I fear that will not be possible," said Atherstone; and as he spoke he felt a light touch on his arm, and turning round, saw Una standing at his side, her sweet mournful face gleaming white out of the surrounding shadows, and her large wide-open eyes fixed on Dr. Burton.

"I must know all the truth," she said, grasping Atherstone's arm to support herself; "do not try to deceive me; the greatest kindness you can show me is to let me know what I have to expect."

The doctor hesitated, and then she lifted her appealing eyes to Atherstone, saying, "You will not fail me?"

He bent down and answered, "Dr. Burton says we must not cherish any hope, and that we can do nothing but watch by him till the end comes."

"How soon?" she asked with a gasp; and he replied at once, "Before the morning."

"Then do not make me lose another moment of these last precious hours of his life," she said; and breaking from them, she flew back into the room where Colonel Dysart lay, and sank down once more by his side with his cold hand firmly clasped in hers.

Atherstone arranged that Dr. Burton was to remain in the house till morning, in case his services were required, either for the dying man or his daughter; and having sent tidings of what had occurred to Vale House, he hastened to join Una in her sorrowful vigil.

CHAPTER XIX.

SLOWLY—silently—the moments dropped into the relentless past, and with them went the last fragments of Henry Dysart's life, whose struggle under the burden of humanity was over for evermore.

What madness it now seemed that ever those dim sightless eyes should have wept for any earthly pain, or that scarce beating heart ached for the loves or losses of its brief existence! Out of the troublous sea of this world's hopes and fears, and its many-tinted waves of joy and sorrow, that senseless form had been cast up on the dim mysterious shore, where the impenetrable night of the grave was setting in to hide him for ever from all human ken. And yet by his side, watching his silent exit from the region of sentient mortality, those two were seated, who living still in the midst of their little day, were abandoning themselves with as much ardour to its ephemeral emotions, as if the irony of death would never mock them also with the supreme indifference which had already stamped its cold serenity on the face of him, who in their very presence was accomplishing the common doom.

Atherstone spoke for the first time since their solemn vigil had commenced. "I think there is a change," he said, and lifting the lamp from the table he held it close to Colonel Dysart's couch, while Una bent forward trembling to look upon him. There was undoubtedly a change, a sort of ripple of consciousness seemed to be passing over the marble face, just as if a light breeze were ruffling the surface of a smooth clear lake; the eyelids quivered upwards, the lips parted, the whole countenance became animated by an expression which was unmistakably that of one who listens attentively. The right hand was slightly raised, as if to deprecate any movement which might prevent his hearing what, if spoken at all, was uttered by no mortal lips, and gradually a smile as of rapturous recognition stole over the wan face. "Yes—Mary," he said, in a voice low as the sighing wind, but perfectly distinct and clear; a moment more and gently the look of consciousness faded from his eyes, the hand sank down, a dark shadow swept over the features, and then they settled into the intense, immovable peace which those who yet draw mortal breath can never know.

A chill of terrible conviction fell upon Una, against which she struggled with an unreasoning resistance that would not face the truth. She flung herself down on her father's body, exclaiming, "Speak to me, dearest father—it is I—Una—your own little Una—don't leave me without a word; let me hear your voice once again—just once—I cannot let you go, dear—dear father!"

So she went on, with piteous cries of entreaty, that echoed unanswered through the gloom, till Atherstone could not endure the sight of her pain. He stooped down and lifted her gently up, saying, "My own darling, it is useless—he is quite gone."

"Gone! father and mother both!—oh! what shall I do?" and she glanced round with a look of dismay and helplessness which was inexpressibly touching.

It was almost more than Atherstone could do at that moment to restrain himself from clasping her in his arms, and telling her then and there that he was indomitably resolved to make her his own at any cost—even of honour or principle; for, although the last words that had passed between them on the subject had been her refusal to become his wife, if it was to involve him in any departure from the purest rectitude, yet he did not, and could not doubt that she loved him; not only had she owned it in so many words the day before, but now, in her utter distress and loneliness, she turned to him with a look of yearning tenderness in her sad eyes, which showed him how entirely she had indeed given up to him the whole treasure of her young heart's pure affections. Still he did resist the sore temptation that assailed him, for he could not speak to the new-made orphan of earthly love in presence of the very corpse of her father. Death was master in that room for the time, and had set a seal on the lips of the strong passionate man which he dared not break even to win his heart's desire; he could but clasp her hands tightly in his own with murmured words of comfort, feeling that even the hope of winning her to his heart one day was a joy greater and more intense than any he had ever known before in all his years of life. But he could not long indulge the strange sweetness of the moment; Dr. Burton and Una's maid, who had been sent for, were in the next room, and it was necessary that he should call them and consign her to their care while the last duties were performed for the helpless dead. With one whispered entreaty to Una not to give way to grief, since there might yet be happy days in store for her, he let them lead her away, and she went passively without a word, feeling only, through all the bewilderment and pain of her bereavement, that her whole life centred now in Humphrey Atherstone, and that, if he willed it, she surely must be his, whether for weal or woe.

At an early hour next morning Mr. Northcote arrived at Atherstone Abbey. Humphrey had known well that he must arrange at once for the departure of the guest he would so fain have kept with him for ever, and for whose speedy return he meant to labour unceasingly, and he also knew that the squire had undertaken to be Una's guardian and the executor of her father, jointly with Mr. Cunliffe, and therefore he had begged Dr. Burton to convey to the Manor the intelligence of Colonel Dysart's sudden death, and the circumstances under which it had occurred, as soon as possible; this had been done and primed with most emphatic instructions by his wife, Mr. Northcote came duly prepared to exercise the functions he so little expected to be called on thus early to fulfil. His chief object was to take Miss Dysart back with him to Northcote Manor, instead of allowing her to return to Vale House. The whole neighbourhood had of late become alive to the fact that there was something more than ordinary friendship between Una and Atherstone, and his long declared intention of celibacy gave an unwonted interest and piquancy to the affair, which caused it to be the groundwork of innumerable speculations. All this was well known to Mrs. Northcote, and the unmitigated horror she entertained for Atherstone made her feel almost a grim satisfaction in the poor colonel's death, since it gave her to a certain extent the power of separating his daughter from the object of her distrust. Let her once get Una Dysart within the walls of Northcote Manor, and Atherstone should catch no glimpse of her, though he besieged them every hour of the day.

Mr. Northcote had brought his carriage for the purpose of conveying his ward to the safe custody of his strong-minded wife. Both Atherstone and Una, however, opposed this arrangement, and wished that she should go to Vale House. They knew that they could not meet at the Manor, and it was besides a most bitter addition to her sorrow for the loss of her father that she should not be allowed at least to remain near him while it was still possible to look upon his face. But Mr. Northcote was inexorable, good easy man as he was in general, the awful consequences of going back to his formidable spouse with her commands unfulfilled, made him hard as a rock against all Miss Dysart's entreaties and Humphrey's remonstrances; he gained his point and poor Una, worn out with grief and fatigue, was borne away from Atherstone's longing eyes, to be seen by him no more for a much longer period than even his worst fears foreboded, dark as they were.

Humphrey Atherstone stood motionless outside his own door so long as it was possible for him to hear the roll of the carriage wheels that were bearing Una Dysart away from the sight of his eyes, and from the longing of his heart, which rose almost to agony as he felt that every moment rendered their separation more complete—perhaps more hopeless; for he saw clearly that the events of the past night had greatly increased the obstacles which already stood between them. He had no acknowledged claim, even in the estimation of Una herself, which could warrant his intruding upon her in any way during the first period of mourning for her father, and he well knew the animosity Mrs. Northcote bore to him, and the use she would make of her husband's powers as guardian to prevent Una from having the smallest communication with him at any time. When—when should he look on that sweet face again, and hear the soft pathetic voice that was the very music of his life? He turned, sickening, from the brightness of the radiant summer morning as a dark foreboding seemed to tell him that for many a week and month, and even year, he might long and long for her in vain. He felt as if in spite of the cloudless sky and brilliant daylight he had himself entered into the shadow of a coming cloud that soon would overspread his whole existence, and quench the sunshine of all hope within it. But Humphrey Atherstone was a man whose indomitable will had never yet been subdued by any force of circumstances, and as he clenched his hand in the intolerable pain of his desolation, he resolved with a deep, stern determination that he would cast every scruple to the winds, and that neither honour nor justice, nor any law of right, should hold him back from winning Una Dysart to his home by any means that he could compass.

This was a great moral downfall, and he knew it, but he would not let his mind rest on the humiliating consciousness even for a moment; nor would he face the real cause of his weakness and defection, for the truth was that Humphrey Atherstone had never yet yielded up his soul in unreserved surrender to that Divine holiness which can alone enable the frail human nature to resist temptation and follow righteousness, not because there is beauty in goodness and truth, but because it is the pure will of the Father of the spirits of all flesh. Hitherto his allegiance had been given not to his God, but to his own ideal of honour, and to the pride of his integrity. That pride was level now with the dust; for as he walked restlessly to and fro in the shadow of the courtyard wall, he was arranging in his own mind a plan of deliberate injustice, whereby he would remove the chief obstacle between himself and her who was the one desire of his heart.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XV. CHRIST TEACHING BY MIRACLES.

Chapter to be read—Matt. xiv. (parts of.) INTRODUCTION. By this time the children will understand something of the nature of a miracle—viz., the putting forth of almighty power. Show the difference between a miracle wrought by man and by Christ—that He needed not to ask for power, but at once did it, and claimed thereby to be proved as God (John x. 25, 38). Have spoken of miracles of healing; shall speak to-day of feeding the multitude and walking on the sea.

I. FEEDING THE MULTITUDE. (1) The circumstances. (Read Matt. xiv. 13—21.) Ask the time when the miracle was wrought; who had just been put to death? where had Christ retired? why did the people come after Him? Remind how popular John the Baptist was; now that he was dead, Christ their only kind teacher—so different to the scribes and Pharisees. How did He feel towards them, and what did He do? So instead of getting His quiet retirement, spent all His time healing the sick, &c. How kind and how unselfish! what an example to children who don't like to be disturbed, or have their occupations interrupted. Christ always ready to do a kindness. Describe the place—a desert; i.e., open country, away from houses and shops; no food to be bought or obtained; what can be done? the disciples, thoughtful for the people, want them to be dismissed, perhaps anxious to eat their own meal. What are they bidden to do? These loaves and fishes their only supplies; how can food for twelve be enough for five thousand? had they ever been with Christ before when food was wanted? (John ii. 2.) Did they forget, or did their faith fail? (Matt. xvi. 8.) (2) The miracle. The story being well known, only draw out the leading points. Picture the scene; the disciples bringing the loaves and fishes to Christ; then marshalling the crowds to sit down in fifties, with passage-room between, little children by their mothers' side. All now watch Christ. He takes the food; stands up; looks up; gives thanks; breaks it; the loaves are multiplied; the disciples walk up and down distributing; then the crowd dismissed, the broken pieces picked up; the disciples make their own meal, and all is over. (3) The lessons taught. Remind how all Christ's miracles show His power and His love, but each has some special lesson. Amongst the lessons will be the duty of doing all things orderly, taking food without scrambling for it, also the duty of giving thanks to the Giver of all things. Show how God by means of the sun, wind, and rain gives food to all flesh, and ought to be praised (Ps. cxxxvi. 25); and also to avoid waste. The special lesson will be that the Giver of temporal and spiritual gifts is the same (read John vi. 48—56), and that Christ is the Bread of Life. Question upon this. Christ fed their bodies first, and then taught them; so with us, temporal blessings as soon as we are born, then spiritual ones. Show how the bread is a type of the other bread—feeds, nourishes, satisfies: does not pall on the taste, and must be taken regularly: so the spiritual food which Christ gives is all this to the soul, and more than this, is the source of everlasting life. Apply this to the children; ask if they are feeding on —i.e., truly believing on Christ; if so, shall never perish, but have everlasting life.

II. WALKING ON THE SEA. (Read Matt. xiv. 22—35.) (1) The story. Point out the separating of the parties; the multitudes filled and refreshed, go to their homes; the disciples toiling to cross the lake; Christ to spend the night alone on the mountain. Describe the voyage; at first calm; disciples full of prospect of soon being safe across and with families. Sudden violent squall; wind contrary; make no way; are distressed and afraid; all the time Christ on the mountain watching them. At last, when they in extremity, He comes, but in form which causes fear. Reassured by voice, Peter asks leave to meet Him; is saved; both re-enter the ship; great calm; the boatmen worship Him as God. (2) The lessons. Here again what is the special teaching of miracle (a) Former miracle showed power over supplies of Nature, this over Nature itself. He made sea (Ps. xcv. 4), must show power over it, as well as everything; hence, people recognising this, worshipped Him as God. (b) Christ's watchful care, though unseen. Knew and allowed disciples to be in difficulties—to test faith and encourage perseverance. He best judge of right time for aid; waits till then. So always—waited for extremity of Israelites in Egypt, Daniel in lions' den, three men in fire; so has promised help in time of trouble. (c) Christ sometimes comes in strange manner; hardly realise His presence; sometimes sends us trial, sorrow, doubts, &c., to test our faith; at first makes us afraid; but when His presence is realised, then even the trial itself takes the form of Son of God. Let children learn to believe in Him, and the tempest of doubts, fears, passions, &c., will cease.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the scene of the feeding the multitude.
2. Name the lessons taught by it.
3. Give the spiritual teaching of it.
4. Describe the separation of the parties after the miracle.
5. What lessons can be learned from Christ's walking on the sea?
6. Give instances of miraculous deliverance of God's people in the old Testament.

THE LINNET'S SONG.

FOUR pretty speckled eggs lay in a soft warm nest. The mother-bird, alarmed by approaching footsteps, had just flown off, and though an overhanging branch of hawthorn, richly laden with fragrant blossom, might have concealed the treasure from ordinary passers-by, yet the sharp bright eyes of Emma Wilford quickly discovered the secret, as she walked along a hedge at the end of the pleasure-ground, peering into every nook and tuft, in the hope of discovering the great object of her desire—a bird's nest. Carefully marking the place, she ran home in great excitement to seek her younger sister. "Oh, Zetta, do come out!" she cried; "I want to show you such a pretty nest, I found myself. But you must promise not to tell Willy where it is."

"Why not?"

"Because boys rob nests."

"Yes, some do, but Willy is not so cruel."

"Well, I would not trust him too far, particularly as his brother is making a collection of birds' eggs—but here is the place."

Every day the children visited this nest, and soon the linnet, finding they never meddled with her treasures, became accustomed to their presence, and would sit quietly gazing at them, with an expression of perfect confidence in her mild motherly eyes.

Just at this time Emma was invited to spend a few days with her cousins in town, but before setting off she charged Zetta to watch the nest carefully, and be sure to let her know when the young birds appeared; "above all," she added, "don't tell Willy."

The day after her sister's departure Zetta set out to visit the nest as usual, but what was her horror to find it gone! She ran to Willy and eagerly asked if he knew anything about it.

"No, indeed, I never went near the place."

Zetta believed him firmly, and said no more on the subject. Not so Emma, when, on her return, she heard of the disaster. She would not speak to poor Willy, or even look at him, and when her father observed her conduct, and inquired the cause, she told the whole story with much indignation.

"I am sorry to hear this, Emma," replied Mr. Wilford, "for I had a better opinion of Willy; but are you quite sure he was not speaking the truth when he denied the accusation?"

"Oh, papa! I am certain, for I have strong proof against him. When I was staying at my aunt's last week, Willy's elder brother, who you know lives with her, showed me his collection of eggs, and amongst them were four, the same as those in my linnet's nest. I asked where he got them, and he acknowledged that Willy had sent them to him lately from the country; and Zetta showed him the place the day before I left, though I asked her not."

"It does look suspicious, undoubtedly," replied her father; "I am sorry to think Willy is not truthful. However, I will speak to him myself; it would not be fair to condemn him unheard."

When Willy was questioned on the subject by his uncle he stoutly persisted in his denial, and seemed hurt and grieved to find his word was not believed. He accounted for the eggs he had sent his brother by saying they had been given him by Dick, the gardener's son, who found them in a fruit-tree which his father had been pruning. "You can ask Dick about it, uncle, if you doubt me," and Willy blushed as he spoke.

"You seem to forget," replied Mr. Wilford, severely, "that Dick went yesterday to a situation at some distance, so there is no one to contradict your story. I should be glad to believe it was true."

Poor Willy felt the loss of his uncle's confidence deeply; indeed, he found himself an object of suspicion to the whole family, with the exception of little Zetta, who never for a moment swerved from her belief in his truth and honour.

"Zetta," he said, "is it not very hard to be blamed in the wrong? I never took an egg from that nest, and if I had, I should not have denied it. Oh! if my own dear papa was alive he would not doubt me," and the poor boy sobbed aloud in the bitterness of his heart.

"Don't cry, Willy," said his little comforter; "I know it must be very hard to bear, when you have done nothing wrong, but remember it is written in the Bible that we should take even that patiently, and I am sure it will come all right in the end."

"No, Zetta, for there is no one to clear me now. Dick was the only person who could, and he is gone away."

"God knows all about it, Willy, and He can make it plain without Dick's help. Do ask Him!"

A few days after this conversation, the children had a holiday, and were enjoying a pleasant ramble at some distance from home, with their young companions, when a heavy shower drove them to seek the nearest shelter. A neat white cottage stood at the end of a pretty green lane, and the little party hastened to take refuge in the porch, which was formed of trellis-work, thickly covered with climbing plants. Willy and Zetta were as usual walking together behind the others, and arrived last at the place of shelter. Presently the cottage door opened, and a kind-looking woman invited them all to come in and sit down while the rain lasted. A pale delicate girl crouched close to the fire, poor little Ellen, who, as her mother said, had never known a day's health during her life.

The shower, though heavy, proved short, and presently a bright ray of sunshine broke through the clouds, when loud and clear, the sweet notes of a bird sounded from the top of the flower-covered porch. Willy started; he had been thinking whether the sunshine of happiness would ever break through the clouds of sorrow that overwhelmed him, and Zetta exclaimed, "That is the song of a linnet, I am sure."

"Yes, miss," said the woman, "it is the mother-bird singing for her young ones; we often hear her when the days are fine."

"Is there a nest in the porch?" asked Emma.

"I'll tell you all about it, for it's a strange story," she answered. "You must know, about a fortnight ago, some idle boys who live in this neighbourhood passed down the lane with a nest full of young birds in their hands. Ellen was sitting in the porch, for the sun was warm, and she asked what they were going to do with the little birds. 'Oh! said one, 'we'll stick them on a bush, and have some fun throwing stones at them.' Ellen begged they would not be so cruel, but they paid no heed to her words; then she offered sixpence which she had of her own, for the whole set, and that tempted them so much that they left the nest with her. She put it in an old cage, and hung it high in the porch for fear of the cat. But the little things would not eat any food, and she was afraid they would die; they were very young, and shivered with cold, having no feathers yet to keep them warm. Towards evening we were much surprised to see the mother-linnet come and perch on the cage; the little ones immediately began to gape, and when Ellen opened the cage door, the old bird flew in, and fed them; she was quite tame, and stayed with them all night. Since then she brings them food regularly, and sits for hours on the cage singing. Ellen says when they are full fledged she will let them fly away. Listen! how gaily she is singing now."

Willy and Zetta looked at one another; the same idea had struck them both. God had answered their prayer by the voice of a bird; the mother-linnet was acquitting Willy of having robbed her nest. Eagerly he inquired, "Do you know where the boys got these birds?"

"Yes," said Ellen, "I asked them; it was from a hedge at the bottom of your pleasure-ground."

As soon as the party left the cottage, Zetta clapped her hands, exclaiming, "Now, Willy, it is all clear; did I not tell you everything would come right? Oh! how glad I am!" S. T. A. R.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

254. Give the name of the mountain upon whose slopes the Saviour stood when He wept over Jerusalem and predicted its destruction.

255. St. Paul's intense sympathy with his own people that would almost lead him to "wish himself accursed from Christ" for their sakes, finds a parallel in the Old Testament. Give it.

256. Mention two instances from the Old Testament of persons fasting for forty days, and give the references.

257. Name the last of the Judges, state how long he held office, and give his age at death.

258. David, we read, gained a great victory in the Valley of Salt. Give the name of another Jewish king who slew 10,000 Edomites in the same spot.

259. Quote a passage from St. Luke's Gospel to show that to rightly understand the Scriptures man needs Divine assistance.

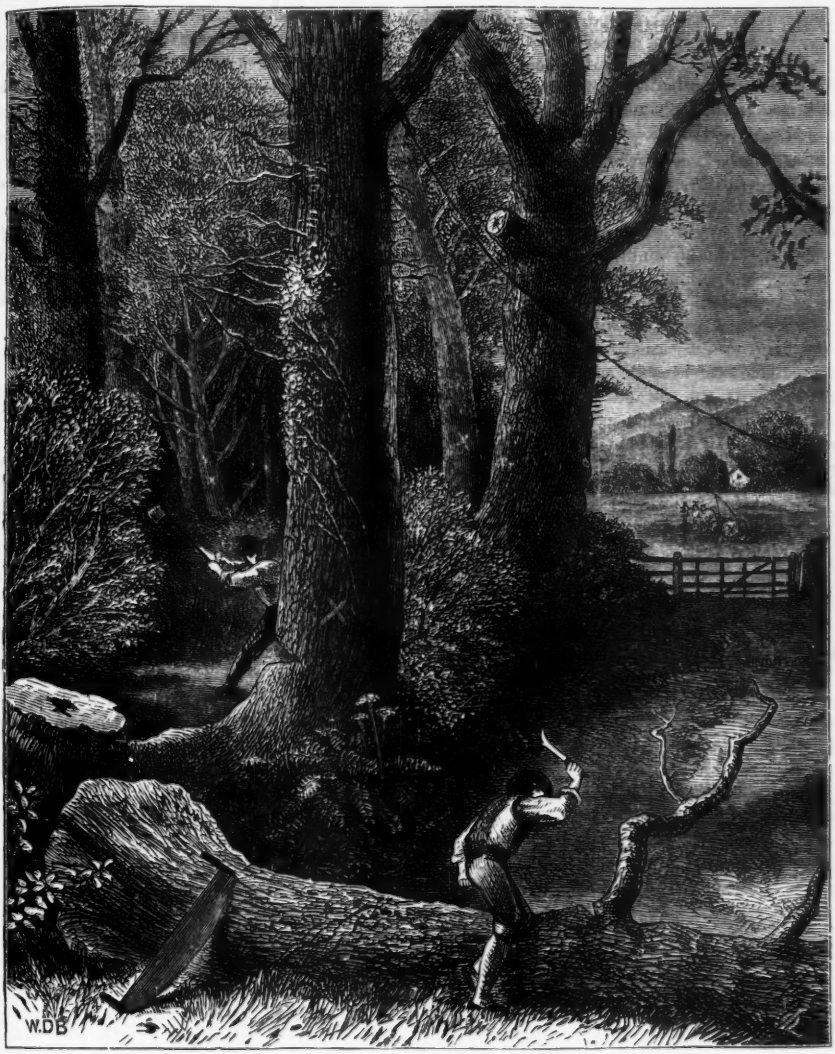
260. Whose seven sons were hanged on account of their father's perfidy?

261. How frequently is Spain mentioned in Holy Scripture? Give chapter and verse.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 576.

241. Benjamin. See Numb. i. It was from this tribe that the first King of Israel was chosen.

242. Matt. xvii. 20; xxi. 21; Mark xi. 23; 1 Cor. xiii. 2.



243. Never, but always "The righteousness of God" (Rom. iii. 21, &c.)

244. See John xviii. 15; xix. 25—27; xx. 4; xxi. 7, 20.

245. St. James (v. 10, 11).

246. Exod. xx. 21.

247. St. Luke (ix. 29) says, "The fashion of His countenance was altered."

(Drawn by W. D. Blatchett.)

THE FELLING OF THE TREES.

WITHIN the darkened room he lay
And heard the moaning wind go by;
And listening to the requiem sung, he knew that he must die.

The scent of pine woods faintly stole
Upon the languid summer breeze,
And sharp the woodman's axe told out the felling of trees.

His thoughts from out the prisoned gloom
Went wandering into dreamy space,
Where through mossed stems gold shreds of light
the fleeting shadows chase.

He saw the scarlet strawberries hide
'Neath unparched grass-waves green and cool,
He saw the shallow streamlet slip into the shady pool.

He knew each wood-path, memories sweet
Upfloated from a sun-gilt time;
He knew each tree the woodman's axe felled in its leafy prime.

He listened all the long day through,
Another and another gone—
"So fall the mighty as the trees! Ah Lord, Thy will be done!"

He listened till the evening came,
And then the woodman's axe grew still,
And as the setting sun went down, he murmured,
"'Tis Thy will.'

And then the summer stars shone out,
And night across the heavens crept,
And on his weary couch men thought the sleeper only slept;—

But with red dawn they whispered low,
"Another to his rest is gone!"
And still the woodman felled the trees, and still the busy world went on. JULIA GODDARD.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER X.

HOW MARGARET TOOK A TRINKET.

THE day following was a dreary one for Margaret Ashbury, only relieved by the pleasant knowledge that in it she had secured her first pupils. Mrs. Fraser was a pretty, delicate woman, and the daughters to whom Margaret was to give drawing lessons ordinary-looking girls of fifteen and sixteen. There was a third child, however (whom she was not to teach), of about seven years old, who interested her greatly, a quiet grave-faced child whose name was Grace.

"Perhaps you will not mind my little Grace sitting in the room while you are giving her sisters their lesson," Mrs. Fraser said. "I have half-promised her this. She is so lonely," she went on sadly; "for her playmates are gone. I had two children beside these you see, but I lost them both three months ago; a little boy named Sandy, who was ten when he died, and Gracie's twin sister Mary. It was hard to lose them both, Miss Ashbury, and very hard for Grace, for they were her great companions."

"Yes, very hard indeed," Margaret answered, and she took the grave little girl in the black frock upon her lap, and made quiet friends with her at once. The child took to her sisters' drawing mistress, and it became the pleasantest incident in Margaret's first days of teaching, that Grace used to watch for her on the afternoons when she was expected, and come to the gate to meet her when she appeared in sight.

She went home from Mrs. Fraser's breathlessly awaiting news of Stephen Bowden. She had thought over the whole matter after he left the night before, and the result had been that she had sent off a little note, saying that she feared he had put some misconstruction upon Charley's visit. What explanation to give she hardly knew; for she felt she could not tell even Stephen Bowden of Charley's offer (unless he taxed her with it, and then she must, she supposed), for it was so mean to tell of a man's love. It was the sort of thing which a woman should always keep to herself, and then poor Charley had seemed so to dislike the idea of Bowden's knowing. Yet on the other hand she did not want to have any secrets from Stephen. It was a point, too, which turned on the one thing wanting—his confidence in himself, and in her power to care for him. After all—and she felt a little angry—he should trust her in all things, and if he could not do so, she thought her pride would raise an obstacle between them. She sighed at the very possibility, for she knew that her pride, compared with his, was as a mole-hill to a mountain, and what with the two, the future looked hazy.

"It is a great mistake having secrets," she said, "a great mistake. All this has arisen only from my desire to keep the fact of my teaching from every one. Yet I did it for the best—just a little expedient that good might come," and then she sat and thought—for Margaret Ashbury was a good religious girl at heart—how the Bible has provided us with precepts, not merely for our edification in church, and to comfort us in sorrow or need, but to help us in the working of our everyday lives.

"Daddy," she said, as she sat working at her picture in the evening, "I want to tell you something;" and then she did away with the teaching secret as far as he was concerned.

The old man rose to his feet with anger. "How dare you, Margaret!" he exclaimed. "It is very hard that my own child and my own relatives should combine to insult and mistrust me. All day long have I been annoyed by a letter from Herbert about his money, and now you evidently think it necessary to show your want of faith in me by going out as a governess." But she soothed him—she knew how to do it so well; and before an hour was over he was both amused and interested in hearing a description of her pupils. He liked sitting for his portrait too—the evenings promised to pass pleasantly for him while the picture was in progress.

Presently Margaret's heart beat high, for a knock was heard at the door, and two unmistakably masculine boots ascended the stairs leading to the shabby drawing-room. It was only going to be one of their usual ridiculous little squabbles, after all, Maggie thought, as the door opened, and—Charley Campbell appeared once more. He saw the blank look on her face perhaps, for his own fell as he seated himself opposite the old man.

"I've only come for a few minutes," he said, looking at Margaret, who could not help seeing how terribly out of spirits he was. "The fact is, I've suddenly made up my mind to go away for a couple of months or more. Aunt's going to spend Christmas as usual in Scotland, and I am going to run on first and do some shooting. Maggie, what time is it, for I mustn't stay long?"

She pulled out her watch and let it fall nervously to the ground. The chain—it was only a brittle vulcanite one—was broken, she said, and she played with its links nervously, while Mr. Ashbury, seeing that Charley evidently wanted to speak to Maggie, went to a side-table and wrote a note.

"Are you quite sure, Maggie?" he asked, when the old man was scratching away with a squeaky quill. She added an affirmative to the question she could not pretend to misunderstand, and went on tying her chain together with a little bit of cotton. "I thought I'd go away for a bit," he said; and his voice showed he was keeping a strong control over himself; for he had always built his hopes on Margaret. "And I shan't come back till I can help it. Oh, I say, Margaret, look up and say something; don't go on fiddling with that thing for ever," he said, with fretful impatience at last.

"I can't mend it," she said, still twisting it about.

"Well, look here, have mine;" and he unhooked his own chain, which was gold, and of quaint workmanship. "It's the one I saved up my money to buy when I was a boy. Yes, do," he went on as she shook her head; "do have it—you needn't mind doing that to please me."

"No, certainly I cannot take it," she said decidedly.

"Yes, do," he urged; "I should so like you to have it. I bought it when we were children, you know, and used to have all sorts of games together."

"And were like brother and sister."

"Oh yes," he said impatiently, "and were like grandfather and grandmother if you like. Will you have it?" Then Mr. Ashbury came to see what was the matter. "I say, Mr. Ashbury, isn't it a shame?" he asked, "Maggie won't have my chain though she has smashed hers. I suppose she's afraid Herbert or Bowden or some of them might notice it."

"No; I am not afraid of any one," Margaret said, with flashing eyes and the colour mounting to her cheek.

"Take it, Maggie," the old man said.

"Or, look here, wear it till I come back at any rate," and then he added so that only she could hear, "though I don't know when that will be, and I don't care."

She put up her hand, and taking the chain, fastened her watch upon it. "I will wear it till you return," she said. "We are very old friends, so there cannot be much harm in my doing so." His chance reference to Bowden had decided her. She could not bear to think she must consider every trifling act, however innocent, for fear of being misunderstood. Then Charley Campbell said goodbye, and took a last look for many a long day at the bright face he loved so well.

CHAPTER XI.

AGAINST HERSELF.

Margaret idled with her brush while her father finished his letter to Herbert, and then another knock came, and this time it really was Stephen Bowden.

"If that's Bowden," said the provoking old man, "I'll take him down-stairs for a quiet talk, then he won't disturb you."

Certainly Fate seemed spiteful towards Maggie that evening. When an hour had passed, however, and the quiet talk was over, and two spots were visible in her cheeks, Margaret had a chance of setting matters right at last; but once more the old man mulled them. "Look at Maggie's chain," he said; "young Campbell gave it her just now."

"He is going away," she said hurriedly, "and I only said I'd wear it till he returned. I did not want to take it."

He made no reply, only looked at the trinket politely and continued his conversation with the old man; and after a time he looked at Maggie's picture and criticised it, and talked of books, and politics, and a dozen other things, so that, though he was constrained and stiff, she yet thought all was right.

The old man grew tired before Bowden left, and bent lower and lower over the fire, and when his guest rose to go he said a dreary drowsy good night, and allowed his daughter to see him down-stairs. The old man's vitality was very much like a flame, quick, and sharp, and bright, but apt soon to die away.

"Stephen," she said, "did you get my note?"

"Yes," he answered coldly. "There was no occasion for it."

"Oh, Stephen! what do you mean?"

"Nothing; I am only sorry you have acted so unfairly towards yourself and me."

"But I explained as well as I could," she began.

They were talking in the hall, and no one could hear them, for the only servant they kept had been sleeping the sleep of the just for an hour or more.

"And in the face of it the man comes again to-night, and you accept his chain," he said in a harsh sarcastic voice.

"But I could not help it," she pleaded, putting her hand on his arm, but he removed it; "he made me take it."

"Then return it to-morrow."

"No, I cannot do that." She was getting a little angry, and her voice was proud and decided.

"Why not?"

"Because I should not like to hurt his feelings."

"Then there is nothing more to be said; it has all been a mistake."

"Yes, a dreadful mistake," she flashed out: "for if you cannot trust me at all, Stephen, it is much better that we should say good-bye at once. I will never return the chain. Charley Campbell would be much more kind and generous."

"And you choose to give no other explanation of last night than the excuse in your letter?" He spoke calmly and coldly; a single trace of feeling in his voice would have made a world of difference to them both.

"None," she answered. He opened the street-door, and the grey evening light stole into the dark passage (which was too small to be called a hall) and threw out her face in relief. It looked hard and set, and altogether unlike that of the woman to whom he had given the best love of his life; who had gathered in the harvest of his heart, and found it spoiled by the tares that grew between. She held out her hand with a bravado that was half desperation, for she did not think he could take it and go. "Good night," she said.

"Good night," he said, looking at her almost absently, yet staring at her as if he feared he might never see her again; but he did not touch her hand. "And good-bye too, for I shall never come again," he added, and made a step outwards, but her voice arrested him.

"Very well, it is better so." She put her hand to her throat to stay a choking sensation there, but he did not know it. The tears were in her eyes, but he could not see them in the dim light, only heard her voice firm and cold as before, and went away with those words ringing in his ears.

(To be continued.)

DAVID AND JONATHAN.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM HANNA, D.D., EDINBURGH.

PART I.

THE only positive information given as to the length of the period of his persecution by Saul, is that "the time that David dwelt in the country of the Philistines was a full year and four months" (1 Sam. xxvii. 7). Taking into account all the other events of that period as given in the sacred record, we shall not greatly err if we regard it as covering about eight years of his life. As his final flight from the court of Saul must have taken place a year or two after his great exploit in the valley of Elah, and as we know that "David was thirty years old when he began to reign" (2 Sam. v. 4), he would be about twenty when he slew the Philistine.

How old at this time was Jonathan? The common impression is that he was as young, if not younger than David. Upon examination this impression turns out to be incorrect. Jonathan was the eldest of five brothers. Between him and Ishbosheth, the youngest of the five, there were Ishui, who appears to have died in infancy or early youth, and Melchi-shua and Abinadab, both of whom fell with him and their father in the fatal battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xiv. 49; xxxi. 2). Ishbosheth, we are told, "was forty years old when he began to reign" (2 Sam. ii. 10). If we assume that his reign began immediately after his father's death, Jonathan, who was at least five years older, must then have been forty-five. There is some reason, indeed, to believe that Ishbosheth was not made king till five years after Saul's death.* If that were so, Ishbosheth would be then thirty-five and Jonathan, forty years old. Counting ten years back to the slaughter of the Philistine, Jonathan must then have been thirty or thirty-five years old, at least ten years older than David.

Counting back another ten years, to within a year or two of the commencement of Saul's reign, we come upon a deed not unfit to be compared even with the killing of Goliath. The yoke of the hated Philistine was then bound tighter than it ever was before or after, round the neck of Israel; which, treated as a conquered country, was held in most ignominious bondage. Garrisons of the conquerors were planted all over the land, with officers appointed to levy the imposed tribute. Oppression went so far that "no smith was found throughout all the land of Israel: for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears. But all the Israelites went down to the Philistines, to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter, and his axe, and his mattock." The country sank cowed in terror. The chosen three thousand that Saul had gathered round his person dwindled down, till only six hundred were left, and these had to retreat far back from the heights of Judah, to gather, trembling, round their king at Gilgal. Multitudes hid themselves in "caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits." Some fled away across the Jordan. Some deserted openly and joined the ranks of the enemy. It was a dark and hopeless time. But there was one young heart which burned with shame and indignation at his country's wrongs and sunk estate. Fired with this feeling, Jonathan slew with his own hand the Philistine officer stationed near his own quarters at Gibeah, who had in all likelihood been perpetrating some piece of oppressive cruelty. The bold and unexpected deed stirred the whole Philistine host into a tumult of wrath.

* See Keil and Delitzsch on the Books of Samuel, p. 296.

"Thirty thousand chariots and six thousand horsemen and people, as the sand which is on the sea-shore in multitude," gathered themselves together and then spread over the land. Jonathan had hoped to have stirred up the spirit of his countrymen. It was in vain. He had but brought down the iron hand of the oppressor heavier than ever upon them. He will make one other bolder effort. From the jagged height which he and his armour-bearer occupy, he looks across the narrow valley to the sharp rock on the other side, upon the summit of which a Philistine garrison is planted. Taking counsel of none other, telling of his intention to no one, "Come," said he to the young man that bare his armour, "let us go over unto the garrison of these uncircumcised: it may be that the Lord will work for us: for there is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few." He had given up all hope of the craven Israelites doing anything for themselves. He had given up all hope that he, swift as an eagle, strong as a lion though he was (2 Sam. i. 23), could by his own individual skill or prowess do much for them. But he had not given up the hope that the God of their fathers, if trusted in, might work for them, and if He did, what were the many on the one side and the few upon the other to Him. It was in this faith that he fixed upon a sign, and when that sign was favourable, turned to the companion, who shared at once his courage and his faith, and said, "Come up after me, for the Lord hath delivered them into the hand of Israel." It was in this faith that he "climbed up upon his hands and upon his feet," till he gained the summit, and then with sling and bow, the weapons of his tribe, in the use of which he ranked as first among them all (1 Chron. xii. 2; 2 Sam. i. 22), poured such a volley of stones and arrows that at the first assault twenty men fell within half an acre of ground before the two. Then came the confusion and the panic, and the flight, and the trembling of the earth beneath the feet of the fugitives, and the trembling of the hearts of the whole affrighted host, and the melting of it away, and the beating down of one another as they fled, every man's sword against his fellow. And then came Saul and his soldiers to join the chase, and all the Israelites took heart once more, and they sprang up out of their hiding-places everywhere around. And the deserters in the camp of the Philistines joined their countrymen, all following hard after the Philistines, and covering the field with the dead. "So the Lord saved Israel that day: and the battle passed over unto Bethaven" (1 Sam. xiv. 23). It was a "great salvation wrought in Israel" that day, nor are we surprised that at its close when the father would have sacrificed the son, the people should have peremptorily declared, "God forbid that Jonathan shall die. As the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for he hath wrought with God this day."

Ten years go past—years of successful fighting with Moabites, Ammonites, Idumæans on the east, Amalekites on the south, kings of Zobah on the north-east; but years too of sad declension in the king's sight and sense of his true calling; of a widening breach with the great prophet, the forfeiture of the kingdom, the possession by the evil spirit from the Lord. Again the note of war is sounded; again the Philistines invade the land; the two armies confront each other; Jonathan is by his father's side. Day by day, morning and evening, for forty days, he sees Goliath stalk forth, fling out his challenge and defy the armies of Israel. Why did not Jonathan accept the challenge? He had courage enough to do it. The odds against him in the fight had not been greater than were against him on the crag-top at Michmash. He who wrought with and for him then, would He forsake him now, if he cast himself upon the promised help? Perhaps his faith in that help had been somewhat weakened. Perhaps the king or the people would not suffer it, that a life such as his should be perilled in such a conflict. At last, while standing beside Saul, he sees a bright-eyed shepherd youth led up to the king. He fixes his eye upon him. He is about the very age he was himself when he climbed the rocky height and slew the garrison. He hears this youth say to his father, calmly and resolutely, "Let no man's heart fail because of him. Thy servant will go and fight with this Philistine." He wonders wherein the secret of that courage lay which could so express itself. It opens to him as in answer to Saul's remonstrance as to his youth; he hears David tell of the lion and the bear, and say, "The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine." The coat of mail, the helmet, and the sword are tried. Jonathan sees David cast them all aside, and take no weapon with him but the sling, one of the choice weapons of Jonathan's own tribe, in use of which he was so expert himself. It gives him a fresh interest in the youth as he sees him go forth to the encounter with only a sling and a stone. And now there is a breathless stillness in either host, as in the valley the two champions approach each other. Jonathan hears, not surely without deep sense of shame, the insults and curses of the Philistine. And then, upon his listening ear, from the lips of the young shepherd there fall the words, "I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. This day the Lord will deliver thee into my hand, that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel." The words sound in the ear of Jonathan as the very echo of those that he had spoken to his armour-bearer at Michmash; the faith they breathe is the very same faith that had then filled his spirit and nerved him for the unequal fight. How eagerly, with growing sympathy and full concord of spirit, did he watch the swing of the arm, the flight of the stone, and what a bound of joy he felt as, following it on its path through the air, he saw it hit the giant on the forehead, and saw the bulky form fall prostrate to the earth.

Again, at the close of the day, Jonathan is standing beside his father. Abner presents David with the head of the Philistine in his hand. He hears Saul say to him, "Whose son art thou, say, young man?"* and listens to the unrecorded conversation, obviously of some length, that then took place, and in which we may well believe that as he told all about his home and kindred, the modesty and manliness, wisdom and eloquence, reverence and tender love which dwelt in him so richly would all come forth. "And it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking unto Saul, that the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul" (1 Sam. xviii. 1).

What was that bond which knit those two souls together, from that day on till death, in a friendship never surpassed on earth for strength and tenderness? Not only, not mainly, we believe, the sympathy that one brave, daring, generous, patriotic, self-sacrificing man has with another like-minded, like-hearted. There was that bond between them which of itself would have drawn them very close to one another. Without aught else in common but the native chivalry of the true soldier, shared in full measure by each, had these two young men stood in the same ranks, and on the same battle-fields, they would have found each other out, and heart answering to heart, their hands had been clasped in the covenant of an undying friendship. But a far deeper element was here at work, and formed the chief ingredient in that cement which bound heart and heart together. The deepest fount of the highest form of chivalry, the strongest bond of tenderest earthly friendship, is a common trust, and love, and hope resting on God our Saviour, and taking in immortality. No such heroisms, no such friendships has this world witnessed as those which have been thus begotten, thus fed, thus nurtured up into the dwelling together in the house of the Lord for ever. And in looking deeply enough into it, it pleases us to think that the love of Jonathan for David, so wonderful, passing the love of woman, had in it this deep enduring root.

(To be concluded.)

* The question of Saul has been regarded as indicating that he did not recognise David as the young shepherd from Bethlehem, whose harp had already exercised over him such soothing power. It may have been so. The visits to Gibeah may have been few and short; the remembrance of what happened during those fits of phrensy may have been imperfect. It may have been but a nominal appointment, that of armour-bearer, conferred then upon David, involving no close or personal connection with the king. Years too may have intervened, and these occurring at the very period of life when a single year makes often such a change in the personal appearance. Still it is extremely improbable that Saul should have failed to recognise David, introduced to him originally as he was as the son of Jesse from Bethlehem. But why then put such a question? Because a quite new interest in this youth had now sprung up. Saul had given it to be understood all through the camp, that the conqueror of Goliath was to be "enriched with great riches, his father's house to be made "free in Israel," i.e., relieved from all public burdens, and he himself to have the king's daughter given to him in marriage. Who was David then, and what his father's house, on whom such special favours were to be bestowed? It was not the name alone, either of David or his father, that Saul cared so much about. He knew these already. It was fuller information as to their fitness to have such privileges conferred on them that he desired. That this was so appears from the lengthened conversation that took place, "And it came to pass, when David had made an end of speaking unto Saul," &c. (see 1 Sam. xviii. 1).

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XX.

AS it so often befalls us in this our mysterious time of trial, no sooner had Atherstone finally determined on doing evil, than the opportunity for its accomplishment was found ready to his hand.

Just at that moment Thorpe, the old butler, came up to him with a rather anxious look. "Can I speak to you, sir?"

His master turned round, somewhat impatient at the interruption. "Yes—what is it?"

"Sir, you must not blame me, but I am afraid that fellow Edwards has been prowling about the house again to-night."

"What!" exclaimed Atherstone, eagerly; "tell me exactly what you know—did you see him?"

"I did, sir; but it was just as he was making his escape, and I am sure he was not aware that any one saw him. He had laid his plans very cunningly, and I imagine he was completely taken by surprise when he found the house all astir—which, of course, it would not have been on any other night."

"What time was it?"

"About two o'clock, sir, shortly before the poor colonel died. I had been putting lights in the library in case they should be wanted, and as I came out of the door I caught sight of a man flying round the end of the long passage that leads away from it. He had been coming towards it, I feel certain, and was scared by the lights. I darted after him, having a suspicion who it was, but he is more lissom than I am, and before I could reach him he had got down the corkscrew staircase that leads to the vaults, and when I caught sight of him again, he was just vanishing through the door that leads from there to the outer cave. I passed through it myself and followed him up the steps to the terrace, and then I could see by the shaking branches of the great tree that stands by the orchard wall, that he had climbed it and dropped over to the other side. He can climb like a wild cat, you know, sir, and leap almost any distance."

"But how did he get through the door that leads from the vaults to the cave? surely it is kept locked."

"Yes, sir; but he had managed to cut out the lock. I dare say he had been nights and nights at work on it, for he would calculate on no one going near it—which we don't, not once in six months."

"It was the only possible means of access to the house, no doubt, and the nearest way to the library."

"Yes, and I feel sure that was the point he was aiming at, sir. I have not forgotten how I found him trying to open the ebony cabinet that stands there, just after Squire Maurice's death."

"You had better keep such recollections to yourself, Thorpe," said Atherstone, sternly; "have you told any one of his attempt last night?"

"No, sir. We have all been too much occupied with the arrangements that had to be made after the death; it was not till Miss Dysart and her maid and the doctor were all gone, that I had time to tell even you, sir."

"Well, see you tell no one else; I will not have a word said on the subject to any one."

"Very well, sir," and Thorpe waited while his master stood still in deep thought. Atherstone seemed to have forgotten his presence, at last the old butler hazarded a question.

"Of course you would like me to have the lock repaired, sir; I feel sure the scoundrel will make another attempt to-night. As he does not know he was seen, he would never dream of any one looking to the door on a busy day like this, when the colonel's body has to be removed, and he would expect us to be more than usually sound asleep after being up all last night; if I might advise, sir, I'd have the police on the watch all through the dark hours."

"You will have nothing of the sort," exclaimed Atherstone, sharply; "nor will you have the lock mended: let the door remain open as it is."

"Sir!" said the old man in great surprise.

"I mean what I say, Thorpe; I shall let the fellow try again to-night, on purpose to catch him in the act, and put an end to his nefarious plans once for all."

"Oh, sir! have a care, he is a desperate villain."

"He will find his match in me," said Atherstone, with a fierce light flashing in his dark eyes.

"But surely you will not encounter him alone—you will let me be with you?"

"Not on any consideration, Thorpe; you will go to your room at the usual hour—there must be nothing to excite suspicion that any one is on the watch; but it may be as well that you should not go to bed, for I shall probably require you afterwards, and remember, not a word to any human being: you may go now."

Atherstone had a singular power of enforcing instant obedience, and the old man went away in silence, though with a feeling of great uneasiness, which he could not shake off throughout the whole day.

Evening had come; the dead man had been carried away to Vale House, and even the departure of that silent guest had deepened Humphrey's bitter sense of desolation, for it seemed like the breaking off of his last link with Una, and the happier past in which he had seen her day by day, and now he sat in a room next the library, with a door of communication sufficiently open between them to enable him to hear and see what might take place therein; he had extinguished the lamp, but there was bright moonlight, which lit up the library quite clearly as it streamed through the large uncurtained windows. Atherstone had prepared no weapon for his defence, as he had entire confidence in his own great strength, and he would have looked formidable enough certainly, to any one who could have seen him sitting there with his dark brows bent in a stern frown, and his curved lips firmly closed with an expression of immovable determination. In the restless uneasiness of a yet unfulfilled purpose, from which his better nature dissented, the deep calm and silence all around him became intolerable, and he chafed each moment more and more against that one cruel difficulty in his life, but for which Una might already have been his wife. Had no secret ever existed which had made him resolve against marriage, he would have asked her long since of her father, who would, he believed, have offered no opposition to their union; and now that father lay dead, and Una was in the hands of his enemies. He felt almost maddened when he thought of it, but clenching his hands he muttered again and again, "This night shall end it, my Una—my Una! this night shall the hateful barrier between us be destroyed; it shall! so surely as I live." At length, in the midst of intense stillness, came a sound. He caught his breath and listened. It was the slow, stealthy tread of a cautious footstep. Nearer and nearer it came, creeping down the long passage, halting a moment at the other door of the library which had been left slightly open, and was at right angles with the one close to which Atherstone was placed. He sat perfectly motionless, scarcely breathing; then he saw a dark form stealing almost noiselessly into the library, and as the intruder passed into the full clear light of the moonbeams, he perceived distinctly the dusky face and gleaming eyes of the Malay. Still he did not move, though he restrained with difficulty the passion that rose to fever heat within him as he saw the man he hated with so deadly a hatred. Edwards made direct for the ebony cabinet, which stood between two windows at the end of the room, and when he was fairly engaged with the lock, which he seemed to be opening by means of some instrument, Atherstone entered through the other door with a step almost as noiseless as his own, and softly advanced, measuring the distance with his eye, till he was within a few paces of his enemy; then he bounded towards him, and with one vigorous blow of his powerful arm he hurled him from the spot with such violence that the man fell flat on his back on the floor, and in an instant Humphrey had set his knee on his breast, and was grasping him by the throat as if he would strangle him. Meantime the noise of the scuffle had reached Thorpe, who, unknown to his master, had also kept watch close at hand, and he came rushing in to give what assistance he could, with a lamp in his hand which lighted up the whole scene effectually; but this he set down at once with a cry of horror, for as he saw the face of the Malay distorted with agony, and the terrible look in his master's eyes, he was seized with terror that nothing less than murder would ensue, and that in his momentary rage Atherstone might do a deed he would repent for evermore. In an instant the old man had flung himself down on the ground beside them, and struggled with all his strength to loosen his master's grasp from the man's throat, while he exclaimed, "Sir! sir! you don't know what you are doing! you are killing him—you are killing him!"

"Keep back, Thorpe," said Atherstone, angrily; "how dare you interfere with me. Hold off, I say!" but he could not use violence to his old servant, and Thorpe so clung to his hands that he was compelled to loosen his grasp on the Malay's throat in order to remove him.

"Quit the room, Thorpe, instantly, and leave me to deal with this wretch; it is no business of yours."

"But you will kill him, sir; you don't know your own strength; you'd blame me afterwards if I did not save you from killing him."

Edwards lifted his head slowly from the ground, and looking fixedly into the face of Atherstone, whose knee was still pinning him down, he said, "Do you know your wise master so little, Thorpe, as not to be aware that there is nothing on earth he desires so much as to kill me? He has been my murderer in his heart these many years back, and now is his time; it is a pity to deprive him of his pleasure."

There was a concentrated malice in the man's words which had evidently a powerful effect on Atherstone, for his hands fell harmless by his side, and slowly rising from the prostrate form of his enemy, he left him lying uninjured on the floor. His rage had almost mastered him for a moment, but, in truth, it was not his purpose to do Edwards any bodily injury at that time; his real plan, deliberately conceived, and now to be executed, was perhaps more cruel: he had given the Malay every facility for his midnight attempt, in order to secure to himself the means of convicting him of an intended burglary, which would enable him to bring him under the grasp of the law, and the punishment which would certainly ensue. Once let him get him get this man consigned to prison for a term of years, and he would be as completely out of his way as if he were dead, and there would be nothing to prevent him from going boldly to ask Una of her guardian in face of day. By this time the unwonted noise and the cries of Thorpe had roused the other servants, and they came pouring into the room with lights, headed by the coachman, who had been almost as long at the Abbey as the butler himself.

(Drawn by H. JOHNSON.)

"Since we had picnics on the bay"—p. 621.

He pounced upon Edwards, exclaiming, "A robber! a robber!" and with the help of one of the footmen, dragged him up to his feet. Then, as they stood holding him tight by the arms, and the lights flashed on his face so that they saw who he was, the old coachman exclaimed, "Mr. Edwards!" in great surprise.

"Yes," said Atherstone with bitter scorn, "this is what he has come to, a common thief."

"A thief!" exclaimed the Malay, furiously; "you had better have a care what you say, Mr. Atherstone; you know very well what I was doing when you saw me first."

"You were opening the ebony cabinet," he answered; "pretty conclusively the act of a thief."

"Indeed," sneered Edwards; "I believe you understand perfectly well what I sought for there."

"You must have been stealing like a thief into these rooms before now, or you would not have known where the cabinet stood."

"And if I have, it is your own dishonesty has driven me to it."

"Scoundrel!" exclaimed Atherstone, making a menacing movement towards him; then, restraining himself, he said more calmly, "whatever your motive was, you have broken into my house and committed a felony, and you shall have your full measure of punishment; I shall screen you from the gaol no longer."

"A gaol—penal servitude," said Edwards, slowly; "yes, I suppose your kind offices could secure me that destiny now. Well, the prospect is not pleasant, I think the time has arrived when you and I might come to terms, Mr. Atherstone. I have a word to say to you; you had better send these servants away."

Humphrey turned to the men and told them to leave the room. The butler and coachman seemed very unwilling to loose their hold of the Malay.

"I would not trust him, sir, if I were you," said Thorpe, respectfully.

"I do not trust him," said Atherstone, contemptously, "but I can defend myself; go out and wait in the corridor, as I shall require you later."

CHAPTER XXI.

The servants left the room, and then the two men remained confronting each other, the Malay like a tiger at bay, Atherstone with his arms folded, haughty and calm. There was a silence for a few minutes while they looked fixedly at each other, and then Edwards spoke in quiet measured tones. "Mr. Atherstone, if I had succeeded in my enterprise to-night, I believe we should have stood in a very different position to each other; but I have failed, and I have placed myself at a distinct disadvantage. Ours has been a long struggle, and the fortunes of war hung often on a word or a look; but you have gained the day—I am defeated, and I admit it. If I am convicted (as I can be by the evidence of your servants) of having broken into your house and attempted a burglary, I know the penalty, and I have no doubt your influence would be successfully exerted to make my imprisonment a long one, but it would not be for life, and when I came out, sooner or later, the contest would begin again; I promise you that, and you may guess if my punishment would mitigate my will to injure you. I tell you, even from my prison walls I would find means to make your life a torture to you, as you know I can. Now hear me, and weigh my words well. Nothing but my own will can free you from me and my power to injure you, and that will I am ready to exercise in your favour if you will agree to my conditions. Instead of sending me to prison now, give me the means of going out to Australia with my wife and child, and a sufficient sum to purchase some land out there whereby I may make a home and a provision for them in that new country, and I will pledge myself to leave England at once, to give up all my hopes, and never to molest you more; you shall never hear my voice or see my face again."

A gleam of pleasure lighted up Humphrey's face at these words, and he stood looking at the Malay with the most eager anxiety. "I might consent," he said, "but how can I tell that you will keep your word?"

"I will give you any pledge you may like to exact," said Edwards; "and of course if I came back you could still call me to account for this night's work; but you have better security than that, for you ought to see that as matters stand it is now most for my interest to make a home out there. Life is short, it is no use squandering half of it on the chance of gaining an advantage in the end—a doubtful chance too in this uncertain world: you have foiled me hitherto, you may do so to the last. Give me money enough to live as a gentleman in the colonies, and I will cry quits and harry your life no more; I shall be to you as one dead."

The man was evidently in earnest, and Atherstone's face brightened up as if a load had been removed from his existence. He said slowly and distinctly, "Edwards, will you swear to meet me at Southampton this day week on board a vessel bound for Australia, to receive from me such a sum as will accomplish all you desire, and then and there to depart from England never to return—never to send back your child, but to be to me—you and he and all belonging to you—as though you were dead, and beyond the power of any meeting on earth?"

"A stringent vow and a comprehensive one, Mr. Atherstone, but I make it; let the sum you bring me satisfy my wishes, and we shall part never to meet again."

"It shall satisfy you," said Atherstone.

"Good, then we meet at Southampton this day week—a ship leaves port that evening. This day week, at noon, you will find me on board the ship which sails the same afternoon."

"It is well—then are you free." Atherstone walked to the door, threw it open, and called out to Thorpe to allow the Malay to leave the house unmolested. The servants stood back to let him go free, and slowly, silently the midnight intruder passed out of Atherstone Abbey and disappeared among the trees.

It was evening, a few days after that on which Colonel Dysart's funeral had taken place. Una was lying on the sofa in a little boudoir which had been given up to her use at Northcote Manor, looking very wan and exhausted. As might have been expected, the shock of her father's death, following so quickly on the suffering she had undergone after her interview with Atherstone, had tried her health very severely. Mr. Northcote had carried her half insensible into the house when he brought her from Atherstone Abbey, and she had fallen into a state of weakness and prostration, through which she had been unremittingly nursed by little Will Northcote, who had shown that in spite of her eccentricities she could be admirably thoughtful and tender in times of emergency. During the days which had elapsed since then, Una had seen no one else until this afternoon, when Mr. Cunliffe had asked to have an interview with her, on his return home from the funeral. Una had herself been far too much overwhelmed and bewildered to make any plans even for the immediate future, and she was considerably startled when she found that her guardians had settled everything for her without even consulting her. Mr. Cunliffe told her that Colonel Dysart had charged him in the event of his death—the suddenness of which he seemed to have anticipated—to communicate at once with her aunt, Lady Elizabeth Molyneux, who had promised him that Una should have a home with her, should she unhappily be deprived of her father's care. This had been done, and a letter had been received, dictated by Lady Elizabeth, and written apparently by her maid or companion, expressing a wish that her niece should join her at once, as she was just leaving home for the Continent, where she wished Una to accompany her, and ending with a regret that she was too great an invalid to write her condolences with her own hand.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Cunliffe and Mr. Northcote had agreed that Miss Dysart should be taken the very next day to meet her aunt in London, and Mr. Cunliffe himself undertook to be her escort, as he had only left his affairs in town in order to attend Colonel Dysart's funeral and the opening of his will, and he was anxious to return as soon as possible. His duties as executor, he told Una, were very simple, for the colonel had left everything he possessed in the world to his daughter, and Vale House was hers on a lease for some years, where her aunt promised to reside with her on their return to England in three months' time. Una listened to all this, her eyes dilating with a look of terror, and her breath coming quick and short. She raised herself from her pillows and looked anxiously at her guardian.

"To-morrow," she said, in a weak, tremulous voice, "must I go quite away to-morrow? Must I leave——"

The name, so deeply graven on her heart, was almost on her lips, but she did not utter it, only her very soul seemed to die within her at the thought that she was about to be borne out of reach of Humphrey Atherstone, just when, at the most solemn moment of her life, the conviction had forced itself upon her, that to be separated from him was to lose for ever all earthly hope or joy; a crimson flush dyed her white cheek as her faltering words ceased in sudden silence; but the shrewd lawyer needed no outward expression of the thoughts he could read so easily; he had long since foreseen what Una Dysart's destiny was likely to be, and in his new position as her guardian, he rejoiced at the prospect; for although he was perfectly aware that there was some secret to be concealed, and probably to be regretted, in Humphrey Atherstone's life, he had yet too much confidence in his intrinsic nobleness, not to feel satisfied that the happiness of the woman he loved would be very safe in his hands.

Cunliffe's kindly nature was moved at Una's piteous tones, and taking her hand in both his own he bade her trust him that all would be well.

"You must go to-morrow, dear child; for we are bound to follow the arrangement that has been made for you; but Cannes, where I believe your aunt means to winter, is not quite the end of the world, and the spring will find you again at Vale House amongst your friends, I hope. For my part, I tell you fairly, I do not mean to go back to Australia till I have seen you settled in a home of your own, and a home worth having, too."

Una could not answer. She let her hand lie in his, fully appreciating his kindness; but her finer sense revolted at all thought of earthly happiness and love, while yet the shadow of her father's new-made grave lay dark and cold upon her life; and this, too, Mr. Cunliffe understood. After a few more words respecting the arrangements of their journey next day, he told her to try and get a good night's rest, and left her. Una turned her face to the wall, and her thoughts went back to their weary brooding over the sad death-scene, when, from the dying lips, went out the name of the unforgotten love of youth, to be the last utterance of the world-worn man. Had her gentle mother heard in the far unseen the voice that his child should hear no more? had she come to meet him on the threshold of the strange new life? only on such images as those could Una bear to dwell as yet, and while she lay pondering over the vanished past, and feeling as if she would never again come out of the death-gloom which surrounded her to look her future in the face, she heard steps approaching her door. Well she knew the light tread of Will Northcote's little feet, and she turned to greet her, as she came in, with a faint smile of pleasure on her sad face, for Will's sympathy and tenderness had been her chief solace in the dark days through which she had been passing, a real affection subsisted between them now. The girl came forward impetuously, and flung herself on a seat by the side of her couch.

"Oh, Una! you can't think how miserable I feel; everything seems so gloomy; life is so changed from what it was only a few months ago, and I am to lose you to-morrow! the best comfort I have."

"Dear Will, I am afraid I have been more of a burden than a comfort to you of late; but I hope and trust I shall soon be back again. I dread going away so much that I quite cling to my aunt's promise to bring me home to Vale House in three or four months."

"Yes—and how many changes may we not see in three months! there are only too many as it is."

"Are there any changes beyond those that have happened to me, Will?" asked Una, looking alarmed, for her thoughts flew instantly to Humphrey, with a vague dread of what might have befallen him since the mournful night when they parted.

"Indeed, there are—there is to be a complete revolution at Valehead. Settle yourself comfortably among your pillows, Una, and I will tell you all about it."

(To be continued.)

TIME STEALS AWAY.

AYE! if you mark the sunny ground,
Where now the maypole-shade may fall,
It soon will wheel a span around,
While seeming not to go at all.
I know not how the time is flown
Since you and I met here one May:
A day of rest, a season blest,
For oh! how time will steal away.

While once our evening mirth began,
The candle's glossy stem was tall,
But soon burnt down, a long half-span,
Though seeming not to sink at all.
The time is gone, I know not how,
Since there we gathered, young and gay,
In nights of joys, with merry noise,
For oh! how lifetime steals away.

The winterborne, when o'er the dell
The spring was green, was flowing fast,
And then fell dry, but who can tell
What day and hour it ran its last?
I know not how the time has fled
Since there, with you, I flung the hay
In youth's gay pride, in hope's fair tide,
For oh! how lifetime steals away.

As when the ship goes under sail
Far out before the sounding beach,
And while we hear some friend's new tale
She sinks beyond our eyesight's reach,
So time has gone, I know not how,
Since we had picnics on the bay—
The happy year, the summer dear,
Of time that softly steals away.

COMFORTABLE WORDS.—VIII.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK-ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"The Spirit helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered."—Rom. viii. 26.

MUCH is said nowadays against prayer. It may be questioned, however, whether Christians are greatly affected or even troubled by such objections. To them, prayer is a necessity of their existence. They can no more help praying, than they can help breathing. "Behold, he prayeth," was said by the Lord Himself of Saul of Tarsus. In one sense, of course, Saul had been for many years a man of prayer. He had never neglected the stated seasons of devotion. His petitions had been long, fervent, earnest. But they had not been the utterances of a soul alive unto God. Now, for the first time, Saul draws the breath of spiritual life; and the words "He prayeth," have a significance as applied to him, which they never possessed before.

The same thing may be said of every Christian

"He prayeth; he will continue to pray; he must pray."

They tell us that we expect, by these requests of ours, to change the purposes of the unchangeable God; to interfere with the regular operation of His laws; to bring about results which He never in the first instance intended should come to pass.

The charge is absurd. We expect nothing of the kind. God, we are very well aware, will grant nothing but what He had all along intended to bestow. God always inspires the petition with which He purposes to comply. Besides, we never ask unconditionally. We cannot trust our own judgment about ourselves. It seems to us that health is better for us than sickness; prosperity than adversity; joy than sorrow; competence than poverty. But it may not be so: we refer then the matter to our heavenly Father. Asking, we ask in submission. Our petitions are always qualified with—"If it be Thy will."

Again, it seems to us, that the Church is a family. But what sort of family would that be, where there is no openness of communication? where the children must not make a request of their father? Surely it were better to encourage them to speak, if only that an opportunity might be offered of showing them the ignorance and folly of their requests. And yet again, we remember that asking is only a part of prayer, and perhaps the least important part. In prayer we speak to God, but we have many things to say, as well as many things to ask. We have thanks to render and praises to offer. There are acts of adoration; humble pouring out of our hearts before God. God is to be blessed for what He is in Himself, as well as for what He has done for us. "We praise Thee; we bless Thee; we worship Thee; we glorify Thee; we give thanks to Thee for Thy great glory, O Lord God, heavenly King; God the Father Almighty."

But enough about objections. Let us see what the apostle says in the text about prayer.

We have "infirmities." Yes; it requires but little self-knowledge to make that discovery, though it requires much self-knowledge to make us rely upon something altogether out of ourselves. In consequence of our infirmity, we know not what to pray for. And when we do know what is wanted, the difficulty is, to ask for it in the manner which is suitable. But a Helper is provided for us. "The Spirit helpeth our infirmities."

Of the three Persons of the ever-blessed Trinity, the Spirit is that One who comes closest to us. It is He who binds us to Christ, as Christ binds us to the eternal Father. The Spirit then, entering into our inmost being, inspires all holy thoughts, all good desires, all lofty aspirations. These things do not spring up in us spontaneously. They come from Him. From Him originate those desires after God, and the knowledge of God, and the love of God, and the possession of God—of which we are occasionally conscious. But these are often such as it is difficult, perhaps impossible, to express in words. Language is too imperfect a vehicle to convey certain sentiments of the soul, especially in relation to God. Try to put the sentiment into words, and you vulgarise it. You feel then that you would rather not talk about it. There it is, and you are conscious of it; but the moment you endeavour to embody it in human speech, the thing is lost. Now, these feelings are, "groanings that cannot be uttered." They cannot be clothed in words. And the Spirit dwelling in us, and making, as it were, common cause with us, becomes our Intercessor, and obtains acceptance before the throne of heaven, for these inarticulate longings after God, which He has Himself inspired.

Perhaps, too, we may gather another lesson out of the words. It not unfrequently happens, in times of sickness and of sorrow, that the thoughts cannot be collected for definite and articulate petition. The body is too weak; the patient is too exhausted even to think. Then a friend, praying by our beside, greatly helps us. But sometimes sick people get past even that. A single text, a verse of a hymn—is all that they can bear. And sometimes sorrow is so crushing that prayer, in the ordinary forms of utterance, seems an impossibility; all that the heart is capable of is an agonised groan. But in both these cases God is the object of the inarticulate desire. And these dumb feelings rising up towards heaven are, be it remembered, the result of His work who helpeth our infirmities, and are lovingly, tenderly, accepted by our God and Father in Christ.

LOST LOUI.

PART I.

THE sun shone brightly, and the birds sang in the leafy trees; everything looked green and fresh, and Loui thought that if mamma or little sister were with her, she would be the happiest child in the world. As it was, even amongst the lovely flowers, and all the new sights and sounds, she felt strange and lonely. Loui had never been in the real free country before; her life had been spent in a large town, with an occasional visit to some crowded watering-place. Of late, however, she had grown pale and delicate, and change of air and scene being considered necessary, it was decided to send her to her uncle's house. With a child's natural love of variety, Loui was pleased at first with the idea, but when she began to realise the pain of parting from friends and going off alone into an untried world, amongst unknown relatives, her timid little heart sank. After a pleasant journey, she was kindly received by her aunt, and the following day her cousins showed her all over the place, and were much amused by her astonishment and delight with things which to them were so common. Her great pleasure was to follow them about through the fields, the garden, or the poultry-yard; but, if even for a moment left by herself, everything became a terror—the cattle, the watch-dog, the very fowl she would have gone any distance to avoid. Her cousins, Robert and James, laughed at her fears, and even tried to increase them, by telling dreadful stories of wicked cows and mad dogs, till the dread of meeting such animals made her life quite miserable.

Charlotte, who was a little older than Loui, regarded her timidity with the utmost contempt, and not being able to believe that any girl of her age could really fear quiet creatures to which she had been accustomed all her life, considered it as a species of affectation. Yet Charlotte was not an ill-natured girl, though she lacked that amiability and true refinement of nature which can enter into the feelings of others, and regard them tenderly, even without having experienced the same. Her aunt indeed made more allowance for the timid child, and remarked that "she would lose all these silly fears after a little; that she was delicate and nervous, and must not be frightened."

One day it happened that her cousins were busy, and thinking it a pity Loui should be shut up in the house when the sun shone so brightly and the air was so pleasant, her aunt proposed that she should go to a cottage a short way off, and inquire about a poor old woman who had been ill. "Your Uncle," she said, "will see you across the fields, then you will only have the lane by yourself, and coming back, old Mary's grandson will walk with you as far as the stile, and I will send the boys to meet you there."

Loui was glad of this arrangement; she liked going to see old Mary; she liked the pretty fields and the walk with her uncle, who was always kind, and talked about her mother. She was quite at home with him, and feared no dangers in his company. The green lane, even by herself, was enjoyable, for the cottage stood in sight; the air was balmy, the sun bright, and the wild flowers so fragrant and beautiful that the little girl felt all her nervous terrors fly off like troubled dreams in the morning's light. She sat a good while with the old woman, and at length remembering that her cousins might be waiting at the stile, asked Mary to allow her little grandson to see her part of the way back; but the boy was out herding, and not likely to return for some hours. The old woman wished she was able to go herself, but was too lame, so there was nothing left for Loui but to call up her best courage, and set off alone.

After all, there was nothing to fear; the lane was safe; only two fields were to be crossed, and she had often been assured that the cattle were perfectly harmless; so with a tolerably cheerful face she bade Mary good-bye, and set out. The sun was just sinking behind the distant hill, throwing slanting rays across her path; the solemn hush of twilight was gradually taking the place of the gay songs of the birds and the hum of the bees. It was a pleasant summer evening, and Loui went on bravely up the pretty lane, where the flowers were already beginning to close their petals for the night. So far, she could hear the sound of carts on the high road, of distant voices, and the hum of busy life; but having passed the little gate which led into the fields, these welcome noises were no more distinguishable, and the timid child began to feel herself utterly alone, beyond the reach of human aid, in that great wide range of fields, inhabited only by herds of cattle, as terrible to her excited imagination as droves of wild buffaloes on foreign prairies. Thus, conjuring up all kinds of ideal fears, while memory brought back the stories she had heard of savage bulls and mad dogs, she went on, trembling at every rustle of the leaves, and keeping close to the hedges; her one star of hope being the stile, where she expected to meet her cousins.

Meantime, Robert and James having come home, their mother sent them with Charlotte according to promise to meet Loui. They arrived first at the appointed place, and sitting on the top of the stile, saw their little cousin come cautiously creeping along the hedge, afraid to look up, lest she should encounter some unknown enemy.

Robert burst out laughing, and proposed to hide himself near and imitate the roar of a cow.

"What a jolly fright she would be in," he said.

"You'd better not!" replied Charlotte, doubtfully, "mamma might be angry. Not that I think it would frighten Loui at all, she only thinks it pretty to seem afraid of everything."

"Oh! but it would," replied James; "and if she runs off to the next hedge, I'll get behind it and bark like a dog; then I wonder where she'll go. You know, Charlotte, if she gets into too great a fix, we can appear any minute and protect her."

Accordingly as Loui glided along, trying to make her footsteps inaudible, a loud unnatural roar sounded close beside her, making her heart beat so violently that she stood still a moment in an agony of terror, then venturing to look round, and not seeing anything near, took courage to make her escape to the next field. Again gliding on close to the hedge, with limbs tottering and nerves quivering after the last start, she heard at her very ear a sharp bark, followed by an angry growl. Turning suddenly, without knowing or caring in what direction, the frightened child ran at full speed across the wide field, terror giving her an unnatural strength and energy. The boys started up from their lurking-places and ran too, shouting to their cousin to stop; but it was useless. Believing she was followed by a mad dog, and that the footsteps and cries proceeded from a party of men who were in pursuit of the dangerous animal, she redoubled her speed. On, on, blind, panting, breathless with terror, through a second gap and across another field.

Charlotte, who still sat on the stile, at first an amused spectator of the scene, now shrieked to her brothers, "Oh! stop her!—do stop her! she is close to the edge of the great quarry; and will never see it!" Then the light seemed to leave her eyes; she grew deadly pale, as her little cousin dashing madly on to the very verge of the precipice, suddenly disappeared from view. The boys strained every nerve in pursuit, but it was of no use, they could neither overtake nor stop her, and their warnings of danger were unheard or unheeded. Yet so near were they to the place that they could see her totter on the edge in a vain effort to draw back, and then fall forward over the open chasm. Relaxing their speed, they tried to recover breath, and tremblingly approached the fatal spot; and there, far down on a heap of stones, lay something, indistinct in shape and colour. How still it lay! not a cry—not even a moan was to be heard.

The twilight had increased rapidly by this time, but light enough still remained to show where that small inanimate form slept on its stony bed.

(To be concluded.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

262. How many times does the name of the Lord Jesus Christ occur in the Epistle of St. James?

263. Give the passage where we read for the last time of Samaria.

264. Name a few individuals of whom it is recorded that the Lord was with them.

265. "Believe in the Lord your God, so shall ye be established; believe His prophets, so shall ye prosper." On what occasion and by whom were these words spoken?

266. On what occasion, and for what reason, did St. Peter request the Lord Jesus to leave him?

267. Give the words of the Saviour which contain the earliest intimation of His crucifixion.

268. St. Peter, shortly after the Lord's ascension, identifies Jesus of Nazareth as the promised Messiah in three ways. Give them.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 592.

248. In both Matt. iv. 16 and Luke i. 79 it is used in a spiritual sense.

249. See Ps. lvi. 3.

250. "I will," said Jesus shortly before His death, "pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter" (John xiv. 16).

251. Jer. xvii. 13.

252. Ahaz (Isa. vii. 14).

253. James iv. 6; Prov. iii. 34.

SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

RIZPAH.

2 Sam. xxi. 10.

SHE watched above the dead. Though vain the task,
She watched 'neath noontide sun, 'mid evening dew;
Though they would never give her thanks, she knew,
She never stooped e'en such reward to ask.
She loved them, and had lost. Let others bask
In life's glad hours and quaff its rosy stream;
Hers but upon a happy past to dream,
And moralise above the empty flask.
So have I seen beside some narrow bed
The silent mourner pause, and linger still
When evening brought her shadows down the hill,
As they would commune with the restful dead.
As though they felt a half instinctive dread
Homeward to turn, and note the vacant chair:
So ever day by day they hover there,
Where rests in death the well-belovèd head,
While points the cross to joys from earth for ever fled.

C. M. D.

"THE QUIVER" FUND FOR THE RELIEF OF THE FAMINE IN BENGAL.

FOURTH LIST.

In presenting the fourth List of Subscriptions to the readers of THE QUIVER, the Editor cannot but express his gratification at the ready response which has been made to his appeal. Further amounts received will be acknowledged as space permits, and the Editor ventures to hope that the good work now so well begun, will be continued with spirit and perseverance, throughout the trying season yet in store for the people of Bengal.

Subscribers are respectfully requested to use POST OFFICE ORDERS instead of Stamps when the remittance exceeds Five Shillings.

	£	s.	d.
Amount previously acknowledged in first, second, and third lists	1837	2	1
Jos. Thos. Maddocks, Crewe	0	2	0
Louisa Turner, 49, High Street, Marylebone, W..	1	6	0
"For His sake," London, E.C.	0	10	0
Little Pollie and Trot, Orchard View, Harwich ..	3	16	2
Arthur Haddon, 3, St. George's Road, Wimbledon	0	2	2
Mrs. Watts, Little Harrowden, Wellingboro, Northamptonshire	2	2	6
E. E. Fothergill, Clayton Street, Blackburn	0	7	3
A Mite from a Brother and Sister	0	1	0
H. M., Bristol	0	2	0
Miss A. Heckford, Stanford Rivers, Bromford	7	7	0
A. A. Taylor, Sutton, Surrey	6	6	0
Elizabeth J. Stenlake, scholar in Pensilva School, near Liskeard, Cornwall, per W. C. Kneebone	0	11	0
John H. Wootton, Byford, Hereford	0	15	0
M. Page, 9, Vaughan Terrace, Mamdel, near Newport, Mon.	0	12	6
Martina Hyde, 20, Foregate Street, Worcester	0	5	8
S. A., Lee	0	0	6
W. G Smith, 77, Park Lane, Leeds	0	15	0
S. Smith, West Swindon ..	1	0	0
Mrs. Richard Burton Porter, Bellevue, Douglas, Cork	2	6	6
W. B., Mousehold, Norwich	0	5	0
S. A. E., Wareham	0	8	0
C. P., Burnt Ash, Lee, S.E..	1	1	0
Elizabeth Baker, 17, Hamilton Street, Chester.. ..	0	5	8
Miss Dudney, Pier Rd., Erith	0	13	0
M. R.	0	2	6
Herbert S. Cousins, 16, Orange Street, Red Lion Square	0	3	7
A. C., Copdeck Lodge, Ipswich	1	4	6
W. Dalton, National Provincial Bank of England, Mold (2nd collection) ..	0	5	0
Miss Maria Stocks, Heigham Road, Norwich	0	5	0
Morton Smith, Ashbourne, Derbyshire	1	5	0
A Poor Woman, Homerton ..	0	1	3
Schoolmistress of the Orphan Asylum, Lockyer Street, Plymouth	0	5	0
Clara C. Bishop, 48, Gainsford Street, S.E.	0	3	0
James Kendal, Tyrone, Boneath, S. Wales	0	6	0
Emily Collett, Handsworth ..	0	10	0
Betsy Bowser, Saitburn-by-Sea	0	4	0
William Parker, 16, Otto Street, Kennington	0	10	0
Gem, Milner Square, Islington	1	10	0
Proceeds of 13 dollars 20 cents from Joshua Cooper, Eugenia, Ontario, Canada	2	8	9
Albert Sytner, Birmingham..	0	16	0
Miss E. Mortlock, from the Girls' Orphan Home, Lower Tottenham	0	3	0
E. & J. Wilson, Hampton Lovett	1	3	2
Mrs. Dutton, North Road, St. Helens	0	10	9
J. G. G., Northampton	0	3	0
E. Hughes, Sycamore Cottage, Liscard, Cheshire	0	5	4
Hugh G. Paterson, Barnsley	0	4	0
Mrs. Hubert Smith, 67, Monkton Street, Ryde, Isle of Wight	1	0	0
S., Newport, Isle of Wight ..	0	8	0
The Young Ladies at Miss Taylor's, Brownhills Seminary, Stoke-upon-Trent ..	1	0	0
Carried forward £	1883	6	4

	£	s.	d.
Brought forward..	1883	6	4
Jane Newton Bewley, Carrick-on-Shannon, Ireland	0	17	0
S. Davis, 41, Gough Street, Cardiff	0	6	0
Daniel Leary, 102, Raymouth Road, Rotherhithe	0	4	9
William Henry Smith, Well Gate, Clitheroe, Lancash.	1	2	6
A. Baker and Sister, New Basford	2	1	0
Frocm Drumblade Female School, and a few Friends in Huntly	2	0	0
James A. Roberts, Staff Sergeant, A. S. Corps, Woolwich, S.E.	0	5	0
Ernest Skinner, Periteau House, Winchelsea ..	0	8	6
M. A. S., Derby	0	5	0
Arthur and Mary Oathwaite, Lord Mayor's Walk, York	0	10	0
J. A. Palmer, Hagley Road, Birmingham	0	7	6
I. N., Hulme, Manchester ..	0	10	0
H. J. Hinds, London	0	10	0
Mary Hesling, Dale Street, Shipley, Yorkshire	0	3	9
Children in the Market Drayton Schools, Salop, per Louisa Hodgetts	0	6	8
Martha C. R., Norwich ..	0	2	6
G. W. B., Paddington	0	0	5
Herbert James, Edgbaston ..	0	2	6
Charlotte Bourroughs, Langcliffe, near Settle	0	5	6
S. Boxhorn, London	0	2	9
E. J. H., Sunderland	0	4	0
E. Rigden, Fisher Street, Sandwich	0	6	0
Mrs. Hutchings, Newcastle-on-Tyne	1	7	0
E. Pitchford, Post Office, Oakengates	0	15	6
Thomas Sanderson, Brancepeth, Durham	0	9	0
M. A. Collins, Lewisham, S.E.	0	10	0
Thomas Knowlson, 18, Roderick Street, off Soho Street, Liverpool	0	7	6
E. M. B., Wigan	0	7	0
A. E. Walton, Chester-le-Street	0	7	0
Alexander G. W. Tod, Taunton House, Gipsy Hill, Upper Norwood	0	10	0
J. C. P., Croydon	0	10	0
Robert Chaplin, Waterloo, Norwich	0	2	6
Nine Years Old, Bangor, North Wales	0	4	0
R. Rolls, Blandford	0	0	8
Emmie and Ettie Mann, Salisbury Street, Blandford ..	0	7	10
Mrs. J. H. Mayail, Lee Grange, Lees, near Manchester	3	3	0
A. Partridge, Hukingdon, Sleaford	0	5	0
Margaret S. Schollick, Bishopswood, Highgate, N.	0	8	0
Pollie and Willie Biddle, Exeter	1	0	0
M. H. Foster, Bradford ..	0	3	9
Fred. J. Grundy, 23, Fairfield Street, Fairfield, near Liverpool	0	4	0
Mary McDonnell, 3, Collingham Road, South Kensington	0	10	1
W. Hall, Bristol	1	0	0
Mrs. C., Church Lane, Urmston	0	1	0
T. F., Mount Vernon Road, Liverpool	0	10	4
K., Bangor	0	1	0
W. L. E., Uxbridge	0	3	4
James Baker, 8, Mack's Road, Bermondsey	0	2	6
Katie Peers, Addlestone ..	0	2	0
Robert E. Collier, Elswick, Newcastle	0	4	6
A. M. Taylor, Dublin	0	12	0
A Very Poor Beggar, Liverpool	0	5	6
Carried forward £	1909	1	8

	£	s.	d.
Brought forward..	1909	1	8
E. T. Richards, at A. James's, 69, Oxford Street, Mountain Ash, Cardiff	1	6	6
Miss Ewins, Pen-y-bryn House, Wrexham	0	7	6
S. E. Lloyd, London House, Holywell	1	13	3
M. Colborn, Frampton Cotterell, near Bristol	0	8	0
Alex. Lymington, 16, Ashton Terrace, Hillhead, Glasgow	0	17	0
James Evans, 17, Dunraven Street, Treherbert, Gla.	1	0	0
W. B., Charlton	0	11	6
Edith Webb, High Street, Brecon	0	10	0
H. Clay, Swerford, Oxon ..	0	13	6
David Williams, 6, Wind Street, Aberdare, Glamorganshire	1	1	6
Edward A. House, Uxbridge	1	9	0
Master George Macnie, Clontarf, co. Dublin ..	0	7	6
S. Beck, Earlham Road, Norwich	0	12	2
J. G., Newcastle-on-Tyne ..	0	11	3
E. J. Bolter, Chastleton Moreton-in-Marsh	1	5	6
J. P.	0	2	6
Miss R. Grey, Enniskillen ..	1	0	0
E. Stilwell, Tower House, Park Hill Road, East Croydon	0	10	0
Thomas Bayliss, West Bromwich	1	10	6
Aimée Richardson, The Friary, Friern Barnet ..	0	8	1
Annie A. P. Handing, Dinder Wells	1	0	0
E. K., Sinclair, New York near Boston, Lincolnshire	0	8	6
Robert Combe, 18, New Street, Whitehaven	0	12	6
L. M. Eves, 65, Charrington Street	0	3	0
Louisa Burrell, Birstall, near Leeds	0	6	6
Walter Green, 5, Cave Street, Bristol	0	12	0
A. E. Judd, Strawberry Hill, Station, Twickenham ..	0	5	3
Nelly Coward, Carlton Road, W.	0	4	0
Miss Pope, Elmsdale House, Astwood Bank, near Redditch	2	7	6
Emily Maud Davies, Dany Castell, Crickhowell, S. Wales	0	10	0
J. N., Kilburn	0	5	0
Kate Bell, Potternewton Lodge, Leeds	0	11	6
Mrs. Hide, St. Mary's Lodge, Blythe Hill, Forest Hill	2	7	0
A Reader of THE QUIVER, Manchester	0	3	6
C. E. Fox, 109 and 111, Bethnal Green Road, E.... ..	1	1	0
Miss R. M. Andrew, 1, Alma Place, St. Mawes, Cornwall	0	12	6
Louisa Agnes Talbot, The Limes, Kidderminster ..	0	17	6
Miss M. C. London, The Rock, Claxhaugh, near Sunderland	0	15	0
Maude M. Peirce, Grange Park Cottage, Grange Park Road, Leyton, Essex	0	8	0
Thomas J. Owen, Bodfaen, Rhyl	0	1	6
Three Friends, Truro	0	9	0
W. Horwood, Bicester Royal Latin School, Buckingham	0	5	9
W. J. Davidson, 125, High Street, Gateshead	0	4	6
Frank Midwinter, Bursledm ..	0	11	0
M. A., The Grange	0	3	0
E. L. Matthew, Bull Point ..	0	14	0
F. P. S. Yeatman, Shawfield, Bromley, Kent	0	5	7
J. Shipley Slipper, Islington	0	7	6
Carried forward £	1941	19	0

	£	s.	d.
Brought forward..	1941	19	0
Annie Strong, 264, Old Kent Road	0	8	11
F. R. Marsh, Hull	0	0	6
Mary Jane Thomas, Bath Street, Todmorden	0	4	0
Mrs. Joseph Minchin, Suir Island, Clonmel, Ireland	0	10	0
Mrs. Eliza Evans, 9, Queen Street, Wrexham	1	2	6
G. Dix, jun., Silverdale, North Staffordshire	0	7	0
Miss M. S. Grey, Herne Bay	2	5	2
R. Twine, Reading	0	2	0
The Superintendent Kew Observatory, Richmond	1	10	0
A. J. Melville, Clarendon P.O., Jamaica, per T. Hankey & Co.	8	16	1
J. S. Nichols, 4, Everilda St., Barnsbury, London, N.	0	3	6
F. K. Squibb, Freemantle, Southampton	0	10	0
Alice Mary Roake, 126, Bartholomew Street, Newbury, Berks	0	6	6
A Few Friends, Newport, Mon.	0	5	2
Catherine Row, Beathwaite Green, Milnthorpe, Westmoreland	0	11	7
Two Little Girls (Sisters), Lee	0	10	0
H. R. S. Cassini, 319, Goswell Road, Islington	0	10	0
William H. Buttress, Poplar Place, Lozells Street, Birmingham	0	2	6
J. M., Worcestershire	0	2	6
A Little Sunbeam	0	4	0
Tom Taylor, Codnor, Derbyshire	0	13	3
Frederick R. Yates, 114, Sherlock Street, Birmingham	0	2	2
W. H. Coulter and O. Marsden, 17, Bishopsgate Street, Leeds	0	6	0
Mary Knight, 11, Lyme Street, Camden Road, Camden Town..	0	3	3
Miss M. Bagssaw, 20, St. Mary's Road, Canonbury Square, N.	0	13	9
J. Hsobee, Buscot Villas, Stratford, Essex	0	5	0
S. H., F. W., and E. T. ..	0	3	0
E. Wing, Dover	0	5	0
Sarah Eaton	0	5	0
Florrie Chapman, The Elms, Chrirton, Weston-super-Mare, Somersetshire ..	0	11	4
E. E. B., and E. J. B., Wantage, Berks	0	2	0
Henry Willis, 29, Alderson Road, Highfields, Sheffield	0	5	0
A Thanksgiving, C. M., Leeds	0	10	0
E. Gilbert, Mare Street, N.E.	0	10	0
T. Powell, Esq.	0	5	0
Martha Guy, 29, Harrogate Street, Wigan	0	2	0
Miss Julia Hunn, Horsley Street, Hall Lane, Liverpool	0	3	0
M. Q. and E. L., Blyth Link House	0	2	0
Walter B. Calton, 52, Chalk Farm Road, N.W..	0	12	6
W. Martin and Friends, Redruth	0	1	7
Miss Green and Friends, Deal	0	3	6
F. Farru Gia, Gen. Post Office, Malta	1	12	9
A. C., Bridgnorth	0	5	0
A. S. F., Birkenhead	0	5	0
Miss McPhail, Glenlochay House, Thillin, Perthshire	0	5	0
Janie Unsworth, 12, Dolvin Road, Tavistock	0	3	8
George Hurst, jun., Burton Joyce, near Nottingham	1	7	8
£	1970	8	10

Being amounts received up to and on 18th May, 1874.

The Editor would be glad to receive any outstanding subscriptions not later than the 10th July, 1874.

NOTE—Amount acknowledged in Second List as from John Yuille, High Street, Frome, should have been from John Yuille, High Street, Irvine.

(Drawn by J. N. Lee.)

THE YOUNG.

AS I, in summer's driest weather,
Sought some friends, by long-known ways,
I fondly lingered in a village,
My abode in early days;
And there were bending street and road,
And there the springing water flowed
By door on door, at which of yore
The many houses showed the young.

There some, once playsome, now were work-worn,
  Through long years becoming old;
And others, leaving sad outlivers,
  Now passed years they no more told.
As men were working on the lands,
At home the mothers plied their hands;
And on the way to work or play
The houses still sent forth their young.

The bells were ringing o'er a wedding
  That had made two households kin,
And some were mourning for a maiden
  That no love can ever win.
And one young man had left his door,
To plough the sea from shore to shore,
And this seemed all the houses' call—
"'Tis thus we still send forth our young."

And, oh! that many sweet foreweenings
  Of our life should flit so soon,
As hope's so-seeming year of sunshine
Shortens to a fleeting moon,
While some youth's face foreshows good days,
And blissful are some maiden's ways.
In girl or boy, for grief or joy,
The houses still send forth their young.

W. B.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER XII.

MAGGIE WRITES A LOVE-LETTER.

"MAGGIE!" exclaimed Hetty in astonishment when she saw her, "what can be the matter?"

"Nothing," Margaret answered with lips that quivered; and the day went by. The old man came home; the sitting was given, and the picture progressed. The next day and the next passed on, Margaret read to Miss Charlotte (Charley had gone) and gave her lessons. She looked out for more pupils, and obtained them; she worked hard, and she waited.

"What has become of Bowden?" the old man asked when nearly a week had gone by.

"I do not know," she answered, and her head drooped.

A letter came that evening from Herbert, and when the old man had read it, he paced up and down the room in anger, and then he wrote two letters, the one to his nephew and the other, Margaret saw with surprise when she looked at the envelope, was addressed to Stephen Bowden. Her face grew paler still when she saw it.

"Daddy, tell me what you have written to Mr. Bowden about."

"About some business, Maggie."

"But what business? oh, daddy dear! do tell me."

"It is about something we talked of the other night—you will know soon," he replied, and with that answer she had to be content.

She went into the studio after she had wished her father good night, and stayed there to think. It was a little room at the top of the house, hung with sketches, and attempts that had been failures. On chairs or convenient hooks, were bits of drapery with which to drape a model, or make up a picturesque dummy, and here was on old easel, and there a broken palette, some worn-out brushes and bits of thick drawing paper on which she had tried her colours, and in a corner was an old rocking-chair, in which from a child she had been in the habit of seating herself to think over some pleasure, or trouble, or some new design for a picture, or strange effect of light or colour. She seated herself in it now for a minute or two, then rose and put the candle in a more safe position, and found a little low footstool covered with brightly-worked wool, made to constitute a detail in some fancied painting, and sitting on that she stretched out her arms over a faded old ottoman that stood in the window, and leaning down her face, sobbed and cried softly to herself. So much for Margaret Ashbury's pride!

"Oh, how unhappy I am! oh, how foolish I was, my darling—my kind old darling!—to think I could have acted so foolishly!" she said, as she brought herself face to face with her own sorrow in the little studio, with no one to hear her, and only the faint sound of the flickering candle on the shelf disturbing the silence round her. What was she to do? He would never come back unless she retracted her words and asked him; she knew that. "And he was quite right too," she said. "I must have appeared in a horrible light to him: he was quite right." She rose and wiped her tear-stained eyes, and pushed back the soft fair hair from her forehead, went to a cupboard and found some writing-materials. Then she took the candle from the shelf, and putting it on the ottoman, sat down on the stool again and resting her paper on the hard side of a book, wrote her penitential love-letter. Surely it would bring him back. She kissed it when it was done, as many a woman has kissed a letter before her, and thought what a happy bit of paper it was, that it would find its way into his hands. Yes, surely it would bring him back. She had told him how bitterly she regretted her hasty words, and explained about Charley as well as she could, and told him how much she loved him (Stephen), and how she would not make him angry for the world—no! not for twenty worlds; and how she longed for a word from him to tell her she was again, what at heart she had never for a moment failed to be, his Margaret. It was a letter such as a woman like Margaret, who was no ordinary love-sick girl, can only write once or twice in a lifetime. It cost her many a tear, and her hand shook as she wrote it; but for all that she meant it, every word, and had no false feeling in the matter. She ought to be humble, she thought; and she had been wrong, and ought to own it; and she did love him dearly, as she ought to love the man who was to be her husband, and she was not ashamed to say so. For one moment a thought flashed upon her: suppose he should not answer! Her cheeks blazed at the very thought; it would be so terrible to write thus unless she received an equally warm reply. But that he would send her, oh yes, she knew he would, and she did not insult him with a single doubt. So she looked at the blurred and blotted letter tenderly, folded it up and addressed it ready to post in the morning, and then, with a heart that felt more satisfied, went to bed.

CHAPTER XIII.

MAGGIE'S LETTER.

She read her letter over in the morning, and hesitated. It was very humble, she thought, yet she had been very wrong, and she was so certain of his love for her, and his readiness to forgive her, so she added a postscript (she knew it would convince him of her penitence and constancy more than all the letter besides) to tell him she had returned the chain to Charley Campbell the very next day.

"I will no post it just yet," she said; "I will manage so that he gets it in the evening, and then perhaps he will come up to St. John's Wood directly."

She was a little diplomatic, she thought, as most woman inwardly flatter themselves they can be, and she had an idea that the pleasant surprise her letter would be, would bring him with a rush to her feet again. She gave a lesson to a new pupil, and then went on to the National Gallery to draw. She could not do much work, though, for she was thinking of her letter, and presently it occurred to her that he might not be sure of her being at home that evening, so she opened it again and added in pencil, "I shall be at home all the evening," and then she fastened it up and played with her brushes, and strolled round the gallery, looking at the work of her fellow-students, until at last it was three o'clock, and time for the missive to be dispatched. She put on her bonnet, and was just going to send her letter off, when suddenly Herbert Ashbury appeared. He had rung the bell, and the porter had let him in, as is customary with students' friends, even on the closed days.

"Margaret, I want a quiet talk with you." Her thoughts went to Stephen Bowden in a moment; but it was not of him he wanted to speak. "I have had a letter from my uncle this morning, enclosing the eighty pounds he owed me."

"Enclosing the eighty pounds!"

"Yes; and there are some observations in the letter of which I shall express my opinion to him; I have come to see you, as I wish you to know what your father has said to me, and to see that I am justified in the course I intend to pursue." He pulled out the letter and handed it to her, but she refused to look at it.

"I would rather not," she said; "my father would have shown it to me if he had wished me to see it."

"But you surely do not take my uncle's part? I lent him the money at great personal inconvenience, and through his representations that he would get me a large per-centage, and then he not only gets me no profit at all, but is almost insulting when I ask for my money back. You must see that he is very ungrateful, Maggie, and it is not the way to sow the seed of future good turns. I thought you would have too much sense to take his part, and so I came to tell you of his conduct."

She answered him with a quiet dignity yet gentleness, that was the best reproof that she could have given him.

"I dare say you are right, Herbert, and I understand the point of view from which you see; but by your own confession you lent the money partly because you expected a large profit, not wholly from kindness; so there was regard for yourself as well as for my father in the transaction. I know my father makes mistakes—so does every one; but am I, his daughter, the person to whom you should discuss them? You have your money back, and be content; as for what my father says, he is older than you, and you can afford to forgive him. It has been an unfortunate business, but don't let us make a quarrel of it."

"Well, no," he answered a little sulkily, "we won't quarrel over it; and of course you cannot speak against your own father. Here, can't you come as far as the Temple with me? then I'll walk home with you and talk it over. It's getting dark, and they turn you out at four—oh, it only wants ten minutes."

"Why do you wish to go to the Temple?"

"I met Grant this morning, and he gave me a note for Bowden, but I forgot to leave it for him, so I want to go back to Coke Court with it. He is away at Marlow, but said he should be back by the six o'clock train to-day, and the note may be important; Grant said it was tickets for a concert, I think, though."

"He is not there now?"

"No, he can't be back till six."

She could not well refuse, so she went, thinking all the time of the letter in her pocket, and longing impatiently for that foolish quarrel to end. It was nearly dusk by the time they got to the house in Coke Court, for the days were short and dull, and Margaret felt her heart beat quicker as she thought of the last time she had come that way on the night of the "call" party. Herbert opened the door with a latch-key, and then the door of Stephen's sitting-room was on their right. He tried the door, but it was locked, so he stooped and poked the letter underneath it.

"Bowden always locks up his room when he goes away, for fear his papers should be disturbed," he said. "Wait here a minute, Maggie, while I run up-stairs," and he left her outside on the door-step.

It was almost too late to post her letter, she thought, so quick as lightning she stooped and slipped it under the door, as Herbert had the one he had brought, and then with a sigh of thankfulness to think it was out of her hesitating fingers, she waited till her cousin came down-stairs, and walked home to her own door with him.

"Daddy, what did you say to Herbert?" she asked, as she went on with the portrait.

She could not work much that evening, for she was waiting eagerly for a knock at the door and a well-known step on the stair.

"Nothing much, dear, only expressed my opinion of his conduct," he answered drowsily.

He looked very worn and bent down that evening, did the poor old man.

"Daddy," she said tremblingly and coaxingly, and going to him she knelt by his side, and stroked the thin grey hair, "where did you get the money?"

"I borrowed it—in the City."

"In the City?"

"Yes, a man lent me a hundred pounds."

"Oh!" It was a comfort to hear it was some one in the City, though how she wished he would not borrow at all! "A hundred pounds! Then, daddy, you will pay the rent, won't you, darling? The landlord has been half-a-dozen times."

"Maggie," the old man said, and he raised his eyes and spoke in a feeble, helpless manner, "you really must not annoy me too, dear; I've paid Herbert, and surely you can be content; I want the other twenty pounds to assist me in getting out the prospectus of a new company I am planning. I leave the Atalanta directly, and I must think of the future."

"Have you nothing certain when you leave there, daddy?"

"No, dear, nothing, so I must think about the company. I am getting an old man, my child, and my last enemy will soon be seeking me."

She looked up, half wondering what he meant, thinking vaguely that his greatest enemy was himself, and then she pulled out her watch, which was suspended again from the broken chain, and found it was getting very late, and there was no sign yet of Stephen Bowden.

(To be continued.)

DAVID AND JONATHAN.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM HANNA, D.D., LL.D., EDINBURGH.

PART II.

THE attachment that sprung up so suddenly and fixed itself so firmly in the heart of Jonathan, found instant and significant expression. He stripped himself of his princely robe, his girdle, his sword and bow, and gave them on the spot to David. Well pleased he was to hear Saul say that David should return no more to his father's house, but should remain attached to the court. It brought the two, now friends by solemn covenant, into the closest daily companionship; all said and done by each but deepening the mutual love. Jonathan had seen himself outrivalled in the use of one of his own favourite weapons. He had witnessed a great deliverance wrought for Israel by another younger man, which quite outshone that effected ten years before by his own hand. He had marked the sudden universal extraordinary burst of popularity which David by that one deed had won for himself. He had listened to the bands of singers and dancers, chanting to one another by the way, "Saul has slain his thousands, but David his ten thousands;" yet not the faintest shadow of jealousy had crept into his heart. But that sinister look of his father, and the bitter words that followed, told too plainly that it was not so with Saul. It was the first trial to which Jonathan's attachment to David was subjected. Next day the dreadful visitation of the evil spirit came upon the king. David seized his harp and was playing as before. Twice the javelin which Saul held in his hand was hurled at him; twice by adroit movement he evaded the meditated stroke. Jonathan and David were both willing enough to impute the act to a temporary phrensy; the more so as Saul's conduct for some time gave no expression of dislike to one whom he could readily, at any time, have dismissed from his presence. David meanwhile behaved himself "very wisely in all his ways." Not even any of Saul's personal attendants, who might have grudged him the high place to which he had suddenly been elevated, could or did find any fault. He won the love and confidence of them all. It but embittered the feeling of the king, who more than half suspected that he saw in David the neighbour better than himself, to whom the kingdom was to be transferred. But he cloaked his spite, gave David high commands, sent him on important expeditions, married him to one of his daughters, all under pretence of bestowing honours, but all coupled with conditions, the fulfilment of which it was hoped might have cost David his life. At last, however, the mask was dropped, and "Saul spake to Jonathan, his son, and to all his servants, that they should kill David." What was Jonathan to do? He could not absolutely disobey or set himself to thwart his father. Still less could he sacrifice his friend. What he does is first to warn David privately of his danger, and then to appeal to his father on his behalf. The appeal succeeds. Saul for the moment is ashamed of himself, hearkens to the voice of Jonathan, and even swears, "As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain."

Things return to their usual course; all looks well again. But again the war breaks out; David heads the armies of Israel, routs the Philistines with a great slaughter, and returns with fresh laurels round his brow. Once more the evil spirit fills Saul's heart. The javelin again is grasped, and the deadly cast is made. That night David fled, but messengers were instantly sent after him. It was his wife's ingenious device that alone opened to him the way for further flight. But where was he to go for safety? He thinks of the home of Samuel. Would Saul dare to tear him from the great prophet's side? He hastens to Ramah, and finds Samuel there. The two pass over to the neighbouring enclosures at Naioth, where the sons of the prophets live. They mingle in all the peaceful and hallowed exercises of the place. But not even the seclusion of such a home, nor the thought that David has renounced court life, and become one of the sons of the prophets at Naioth, can quench the hate that burns in the king's breast. Messengers after messengers are dispatched from Gibeah to Naioth with strict orders to seize David, whoever should protect him, however he should be engaged. The messengers are ready to do the king's bidding, and apparently have all the power to do so; but a power higher than human intervenes. The Spirit of God comes upon them, and instead of stretching out their hands to arrest, they open their lips to prophesy. The king will go in person to make the capture. He does so, but the same power is upon him. Stripped of all his outer garments, he lies day and night prophesying before Samuel. For the time David is safe enough, but he will not expose Samuel and the youths of Naioth to further peril on his behalf. At no small risk to himself he hastens to Gibeah before Saul could have returned, watches his opportunity, and obtains a private interview with Jonathan. No conversation between two friends of equal length is recorded in the Bible, and no conversation recorded anywhere exhibits a greater intensity or tenderness of emotion on either side, a more generous rivalry in all the courtesies of friendship. The first words that David utters show into what a state of excitement he had been thrown. "What have I done? what is mine iniquity? what is my sin before thy father, that he seeketh my life?" Jonathan will not believe that it is his father's fixed deliberate purpose to take David's life. It had been in times only of temporary insanity that he had made the attempt. At no time when he was perfectly himself had he ever spoken of cherishing such a malignant design. "God forbid; thou shalt not die; behold, my father will do nothing either great or small, but that he will show it me: and why should my father hide this thing from me? it is not so." David has seen deeper than Jonathan into Saul's disturbed, envenomed heart, and can give a reason why the king should keep his son in ignorance of his purpose. "Thy father certainly knoweth that I have found grace in thine eyes; and he saith, Let not Jonathan know this, lest he be grieved: but truly as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is but a step between me and death." Jonathan bows before the strong assertion confirmed by a double oath. "Then said Jonathan unto David, Whatsoever thy soul desireth, I will even do it unto thee." David will not part finally from the friend so dear to him, till he has convinced him that there is no other alternative. He wants Jonathan to be as assured as he was himself of the determined malice of the king. He proposes, therefore, that Jonathan should apply a test which would bring out unmistakably how his father thought and felt. His only fear was that the fine nature that was in the son might be played upon by the father, and Jonathan be prevented either from applying the test or telling David truly and fully of the result. Reading his friend's heart, Jonathan proposes to go out to a field where they could continue the conversation, surer of being unseen and unheard. There, in most solemn manner invoking the Lord God of Israel, Jonathan engaged to let David know whatever was the issue, and David engaged by oath to show kindness to Jonathan and to his house for ever. The covenant of eternal friendship was renewed; oaths on either side repeated; all was arranged as to the manner in which the king's temper was to be tried, and in which David should be informed of the result. No shadow of distrust on either side, they part; David to go meanwhile into lïidings, Jonathan to go to carry out the preconcerted plan. The execution brought out such a depth of deadly vengeance in Saul's heart against David as Jonathan never could have conceived. In the heat of his furious passion, the king so far forgot himself as to fling foul words of reproach on Jonathan's own birth. "Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman, do not I know that thou hast chosen the son of Jesse to thine own confusion, and unto the confusion of thy mother's nakedness?" And when Jonathan ventured to say a word on behalf of his absent friend, no longer capable of restraining himself, the king flung the javelin intended for David at his own son. It was more than even the fine spirit of Jonathan could bear. He rose from the table "in fierce anger." He needed no further evidence; all that remained was to let David know. Next morning the arrow signal that confirmed all the fears of David was given. The boy was dismissed; David rose from his hiding-place. The two friends drew near to one another. They know that it must be a hurried meeting; that it is not a time for many words; that David must not expose himself to detection; that he must be off without delay, and fly far away. But not the need of haste, nor fear of exposure, can keep David from showing, even in such circumstances, the depth of his respect and gratitude to the friend who had proved so true. "And David arose, and fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times." Then, all formality forgotten, the two friends fling themselves into each other's arms. "And they kissed one another, and wept one with another, until David exceeded." If the excess of tears was with David, perhaps that of love was with Jonathan. David does not appear to have said anything; if he did it could only be a few broken unrecorded words. "And Jonathan said to David, Go in peace, forasmuch as we have sworn both of us in the name of the Lord, saying, The Lord be between me and thee, and between my seed and thy seed for ever." And so they parted, never but once to meet again.

It was some years thereafter, in one of the most perilous crises of David's life, that the last interview took place. Flying before the hot pursuit of Saul, David was in a mountain of the wilderness of Ziph in a wood. There one day the glad surprise was given him of the appearance of Jonathan, who must have come hurriedly and secretly from his father's side. He came to encourage his friend, and strengthen his hand in God. But a single sentence of that last conversation between the two is preserved. It came from the lips of Jonathan. "Fear not," he said: "for the hand of my father shall not find thee; and thou shalt be king over Israel, and I shall be next unto thee; and that also Saul my father knoweth."

Jonathan was not a king's son by birth. He was of sufficient age, and of sufficient wisdom, when his father was called of God and by the people to fill the throne, to know that it was an elective monarchy, this new one of Israel, and might not be hereditary. Still, undoubtedly, the use and wont of all other kingdoms must have excited in his, as it evidently did in his father's heart, the hope that he would succeed. The very time when Saul and he came certainly to know that another had been anointed to the kingdom, was that at which Saul's son Mephibosheth was born. Parental as well as personal feeling was thus involved, so as to make it no small sacrifice in him to give up all hope of the succession. But it was made without a struggle, and without a regret. His faith in the Lord's right to nominate was too strong to tempt him to dispute that right, though exercised against himself. Nor was he long in recognising the good and sufficient reasons for the new choice in the pre-eminent ability and piety of him whom the Lord had nominated. The readiness with which he renounced all imagined rights, and threw up all expectation of being king after his father's death, of itself is fitted to excite our deepest respect and liveliest admiration. But it tells us not half the story of his peerless and unparalleled self-devotion. We have had before us many a ready enough and most graceful retirement from high station, and relinquishment of high hopes. We have seen other sons of monarchs whose fathers had forfeited their thrones, submitting with a noble magnanimity to their lot. But they all retired into private life; to save themselves or others the pain of being constantly the spectators of honours worn by others, that they once thought would have been their own. But where have we another, who in the very act of laying down all his rights and all his prospects, said to him who was to take them up, as Jonathan said in his last words to David, "Thou shalt be king over Israel, and I shall be next to thee?" He had no distrust of David, that through any petty jealousy he would shrink from offering to him the post of his prime minister. He had no distrust of himself that he would in any way abuse the powers or prerogative of such an office. His own heart told him what a joy and honour it would be to be second to such a man as David; and he rightly judged of David's heart by his own. What a noble confidence in his friend; what a sublime self-abnegation. It is this speech of Jonathan in the wood than enshrines him in our affection, as one of the most unselfish and magnanimous of our race. Alas! he little knew, when he broached this project as to the future—met so instantly in the same spirit in which it was made—that he was never to live to see it carried out. But as little did he know that those words, whispered that day into David's only listening ear beneath those deaf branches of the forest, would have wings given them of tireless strength,—wings that should waft them abroad through the earth, and down through coming centuries; that the words spoken in such a secret place should be proclaimed on the house-tops of all lands, an everlasting memorial of his rare unenvying and devoted love.

Friendship had its claims upon Jonathan, so too had the filial tie. He loved David as his own soul. He loved his father too; as well and fondly as such a father could be loved. There were conflicting affections here, or at least conflicting duties. He had to be faithful to the covenant made with David; he had to be faithful also to the heaven-made covenant, which bound him to love, honour, and obey his father. Placed in a position so peculiar and so painful, nothing could exceed the wisdom with which he steered his course; giving to each, father and friend, his due. For his father's sake he made the great sacrifice of giving up the companionship of David, seeing him but once through the long years of David's outlawry. Fidelity to Saul, both as his father and his prince, bound him to support the throne as long as it stood. He preserved that fidelity inviolate. Much as he must have condemned many of his father's actings, he never set himself in opposition to his authority. Not even that authority could tempt to take any personal part in the cruel persecution of his friend. You read of Saul and his 3,000 men chasing David from stronghold to stronghold, but never of Jonathan being among their number. At any time and by a word his father could get him to peril his life in conflict with any of Israel's open enemies; but never to move a finger threatening the life of the innocent. Nay, he was as ready to peril his life in support of his friend's injured character as in support of his father's assaulted throne. True to death on either side, he gave the last proof of fidelity to his friend in the wood of Ziph: the last proof of his fidelity to his father when he fought and fell by his side on the mountains of Gilboa.

Never over any death was such an elegy pronounced as that recorded in 2 Sam. i. We mourn with David over Jonathan's early death; but which of us would take it on us to deny that he died at the very best time for him, for us, for all the world?—escaping all the trials that a life through David's reign might have brought with it, and leaving behind for the world to keep and cherish for ever the unsullied record of a friendship, for its truth, its tenderness, its intensity, unrivalled in the annals of our race; the single feature of his romantic attachment to David, heightened in our regard by the striking fact, that Jonathan is one of the few men we read of upon whose outer life and conduct, so far as known to us, there rests not a single stain.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XVI. CHRIST TEACHING BY MIRACLES.

Chapter to be read—John xxi. 1—14.

INTRODUCTION. Question on some of our Lord's appearances after His resurrection. To what woman did He appear first? (John xx. 15.) How was He known to His disciples, going to Emmaus? (Luke xxiv. 30, 31.) Refer to His appearance to the disciples without Thomas, and with Thomas (John xx. 24, 26). From all these collect the idea that there was something new and strange in His appearance, so that He was not at once recognised, till His voice was heard, and same manner shown. Ask where many of the disciples had been first called (Matt. iv. 18, 21). So now visits them again on same sea, and gives a fresh and lasting call.

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES. (Read John xxi. 1—14.) Ask why Christ did not ascend immediately after His resurrection. For what was He preparing His apostles? (Matt. xxviii. 19). So now, when they resumed ordinary life and work for a time, Christ turns that work into a lesson, or parable, to illustrate their future work. Notice the following points in the story. (1) The place. Same Sea of Galilee where Christ had so often been with them. Ask for the principal incidents—e.g., stilling the tempest, walking on sea, first miraculous draught of fishes (Luke. v. 1), parables taught while sitting in a boat (Matt. xiii.) &c.—a sea full of happy recollections. (2) The persons. Peter, always taking the lead; doubting Thomas; guileless Nathanael (John i. 45); fiery James and John (Boanerges), and two nameless ones. (3) The miracle. Picture out the scene; the weary night; net cast again and again; no success. Another attempt; same result—morning dawn showing tired and disappointed disciples. Dim light; a figure seen on the shore. Who can it be? A voice calling. Question reminding of want of success, but showing interest in welfare. Command given. Shall it be obeyed—is it any use trying? The net cast, the fishes collected. (4) The meal. Ask who recognised Christ first. What would quicken his faculties? Who was the eager apostle? what did he do? Describe the boat slowly rowed along, dragging the net: the disciples collecting the fish; piling them into the boat; Peter taking the lead and giving directions (ver. 11); then the fish-kettle swung over the fire and rude but hearty meal. Christ having provided bread and condiments (ver. 9, "fish" meaning fish-sauces), the disciples bring of their fish, and the meal begins. Had they ever taken a meal with Christ before? What did He always do with the bread before eating? so doubtless now. No longer any doubt as to Who it was.

II. THE LESSONS. (1) Christ really present, though unseen. When had they been in like situation before? (Matt. xiv. 23, 25.) What was He doing for them then? So now was watching, intending to aid. Show how this may be a comfort to all; remind how Elisha's servant's eyes were opened to see the Divine protection (2 Kings vi. 17), and of the numerous directions to call on God in trouble, as being ever near. (2) Help given when man's exertions failed. Toiled all night before help came; what would this teach as to their own powers? would make more earnest in relying on God. Remind of Israelites in extremity at Red Sea, Jonah in whale's belly, Peter on sea, &c. Must simply cast ourselves on almighty aid, which shall not fail. (3) Nothing wanting in Christ's service. Show Christ's love in feeding bodies before souls—gave all needed. So will always (Ps. xxxiv. 10) our duty then to trust.

III. THE SPIRITUAL TEACHING. Was this all that Christ wanted to teach? Where were they to be sent? Would He be any longer with them? What had He promised they should become? Were soon going to begin as "fishers of men" in the great sea of the world. Remind of parable of draw-net (Matt. xiii. 47). This miracle would teach them (1) without Him could do nothing. Had they ever tried to work in their own strength? With what success? (See Matt. xvii. 16). So, too, in their own life, who of these now present had disbelieved and denied? Would now be distrustful of self. See Peter's answer to Christ's question as to his love (ver. 15—17). (2) With Him could do everything. Ask what power Christ was to give them (Acts i. 8). When did it come, and in what way? (Acts ii. 2.) With what result? How many converted in one day? (Acts ii. 41.) So with individual apostles. Remind of Peter and John healing lame man in name of Jesus; Stephen full of Holy Ghost doing great wonders; Peter's boldness before the Council (Acts iv. 13); Paul's labours throughout the world. (3) The typical end. All this work and preaching to draw souls to Christ. What will happen when work done? Same Christ return; His workers, with those gathered in, come to heavenly shore to feast on provision His love provided for them. What shore and feast is that?

Questions to be answered.

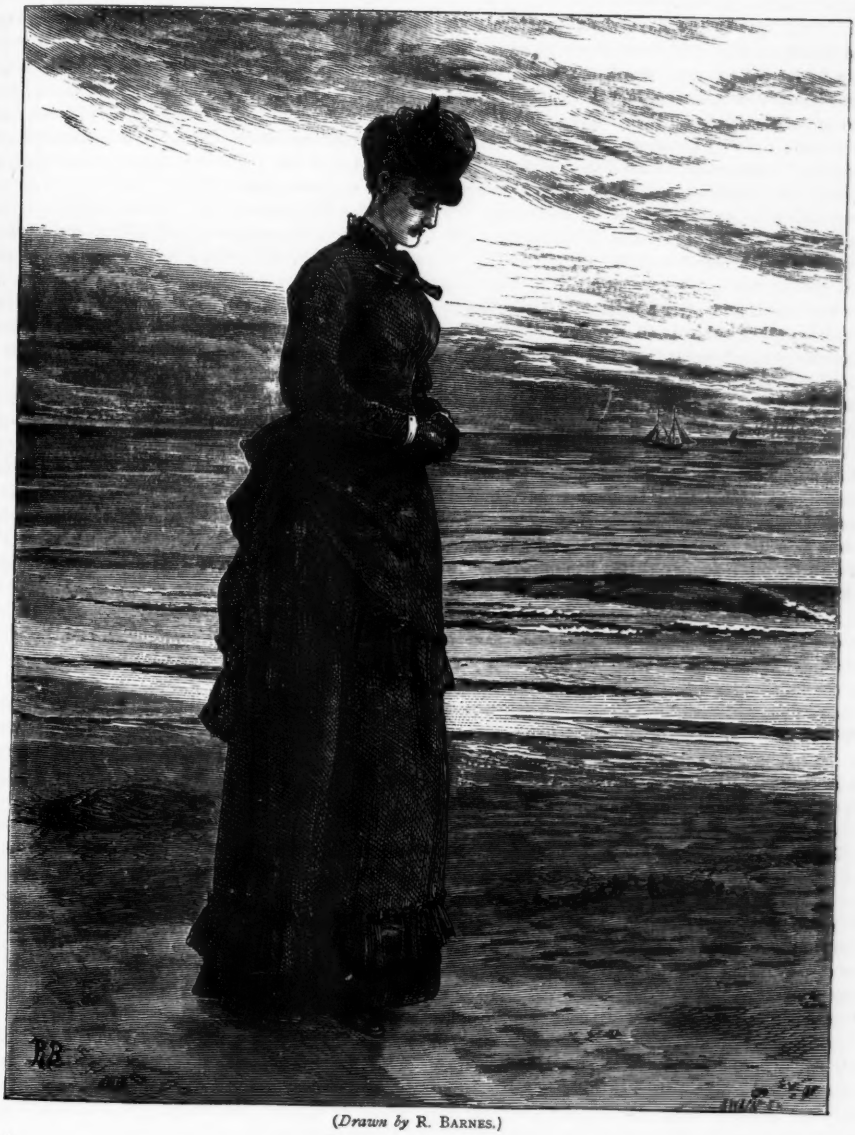
1. Describe some of the different appearances of Christ after His resurrection.
2. Name some of the scenes connected with the Sea of Galilee.
3. Which disciples were present at this miracle?
4. What lessons does the miracle teach?
5. What further spiritual teaching was intended?
6. What typical end may be noticed?

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. P. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XXII.

"NOW, Will," said Una, as she laid back her tired head, "tell me what is going to happen in the neighbourhood."



"First of all," said Will, "the rector is going to give up his church for at least a year, perhaps for altogether, and a new clergyman is coming, who is said to be a very different person from Mr. Crichton."

"That is, indeed, an important change," said Una; "but what is the cause of it?"

"Lilith's health; she has drooped so much lately that the rector has been advised to take her to Torquay for the winter, and then, I believe, to some German baths for the summer; so they are all going away immediately, the rector, and dear pretty Lilith, and—and Hervey."

Something in Will's tone and downcast face struck Una with a sudden suspicion that Hervey Crichton had become more to her little friend than she herself had been aware of, till the prospect of a separation had, as it were, awakened her heart. It was not, in truth, very long since Hervey had told Una of his attachment to herself in the conservatory at the Abbey, but so much had happened since then that the event seemed to have drifted far back into the past, and she could not help having a strong conviction that it was a mere passing fancy which attracted him to her, and one which could easily enough be replaced by a more lasting affection for Will, whom he certainly admired very much, if they could meet more frequently than they had done hitherto, and Una determined that if she could in any way promote such a result she would do her very best to secure it. She put her arm affectionately round Will, saying, "You must cheer up, darling; I have a firm belief that brighter days are awaiting you, whatever may be in store for myself; your fate is not likely to be so involved as mine is."

"Well, I am sure I hope so; I am not one of the good resigned people at all, I want to be happy very much."

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"One life only, one life only"—p. 636.

"So we all do, I am afraid," said Una, with a sigh.

"But then you deserve happiness, and I don't suppose I do; my old nurse used to tell me I should come to a bad end if I went on being so naughty."

"But that was in the days when you tore your frocks climbing trees, and insisted on going to the stables to feed the horses, and I am sure you are very good now, considering how kind and patient you have been with me all this time."

"I know I am very discontented, and that is not being good, I suppose, but it is all so wretched. There is Rupert too, I do not know when I shall ever see him again, and my father is unhappy and my mother is cross—oh, dear!" and Will laid down her head on the couch very despondingly.

Una passed her hand caressingly over the dark clustering curls, and after a moment's silence began to speak on other subjects, in the hope of changing the current of her friend's thoughts. "Tell me about this new clergyman, Will, who is he?"

"Mr. Trafford; he is a very well-known man in London, where he has almost worked himself to death in one of the very worst parts of the city. I hear he is a most devoted, energetic person, and so eloquent that people used to flock from the West End to hear him preach."

"And how does it happen then that he is willing to come to a quiet country parish like ours?"

"Because he is just recovering from an almost fatal fever, which he caught in some of the pestilential places where he worked, and the doctors said he would die if he did not go to the country for a year; I do not suppose he will stay after that time."

"Is he young?"

"Not very, between forty and fifty, I suppose; but unmarried, and a singularly fine-looking man. I expect he will become a sort of besieged resident at the rectory, all the single ladies in the place will wish to make him happy,—always excepting myself."

"You must make somebody else happy," said Una, stooping to kiss her. "But now, dear Will, since I have to go this dreary journey to-morrow, will you please send my maid to me that I may make preparations for it? how glad I shall be when I can come back and go with you to hear Mr. Trafford!"

"And so shall I—I'm sure," said Will, warmly returning her embrace; "but you must leave your maid and me to pack up for you, and go to sleep yourself; you look so pale and tired, poor darling," and after settling Una comfortably amongst her cushions once more, she quietly left the room.

A long stretch of level sand, lying dim and grey under the twilight sky, and one solitary figure pacing to and fro upon it buried in deep thought; it is thus that we find Una Dysart again three months after her father's death. Her life during the interval had been singularly cheerless and uneventful. Lady Elizabeth Molyneux was a fanciful invalid; or rather, to speak with entire accuracy, she was an elderly unmarried woman, physically in perfect health, but morally afflicted with the blighting disease of an intense selfishness. To be herself the sole object of importance to every one in the household, and the recipient of their ceaseless attention, seemed to be the one purpose for which she lived, and as this end could best be gained by the continual and minute claims of a condition of supposed weakness and bodily suffering, she had long since persuaded herself that she was the victim of a chronic state of illness, and established it as a fact, which no one attempted to dispute. She was entirely ruled by a companion in the shape of a penniless maiden lady of mature age, who was keenly alive to her own interests, and not very scrupulous in the means she took to further them, so that while she did not hesitate to flatter and cajole her wealthy mistress to the utmost of her power, she was very ingenious in detracting from the merits of every one else who approached her, and easily succeeded in turning her against them. Miss Grubbe did this with especial effect in the case of Una, who would have been only too glad to fill the aching void left by her father's loss, in loving care of her mother's sister; but it was in vain that she struggled to find a place in her aunt's life; if she attempted to read to her, or even to sit by her couch and converse with her, Miss Grubbe was sure to remark, with a most reproachful air, that she wondered Miss Dysart did not perceive how much she was fatiguing her ladyship, and then Lady Elizabeth would sink back on her pillows and implore her niece to leave her.

But now the certainty that she had one life only, to make or mar, had a very different significance from what it ever had previously. Unless she could bear this one life stainless, at least in purpose and effort, into the awful light of God's own presence, how should she in her turn meet that Death which stands as a doorkeeper at the gate of heaven? She remembered the day on board ship, when in the arrogance of her youth and inexperience she had not feared to prepare a record as a testimony against herself, if at the close of her existence she should be found to have failed in crowning it with the finished work of her righteous purpose. She had not looked at the words she had written since; they remained safely locked up, as when she gaily threw the key into the depths of the sea, but they came back upon her often in the time of struggle and idecision through which she passed during the lonely winter, and although when she wrote them they had sprung rather from the ambition of her pure young soul than from religious conviction, yet she could well see that she could be no true child of God except she did indeed try to carry them out. Often in the darkness of her sleepless nights she seemed to see them blazoned in letters of fire on the wall. "I have one life only," she had written on that day when we first saw her. "I will make it blameless and noble. I will make it fruitful in blessings to others. It shall leave its mark for good on the earth. It shall not be spent on myself. It shall not be spent in vain." These were her deliberate resolves before temptation assailed her; and now what was it she was about to do? To marry Humphrey Atherstone would be in some way, she knew not how, to lure him into a dereliction from the stainlessness of perfect rectitude—to draw him down with herself from the one inflexible standard of purest honour and truth. He had told her this in so many words, and the fact that she could not in the slightest degree understand the nature of the obstacle to their happiness, was no reason why she should doubt that its import must have been weighty indeed, since it had made him take that solemn resolution against marriage, which love for herself alone was making him abjure. She knew that the decision, the responsibility, would rest with herself; for it was only when he found that her happiness (as well as his own) was involved in their union that he threw his scruples to the winds and implored her to become his wife.

It was thus that through all the period of her absence from England Una had tortured herself with endless balancing of the momentous question, but she felt on that evening that the time was come when she must make her final decision, for the very next day she, her aunt, and Miss Grubbe were to set out on their return home, and they were to go at once to Vale House, where they were all to reside together henceforward; there she would see Atherstone again, and there she could not doubt he would require of her at once an answer to the question which death had delayed so long.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Not once since the night when under Atherstone's roof Una fell on her dead father's breast had she seen the beloved face, whose image was for ever before her eyes; not one word had come to her from him across the gulf of separation she had found so hard to bear; but she knew well from hints dropped by Will in her letters that she owed this dreary silence to Mrs. Northcote's diplomacy.

On the day of her father's funeral Atherstone had stopped Mr. Northcote as they were turning away from the grave, and asked him anxiously how Miss Dysart was, without the least attempt to conceal the interest he felt in her. The squire had evidently been primed with an answer in case Humphrey asked after her, and he proceeded to repeat his lesson hurriedly as if afraid of leaving a word unspoken, "Miss Dysart is very sadly—very sadly indeed, quite unable to see any one, or to receive any letters. She is going abroad soon with her aunt, and we mean it to be the beginning of a new life to her, where she will be kept as much as possible from all associations with the past."

"And all connections with her past friends, I suppose," said Atherstone with a scornful curve of the lip, for he saw Mr. Northcote's drift perfectly.

"Well, yes—yes—it will be best so; her aunt will regulate her acquaintances now, and she is a very fastidious person, very exclusive, she will be exceedingly particular." Atherstone turned haughtily on his heel and walked away, but it was with the resolution muttered obstinately to himself, that neither Mrs. Northcote nor any one else should keep him from seeing Una when he returned from Southampton, whither he was to go next day, to send his enemy away out of his sight, as he hoped, for ever. He accomplished his purpose in this respect, and saw with unspeakable relief the vessel which bore Edwards and his family dipping down below the horizon till it finally disappeared from his anxious gaze, and then feeling that he had, at a terrible cost to his conscience, removed the barrier between himself and Una, he returned with almost frantic impatience to Atherstone Abbey, determined to lose no time in making his way to her, and hearing from her own lips, that she would revoke the refusal she had given him for the sake of his honour, even while frankly admitting that he had won her heart. Atherstone had imagined it likely that she would return to Vale House for a few days, before going abroad, and he had not been five minutes in his own house before he had called Thorpe, and impatiently asked him if he knew whether Miss Dysart was still at the Manor.

"Oh no, sir!" exclaimed Thorpe; "she is gone quite away to foreign parts."

"Gone!" said Atherstone, turning fiercely upon him; "where has she gone?"

"No one don't know, sir," said the old man, who was keenly alive to the true state of his master's feelings. "I made it my business to wait for the housekeeper at the Manor after church on Sunday, and I asked her where Miss Dysart was a-going to, and she said no one didn't know, nor wouldn't; for Mrs. Northcote had said the young lady was going with her aunt, and her ladyship did not choose her plans to be discussed. All I know is, sir, that she crossed the Channel two days ago."

Atherstone turned and walked away without a word, controlling with difficulty the fiery passion that almost choked him; for he felt that he was baffled, even conquered for the time. If the Northcotes were deliberately set on concealing Una's destination from him, he knew well that they could do so most effectually, and he clenched his hands with impotent rage, as he felt that in all probability he should be able to hold no communication with her at all until she returned.

So it proved; to those two who lived in each other's thoughts night and day, not one single opportunity was afforded of even the most shadowy intercourse; but it never caused Una to doubt Humphrey Atherstone for a single moment. She knew perfectly how this total separation had been compassed, and she felt that the hour was fast approaching when none could prevent their meeting, and then it would rest with her and her alone, to make the final decision as to their future fate.

This night, the last she was to spend at Cannes, she must settle the question with her own soul; this night she must fix immutably her whole future life; and as she paced to and fro on the desolate shore she seemed to hear in every moan of the waves the perpetual echo of the warning, "One life only," "one life only!" Suddenly, with an impetuous movement, she turned to the sea, and standing on its brink, she gazed out over the waste of waters in the direction of that far-off spot where he dwelt whom she loved with all the impassioned fervour of her ardent nature. His beautiful face seemed to rise up before her with the infinite tenderness of his dark eyes pleading to her soul. And all the pent-up love of her aching heart suddenly burst its floodgates, and overwhelmed conscience, scruples, doubts, whatever had held back from him hitherto whom now she felt to be her only hope, her only joy; and with almost a cry of anguished appeal to him to take her home to his heart for ever, she stretched out her arms towards the far horizon and exclaimed, "Yes, I have one life only, only one; but I give it all to you my love, my love; it is yours, and only yours from this time forth for evermore." She clasped her hands and hid her face upon them, while she registered in her heart the vow she had uttered; then turned and slowly walked homewards. She reached the house, and as she passed the threshold of the door a thick letter, which had just been left by the postman for her, was put into her hand.

Una Dysart walked into the drawing-room, with the letter in her hand, and found it deserted; Lady Elizabeth having gone to bed early, in preparation for the journey next day, and Miss Grubbe being in attendance on her. So she sat down quietly near the lamp to examine its contents. It was deeply edged with black, and bore the postmark of the Mauritius. Una had but one correspondent in that island. Miss Amherst, whom she had been wont in her lighthearted days to call the "weird woman," had conceived a great affection for the bright winning girl she had first met on the homeward-bound ship, and had kept up a steady correspondence with her ever since. Una had often mentioned Humphrey Atherstone in her letters, and in one which she had written before her father's death, she had unconsciously let it be seen that they were far more to each than mere acquaintances or even friends.

This letter had been immediately answered by Miss Amherst in a manner which had roused Una's indignation on Humphrey's account, in no small degree. She had begun it by stating that she was in a very bad state of health, and that her condition was such as to make it certain that her life could not be greatly prolonged. It had been her intention to make certain arrangements with regard to her property, which affected both Una and Humphrey quite independently of each other, and this had caused her, she said, to bring their names before the lawyer at Valehead. From him she had heard that it was generally believed they were engaged to be married, but along with that announcement he had made certain statements to her concerning Mr. Atherstone, the truth of which it was, she said, of the utmost importance, she should distinctly ascertain. Nor would it be sufficient that she should have a mere contradiction of the charges brought against him. It was most essential that she should have a detailed explanation of the vague generalities which had been laid before her. She felt certain that these must be known to Una, as the lawyer had stated that the strange reports concerning Mr. Atherstone were so rife and of so unpleasant a nature that Miss Dysart's friends were believed to be much opposed to the marriage, and Miss Amherst, therefore, implored her to tell her all the facts, all that was known to herself.

"It may seem strange," her letter had continued, "that I should ask you to give me any explanation of matters connected with one who may already be your husband for aught I know, but I entreat of you to trust me, Una, and to believe that I ask this of you for his sake, as much as for your own; and in the interests of that truth and justice, which I cannot doubt you have both at heart. I believe that I possess the knowledge of a secret, which may be of the highest importance to Mr. Atherstone, but it must depend on what I hear from you whether I can reveal it, and if I die before it has been told, it dies with me, for none other has been entrusted with it. Remember that I am dying now, and if you delay even one mail, it may be too late. I beg of you, therefore, to write to me at once, and tell me all I wish to know."

So the letter terminated, and it had made Una very indignant, not with Miss Amherst, whom she knew to be a true friend to herself, and an honourable person, but with all those who had spread evil reports against Atherstone, which she believed to be perfectly unjust, and it seemed to her that it would be sufficient to show on what a slight foundation they had been raised to disprove them altogether. She had no hesitation in telling the facts which were publicly known to the whole neighbourhood, to Miss Amherst, and she had therefore written a brief statement of the circumstances of Maurice Atherstone's death and all that followed it, painting Edwards in very dark colours, and touching lightly on Humphrey's determination not to marry, which she said had been alleged against him as a crime, and which she did not attempt to conceal had been completely overcome by his love to herself.

Since the day when Una had dispatched this answer to Miss Amherst's inquiries, she had often thought of them, and felt very anxious for an explanation of the request that had been made to her, and she now hoped to find it in the letter she had just received. She took it up eagerly, and saw that it was addressed in a strange handwriting, and the conviction instantly darted through her mind that it must contain the announcement of Miss Amherst's death. She felt shocked and startled at the idea, although she knew if it were so it was only what she might have expected after the bad account she had received of her health. She tore it hastily open. There were two letters enclosed in one envelope. The first was from the English chaplain at the Mauritius, who began by stating that Miss Amherst had died, after a lingering illness, the day before that on which he wrote. She had retained all her faculties to the last, and on her death-bed had entrusted him with the letter he enclosed, begging him to see that it was safely transmitted to Miss Dysart, which commission he now executed, hoping to hear from her that she had duly received it. He then added a brief account of Miss Amherst's last hours, saying that he trusted one so humble and little hopeful of forgiveness for her errors in the past, would find the love and mercy that awaited her beyond the grave far greater than she had ever dreamt of here, and so concluded his letter.

Then Una opened that which had been written by the hand now cold in death. But it was something more than this fact which made her feel a shrinking sort of awe and terror as she prepared to read its contents. Some instinct told her that they would deeply affect her life.

(To be continued.)

ROUND THE ROCK OF CASHEL.

The beautiful chalk-white Caiseal."

"THIS is worth fighting for!" said Cromwell, as he looked across the Golden Vale of Tipperary, stretching away south-westward to the blue range of the Galtee mountains, and eastward reaching up its tribute to Cashel of the Kings. Well might he say so, little as Cromwell cared for the old historic and saintly memories of the towers that crowned its rock; yet what he and his Ironsides thought worth fighting for, is at least worthy of being remembered.

A great hill that stands alone, and which (corresponding in shape to a gap in the crest of the Devil's Bite range) is said by tradition to have been bitten out of that chain and dropped at a distance from it; a magnificent expanse of rich, undulating plain, embracing the Golden Vale and bounded by the distant hills of Waterford, Cork, and Limerick, as well as by its own beautiful mountains of Galtee and Knockmeldown. The lights and shadows that sweep over them fitfully like the change and chance of time;—a deep, suggestive stillness;—this let the reader imagine, and he has the setting of the stones which are so eloquent, ay, and a worthy setting.

The royal residence of the ancient kings of Munster took its name from a stone which remains within the old cathedral's precincts, called Caiseal, Caisil, or Cashel, "the stone of tribute." Here the subject chieftains came with their offerings and paid their homage. The modern town lies partly on a slope descending from the rock, and partly in a hollow; and the thirteen roads which radiate from it in all directions have been well compared to "spokes of a wheel." There is something very suggestive in the fact that the snort and scream of the iron horse have never broken the impressive quiet of the place; no railway coming nearer to it than Goold's Cross, about five miles away.

Ere we suffer our thoughts to rest on one particular "stone of witness," let us understand the entire precincts of the rock. Entering by a southern gate, at the great refectory, we pass the Caiseal, and picture to ourselves the chiefs of Munster, assembling from their hills and plains to lay down on it their tribute. Going round the southern side of the enclosure, and past old doorways, grim with the things still hideous, which were made to be "without," we stand outside King Cormac's chapel. It was built about the year 900, before any other edifice on the rock, the Round Tower excepted. Even its exterior is remarkable, particularly the high peaked stone roof, the greater part of which has been recently cleared of its mantling green, showing its true proportions. This stone roof is double, and it holds between its upper and lower parts a spacious chamber, from whose fireplace runs the old stone flue, whose hot air warmed the chapel. So that (in consideration of the past) the nineteenth century need not be too proud of its newly-discovered heating-apparatus. The Round Tower stands close to the chapel; and through a gap in its inner wall it is sometimes possible to look up the giddy height, in which treasures hidden must surely have been safe. When the cathedral was built, A.D. 1169 (it is dedicated to St. Patrick), its cruciform plan was made so as almost to enclose an angle of King Cormac's chapel. In fact, we cannot wonder much at modern Vandalism, when we recollect that even then the architects of the cathedral ran one of its walls dead against the beautiful Norman doorway, defacing and absolutely cutting away a part of its rich moulding and delicate tracery. King Cormac's chapel was afterwards converted into a chapter house, and entered from the cathedral, by a low dark door, too suitable to the darker deed done afterwards there, when the papal legate signed the Emerald Isle away. But the chapel is thus most truly described by an Irish pen:—"Nothing can exceed the grace and beauty of the decoration absolutely lavished on the interior and exterior of this gem of ancient Irish art. The arched mouldings, rich in sculptures, serious and grotesque, the vaulted roof, the noble doorway, the elaborately carved pillars, the exquisite grace of the towers, all vie with each other in charm of design and wondrous finish of execution. Scarcely a stone in this fairy temple but is enriched with tracery as delicate as lace-work—tracery purely Irish in its character, closely akin to the ornamentation of the Book of Kells and the bell shrine of St. Patrick, and speaking volumes for the inborn grace and the high culture of the unadulterated Celt." In the "dim religious light" we see among those exquisite and varied traceries, and even at this remote distance of time, the remains and the bright red colouring of ancient frescoes. We ask for a moment how the structure of A.D. 900 came to be Norman; but we quickly recollect that the ancient Irish were well acquainted not only with the Norman, but all other styles and arts, long before they were known in England. A very curious moulding over the beautiful injured doorway symbolises St. Patrick coming to the relief of Christianity in Ireland; he finds it there, but barely existing, as a tiny living thing almost crushed by the beast, which represents Paganism; and he is shown as a centaur, killing the beast, and rescuing the infant Church. In this chapel there is no east window. The custom of having a chancel window towards the east was originated by the Latin Church, which was unknown in Ireland in King Cormac's time.

Let us pass up the roofless choir, in which Divine service was kept up by our Irish Church till within the last century. It is said that after an effort to strengthen the roof, the walls bent out of line; but when the roof was lifted off, they sprang back again. Here is the grave of Miler Magrath, Archbishop of Cashel in the seventeenth century. The Latin inscription thereon has been thus translated:

> "Patrick, the glory of our isle and gown,
> First sat a bishop in the See of Down:
> I wish that I, succeeding him in place
> As bishop, had an equal share of grace.
> I served thee, England, fifty years in jars,
> And pleased thy princes in the midst of wars.
> Here where I'm placed I'm not, and thus the case is,
> I'm not in both, yet am in both the places. 1621.
> He that judgeth me is the Lord.—1 Cor. iv.
> Let him who stands take heed lest he fall."

But just opposite this curious tomb, built into the wall for preservation, is a wonderful carving, recently lifted from the depth of a well in the northern tower, and whose sharp lines have been preserved for ages by the embrace of the water. We clearly trace on it the winged Assyrian bull and sphinx. Has this anything, directly or indirectly, to do with our Eastern origin?

We leave the choir, which, unlike other cathedrals, is longer than the nave, because the whole western side was the monarch's palace and stronghold, and a large part of the nave was covered by the royal chambers. All round the palace and cathedral, in the height and thickness of the wall, runs a narrow gallery like that in Beaumaris Castle. If in the olden time it were a place "to heavenly contemplation dear," it is not less so now, though frequently the loosened stones would make solitary musings dangerous.

Passing again towards the northern door, and before we leave the place, we stoop over a very ancient font or baptistery. For some time it was thought to be a sarcophagus, from its shape; but two runnels in the side show it to be a font.

And now to the Caiseal, or stone of tribute. Here in heart we too lay down a higher tribute, praying that our dear land may be a living offering to the King of kings. We think how His truth may be buried for centuries, but never can be lost. On the old stone's eastern part there are carved involved monograms, hardly legible now; but on its northern side there is another device, peculiar to the Eastern Church; the Lamb within the endless circles of Eternity. The stone, which is about three feet high and three broad, has been recently surmounted by an ancient crucifix, found elsewhere within the bounds. The figure on it is draped, which is never the case in the Church of Rome; and this is one of the strongest proofs of all that Ireland's Scriptural Church was of directly Eastern origin. The figure of St. Patrick, on the other side, wears the alb in front, not behind—also an Eastern custom.

As we seriously remember this, there comes up another thought, full of wonder, mystery, and hope. What if our British people, Saxon as well as Celtic, be indeed, as some have thought, mingled with the long-lost, long-sought tribes of Israel? Is there not a strong similarity in the gifts, the passions, the very languages of the Hebrew and the Celtic race? Is not the Irish harp that which most closely resembles the Hebrew lyre? One accepted derivation of the word "Saxon," is Saxuna, "unknown." At the time of the Assyrian captivity, tradition saith that "exiled men" were found in that strange land, who only knew that they were strangers there, but had forgotten how; and when asked the name of their own land they replied, "Saxuna" ("we know not"). Hence the idea of the Saxons too springing from Israel's race. A strangely wild but beautiful legend exists about the Stone of Scone, now in Westminster Abbey, and on which our sovereigns have for centuries been crowned; and though we build nothing on legend, yet we think there can be no shadow without its substance. The legend runs thus:—About 600 years B.C., at the time of the Babylonish captivity, two Hebrew princesses, daughters of Zedekiah, King of Judah, having fled, were shipwrecked on the Irish coast. Their protector was the prophet Jeremiah(!), and they had with them the stone which had been Jacob's pillow, the sacred stone of Bethel. The people whom they came among were struggling between the claims of two kings, one of whom the prophet promised to crown, on condition of his giving up the idolatry of Baal, worshipping the true God, and taking as his wife the Hebrew princess; to all which conditions he readily agreed. The stone of Bethel was thus kept by the Irish race for more than a thousand years; and when they colonised and Christianised the western coast of Scotland, the stone found its way to Scone, near Perth, and became the crowning-place of the Scottish kings. With its removal to Westminster Abbey the subjugation of Scotland, too, was sealed; the stone of destiny was gone, which had been kept so long at Cashel of the kings. Beneath the wildness of this strange old tale lurk many possibilities; but whether the British Isles have or have not the high honour of kindred with Israel's race, may their millions yet be spiritually reckoned, through faith in the incarnate Saviour's sacrifice, among the Israel of God.

ALESSIE BOND.

LOST LOUI.

PART II.

THE brothers gazed in mute dismay at this sad termination to their thoughtless jest. It would have been impossible for them to climb down the steep precipice; and to reach the other side by the road was a long round. Too much stunned by the suddenness of the accident to make up their minds how to act, they stood as if spell-bound. Charlotte had by this time joined them, but no one ventured to speak, an awful stillness like the silence of death reigned around; they could only point to that motionless object which lay below, every instant becoming more indistinct in the rapidly-increasing darkness; they feared even to breathe lest the terrible repose should be broken.

Charlotte was the first to recover presence of mind. "Come home," she said, "let us tell all, and bring help, life may still be left."

Not a word was spoken on the way; the sad tale was shortly told, and their father and mother, deeply grieved and horrified, accompanied them to the spot, bringing everything likely to be of use in such a case. Taking the lower road, they arrived quickly at the foot of the great quarry, and by the aid of lanterns soon found the heap of stones where it was supposed poor Loui lay; but, to the astonishment and relief of every one present, the shapeless form turned out to be a coat belonging to one of the quarrymen, who just then returning to seek it, gave his aid in looking for the missing child. Every corner and cranny of the place were known to him and carefully examined, but no trace could be discovered of the little girl. Hours were spent in the search, but with the same result, and had it not been that the three children were present, and all declared they had seen her fall, the thing would have been incredible. Old Mary was questioned; the fields were traversed in every direction, and parties were sent for miles round the country to make inquiries, but all to no purpose, for Loui's unaccountable disappearance still remained a mystery. True, a narrow unfrequented road wound round the lower side of the quarry, but it was unlikely any one would pass there at so late an hour.

The next day was spent in further searchings, and equally unavailing inquiries; and then there remained only the painful task of informing Loui's parents of what had occurred. During this time of suspense it would be impossible to describe the feelings of the two boys who had been the cause of so much distress and anxiety; and Charlotte, oh! how often she thought that had she been kinder and more considerate towards her little cousin, this misfortune might have been averted.

And now we must find out what had become of lost Loui. It happened, that the very day before her disappearance she had written a letter to her mamma, full of such yearnings for home-love and sympathy that her father, on reading it, remarked, "I fear the child is not happy. I'll be passing that way on business to-morrow, and might find time to look in and give her a surprise just for an hour or so. I'll see how things are going on, and if she wishes, I can bring her back with me." And thus it came about that Loui's father arrived at the neighbouring village at the same hour that she left old Mary's cottage. Knowing the country well, he took a short cut across the fields to reach her uncle's house, with the intention of staying half an hour there, and catching the evening train at the nearest station. When, passing quickly over the narrow road which leads along the base of the quarries, his attention was attracted by seeing a small white figure lying on a shelving ledge, a good distance up the stony height. A long trailing bramble which overhung the edge of the descent formed a kind of veil half-concealing it from view. On examining this object more closely, Mr. Melville saw that it was a little girl who lay in this dangerous position, so motionless, so silent, that he feared she must be dead.

The night was rapidly closing in, and there was no one within sight, for Charlotte and her brothers had gone home just a few minutes before to look for help. Their eyes had been so riveted with horror on the shapeless object beneath, which they had mistaken for Loui's body, that they failed to find where in reality she lay, screened from their view by a projecting ledge of stone.

Mr. Melville managed to climb sufficiently high to reach the child, and taking her in one arm, with considerable danger and difficulty descended in safety, and placed his charge on the ground in a state of insensibility. Then looking at her face for the first time, by that waning light he recognised his own little daughter in the child whom he had rescued. How shocked, how surprised, he felt at this discovery! how anxiously he leaned over her inanimate form until a slight quiver of the eyelids, a faint breath, showed that life was not extinct. The chief object now was to get the poor child back to her mother as soon as possible, and hurrying to the station with his precious burden, he arrived just as the train was starting, and reached home in due time.

After all, Loui had not fallen any considerable distance, for God had been pleased to preserve her life by means of that long trailing bramble, which catching firm hold of her light dress, broke the fall and landed her gently on the narrow ledge of stone, from which her father's arm had rescued her. But the over-wrought nerves of the delicate child were sadly shattered by the shock and previous fright, and though after a long and dangerous illness, youth and nature struggled into life again, she never entirely regained her former health and strength. Her first thought on recovering consciousness was of her cousins, and she begged that a message might be sent them from her, saying "they were not to be unhappy, for she knew they did not mean to hurt her, only they could not understand what a silly, frightened little thing she was." And her mother, who wrote the letter, added "that she, too, forgave them, but hoped it would be a lesson for life to avoid playing with the feelings of others merely for their own amusement. S. T. A. R.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

269. In speaking to His disciples the Lord Jesus connects "fulness of joy" with something else: with what?

270. We read in St. Luke's Gospel (xviii. 12) that the Jews in our Lord's time fasted twice a week. Was this practice enjoined by the Law of Moses?

271. All the allusions of the Saviour to the prophet Jonah were in answer to a certain request made by the Jews. Name it.

272. "All this was done," says the Evangelist, referring to our Lord's dispatching two disciples to bring the animal on which He rode into Jerusalem, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, Behold, thy King cometh unto thee, sitting upon an ass." To what prophecy is reference made?

273. "The Lord," said Moses to the Israelites, "hath taken you, and brought you forth out of the iron furnace, even out of Egypt." Which of the greater prophets, referring to that deliverance, uses the same expression?

274. Give the name of the man who said, "He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give my daughter to wife," and state the result of the attack.

275. Who said: "The place which the Lord your God shall choose to put His name?" Prove that the place referred to was Jerusalem.

276. Both St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke record the stilling of the tempest by our Lord, but only one tells us whether Jesus calmed the fears of His disciples or hushed the storm first. To which Evangelist do we owe this?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 608.

254. The Mount of Olives (Luke xix. 37—44).

255. Exod. xxxii. 32. See Rom. ix. 3.

256. Moses (Exod. xxxiv. 28, Deut. ix. 9); Elijah (1 Kings xix. 8).

257. Eli. See 1 Sam. iv. 15, 18.

258. Amaziah (2 Kings xiv. 7; 2 Sam. viii. 13).

259. Luke xxiv. 45.

260. Saul's (2 Sam. xxi. 1—9).

261. Twice. See Rom. xv. 24, 28.

"The child could lead the woman"—p. 642.

THE LITTLE GUIDE.

WHERE rambled on the meadow brook,
Along its winding row of sedge;
Where went the path, by mound and nook,
To climb at last the downside ledge;
And aftermath had sprouted quick,
And green, around the grey new rick:

'Twas there a little girl came by,
With closely-patted steps, and led
A woman blind, whose hand held high
The child's beside her little head,
Along the ground that once, with sight
All clear, she skimmed with tiptoe flight.

The child could lead the woman right
By her sweet light of two blue eyes;
The woman's mind could give a light
To help the child's, less widely wise,
As all may find wherewith to pay
For deeds of love, in some good way.

The child told her of things the sun
Around her feet now shone upon;
She told the child, from her long run
Of life, of things for ever gone:
The child showed her the day o'erhead—
She showed the child whole year-times fled.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER XIV.

HOW ONE PHASE OF MAGGIE'S LIFE ENDED.

"MAGGIE, I have received a most insolent letter from your cousin Herbert, and I desire that all acquaintance with the entire family ends. I shall write to him to that effect," exclaimed Mr. Ashbury at breakfast-time next morning.

"Not with Hetty, daddy——"

"Yes, with Hetty too, I will not have one of them inside the house again."

The old man could be unreasonable sometimes, and Maggie knew that to try and thwart him then would be useless, and so she sat silently over her coffee, and said nothing. Presently he looked up, for he wondered why she was so quiet that morning, and when he saw her face he started in astonishment. "Maggie! why, my dear child, what is the matter?"

"Nothing, daddy dear;" but the tears came into her eyes, and her voice trembled.

"Maggie, you must be ill. Tell me what is the matter."

He was quite alarmed, but she only said faintly, "Nothing is the matter," and rose to get his hat and coat ready as usual, and saw him off to the Atalanta, almost for the last time, for his secretaryship there was nearly over. She wished him good-bye, clinging to him almost desperately, for she was beginning to feel very lonely and desolate, as if that dear mistaken old man would soon be all she would have left in the world; Charley was gone, Miss Campbell going to Scotland very shortly, there was a quarrel growing, or had already grown up, which was to divide her from her cousins; and Stephen—oh! what should she do? he had neither come nor written, and she felt as if she would give her life for just a single word from him! She was so thankful when that foolish old daddy of hers went, she wanted to be alone and to think; but after he had gone all her power of thinking had gone too, so she could only hasten up to the studio, and long as she covered her face with her hands, and swayed herself to and fro in the rocking-chair, to remain there for ever out of sight or sound of all beyond; or to slip away from life itself. Then suddenly she got up. "Oh! how foolish I am—how foolish I am! he cannot have had the letter," she said, and as she spoke the door opened, and in came Hetty.

"Maggie! there is a dreadful quarrel about Herbert; I met uncle just now, and he says we are to be strangers in future, that he was very sorry, but unless Herbert apologised—and I know he never will—I was not to come to see you any more. I waited till he was out of sight, and then in I walked," she added breathlessly and excitedly.

"Hetty, have you seen anything of Stephen?" was all Maggie said in reply.

"Oh yes, that is what I was coming about, only I suppose it is no use now. Mr. Bowden came to our house last night—he had just come from Marlowe—and brought some concert tickets, and asked me if I would like them; I thought you would go too as there are four."

"Did he say anything about me?"

"No——oh yes, mamma said, 'Have you been to St. John's Wood lately?' and he said, 'No, but I suppose they are pretty well, I found a note from them on my return to-day.'"

"Oh," she could not say more, for even her lips were white; but she took up the concert tickets, and played with them idly for a minute. They were signed "George Grant," the name of the man Herbert had mentioned, and they were still in the envelope she had seen him leave at his friend's room. It was too bad of him to say he had heard from her. It seemed like betraying a part of her secret. "Hetty," she said, "try and make Herbert apologise, a quarrel is so miserable, and unless he does we may not see each other for a long time."

"I shall come and see you just the same," said Hetty, staunchly; "uncle need not know."

"No, dear, you must not do that. I think my father is wrong to make a quarrel of it, but if he says we are not to meet, we must not, though we can love each other the same; right is right, Hetty, whether it be pleasant to do or not."

"But may I not come or write?" pleaded Hetty.

"No, darling, the quarrel shall end as soon as possible, but till it does we must keep apart, it is harder for me than you, Hetty, for I am so lonely." The tears welled up into her eyes, and Hetty saw for the first time how worn and pale her face looked.

"Maggie, has anything happened?" she asked; "why, you look like a ghost. Is it anything about Stephen?"

"Yes, dear, something about Stephen," she said struggling not to break down; "but don't ask me what, for I cannot tell you—not yet at any rate. Never tell any one we are engaged, Hetty, for I fear we are not any longer."

Hetty stayed another hour, it was the last time, she pleaded, that she might have the chance unless the quarrel were made up, and then the two girls kissed each other, and promised always to love each other, and talked as girls do and will, and then Hetty, lingering still, obtained leave to walk with Maggie to a pupil's door, on condition that then she would not come again unless Maggie obtained leave from her father to invite her. It was only a mile or so, but it seemed a long way to Maggie, who felt impatient even of Hetty's sympathy.

"Maggie!" said the little dimpled girl presently, "is not that Mr. Bowden in the distance?"

She looked up eagerly and saw him, and she saw too that he recognised them; but he turned down a side street, evidently to avoid them. She made no remark, but the colour came to her face, and her pride rose again.

"Hetty dear," she said, when they reached her destination, "never do anything on the sly, it is a terrible mistake. Deceit is a seed which yields a bitter harvest for the sower; if I had only been open in this matter, there would have been no quarrel now. I concealed the engagement from my father, you know—that is where I was wrong, and happiness bought at the expense of what is right is only a sham at best. Now you must go, darling, and so good-bye for a little while, and God bless you, little cousin." She felt somehow that she should not see the dimpled face again just yet, and though it seemed cold to submit so readily to her father's wish, she knew it was right, and right, at any cost, Margaret Ashbury wished to do in future. She stood and watched Hetty out of sight, and then she thought sadly, "If there is no letter to-night, or Stephen himself does not come, I shall feel that the old sweet life is dying away from me, or has died already."

And that night brought no letter and no Stephen Bowden, nor did any day that followed.

CHAPTER XV.

AFTER FOUR MONTHS.

THEY had left the house in St. John's Wood and were living in lodgings.

Maggie sat and wondered over it all in the firelight that evening and remembered Miss Charlotte's words, "Keep back your strength, my dear, till the time comes when you need it." She had needed it sadly lately; the old man's schemes had all failed, his last resources been used up, and his health had broken down. The rent at St. John's Wood had not been paid, and at last the brokers had been put in. There was no one to help them, Herbert was written to, but Maggie could not bring herself to tell him how terribly the aid was really needed, so he had coldly refused the almost faint appeal and the feud was widened. Hetty was away in Scotland, staying in the same house with the Campbells.

"Bowden might help us," the old man said, but Maggie turned pale at the very thought, "only," he continued, "I have not yet returned his hundred——"

"His hundred, daddy!"

"Yes, dear, I did not like to tell you at the time, but he lent me the money out of which I repaid Herbert, and the rest you know went in the prospectus of the company. I thought he was sweet on you, Maggie, that was why I did it. He never comes here now. I suppose he is like the rest of the world. I cannot understand it," the old man went on; "people think so much of money—I never did," which was true. "Why, Margaret!" he exclaimed, "what is the matter?" for she was kneeling down before him, hiding her face in his hands, and trembling and crying; but she only answered, "Oh, daddy! how could you?" and cried and sobbed the more.

Then the old man was touched. "My dear child," he said, kissing her rumpled hair, "my dear childie, don't fret so, or you'll make your old father break down too, and you won't have him much longer perhaps, he's getting an old soldier now." She got up and stroked his thin face gently and kindly; she knew that he had meant well, yet, oh! how foolish he had been! And then she looked at him long and hopelessly, and heard a little noise down-stairs, and shuddered: it was the hateful man in possession.

"Daddy, you must write to Mr. Bowden immediately," she said, "and tell him that we are going away from this place, but that you will repay him as soon as possible."

"Of course I shall repay him as soon as possible," he said dreamily. She got the writing materials and the letter was sent there and then. No answer came to it, and the slight hardened her heart a little. "He might have sent a line to the old man," she thought.

How Maggie woke up to the realities of life during those last two days at the old house! how she cast self and selfish cares aside, and thought only of her father and his comfort. He had grown almost childish latterly, and listless, perfectly indifferent to his position, and to all around him.

"Let the things go," he said to Maggie, "I must try and think of some one who will lend us a little money to go on with."

"No, dad!" she answered almost sternly; "in the future we must work, and borrow from no one."

"I cannot work yet, dearie," he said feebly. A ray of winter sunshine stole in at the window and lighted up the room, and Maggie rose, and walking listlessly round, looked at the familiar things she had known all her life, till there came from without the sound of a street-band playing "There's nae luck about the house," all out of time and tune. She almost broke down again, and stopping before a little table, on which were arranged some religious books, took up the Bible and opened it haphazard. Perhaps the book gaped at the place, for it was her favourite one, but the leaves parted at the fourteenth chapter of St. John, and her eyes fell on the first verse, "Let not your heart be troubled." What a draught of comfort the words were to her! She half-wondered if she had ever understood them before in their fullest, sweetest sense, and she took them to her heart now and made them the text of her daily life. What mattered the hateful man in possession moving about below, or the tones of the crazy German band, though the old melody seemed that day to have a burden sad beyond expression? "Let not your heart be troubled." How gratefully she accepted the Saviour's comfort! and still bending over the book, with her eyes closed and her head bowed, she sent up a silent prayer to heaven, and then, strengthened and refreshed, turned round and answered the old man's fretful words. "I will work for you, daddy dear, till you can do so again for me."

There were a few things saved from the wreck, enough to scantily furnish the three small rooms to which she removed them, and then Maggie commenced her fight with the world for her father and herself. She gave up her day-dreams, and her poetry, her long pleasant days of study, and her lingering thoughts of the past, and worked in earnest, teaching and drawing incessantly, and striving to get a little connection together, and in the one hour she snatched from the day, she put the finishing touches to the portrait of the "dear old man," that first picture which she had commenced in those happy days which now had gone for ever. Poor Maggie, how she worked! And yet dire poverty came upon them, for the old man fell ill, and everything depended upon her weak hands. Yet still she strove, and hid her struggles and cares from his sight, and denied herself and smiled for him, while often she longed to weep, and gave him many a trifling luxury at the expense of even necessary food for herself. So the weeks passed and carried away the winter; and spring crept softly back to the earth again.

To be continued.)

"THIS GREAT SIGHT."

BY THE REV. C. J. ELLIOTT, M.A., VICAR OF WINKFIELD, BERKS, AND HON. CANON OF CHRISTCHURCH, OXFORD.

IF it be deemed a somewhat extravagant expression to say that "History herself was born on that night when Moses led forth his countrymen from the land of Goshen," it may, at least, be affirmed, without fear of contradiction, that it is with the Exodus, or, in other words, with the history of Moses, that that of the Jewish Church and people, strictly speaking, begins.

A comparison of the brief and rapid survey of the sojourn of the Israelites in the land of Egypt, as contained in the first and second chapters of the book of Exodus, with the minute and graphic description contained in the following chapters of the incidents which prepared the way for their deliverance out of it, will suffice to show the importance of this period, not only as a crisis in the national history of the Jews, but also as an event pregnant with most weighty results to the Church of all after ages.

We may not now dwell, as the surpassing interest of the subject would invite us to do, on the brief record contained in the Old Testament, and on the brief allusions to it which are found in the New Testament, of the early history of Moses, and on that special course of training by which, alike amidst the splendour of Pharaoh's court and the solitude of Sinai's desert, he became qualified for the discharge of that arduous work in which, when the appointed period had arrived, he was summoned to engage. We must not, however, fail to take notice of the circumstances under which that summons was received. Whilst possessing all the advantages which worldly rank and reputation could impart, Moses, as the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and, it may be, the destined heir to Pharaoh's throne, was not found qualified to become the ruler and the captain of the people of God. He needed something more in order to fit him for the work which he was destined to accomplish, than the zeal, and courage, and self-sacrifice of which, at forty years of age, he afforded so signal a proof, when he "chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season;" and during a second period of forty years, spent in the land of Midian, in the humble occupation of a hired shepherd, Moses had to learn those lessons which nothing but converse with God and with his own heart could teach him.

It was, as we read in the beginning of Exod. iii., whilst keeping "the flock of Jethro, his father-in-law, the priest of Midian," and as he was drawing nigh, apparently, to the northern portion of the Sinaitic range, already designated by anticipation "the mountain of God," that Moses received that marvellous revelation of the Divine purposes respecting himself and his people, which is recorded in that chapter. An objection has been taken by some to the Mosaic authorship of this portion of the Pentateuch, founded on the expression to which we have just referred, "the mountain of God," as applied to a spot of the sacred character of which no previous intimation had been given, and which, consequently, we have no right to assume. We think, however, that in this case, as in the somewhat parallel cases of the words, "the desert" and "the bush," in the first and second verses of the same chapter, the objection cannot fairly be maintained; and when taken in connection with the other instances cited, may more fairly be adduced as arguments in favour of a contrary conclusion: for what more natural, in the one case, than that Moses should, in after years, have referred to Mount Sinai, so well known to the Israelites, as the scene of the giving of the law, as emphatically and pre-eminently "the mountain of God,"* or what more natural, in regard to "the desert" and "the bush"—the one so well known by the Israelites as "the place of their own sojourn, and the other so familiar to their ears by the allusions which we can scarcely doubt that their great lawgiver must have often made to this eventful epoch in their national history—than that both should be described, in the most distinctly defined manner, the one as "the wilderness," and the other as "the bush?"

It was, as we have already observed, whilst engaged in the discharge of his appointed duties, as the keeper of Jethro's flock, that Moses, whilst musing probably on the vicissitudes of his own career, and on the wrongs and miseries of his oppressed countrymen in Egypt, descried, upon "the mountain of God," a strange and marvellous appearance—a bush burning with fire, and yet unconsumed by the flame.

Amazed by the unaccustomed sight, the record of which recalls to the mind that of the fire of coals seen by the disciples on the shores of the lake of Tiberias, laid, as it should seem, by no earthly hand, and burning with no earth-lit radiance, Moses said, "I will now turn aside, and see this great sight, why the bush is not burned." And then follows the explanation of the marvellous appearance which the bush presented: "And when the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him out of the midst of the bush, and said, Moses, Moses! And he said, Here am I. And He said, Draw not nigh hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." Here is furnished, in few words, the key to the solution of the otherwise inexplicable sight upon which Moses gazed. The bush burned, but was not consumed, because "the light of Israel" was within it, and the Most High, who dwelt in the midst of the children of Israel (Numb. xxxv. 34), was pleased to manifest Himself to His servant Moses as dwelling in that bush, which was the type of His afflicted people.

That such was, indeed, the typical character of the "bush" will be manifest, not only from the context, but also from the only other place in Holy Scripture besides this chapter, in which the word here rendered "bush" (seneh) occurs.

In the blessing pronounced by Moses, just before his death, on the tribe of Joseph, a portion of whose descendants—viz., the tribe of Ephraim, subsequently gave their name to the ten tribes of Israel, we find the following words: "And for the good-will (or favour) of Him that dwelt in the bush (seneh)." If this passage be compared with those in which Jehovah is said to "dwell amongst," or to "inhabit" (where the same verb occurs), the children of Israel, and afterwards, Sion and Jerusalem, but little doubt can exist that the lowly "bush" out of which He appeared to Moses was a designed type of the mean and abject condition of Israel in the land of Egypt; and that the secret of their continued existence as a people, notwithstanding the efforts of Pharaoh to root out their name and nation, was disclosed in the bush which burned, but was not consumed, because Jehovah Himself was in it, and He who is a consuming fire to His foes, is as a "wall of fire round about" His people, and "the glory in the midst" of them.

In this striking figure, then, which we find preserved, as regards the fire, throughout the symbolism of the Old and New Testament, there was given to Israel's destined leader a solution of the mystery of his brethren's continued existence, and even multiplication, amidst their brick-kilns, and their daily oppressions and persecutions in the fiery furnace of Egypt; and, at the same time, there was given a pledge and earnest not only to "the Church in the wilderness," but also to the Church of all subsequent ages, that though weak and defenceless in herself, she should be strong in the might of her Lord; and further, that the promise of the continuous indwelling of her Head

* The genius of the Hebrew language does not admit of the insertion of the definite article before the word "mountain." The only manner in which the idea of definiteness can be given to a noun in a state of construction—i. e., to the former of two words, of which the latter, in Western languages, would be in the genitive case, is by inserting the article, when admissible, before the latter of the two nouns. This is done in the present instance, and the words are, therefore, correctly rendered, not "a mountain," but "the mountain of God."

should receive its most signal accomplishments in the hour of His people's sorest need, and in the time when their destruction should appear to be inevitable; insomuch that, as in the case of the deliverance of Jerusalem from the invading force of Sennacherib, so throughout the whole duration of the militant state of the church on earth she should have occasion, as the night of sorrow gives place to the joy of morning, to adopt the triumphant language of the Psalmist as her own: "God is in the midst of her, she shall not be moved; God shall help her at the appearing of the morning."

We trace, in the reluctance of Moses to accept the commission at this time entrusted to him, one amongst the many instances left on record in Holy Scripture of the proneness of men in all ages to distrust God's promises, and to look more to the earthen vessels than to the excellency of the heavenly treasure confided to their keeping. One result, indeed, which ever follows upon a manifestation of the majesty of Jehovah to the souls of men is apparent in the conduct of Moses. Like Job, when the Lord spoke to him out of the whirlwind, Moses was conscious of his own vileness, and he abhorred himself. But notwithstanding the verbal, in addition to the typical, assurance of Jehovah's presence with His servant, "Certainly I will be with thee" (ver. 12), Moses still shrunk from the work to which God called him, and it was not until after signs and wonders had been wrought, and the assistance of his brother Aaron, as his spokesman, had been granted, that he was induced to address himself to the discharge of his appointed mission.

Nor must we fail to take note of the only equipment divinely sanctioned for the discharge of the arduous undertaking in which Moses was summoned to engage. "What is that in thine hand? And he said, A rod" (or rather, a staff, iv. 2). One of the lessons most clearly taught us, alike in the Old and in the New Testament Scriptures, is that, whether it be in regard to the human instruments selected for the accomplishment of God's work, or the means which those instruments are to employ, God has ever been pleased to choose "the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God has chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty" (1 Cor. i. 27). The "staff" of Moses; the "staff," the "sling," and the "five smooth stones" of David; the choice of the obscure and unlettered fishermen of Galilee, in preference to the nobles of Rome, the priests of Jerusalem, or the philosophers of Athens; all teach that same lesson which the Church is ever so slow to learn, that "the Lord saveth not with the sword and spear" of worldly might, of earthly wisdom, or of carnal expediency, but that the battle in which she is called to engage is "the Lord's;" and that it is He alone who can deliver her enemies into her hands.

The fact recorded in ver. 6, that "Moses hid his face, for he was afraid to look upon God," is suggestive of many interesting and profitable considerations. This veiling of the face when Moses is brought into direct converse with God, serves to remind us of the reverence and humility which should attend every effort on the part of man to penetrate the deep things of God. It serves also to remind us of the infinite distance which separates man from the Creator, and of the absolute and unquestioning submission which is becoming on the part of frail and sinful man, when the High and Holy One who inhabits eternity condescends to reveal to him His ways and His will.

Nor does this lesson lose any portion of its significance when we contrast with this record of the veiling of the face on the part of Moses, when Jehovah first revealed Himself to him, the subsequent mention of the fact that "when Moses went in before the Lord to speak with Him, he took the veil off," which he had previously worn.

There is much misapprehension respecting the design and the use of this veil, the origin of which may be traced to the mistranslation of Exod. xxxiv. 33. According to the Authorised Version, Moses is there represented as putting a veil on his face "till" he had done speaking with the people. The very reverse of this appears to be the unquestionable meaning of the passage. So marvellous was the effect produced, even upon the outward appearance of Moses, by his direct intercourse with God upon the mount, that when he came down from it, and when Aaron and all the children of Israel saw him, "behold, the skin of his face shone; and they were afraid to come nigh him." Being invited, however, by Moses to approach him, first Aaron and the rulers of the congregation, and afterwards, all the children of Israel, drew nigh, and he "talked with them," and "gave them in commandment all that the Lord had spoken with him in Mount Sinai." And then, in ver. 33, it is recorded of him that "Moses left off from (or finished) speaking with them, and he put a veil on his face." This veil, then, was evidently put on, not whilst Moses was speaking with the people, as the Authorised Version represents, but when he had finished speaking with them. And the object of the putting on the veil—whether it was, or was not, also with a view to dim the lustre of his countenance, during his ordinary intercourse with those around him—was, as St. Paul expressly assures the Corinthians, "in order that the children of Israel might not look on the termination of that which was being done away" (πρὸς τὸ μὴ ἀτενίσαι τοὺς υἱοὺς Ἰσραὴλ εἰς τὸ τέλος τοῦ καταργουμένου).

"If, then, even under the imperfect dispensation of the Law, the result of communion with God was such that Moses no longer shrunk from it with terror, but was enabled, without hiding his face, to receive direct communications of the Divine will, how much more encouragement is there for those for whom the new and living way into the Divine presence is now opened to "draw nigh with boldness unto the throne of grace," and "with unveiled face beholding in a mirror the glory of the Lord," to become day by day "transfigured into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Lord the Spirit" (2 Cor. iii. 18).

Once more: the symbol of the bush, burning but not consumed, is full of instruction and of encouragement, not only to the Church of Christ universal, but to each individual member of that Church, in time of chastening and of tribulation, whether it be in mind, in body, or in estate. It would be an assumption for which no sufficient warrant could be alleged, were we to affirm that in that striking picture which St. Paul draws in 2 Cor. iv. of the life of the early followers of Christ, he had the history of the appearance to Moses out of the burning bush prominently in mind. It is apparent, however, alike from the apostle's allusion in the preceding chapter to the veil worn by Moses after the communication of God's will to the people, and also from his allusion in ver. 6 to Gen. i. 3, that, here as elsewhere, his mind was, if we may so describe it, saturated with Old Testament imagery; and it is, therefore, no arbitrary or impossible assumption if we suppose that, in the verses which follow, his mind may have reverted to the circumstances connected with the original commission to Moses to bring his brethren out of Egypt. Be this, however, as it may, the lessons of the burning but unconsumed bush, as applicable to the history of the tried and persecuted followers of Christ in all after ages, are expounded and applied by St. Paul in language of marvellous strength and beauty in that chapter. "The light of the knowledge of the glory of God" is there described as a treasure, confided to earthen vessels, just as the ineffable glory of the uncreated Jehovah is represented, in Exod. iii., as shining out of the bush. And as, in the one case, the result of the inhabitation of the bush was that, though burning, it was not consumed, so, in the other case, the result of the possession of the heavenly treasure within earthen vessels is, that the vessels are preserved, though exposed to an ordeal which they could not otherwise survive:—"We are troubled," the apostle writes, "on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed; always bearing about in our body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body. For we which live are alway delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh" (2 Cor. iv. 8—11).

It is thus that the same God, who is "a consuming fire" to His enemies, is the Light and Defence of His people. The cloud which obscures the sight of the one, becomes a pillar of fire for the guidance and protection of those on whom, in the words of Elihu, God "causes the light of His cloud to shine." The same fire which, by its light, dispelled for Moses the gloom of Sinai, and directed the hosts of Israel in their passage through the Red Sea, is still the promised heritage of Christ's Church.

It is needful, indeed, throughout the entire duration of its wilderness wanderings that the fire and the cloud should be inseparably connected, and that both should retain their twofold aspect and their double use. Moses "was afraid" as he gazed on the burning bush, and the three highly-favoured disciples "feared" as they entered into the cloud. But soon He whose works and whose ways are now encompassed with clouds and darkness—He who now tries by fire every man's work, and who salts with salt every sacrifice which He accepts—will reveal Himself to His people in no other aspect than as "Light," in which there "is no darkness at all;" and in that light the nations of them which are saved shall for ever walk, and in that light only shall they for ever "see light."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XVII. CHRIST TEACHING BY MIRACLES.

Chapters to be read—various.

TO THE TEACHER. So far isolated miracles have been taken as showing the power of our Lord in different cases. This lesson is intended as a summary of the whole teaching by miracles, and the lessons conveyed.

INTRODUCTION. Ask for a few of the more prominent miracles to show varieties of Christ's power—e.g., (1) over physical infirmities: blind Bartimæus; the deaf mute (Mark viii. 32), the lame (John v. 8). (2) Over vegetable kingdom, in feeding the multitudes with bread; withering the fig-tree. (3) Over animal kingdom, in casting out the swine (Matt. viii. 31), collecting fish in one place (Matt. xvii. 27, Luke v. 6). (4) Over creation generally—e.g., in stilling the tempest of wind; walking upon the water; providing wine at the feast. Will now try and gather up some of the lessons of the miracles.

I. REQUIREMENTS. (1) Faith. (Read Mark v.

25—34). Ask a few questions on the story to show the woman's sad case; diseased for twelve years; tried one doctor after another in vain; spent all her money—no better, getting worse, case almost hopeless. Of whom does she hear, and what does she hear? What effect produced on her mind (ver. 28)? Not merely tries experiment, but fully convinced will be cured. What is this feeling? See Heb. xi. 1 for definition of faith, as a full trust in things as yet unseen. Ask the result of her faith; not misplaced; her tale told, fears allayed, departs in peace. (Read Matt. viii. 5—10.) The last case a Jewess, this a Roman centurion. Of what religion were the Romans? Yet came to Jesus; for whom? What did he ask Christ to do, and how? Contrast with Thomas, one of disciples who wanted a sign; this heathen centurion content with a word at a distance. What did Christ say as to the greatness of his faith? What did he say as to his own unworthiness? What other quality did this show? These two things most fit the soul for the presence of Christ. (2) Repentance. (Read John v. 1—14.) Describe the sad case of the impotent man; how long had he been there? What did he do immediately he was told? Why did he do it? What did Christ tell him afterwards (ver. 14)? But was disease a sign of a man's being a great sinner? No; see John ix. 2. Still remind how sickness is one of God's punishments. What should God's mercies lead us to (Rom. ii. 4, xii. 1)? Therefore Christ looked for repentance. (3) Devotion. What would Christ naturally expect in return for a miracle? Did He always meet with it? Remind of the nine unthankful lepers (Luke xvii. 17), but as instances of gratitude read Luke vii. 45—47; the lame man (Acts iii. 8), and many others. What did Christ often tell people to do in token of gratitude (Luke v. 14)?

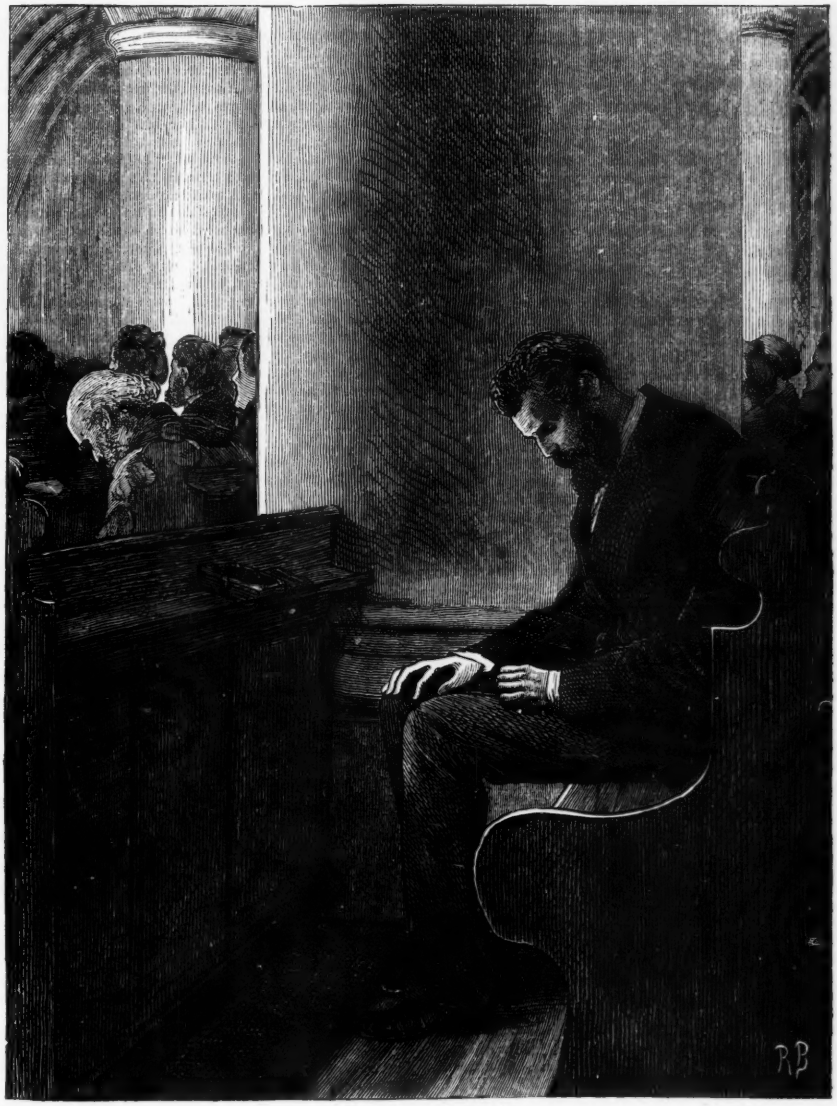
Practical Lessons. Though miracles as such have ceased, what change does Christ work in us? Our souls are diseased (Isa. i. 5). He changes the nature. Remind of Saul the persecutor changed. Is not such a miracle? What are the requirements? Faith, repentance, gratitude. Does Christ always find them?

II. OBJECT. So far have spoken of man's part in being subject of miracles; what do they teach about Christ? What was first miracle; where wrought; what did it show (John ii. 11)? Name any others in which food was given. What do all His miracles show? By whose power were they done, and what did He claim that His miracles proved Him? What do they show besides His power and glory? Did Christ always work miracles—e.g., when He wanted food? where did the disciples go for it (John iv. 8)? Did He always walk on the water? Therefore only worked miracles when there was need of it; thus showing wisdom. And what made Him work so many? His compassion and love. Remind of His compassion for the widow, and His tears for Lazarus. Show how Jesus is the same still, and bids us go to Him now; we little know how often He invisibly provides with food, makes whole, &c., still, showing the same power, wisdom, and love. Let the children also notice how Christ did miracles for all classes of people. Ask for some instances of a rich man, the nobleman (John iv. 47); a very poor man, the impotent man; a very miserable man, the leper (Mark i. 40); a servant, the centurion; a mother, the widow; a child, Jairus's daughter; an enemy, Malchus, whose ear Peter cut off; a disciple, Peter and the others on the sea (John xxi). Also ask to whom Christ first came—His own people; did He confine Himself to those? No! would draw all nations to Him. Healed Syrophœnician and others. Hence draw practical lesson of how all classes with all kinds of needs, may turn to Christ, feeling sure of sympathy and of help.

Questions to be answered.

1. Show by Christ's miracles the varieties of His power.
2. What did He require on the part of those healed?
3. Give instances of faith and gratitude.
4. How does Christ work miracles now?
5. What do they teach us about Christ?
6. What practical lessons may we learn?

EVERY DAY.



THE sun with strength arises,
And pours his cheering ray
O'er field, and flood, and flower,
Every day.

The mighty tide comes streaming
Up river, creek, and bay,
And girds our world with vigour
Every day.

The birds sing high in heaven,
In thankful notes they pay
Glad homage to their Maker,
Every day.

The evening shades come stealing,
And bid us all away
To sleep and rest God given,
Every day.

With strength, and joy, and patience,
O God, our souls array,
To toil, reposing in Thee,
Every day.

(Drawn by R. Barnes.)

"In a dark corner behind a pillar"—p. 652.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THIS was Miss Amherst's letter:—

MY DEAREST UNA,—From my dying bed I write these words to you, and I am thankful that I have been allowed to live long enough to receive your letter, and to answer it, for it has proved to me, as I feared it would, that a great wrong and injustice has been done—unintentionally, I feel sure—by Humphrey Atherstone, but which I can now put it in his power to rectify. When you receive this I shall have passed to the realm where alone truth remains triumphant, and you must receive my statement, painful to you as I know it will be, with the implicit belief due to one who is about to stand before the Judge of all, and who has done for ever with this world's sophistries and deceits. To make my information intelligible, I must go back to my own early history; but I will be as brief as I can, for my strength is failing, and my time is short. The one influence which has had verily an awful power over all my life, from the days of youth and hope to those now closing in the darkness of the grave, has been my indestructible love for Maurice Atherstone. He, too, loved me well—fondly, truly, even unchangingly; but his affection, deep as it was in truth, was absolutely nothing compared to the entire devotion with which I gave myself up in heart and soul to him. Standing where I do on the brink of eternity, I can see that such a love for any mere human being was nothing less than idolatry; but I was too absorbed in it then to question if it were right or wrong, and I became secretly engaged to him, without the sanction of our parents. For there was a deadly feud between his father and mine; one of those old long-standing quarrels founded on mutual insults given and received, which in the last century were seldom washed out except in blood, and even in my later times were allowed to wreck the happiness of families; but Maurice, like his father, was a passionate imperious man, who would not long brook control or delay in the fulfilment of his wishes. After a time he told his father of our engagement, and demanded his consent to our marriage. Then the storm broke. So terrible a quarrel ensued between them, that it ended in Maurice vowing he would never see his father's face again; and he kept his word. He left England to return no more while the old man lived. He asked me to go with him to the Mauritius, and I consented, and would have gone in spite of my father's stern prohibition, had he not exercised his power over me, as I was under age, and deprived me of all liberty till long after Maurice was far away. At that time, without means of my own, I was powerless to resist; but I took a vow in my own heart—a wicked vow—that I would live for Maurice Atherstone, and him alone, and that I would break all other ties, and fling all duties to the winds, if ever the time should come when I could go to him to be his wife. For some years I never even knew where he was, and the letters he wrote to me were destroyed before they reached my hands, as I was warned they would be. At last I heard that he was at the Mauritius, and that his father had caused a false statement to be made to him that I had married very soon after he went there, which had plunged him into a state of despondency and ill-health that had almost cost him his life; and when he partially recovered, he had gone up the country to some lonely place where he had lived ever since in perfect isolation, holding no communication with any of his countrymen, and surrounded only by the native islanders. At the time when I heard this account of him who had been my one thought day and night since our parting, my mother was dead, my father was growing old and feeble, requiting all my care, and my only brother was a helpless cripple, whose whole comfort and pleasure in life depended on myself. To abandon my home under such circumstances was as cruel as it was wrong, but I did not hesitate an hour. I had inherited money of my own, derived from my mother's family, which made me independent. I asked no permission, I made no farewells, but I left my home early one morning when all were sleeping, having told my father and brother that I should do so; and as I closed the door behind me, I said to myself that my motto henceforth should be, "All for love, and the world well lost!" Alas! alas! now at this hour, with the grave opening at my feet, what terrible reason have I to fear that it may not be only this world which is lost, when human love is set up as an idol in the heart to be worshipped with all the powers of life that are due to the service of our God alone! I reached the Mauritius, and, through Maurice's banker there, I got a letter conveyed to him, telling him that the report of my marriage was false; that I was true to him, as I had ever been, and that I would be his wife, or that of none on earth. I told him of the vow I had taken on the day of his departure, and said that truly I had lived for him alone through the long years of our separation, though I knew not even in what part of the world he was, and that so soon as I had learnt how he had been driven by that cruel falsehood to a wretched solitary home, I had come to share it with him if he would, and for his sake had abandoned all who had a right to claim my love and care in England. I sent this letter, and counted the days which I was told must intervene before my messenger could bring me back an answer from the solitary region where Maurice lived. On the very first morning when it was possible a reply could reach me, the door of my sitting-room at the hotel was opened, and Maurice Atherstone himself stood before me. Even now, in this awful hour, when the chill of death is curdling round my heart, I can recall the rapture of delight that thrilled my whole being when I looked upon his face again, for it was the last moment of happiness my life has ever known. I flew towards him, and for one instant—only one—he clasped my hands in his as if he could never let me go, and then almost flung himself away from me, while he exclaimed in a tone that pierces me with its remembered anguish even now, "Too late, Catherine! too late! Why was I ever born to be your misery and my own?" This was his history, when he gathered courage to tell it me.

He had believed the report of my marriage, and it had maddened him. He rushed away from the presence of men, wandering among the hills, getting what rest he could under the trees by night. Fever ensued, and a Malay family of the wealthier class took him into their dwelling, and nursed him through a long illness, till he was quite recovered. During the whole period the leading idea in his mind was the desire of revenge on his father, who had wrecked his happiness. He believed me lost to him, and when he saw that the beautiful daughter of his Malay host had learned to love him, he recklessly resolved to marry her, and let the proud old Atherstone discover, too late, that there could be something in the shape of a daughter-in-law worse for him than an Amherst. He accomplished his purpose, taking care that all formalities which could make the union valid should be rigidly performed. But the fact of the marriage was not made known in the town, for it was performed by a passing clergyman, a college friend of Maurice's, who almost immediately after left the Mauritius for Ceylon, where he died; and Maurice himself continued to live in the Malay home of his wife among the hills. Partly from the wayward inconsistency of passion, and partly because as he came to know more of the Malay girl he had married, he saw the miserable folly of the step, he never after all announced the fact to his father. One year after his marriage a son was born to him, and then he would have openly avowed the birth of an heir to Atherstone Abbey and all its fair estates, had it not been that the child was weakly, and little likely to live, while a terrible calamity supervened in an attack of brain-fever which seized his wife, and left her hopelessly and violently insane. He had never loved her, but her father had died shortly after their marriage, and he could not abandon either her or her child to the mercy of strangers. He had remained up to the hour when I met him once more, in an existence by the side of the madwoman which was nothing less than a living death, and without a gleam of consolation save in the love he bore his child. It still lived, but was so delicate and sickly that he had not the slightest expectation of seeing it survive many months, and although he had had it duly registered and baptised by the name of Edward (that of his brother, Humphrey's father), he did not think it worth while to take any other step, such as he might have done had he expected it to live long enough to inherit the lands of his ancestors.

Una, I must not linger over the hopeless desolation into which I was plunged by this revelation; but, bitter as was my suffering, I can truly say that my worst anguish was in the thought of the miserable ruin which had fallen on Maurice Atherstone. To rescue him from his terrible position became the one only hope I had in life, for I well knew that I myself must see his face no more, as the husband of another woman. Yet still would I live for his happiness, if I had power to compass it, and strangely enough the way to do so was opened to me then and there. The very next mail brought him the news of his father's death, and the urgent summons of his agents in England to return and take his place as possessor of Atherstone Abbey, where the widow of his brother and her young son Humphrey alone remained. His heart was yearning for his home. The idea of announcing his marriage had become perfectly hateful to him, and it seemed quite unnecessary so far as his child was concerned, for it was apparently dying of the malaria of the country. Yet he was too good and noble to abandon the poor insane woman, who was lawfully his wife, and had I not been there I know not to what desperate deed he might have been driven. But now was my time to give him my life as I had vowed, though to my own utter misery. I went to him, and asked him to entrust his wife to me. I would remain with her at the Mauritius, and tend her carefully as if she had been my sister, while he might return to Atherstone to take his rightful place, and enjoy a civilised life once more in his own old home. He could not resist the temptation of so great a release, and he accepted—letting me see plainly enough that if his poor wife's miserable life should come to the speedy close he anticipated, he would then return to claim me as his own. This is more than twenty years ago, and now—such is the irony of life—his Malay wife yet lives, a helpless idiot, while he has long been dead, and I am dying. Maurice went, and he took his sinking child with him, because he could not bear that it should die in any arms but his. He did not expect it to live many hours after he left the shore. One only condition I made, in a sort of vengeance on my own weak heart, which I felt still clung to him too fondly, married though he was: I stipulated that there should be no sort of correspondence between us; he was never to write to me, nor would I write to him, unless it were to announce to him the death of his wife. I compelled him to accept this condition—and he did. We parted then for ever. I never heard from him; I never knew how he fared in this sad world till the day came, long years after, when I saw the announcement of his death in the papers.

Una, now comes the revelation which I fear will be so terrible to Humphrey Atherstone, and, for his sake, to you. When I heard that he had succeeded to his uncle as sole and rightful heir, I concluded, of course, that Maurice's own son had died, as had been expected, on the voyage home. Indeed, it had never occurred to me that he could survive, judging from the suffering state in which he was when he embarked from the Mauritius with his father. But, so soon as I read your letter with the account which it contained of him whom you call "Edwards, the Malay," the whole truth flashed upon me only too clearly, and I saw unmistakably that he is in truth none other than Edward Atherstone, the legitimate inheritor of the Abbey and all the estates of his ancestors. The chain of events is perfectly plain to me. You say that "Edwards" was brought as a child from the Mauritius by Maurice Atherstone. He took no child with him but his own son. I saw the vessel weigh anchor, while he stood on the deck with the boy in his arms, and the ship was to touch no shore till it reached England. Doubtless the sea breezes revived the child, so that he still lived when they reached home; but Maurice probably expected that he would not live to grow up, and therefore said nothing of his parentage, for I know it was his purpose never, if his child died, to reveal the marriage, which he felt to be a disgrace to his family. Having once concealed the boy's relationship to him, it would become daily more difficult for him to own to it, and as months and years rolled on, and the child's strangely evil propensities revealed themselves in painful contrast with the noble qualities of his reputed heir and nephew Humphrey, to own him would become a task almost beyond the power of a man so proud as Maurice. The marriage of his son to a gipsy girl must have greatly increased his unwillingness to let the children of such a union represent in future years the noble race of Atherstone. Yet I believe he must have intended to do justice at the last, and that the suddenness of his death alone frustrated his purpose. Probably some half intimation of the truth, made in his last moments to his nephew Humphrey, rendered him to a certain extent doubtful of his title to the estates, without his having a sufficient knowledge of the rightful possessor to restore them, and this will account for all that has been mysterious in his conduct; while on the other hand it is probable that Edward had gained from his father some idea of his claim, without any certainty, and that the effort to find documents explaining it was the cause of his continual lurking round the Abbey, of which you tell me, and which must have been done with the view of stealing into the house unseen. This, however, is certain—Edward Atherstone is the legitimate possessor of his father's house and lands, and I have been allowed to live long enough to do a last service to him who was the one love of my life, by restoring his son to his rightful home. I leave it to you, Una, to reveal the truth to Humphrey Atherstone. Your tenderness will soften the pain of the disclosure, for I can see but too clearly how deeply you love him. It will be bitter to him, no doubt, and to you, for his sake. Yet to me, in this awful hour, it seems worse than folly to give a thought to the perishable possessions of this mortal world, while still it is possible to gain an entrance to that abiding city whose Builder and Maker is God. Shall not I, who squandered all my life on an earthly love, knock at its doors in vain?

And now, Una, farewell, till we meet before the great white throne.

CATHERINE AMHERST.

To the very last word of this long letter Una Dysart read on, and when she came to the close where the signature had been traced, scarce legibly, by the stiffening fingers of the dying woman, she let it fall from her relaxed grasp, while her head sank upon her hands, and Humphrey's name passed from her lips in a low wailing cry.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE gloom of a starless winter's night had fallen over Valehead like a funeral pall, and the chill wind went moaning through the leafless trees with a sound so mournful, that it would have required all the sunshine of hope, or the still gayer brightness of present joy, to have enabled any one to resist its depressing influence. Neither of those were with Humphrey Atherstone, as he stood on the bridge which spanned the river just below Vale House, and watched the dark waters rushing on ceaselessly to their grave in the depths of the sea. He leant with folded arms on the parapet, and tried from time to time ineffectually to distinguish the dim outline of Una's deserted home, and then, as again and again he failed, and felt as if the darkness had blotted it off the very face of the earth, he turned back with a look of utter despondency to gaze down once more on the cold flowing river, while the shadows that lay within his deep sad eyes were gloomier far than any which the leaden-hued sky could cast around.

Life seemed now at its lowest ebb to this man of dauntless resolution, for even his strong will had been beaten down to passive endurance, by the strong power of a destiny which offered him no scope for resistance. Just when, at the cost of his own self-respect and the final sacrifice of his stainless honour, he had destroyed the barrier between them, Una Dysart had been snatched out of his grasp and hidden away, to be found perhaps by him no more. In the hour that he sinned for her, he seemed to have finally lost her; for although he knew that there was a probability of her returning to Vale House in the spring, it was his greatest fear that his enemies would have worked upon her by that time with such persistence, as to make her give him up altogether. She had never in words reversed her refusal to marry him, even while she loved him, if it compromised his honour, and although he had felt sure on the night of her father's death that the resolution would soon be overthrown by the deep affection she evidently bore him, it seemed to him but too likely that it might be strengthened now into an immovable determination, by the representations of her friends. As the days and weeks rolled on, and he never so much as heard the sound of her name, while in the complete solitude he had created for himself at Atherstone Abbey he could not escape the uneasy humiliation caused by the remembrance of that which he had done to win her, a hopeless depression fell upon him, with which he had ceased even to struggle. Beyond this life he had never yet looked, and within its compass there shone not a ray of light for him. There were times when the gloom and loneliness of his own old halls became intolerable to him, haunted as they were by the memory of the sweet face that perhaps would never brighten them more, and then he would rush out into the darkness of the night, and wander ever in the same direction, to be at least near the house that might one day receive her within its walls again. At least half an hour that evening he had stood there on the bridge, writhing under thoughts of exceeding bitterness, sometimes thinking of her with a longing which was quite unendurable, sometimes remembering with a shudder the unhappy man whom he had driven out for Una's sake over the waste of waters, never perhaps to be heard of more. And now, as with a groan he laid his head down on his folded arms, there rose upon the dim cold air the sound of softly-chiming bells. Sweet and musical they rang out through the silence, and Humphrey looked up surprised, for it was nearly midnight, and he could not imagine what bells could have been awakened at such an hour, or for what purpose. He glanced towards the church, and saw that it was lighted up, and that the dark figures of numbers of persons were passing through the open door; then he suddenly recollected that it was the last night of the old year, and that he had heard some rumour of a midnight service which the new rector intended to hold at that hour, in order that his people might pass on the wings of prayer from one step to another on their road to death.

Atherstone had never seen Mr. Trafford, he had not crossed the church threshold since his uncle's death, for he always fled to the "Eagles' Nest" when the instinct of his immortality drove him to thoughts of the Unseen, as if the ashes of his dead ancestor contained some virtue which could soothe his soul to peace. But it was rarely that the impulse seized him to do even this much. Although he was no sceptic, the inner sanctuary of his being was yet untouched by the Divine Fire, which alone could have lit up the flame of a pure sacrifice to the one true God on the altar of his soul, and it was honour only that he had worshipped till human love usurped its place, and won him to that deeper idolatry which absorbed him now. But although he had in no way sought the new Rector of Valehead, he had heard of him far and near, and had seen with wonder the power over the souls of others, which one man may have who believes with all sincerity that he has a true message to deliver, and rests not day or night till he has caused it to be heard by all whom he can reach by any means. Amongst his own tenants Atherstone could trace Trafford's working everywhere; men whom he had always known hardened and indifferent became as little children in their humility and faith; the poor and sorrowful, weighed down by heavy troubles, lifted up their heads with joy, as those who had learnt that their redemption was drawing nigh; and many a weary sufferer smiled pain and grief away because of the consolation the clergyman had poured into their aching hearts. But for his own burthen Atherstone sought no comforter, he wrapped himself up in his proud misery, and moodily repelled all the attempts Trafford made to become acquainted with him. On this night, however, he had reached a depth of despondency which it was almost beyond human nature to endure alone, and it seemed to him as if there was a thrill of loving tenderness in the soft calling of the gently-pealing bells, which drew him on irresistibly towards their sweet pathetic sounds. Mechanically he began to walk in the direction of the church, the only bright spot in all that night of gloom, and he felt as if its pure radiance shone even into his own heart with a faint glow of hope. The door was wide open, and the light streamed out over the churchyard, seeming to sign the quiet graves with the shadow of the cross, which stood at the head of each as a memorial of the hope of those who slept beneath; and Atherstone, stealing in, took his place in a dark corner behind a pillar, where he could see without being seen. The church was thronged, but the first part of the service was already over, and the preacher had just finished his brief private prayer in the pulpit and stood up now to address the people. Atherstone looked keenly at the man whose influence he had discerned so clearly on the souls of others without ever having seen his face, and his eyes became riveted upon him with mingled astonishment and admiration. He saw a man of splendid physique, tall and finely proportioned, with a grand head, which would have suited well as a study for one of the warrior angels of the old masters, for it is seldom, indeed, that so pure and noble a soul as his is seen to shine through lineaments of mortal clay. His rich brown hair waved back from his broad forehead without a touch of age in its warm colouring, though he had lived and toiled for nearly fifty years; his face was pale, but the somewhat severe beauty of his strongly-marked features was redeemed by the singular sweetness of his expression, while his large eyes glowed with so vivid a fire that it was impossible to discern of what shade they were. It was an essentially spiritual countenance, and there was an intensity of conscious power in the look with which he slowly scanned his audience before he opened his lips to speak; his glance noted every individual in that crowded assembly, not excepting Atherstone in his fancied concealment, and when he had thoroughly mastered the details of the throng before him, he gave one rapid upward look of powerful appeal, and then stretching out his hand he spoke in tones clear and ringing as those of a silver trumpet. "And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth, lifted up his hand to heaven, and sware by Him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven and the things that therein are, and the earth and the things that therein are, and the sea and the things which are therein, that there should be time no longer."

If Mr. Trafford had said no other words than these he would have strongly impressed his hearers, for there was an indescribable power in his utterance of the text, which seemed to bring before each person present there, the awful vision of the mighty white-winged angel standing on the reeling earth and sea beneath the shattered heavens, and proclaiming through all the shuddering universe that time should be no longer, and only eternity—immutable, unchanging—remain for the risen dead. But it would be impossible in written sentences to give any true idea of the burst of living eloquence which swept with irresistible might over the very souls of the hearers, as the preacher took up the magnificent theme, and compelled every living being there present to realise the awful truths it involved. "Time should be no longer," he said. "Yes! and in the hour when that proclamation was made from the Eternal all things that belong to time would perish also, blown away by the thunder-voice of the angel like withered leaves before the blast. All that men had lived for, all they had desired, all they had sinned for, all they had hoped or feared or adored; their living idols of flesh and blood, their gods of dust and clay, their gold, their lands, their ambition, their pride, the passions of their lower nature, the affections of their hearts—all these things would perish in the wreck of time, and be as though they had never been, save in the sin-stains they might leave on the souls that had loved them. Not these alone would dissolve in vapour and crumble into dust, but whatsoever earthly thing lay nearest to the hearts of those who heard him, the secret treasure known to themselves alone, which they cherished more than life, and worshipped more than God, that too would be whirled away by the breath of the mighty angel-words; and all that would remain for the resurrection souls in the whole vast universe would be that eternal Love which they had bartered haply for the mocking ashes that would so utterly fail them in their hour of need. With words keen and incisive as a knife the preacher cut into the very souls of the people, as he dissected their lives with an instinctive knowledge of their motives and temptations which made each one feel as if he had read the innermost secrets of their hearts, and was addressing themselves alone, in all that crowded church. "If now," he said, "while time yet existed, there was any one single thing which stood between them and their own highest standard of holiness, then so surely as time would perish at the sound of the angel's fiat, they would find that it had stood between them and their God;—that gone, perished as it was, its brief possession was all they had in exchange for that love which could alone be life to them in the dread eternity."

"The love of God!"—the preacher's voice changed and faltered when he uttered those words; he paused as if some whispered sound arrested his attention, and he stood with abstracted eyes, gazing into vacancy, while a tremulous smile rose to his lips, and a light passed over his face like the sunny joy that brightens the countenance of one who listens to a voice beloved. For a few minutes he was quite silent, but it was perfectly evident to the congregation that he was so, unconsciously; and when at length he spoke again, his tones, low and tender, had a strange sweetness, as if they had caught an echo from some surpassing melody unheard by mortal ears. "The love of God!—would they know in some degree the meaning of those wondrous words? Let them look upon that Love Incarnate in the living form that weeps by the grave of a human friend, in sympathy with all who, in any age or clime, shall weep for those they have loved and lost; let them see it with compassionate hands restoring to the widowed mother the darling of her heart, calling back to joy and sunshine the maiden flower withered in its spring, healing the suffering, soothing the fearful, comforting the sorrowful, assuaging pain, agonising all the while for us, in exile from holiness and home, yielding Himself at last, forsaken and alone, to willing death, that into His broken heart He might gather up His own redeemed, and shelter them there from evil throughout eternity!"

Long the preacher spoke on this theme with such beauty in his tender pleading as we have no power to reproduce. But at last with a final gesture of intense appeal he stretched out his arms over the sobbing people, as if he longed to draw them all into the Father's bosom, and exclaimed, "Oh, children of the Eternal Love, when amid the crashing worlds you shall hear the doom of time and feel the earth and all its pleasures sinking away beneath your feet, how will you loathe in uttermost anguish what thing soever has in these mortal days stood between you and the love of Jesus!"

With that Trafford concluded, sinking down on his knees in what seemed to be a very agony of prayer, and soon after he rose and passed silently from the church, whence his hearers had already departed with grave looks and quiet steps.

(To be continued.)

WILHELM'S WOOD.

BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

"BERTHA—Bertha! are you not risen yet? the sun is already high in the heavens, and neither Rosalie nor you are stirring. If you do not hasten, Fritz will have gone up the mountain without you." Frau Kiefer raised her foot, and laid her hand on her spinning-wheel that she might listen for a reply; but there was not a stir in the châlet, and both the girls were still evidently sleeping.

She rose and looked once more at the carved clock behind the door. It was fully a quarter-past four, and the goats were unusually high up on the pastures. Unless the girls rose at once, they would not be driven down till quite late in the afternoon, while some invalids from the valley were to be carried up to the châlet at midday to drink the goats' milk fresh from the pails.

"Rosa—Rosa! Bertha—Bertha!—sleepy, sleepy children," cried their mother, as she clambered up the pine-wood steps of the châlet; "awake, dears, it is time to go up the hill."

"Oh, mamma! why must we rise so early?" cried a very sleepy voice, as Frau Kiefer entered the low-raftered room, with its neat little beds at either corner; "it seems to me as if we had only just gone to sleep."

"Sleep or no sleep, it is a quarter after four, and Fritz has been dressed this hour. You must at once get up, Bertha; and Rosa, is it possible she is asleep still?" and Frau Kiefer approached the younger child's bed, and laid her hand on her daughter's curly head.

"What is it, mamma?" cried Rosa, starting up in her bed and rubbing her eyes; "did you call me?"

"Have I been calling you this half-hour past? Get up, my angel, and dress yourself quickly, for I must take my linen to the far field to bleach, so I cannot return to rouse you again."

Rosa clasped her hands, and rolled up her pretty blue eyes in horror at the thought of being so late, while she immediately sprang from her bed and began to dress.

"And you, too, Bertha, rise quickly, my darling," cried Frau Kiefer, as she descended the stairs; "the goats have been moved up to the high pastures, and unless you hasten they will never be driven down by midday; and we would not have the ladies disappointed for anything, would we?"

"I cannot rise, I am too sleepy—I have no wish to climb the hill to-day," murmured Bertha, drowsily, and, turning on her side, she fell asleep again.

It was not until her sister was just dressed that she started up in her bed, and rubbed her eyes wearily with her hands. "Are you really ready, Rosa?" she said, "and I am not even out of bed; but never mind, I am not going up the mountains to-day—I have something else in my head, I can tell you."

"And what is that?" asked Rosa, searching about the room for her little crooked stick, with which she always climbed the rocks.

"I am going instead into the glen by Wilhelm's Wood to search for strawberries. The ladies asked me yesterday whether I had any to sell, and promised they would buy some from me to-day if only I could procure them."

"Oh dear! how nice!" said Rosa, with a longing sigh. "And does mother know?"

"I told her last night," said Bertha, colouring and turning away her face.

"And what did she say?" asked Rosa, whose heart evidently yearned for the same excitement.

"She said I should do better to go with you and Fritz, and when I said, 'Why?' she only answered, 'Mother does not know what why means;' and so as she did not exactly forbid me, I intend to go."

"Well, good day," cried Rosa, "for I see Fritz has gone, and I must run fast to take him up. But, oh! how I should like to go with thee!"

When Rosa had left the room Bertha also began to think of dressing. She rose from her bed, and looked dreamily out of the many-paned châlet windows at the great mountain opposite towering as it seemed to her up to the sky itself. The sun was shining on its snowy summit, and a little circle of cloud clinging round its very peak gave exactly the appearance of a crown of gold.

"Ach! how lovely! how wünderschön!" cried Bertha, whose great grey eyes were always on the look-out for Nature's beauties, and alive to every new effect of that sunlight and shadow, which can nowhere be seen to greater advantage than among the wild mountains of the Tyrol, "ach, himmel! is it not?" she cried, "as if a golden crown from heaven had descended on its brow," and then Bertha paused, while some thoughts seemed to wander through her little brain, and her face grew thoughtful, and at length almost sad.

She turned away from the window and continued her dressing; but, from her movements and looks, one could see her thoughts were still busy about far-off things. When she was quite dressed, she took down a little Testament from the shelf by her bedside (Rosa had forgotten to do this) and opened it.

It was strange how the pages fell apart at the place most suited to her thoughts. It was the parable of the two sons, who were sent by their father to work in the vineyard; and when she had finished reading it, she still stood by the window gazing at the cloudy wreath on the mountain's brow till it faded into blue air, while her conscience did fierce battle with the selfish heart which sought to carry out its own pleasures in the face of what was right.

Presently Bertha put aside the Testament on the shelf, and turned from the window. She took her straw hat from the peg behind the door, and her blue handkerchief from its place in the cupboard, and then she knelt reverently beside her little bed and prayed. (Rosa had forgotten this also.) It was a short prayer, but a very earnest one; and when Bertha went out of the châlet door, she did not turn towards the glen, but with quick agile steps she sped up the path that led to the goats' pastures.

Meantime, let us follow Rosa up the hill, and see how she had been faring. Had she seen the hazy crown of gold clinging to the snowy peak of the great mountain opposite? or had visions of brighter crowns and everlasting hills risen before her mental eyes? No, nothing of the kind; nor was it probable that Rosa would see the brow of the hill on which she trod, for her eyes, from almost the moment she set out, kept constantly looking on the ground, glancing hither and thither with eager searching gaze among the rocks and the lichens and the wild flowers which strewed her path.

Now and then she evidently found what she was seeking, for she would make a sudden dart upon some pretty clump of leaves, and rifle it of the bright red berry which was in hiding beneath them. She was beginning to get quite a large bunch of strawberries in her little sunburnt hand; but meantime, she was wandering further and further away from the beaten track, and drawing nearer and nearer to the pine forest known as Wilhelm's Wood, whose close-growing, sombre trees could be seen from afar, like a dark saddle on the mountain's side, and, engrossed in her search, Rosa scarcely noticed how far the sun had risen in the heavens, or how near she had rambled towards the opening of the wood, into whose depths even Fritz dared not wander alone, and from whence at night had been known to issue horrid sounds of wild creatures searching for their prey.

"I shall soon overtake Fritz," Rosa would say to herself when she first turned aside from the path. "I shall run twice as fast when once I have finished gathering my strawberries." But by-and-by she could not comfort herself with this reflection; for by this time she knew Fritz must have reached the pastures. "I will wait and meet him as he comes down with the flock," was the next excuse framed by the weak, selfish little heart, while a worse, a still darker thought suggested itself, "Mother will never know; I will ask Fritz not to tell that I was late."

But presently she was forced to give up all hope of assisting her brother with the goats, and to content herself with the prospect of the money she was likely to gain for her strawberries, and the purchases which it would enable her to make.

Bertha, meantime, with her light figure and quick eager steps trying to overtake time and make up for all the lost minutes, had nearly gained the pastures. She was expecting at every turn to see her sister in advance, or to hear her brother's horn calling the goats to assemble. Her face had quite a different expression now from what it wore in the morning; her eyes sparkled and her cheeks glowed, and the feeling that she was doing right, and that sin had been conquered, gave an expression of peace and joy to her countenance.

But just as she turned the large boulder of stone which lay on the mountain's side, and which was known by the peasants as "The Giant's Skittle-ball," she came face to face with Fritz, his cheeks pale, his eyes full of terror, and carrying on his shoulder a wounded kid, from whose side trickled blood, and whose pitiful bleating showed the pain it was suffering.

"What is the matter, Fritz?" cried Bertha, catching at the shoulder of the rock, and growing pale herself as death.

"The wolf has been in the pastures," he said, speaking fast and scarcely stopping to answer her, "it must have stolen up there in the night and killed four of the finest of the herd, besides wounding many more. I am rushing down now for father; oh! why were you both so late? I have had no one to assist me, and no one to send for help."

"Is not Rosa with you?"

"No, not she, I have been all alone."

"She started long before me; I cannot think where she can have gone; but tell me, Fritz, shall I go on to the pastures or return with you?"

"Where is father?" asked Fritz, abruptly.

"He is cutting grass by the river-course, with Johann and Heinrich."

"Fly to him then—fast, fast as the wind!" cried Fritz; "tell him and Johann and Heinrich to come at once; let them wait for nothing, but bring their scythes, pitchforks, and sticks; the wolf must be close on the edge of the wood, for I heard him howling as I went up early this morning. I will meanwhile hasten back to the house with this miserable animal, and meet them at the wood with the guns."

Bertha was soon out of sight, flying over rocks, stones, and ferns, and a few minutes saw her in the river-meadow, calling her father and the men to the chase. Nor were they slack in following Fritz's advice, and while they made for the wood with all speed, Bertha hurried after her brother into the house. Fritz was, however, already gone, and with two guns slung over his shoulder, and one ready loaded in his hand, he was pushing for the nearest entrance to the wood.

It was now nearly midday, and the sun blazing fiery hot overhead. The birds, which had sung all the morning, had ceased now in the heat, and there was no sound far or near to be heard but the endless click-click of the grasshoppers' wings as they simmered in the burning meadow-grass.

But all at once Fritz heard a cry—a kind of yell of terror and surprise, followed by another and another shriek and wild cry for help.

Fritz was so startled at first he could do nothing. It seemed to him as if the cry had come out of the air, it sounded so fearfully near, and yet where it was, or what it was, he could not tell. He gripped his gun firmly and set the trigger on full cock, while he ran forward bravely to meet the danger, whatever it might be.

"Fritz—Fritz! save me! the wolf! the wolf!"

Good heavens! it was Rosa's voice; he could see her now, straining up the rocks by the edge of the wood, and catching at the stems and grass, while, lilting after her with long trotting steps came a great gaunt wolf, open mouthed, and with bristling mane, ready for fight.

Fritz was a good shot, there was not a better in the country, and he was as brave as he was clever; but the fright and terror of the close and sudden pursuit and the imminent danger almost deprived him of sight. He took aim and fired, but when the smoke cleared away the wolf was still advancing, and Rosa's strength evidently failing. But while he strove to steady his aim for a second shot, and to conquer the faintness at his heart, he heard a loud resounding yell and a series of triumphant shouts. There were figures rushing out of the wood, and the wolf had turned now and was standing at bay.

Fritz's sight came back and his senses rallied in a moment. Once more he seized his gun, loaded it and fired. This time the wolf was hit; it whirled round, leaped half up into the air, made a rush forward, and then fell, and the men rushing up from behind gave it its quietus.

Rosa was lifted up and carried home in her father's arms. She was deathly pale and almost lifeless. The sudden fright and the agony of fear had nearly killed her, but, thank God, she was not dead, and she lived for many a long year afterwards, to learn that the path of duty is not always the path of pleasure, and that that child is more blessed in God's sight who, though he may have hesitated at first to obey, yet repented and went, than he who said, "I go, sir, and went not."

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

277. The words "Jesus Christ" are placed together once only in the Gospels. Where?

278. When did the Saviour use a parable as a means of instruction for the first time?

279. Give three passages from the Old Testament in which God promised to reveal Himself by means of dreams.

280. The account of Rahab's artifice in concealing two men from their enemies finds a parallel elsewhere in Scripture. Give chapter and verse.

281. 'For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me," said our Lord to the Jews. Give any passages from the book of Genesis to which the Lord Jesus may have referred.

282. It may be shown, both from the Old and New Testament, that the custom of celebrating birthdays is a very ancient one.

283. Though St. Peter was so eager to be with Jesus when the Lord was walking on the sea, yet he was not the first to recognise the Saviour. Name the disciple who did so.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 623.

262. Twice only. See James i. 1; ii. 1.

263. Acts viii. 25.

264. Abraham (Gen. xxi. 22); Isaac (Gen. xxvi. 28); Joseph (Gen. xxxix. 2, 21); Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 19); David (1 Sam. xvi. 18; xviii. 12, 14); John the Baptist (Luke i. 66).

265. By Jehoshaphat, before the Lord destroyed the enemies assembled against Judah (2 Chron. xx. 20).

266. See Luke v. 4—10.

267. Matt. ix. 15.

268. 1, by His miracles, &c.; 2, by His resurrection; and, 3, by the gift of the Holy Ghost. See Acts i. 22—ii. 33.

(Drawn by FRANK CARLESS.)

OUR CHURCH.

HOW brightly our church, this sunny time,
Shows out on the hill its light-grey wall,
And five-belled tower, rising tall
Above the dark yew and leafy lime,
And flinging its merry sounds of bells
Out over the many-fielded dells!

Though I have my roof beside the spring,
And yours is beside the hollow oak,
And some by the street may send up smoke,
And others' lone doors by fields may swing,
Still there are the chimes that sweetly call
Us all to the house that stands for all;

For all, at our Lord's high call, to go
To share of His graces; glad, but meek;
And hear the good words His love may speak;
As unto His children, high and low;
Our own to go up that He may bless
Our fast-wedded loves with holiness:

Our own where our Lord, in goodness, takes
Our children to make them all His own;
And kindred beneath cold earth or stone
May sleep till their souls' bright morning breaks.
Through every change of good and ill,
We there have our church beside the hill.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER XVI.

MAGGIE NAMES HER PICTURE.

"MAGGIE, put on some more coal, it is very cold."

"Yes, daddy dear."

"What a screw you are, Maggie, to put on so little this perishing day." She said nothing, and the old man did not know that there was hardly another scuttleful in the house, and no money to buy any more. Pupils were difficult to get, and purchasers of pictures did not drop from the sky, and poor Maggie struggled hard, yet week after week her slender means were eked out with the money she got by selling some trifling ornament of former days. The old man never knew it, for his health failed and his intellect weakened, and his daughter saw only too plainly that his money-earning powers were at an end for ever, and she silently tried to be bread-winner for both. He never knew all she did for him; he never guessed how days of toil and anxiety and scanty food and sleepless nights were making her cheeks look pale and her face pinched. He loved her after his own fashion, but that fashion was selfish, and he was too much taken up with his own griefs, and with the weariness which came creeping over him, to notice her. He never acknowledged her kindness, or even appreciated it, but she was satisfied if he forgot to notice how many things he had to do without, and thanked God who had given her strength and power to work for her father in these his days of helplessness and weakness. Sometimes her courage failed, and her spirits broke down, but "Let not your heart be troubled," she said to herself many a time, when the future looked its darkest and dullest, and pondering over the words, she waited till the clouds parted, and then went on her way again without faltering. There was one thing she could not do—she could not let any one know of their poverty. The old man's angry feelings towards Herbert never relaxed in spite of all her efforts to make peace, and Miss Campbell had been ill, and remained still in Scotland, and so they had no friends—no one to come and see them—but lived entirely together and for each other.

"Maggie," the old man said—that inconsiderate old man—"why do you dress so badly now? I like to see a woman in silk, my dear; plain black silk, with a bit of white round the throat and wrists; it is no use saving your things, my child, I shall be better as the spring comes on." He did not know how the one respectable dress she had left was put on to teach in, and taken off and carefully laid by on her return. She made no answer, only looked up sadly at him. He had aged more and more, the bend in his back was more decided, and he had a little hacking cough which her heart ached to hear. Surely the old man was slowly putting round him those sorry garments in which we so often say our last adieu to the world?

"Daddy," she said, and he looked up from his long vacant stare into the fire, at the sound of her voice—a wonderfully sweet low voice had Margaret—"I have finished my picture; but I shall make no name by it, for I should not like to sell it; besides, no one would buy an unknown portrait by an unknown painter. I am glad of it, for I could not bear to part from it."

"Let me look at it, dearie," and he rose, and feebly leaning on her arm, went to look at his own portrait. "What an old man he seems, Maggie, the world and he have almost done with each other; I only want to see you settled, and then I shall be ready. What have you called it?"

"Nothing, daddy."

"It must have a name, put under it, 'An Old Soldier.' No, that won't do; people can see it is a soldier, for there is his sword over the shelf. Call it 'Nearly Conquered,' for he is nearly conquered, dear, but it is for the first time—the first time, Maggie." She never knew why, but she stooped, and taking her brush painted in, in small white letters in the corner, "Nearly Conquered;" and so the picture was named.

"Daddy," she said wistfully, "I would give the whole world if I could send it to the Academy to take its chance. I don't want it to sell, but I should like it to be seen."

"Why don't you send it, dearie?"

"It only wants a fortnight to sending-in day," she answered, "and a frame would cost a fortune."

"I dare say you could get one without paying."

But she put her hand quietly and almost sadly over his mouth, and kissing his forehead, said, "Oh no, daddy——" and she stopped, for suddenly in walked Charley Campbell.

CHAPTER XVII.

CHARLEY CAMPBELL'S NEWS.

"CHARLEY!" She sprang forward in surprise, and he clasped both her hands in the old boyish manner.

"I am so glad to see you again, Maggie, so awfully glad. Why ever didn't you write? if it had not been for the Frasers I should never have found you out." Then he turned to the old man, and after a little while told them all his news—how he had spent the winter months, how Hetty had come on a visit to Scotland, and how both of them had written to St John's Wood, but obtained no reply. He was so glad to see them again, he repeated. There had not been a day in which he had not thought of them, and he looked at Maggie, and wondered why she had grown so thin and pale. "And now," he asked thoughtlessly, "how is the new company you had in hand getting on, Mr. Ashbury? and why ever are you living in this horrid part?"

"I prefer it," the old man began, but Maggie's honest nature revolted at the untruth.

"No, daddy," and she stopped him gently. "We are living here," she said, turning to Charley, "because we are poorer than formerly, and my father has abandoned the idea of forming a company."

"I have not been well lately," the old man said, his better feeling roused by Maggie's unflinching statement of their poverty; "and Maggie has worked for me, Charley. She has been a dear good girl, but that she always was."

"Nonsense," Maggie said, trying to laugh, but feeling a choking sensation at her throat, for she saw how the little excitement caused by their visitor, told on her father; he seemed quite tired out, and ready to lay his head down to sleep. "Come and look at my picture, Charley; I have been wishing I could send it to the Academy. Of course it would not be accepted, but I should like it to take its chance."

"Why don't you send it?"

"A frame would cost a fortune."

"Maggie!" and he put his hand down on hers, "will you let me——" He was afraid to say more, for he saw a flush almost of anger on her face as, anticipating his meaning, she answered, "No, Charley, I certainly would not. I shall keep my picture at home."

"Oh," and he hung his head disappointedly. "Maggie," and he looked towards the old man, who was dozing, "I do so want to talk to you a little while; may I, without making you cross, you know?"

"Tell Charley why you won't send your picture to the Academy, Maggie," the old man said with one last effort of wakefulness, and then, tired and exhausted, his head sank upon his breast. He was so glad young Campbell had come back, he thought, half-dreaming, half-waking; he had always seemed to like Maggie, and they were talking away in low tones by the window. Perhaps after all something would come of it when he had gone home, and he did not think he should be here much longer; and then the fire flickered and blazed in a confused sort of way, and the hum of the voices from the window became fainter and fainter, and the old man lost all consciousness until an hour later, when he woke to find Maggie kneeling at his side, and heard her say, "Daddy dear, my picture is going to the Academy to try its fortune, and Charley is going to give me a frame for it, so if it is accepted I shall have to thank him, and I am going to tell you some news now, daddy."

"Oh I forgot to tell you some news about Bowden, Maggie," Charley interrupted.

"Yes!" she gasped, turning quickly away from her father.

"It is not much, only he and Herbert had an awful row just before Christmas, and they do not even speak now—that was one reason why Herbert left Coke Court; and Bowden's mother is dead, and he is going to give up the Bar, and is going to settle in New Zealand with his younger brother, who is out there."

She made no reply, only knelt a moment or two longer with her hands folded over the arm of the old man's chair; then rose, and almost hurried Charley away. "Well, look here, Maggie, I'll send the frame-maker for the picture at once, and you'll come and see aunt, won't you? and have you any message for Bowden? I may call on him for a minute just to say How do you do?"

"Yes, ask when he leaves England, and tell him that he shall hear from my father before he starts—with regard to a business matter."

"All right," and then he took Maggie's hands in his again, and looked at her, and wondered again at her paleness; "I shall come in to-morrow, Maggie dear," he said, "and you'll tell your dad about this afternoon, won't you? Oh, Maggie! you are such a brick!" and he wrung her hands nearly off. "There never was any one in the world like you."

"Hush!" she said, "you must not talk nonsense, or I shall use a privilege to which I suppose I have a right now, and box your manly ears," and she tried to laugh in the old happy manner, and failed most signally in the attempt. Then when he had gone, and she saw that the old man was still dozing, she went up to the shabby little room she called her own, and gave way (as she used in former times to do in the studio) to all the misery she could nerve herself to hide from others, yet could not hide from herself. "Oh, what shall I do?" she said hopelessly, "oh! what shall I do?" and she sat down by the window and leant her head down on the ledge. "I am so miserable —oh! I am so miserable!" she sobbed; "and I cannot help it. I love him still with all my heart and soul, and always shall as long as I live, though it be for a thousand years. I cannot help it, and I do not care how unkind he may have seemed, it is all my fault—and I shall love him to the end of my life."

(To be continued.)

OBEDIENT LABOUR.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A., RECTOR OF ARMAGH.

"We have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing: nevertheless at Thy word I will let down the net."—Luke v. 5.

THIS miracle of our Lord, like most of His miracles, is an acted parable. It is a secular mask behind which a spiritual truth lies hid. Christ Himself makes it plain that this is so by pointing out one great spiritual application, when He makes Peter a "fisher of men," who shall not toil vainly in the obscure and stormy deep of human passions, but "from henceforth," from the time of his Lord's bidding, shall "catch men." So applied, it has in all ages cheered and strengthened the disheartened fisher who is tempted to despair because the travail of his soul is vain, and his nets are empty. Such a one pauses, recollects himself, hears once more the voice of his Master bidding him toil on, and succeeds in due season because he faints not. Not only the minister of the Gospel to whom a formal commission is given, but also the lay-helper, the Sunday-school teacher, every man or woman who has anything to do for Christ, may learn from this view of the text. You have not been successful hitherto. You have spoken in vain. Your scholars are careless and thoughtless, and your own heart is sick. But perhaps you have been relying too much upon the skill of the fisher and the texture of the net—upon your intellectuality, or your address, or your study of the lesson. These are not to be despised; they are assumed in the command to "launch out" and "let down the net;" but, after all, the grand difference between success and failure may be discovered, if you will only learn to rely more simply, more teachably, upon His command, "Let him that heareth say, Come."

But the story seems to be entitled to a much wider application. Doubtless this is the main one; men are the "fish" whom our Saviour chiefly thought about: and its first and strongest encouragement is for those who are striving to save souls. But it has encouragement also for all circumstances of every kind, in which the same principle holds good. Consider what happened. Peter and his comrades had every external discouragement. They had just tried the place and found no fish. They had failed in the darkness, when their own movements and the meshes of their nets would be invisible, and when their prey would be off their guard. They had persevered all night, and the failure was complete. Our text speaks therefore to the children of failure and of disappointment. Furthermore, they had lost hope. Discouragement is unmistakable in the words, "We have toiled, toiled all night, and have taken nothing;" and in the plain assertion that any further attempt would not be from natural hope, enterprise, or calculation, but simply from respect to Him who bade them repeat the effort. And they now succeeded beyond what they could have dreamed of; the blessing was more than there was room to contain, although it came through exactly the same process, the boats, the nets, the labour of strong limbs. Clearly we may infer that failure and hindrances and a sinking heart are not to weigh against a promise or a command of Christ. Clearly we are to let no past misfortune curb our ardour, or blanch the radiant colours of our hope, as we obey our Captain's orders. Yet it is very doubtful whether if the Son of man came to-day, He would find this faith on the earth. How often, for example, are missions spoken of as things which do very little good perhaps, yet which we keep up, without much hope, because we are commanded to maintain them. This may be letting down the nets but not "for a draught," not honestly looking to baptise or make disciples of all nations. And one reason why we achieve so little is because we expect still less, or because our expectation is not grounded simply upon the commission of our Lord.

Let us look then at some other applications of this principle.

1. Many a reader knows what it is to study the Bible, and receive little benefit; to pray, and rise from his knees unrefreshed. Now we are far from saying that all is failure which appears to be so. The chapter you read with so little emotion may return to your mind in a great temptation, and rescue you. The prayer may be answered which failed to cheer you. But after all, there is such a thing as unprofitable study and unprofitable saying of prayers. There is such a thing as spiritual defeat. It is possible for the soul to cleave unto the dust, for the heart to be in a dry and thirsty land where no water is, and to desire vainly to see the beauty of the Lord so as we have seen it in other times. There are times when faith is dry, and the whole life of man is as a puny and contemptible round of despicable pleasures, low sorrows, and death to crush them all out of being at the end. What is it that so weighs upon the wings of the soul, and prevents them from soaring into the sunshine and liberty of the sons of God? We believe that faith is the sure way to victory and blessedness. Want of faith, therefore, or error of faith, must be the secret of unhappiness and defeat. And when we have been fishing exactly where the fish are to be caught, seeking God in His word or at His footstool, our failure is likely to be caused by the spirit in which we do so. We come, thinking there is some natural and inherent right to succeed. We think our mere brain and learning will find Him in His word; we fancy that our mere supplication entitles us to succeed in prayer. We persevere, and fail, and despond. My brother, try another plan; say, "Prayer and study are in themselves less than nothing and vanity; God, regarded apart from Christ, dwelleth in the thick darkness, unsearchable, remote, unknown. But Christ has bidden me ask and receive; He has bidden me search the Scriptures, and although I have toiled all night and taken nothing, yet oh, my Master and Guide, at Thy word I will let down the net." Have faith in God, and He will honour you.

2. Not much need be said to carry out the same principle in reference to public worship and the sacraments. Do not come to church and expect to be made good there, as if by mesmerism, without coming in a proper spirit. Do not dream that merely to kneel at Christ's table will feed your soul. But come because Christ bids you; because He has blessed these means, and appointed them; and although they would fail otherwise, and although you may have tried them without the least success before, yet when you honour Him in them, and when you trust Him to work through them, then you may expect to find these great and precious gifts of God laden with blessings until your soul is weighed down to the water's edge, and the ordinance, like Peter's net, is unable to hold the lavish treasure bestowed upon you.

3. But there is another, all-important sense, in which to apply the text. It is in regard to nothing else than the love of God Himself. We need none to tell us that His love exists for every soul of man. We are like the fishers plying their trade upon the waters of the same lake which has always sustained them, for it and it only has supported each of us to this day. If our lips are free from blasphemy and our hands from blood, if our memories are pure as men count purity—nay, if none of these things are so, yet inasmuch as we live, and may repent and honour the name of God, we are assured that He is good, and we have actually fed upon His lovingkindness. And now we would fain grasp His love. We seek to trust Him; we resort to what are described as the appointed means; but the net takes nothing, the fruitless waters elude our search, our hearts grow heavy and weary, and we are inclined to come to land and give up the quest after so long, so ineffectual toiling. But in our lives, as in this miracle, the efficacy of the net depends upon the word of Jesus. Listen to Him; He says, "Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught:" do so at His bidding; do it in honour of His word, and now you shall not be able to draw your net to shore. The Father will love you, and will come unto you; the love of God will be in Christ Jesus our Lord, and you shall learn how all fulness dwells in the Son of His love, and how His word quickens and blesses every instrument, from the bread and wine or the printed page up to your spirit's crowning act of faith when, trembling not with fear but with joy, it commits itself at the last hour into the hands of Him who gave it, and goes forth to seek Him who bought it, where He is.

The sum of all this is faith; not in the god of our own dreams, or conjectures, or sensations, but in the God who spake through Christ, the God of the Gospel promises. In us and our emotions there is change, indecision, doubtfulness, but a promise well grasped is like the horn of the altar, a refuge and a sanctuary. Peter may not have been certain of the result; he clearly expected less than was bestowed; but yet he acted upon a merely implied assurance, and he was richly rewarded. Now we have the plainest promises to lean upon. Is it a small thing to be told "every one that asketh receiveth," or "all things are yours," or "the Scripture helpeth your infirmities," or "lo, I am with you always?" These are better grounds of confidence than any feeling which Satan may perhaps forge or perhaps confuse; better than any past experience which vanity may exaggerate or fear may dwarf. "The word of the Lord endureth for ever." In what mood soever we are, it is still there, whether it stands out like a mountain in the sunshine, near and clear and purple, or seems remote and vague and grey, among driving mists and sullen rains, yet you know that it has not removed, no rains can drown, no tempests overturn it. Read the assurance of God's pardon, God's help, God's love, and if you are wise, cry out,

"Let God be true, and every man a liar;" yea, and even my own heart a liar, with its dastardly misgivings, its craven bodings of disaster, its insane suspicions that perhaps, just because the road is steep, and my feet weary, and my brain dizzy among the precipices, therefore my Father will let go the hand of His trembling child, that his broken and mangled corpse may feed the vultures down below. Not so, Lord! Although our own strength has failed, our vows are broken, and our memories are a barren blank of enterprises that have come to nothing, yet at Thy bidding we venture again, and with Thy smile we shall succeed.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVI.

WHEN preacher and people had left the church, one only remained in the solemn darkness of that holy place; his proud knees bent, his haughty head laid low, for it had been to Humphrey Atherstone as though a keen pure wind from heaven had suddenly swept through his soul, dispersing utterly all the mists of sophistry and expediency wherewith he had so long obscured to himself the steadfast light of truth. He had built himself up in the fatal delusion that it is permissible to do evil that good may come; he had ruled his life by his own self-blinded judgment, instead of by that immutable law of holiness, whose foundations are from everlasting, because it is of the very being of the everlasting God; and he saw that when time should be no longer, and he stood amid the wreck of all things perishing, he could lay no claim to the eternal love of Jesus, because of the earthly idols whom alone he had worshipped till that hour, and to whom he had not spared to offer up in unholy sacrifice even his own integrity. It should be so no longer; of that he was fully determined, as he lay there prostrate, for the first time in his life, in unreserved submission before the Divine Truth. Mistaken and erring as he had been, he was in reality too noble and true a man to resist for a moment the awakening which had so suddenly come upon him. But it befell him as it does all who tamper with their own purity of conscience, that he had so confused his sense of right by false reasonings as to be quite unable to unravel the intricacies of his position with sufficient clearness to discern unmistakably the course which he was now bound, in the sight of God to pursue. He saw plainly enough what had been the nature of his own unconscious idolatry. He had given himself to his home and his people first, and then, with far more complete surrender, he had delivered up his whole being to the influence of the one sweet love which he had won too surely to himself. How, he asked himself, was he to render unto these that which was indeed their due, and yet do perfect justice to the claims on his own soul of an uncompromising righteousness? He could not answer the question. But no greater proof could have been given of the change that night had wrought on Humphrey Atherstone, than the determination to which he came, that he would no longer trust his own judgment, but would seek counsel in his extremity from that brave messenger of truth, whose mission it had been to tear away the veil which so long had hid him from himself.

There must be no delay; Humphrey Atherstone felt that he could not live another day in the terrible state of bewilderment and indecision into which he had been plunged, and the tardy light of new year's morning found him seated opposite to Trafford in the clergyman's study.

It was the bitterest humiliation to this man to lay bare the secrets of his proud soul before any mortal gaze. But his strong will was as potent for good as it had been for evil, when once the right impetus was given to it. He had resolved that he would know how the clear spiritual discernment of this true servant of God would solve the problem of his life, and he would not be deterred from his purpose by the burning pain it cost him. They were a strange contrast, those two men—Trafford with his eyes full of light and peace, and a radiance in his smile which no earthly joy could give: Atherstone with his beautiful face dark and almost forbidding in the anguish of his shame; but both were straightforward and outspoken, and neither of them made the least hesitation in grappling with the question which had brought them together. "Mr. Trafford," said Atherstone, "I went into your church last night, and you had power to show me that for the last five years I have been walking blindfolded by my own hands, in a tortuous path, which has led me into a position I can only view with infinite self-scorn; yet I am unable to see in what way I can overcome the difficulties which have brought me to this. You have the wisdom which is not of this world, and I have come to ask you to use it for my enlightenment in the crisis your own words have induced."

The quiet courtesy with which Trafford gave his assent soothed Atherstone's wounded pride far more than if he had manifested any eagerness to help him, and bending his dark eyes keenly on the preacher's face he went on slowly: "Mr. Trafford, I am well aware under what a stigma I lie in this neighbourhood, and before I say one word of my real history, I must ask you to tell me the worst you have heard of me."

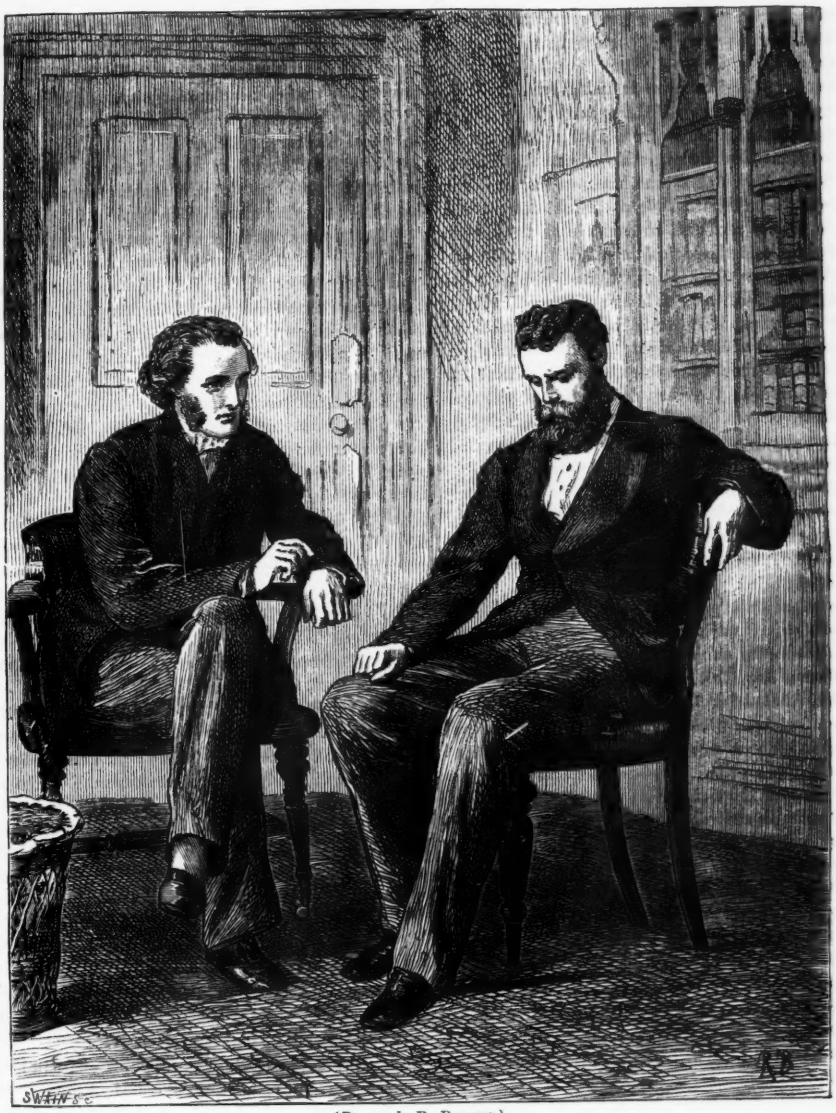
With perfect simplicity Trafford answered that he was aware of all the circumstances of Maurice Atherstone's death, as they were known to the public, and of the subsequent change which had taken place in Humphrey himself, with the inferences which had been drawn from it; "and further," he said, "when Mr. Crichton was committing his people to my care, he mentioned Edwards in particular, and said that he had communicated to him certain facts which satisfied him that the man had sustained a great wrong at your hands; and he asked me, if the opportunity presented itself, to assist him in obtaining redress. I never, however, so much as saw the Malay; he disappeared just at the time when I arrived here."

"Yes," said Atherstone, "he disappeared by my will, never as I hoped to be heard of more, because he stood between me and all that was dear to me on this earth." He paused, while a dark crimson flush rose to his forehead, and then he said firmly and distinctly, "He is Edward Atherstone, only son of my Uncle Maurice, and legitimate possessor of the Abbey and all the lands pertaining to it." Atherstone drew a deep breath when he had thus made the revelation of what was in truth his own fall from rectitude and honour, but he would not trust himself to look at Trafford or wait for any word from him, lest his comments should rouse the fiery passion he so often mastered with difficulty when his pride was assailed. Rapidly he went on and explained to the clergyman all the circumstances connected with the birth of his uncle's son, and the concealment of the boy's parentage, which had just been made known to Una, little as he guessed it, by Miss Amherst. When this much of his painful explanation had been made, he paused at last to let Trafford speak if he would.

The few kind and manly words the preacher uttered in reply showed such entire sympathy, and such a perfect comprehension of his difficulties, that there was more of comfort than of humiliation in going on to give him a full account of the whole process of false reasoning by which he had persuaded himself that he was justified in doing that which was in fact not only dishonourable, but actually dishonest. He saw the truth only too clearly now; but he explained to Trafford that until the day of his uncle's death he had not had the remotest idea that a relationship of any kind whatever existed between Maurice Atherstone and Edwards the Malay; he believed the latter to be simply a most unworthy dependant of inferior birth and position, hopelessly vicious in character, and flagrantly ungrateful for the good education and other advantages which had been so ill bestowed upon him; he believed what—indeed was the case—that the Malay imposed on the old man's kindness, and that it was a duty he owed both to his uncle and to society in general to prove the man's dishonesty, and secure its due punishment. He acted therefore, purposely, without consulting his uncle when he had the Malay arrested for the fraud in which he himself, as the future heir of the estate, was so much wronged; and he was perfectly thunderstruck when the old man, in a paroxysm of fury at hearing that his son was publicly disgraced, suddenly hurled at him the disclosure of the terrible truth—that the man he had just consigned to the hands of the police was none other than the true heir of Atherstone, by whose permission alone he, so long its virtual owner, could ever hereafter cross the threshold of his ancient home. The fatal attack which put an end to Maurice Atherstone's wayward life followed so closely on the fit of ungovernable passion by which it was caused, that he had little time left for explanations, but this much Humphrey was able to understand from his broken utterances, that he had never for a single moment contemplated depriving his son in the end, of his name and birthright, though shame and disappointment at his conduct—the more deep because of the love he bore his only child—had made him postpone the revelation from year to year. The Atherstone estates were strictly entailed on the nearest male heir, and even if Edward, who truly filled that place, had been far worse than he was, the old man would not have defrauded him of his rightful inheritance; and in that last brief hour of life his great anxiety was to prevent any wrong being done to his son as a consequence of his own rash delay in acknowledging him. He was just able to indicate to his nephew that the ebony cabinet contained all the legal documents necessary for the identification of Edwards, as his son and heir, and to add with his last breath, "See that justice is done," before speech and life failed him together, and his unhappy nephew found himself alone with the dead.



When Humphrey came to this point in his recital, he paused a moment, almost shuddering at the recollection of the tremendous struggle through which he had passed in the brief period, during which he alone knew that the death had taken place, and that the heritage of the Atherstones had fallen from the lifeless hands of his uncle. In that short space of time he had to make up his mind as to his future course. If the convicted forger, the cruel, vicious Malay were to be by him proclaimed as the true heir to Maurice Atherstone's estates, it must be done at once—he could not allow himself to be treated even for a day as the possessor of the property, if he was ever to tell the world that he had no right to it. But was it possible for him to do so under the circumstances? he could not dissociate

Edwards in his own mind from accessories of degradation and infamy, which seemed to make it utterly out of the question that he should ever be placed as the representative of the noble Atherstones in the stately home of their ancient race. Was a mere accident of birth, of which the low, disgraced criminal was himself half unconscious, a sufficient reason for bringing shame upon their house and misery on their people? A thousand specious arguments seemed to show Humphrey in that hour of temptation, that he might let the grave close over a secret so pregnant with evil consequences without dishonour or wrong. There was but one counter-weight to balance all those sophistries, the power of immaculate truth claiming a pure and perfect service from all faithful followers of Christ. In the end Humphrey had succumbed to the most subtle of all temptations, that which suggests a compromise with evil, involving enough of personal sacrifice to make it appear almost a virtue. He decided that he could not, when in reality he would not, give up Atherstone and its people to so unworthy a master; but he determined that to his own great loss he would limit the wrong done to the person of the Malay alone. He himself would never marry and bring children of his own into the usurped possession unless Edward's only child died, which would place himself once more in the position of presumptive heir. This being the conclusion to which he came while still he stood alone by the corpse of his uncle, he had set himself from that hour to carry it out with a silent, inflexible resolution, which had baffled all the curiosity of his neighbours, while it effectually roused their suspicions, and in that position he had remained till within the last year. Then had come a change; and when Atherstone arrived at this point in the strange history he was so frankly telling to the man whose face he had never so much as seen a few hours before, he suddenly stopped and shaded his eyes with his hands for a few minutes, while Trafford sat in perfect silence, letting him think out his thoughts, whatever they were, undisturbed.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Atherstone felt that he could not name Una Dysart to the clergyman; he was but too uncertain whether he would ever have a right to connect her with his destiny, and his pride and delicacy alike revolted from the idea of revealing to this stranger who it was that had melted away his iron resolution by the power of her sweet love, and given him a glimpse of happiness so exquisite that he had been ready to barter his very soul to win it. He remembered so well, as he sat there letting his thoughts go back over the entanglements of the past, how strange a circumstance it had seemed to him, that she whom he so desired to make his wife, should have been the very person to save the life of the child who was the one obstacle between them; he felt now that the fact ought to have been a warning to him to go no further in the crooked path on which he had entered; but so far from this having been the case, he well knew that it was on that very day he first realised that the love he bore her was becoming too strong for the constancy of his self-sacrifice; he could see now that because he had yielded to the specious temptation in his first struggle by the side of his dead uncle, he had become more and more unable to resist every fresh plunge into falsehood and injustice, and at last it had come to this, that in order to win the woman he loved to himself, he had driven the kinsman whose possessions he was usurping, into a perpetual exile from his country and his home, not only because for the quieting of his uneasy conscience he was determined to be quit of this witness against himself, but because if by any means Edwards made good his claim before he had secured Una as his wife, she would too surely be lost to him for ever. How could he, not only impoverished and defeated, but convicted of an actual fraud, so much as look in her pure face again? No! he would not let her stainless name be mixed up in such a tale as this; but he had to tell Trafford what potent influence it was that had come into his life and lured him down to the depths of moral disgrace, in which he was writhing now, and with an effort which the clergyman's keen penetration fully appreciated, he told him all the truth, omitting only to give him the smallest clue to Una's identity. It was done. Humphrey Atherstone had paid to the uttermost farthing the debt of bitter self-abasement, which the conviction of his own errors had brought upon him, and folding his arms he turned his noble, mournful face to the clergyman, and said with a quiet dignity, "Now, sir, I make you my judge; I have executed justice on myself for the irrevocable past; but I ask you to tell me how I may make the future pure and true in a position so intricate as that in which I find myself. You can see, no doubt clearly enough how every different course I could take seems alike fatal to the interest of others."

"I do," exclaimed Trafford, warmly grasping his hand; "your trial has indeed been keen and subtle, and I can well understand how life now seems to lie before you as a hopeless chaos, where there is not a ray of light to guide your feet; but, Mr. Atherstone, there is but one thing immutable and certain for us men in all the mysteries of the universe, and that is the eternal law of holiness, which nothing can ever really change or obscure, however much the dimness of our moral sense may prevent us from distinguishing it. Truth and Justice are indestructible, for they have their existence in the Being of God, and are an everlasting witness unto Him; therefore when the face of a man is set to do right, it is set towards the Throne of Perfect Purity, and from thence the light streams upon his path, however dark and fatal, and brightens every step before him as with the shining of the noonday sun."

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"There is but one thing."—p. 664.

There was a light on Trafford's own face as he spoke, which seemed caught from the very radiance he was describing, and Atherstone bowed his head and said simply, "I believe you, and I trust you; tell me what course your eyes can perceive for me in this darkness."

"Your mistake has been in this," said Trafford, "that you have been guided in your actions by the results you expected to flow from them, rather than by the fixed principles of right, which alone should have ruled them. Mr. Atherstone, we men have nothing to do with results, we have a distinct moral law, which is just as real and irreversible as the laws of mathematics, and the logical result of accomplishing it must be that which is right, and which is the unchanging will of God, although to our blind eyes it may appear as if it would be utterly evil. We have to do that which is right, no more and no less, and though we should imagine that the results of our doing it would be the very destruction of the universe itself, we yet have to perform it unflinchingly and unreservedly, and leave the consequences to God, in whose eternal righteousness all laws are fixed."

"Following this rule, it is easy to see what my course should have been," said Atherstone.

"It is, undoubtedly; but before we enter on the details of the future, will you tell me, Mr. Atherstone, how far you think your cousin Edward has been or is aware of his true position?"

"I am quite convinced that he has no certain knowledge on the subject, or you may be very sure he would not have left me in possession for a single hour, but that he believed himself to be invested with some claims, whatever might be their nature, is, I think, quite clear; my own impression is, that my uncle must often have dropped hints on the subject as an inducement to his son to conduct himself more in accordance with his future position; probably but for his low marriage, which incensed his father very much, he would have owned him long ago, but I think at least he must have indicated the ebony cabinet as containing papers bearing on his claims, from the anxiety Edward has always shown to examine it."

"What does it really contain?"

"The certificates of the marriage of Maurice Atherstone and Sanna Gulguli, a Malay girl, of the birth and baptism of their son Edward, and a paper signed and sealed by my uncle identifying the person commonly called Edwards the Malay as the son to whom the certificates refer, and whom he therefore stated to be the legitimate heir of Atherstone Abbey."

Humphrey reddened with shame as he spoke, the unworthiness of his own conduct seemed to stand out in such glaring colours while he thus enumerated the clear proofs of the Malay's right, to the just and honourable man before him.

"It is a matter for great thankfulness that your cousin's claim is so perfectly indisputable. It renders your duty for the future quite unmistakable, and it may, in fact, be summed up in one word."

"Restitution—that is your meaning, is it not?"

Trafford bowed his head. "Even so."

"And my people," exclaimed Atherstone, with some agitation, "how will it fare with them, delivered over to the tender mercies of such a man?"

"They are God's people; He will protect them," answered Trafford, quietly.

"And the honour of the name of Atherstone, stained by the crimes of a man who legally should have been even now in a convict prison?"

"Has it not been more dishonoured by injustice?" said Trafford. These words stung Atherstone to the quick, for they implied that he had himself dishonoured it, and he started to his feet, his eyes blazing with passion, but the calm, almost angelic expression on the face of the man before him subdued him like pure cold water poured on a smouldering flame, and passing his hand over his eyes he sat down again, saying, "You are right, Mr. Trafford, full restitution shall be made at any cost;" then, while his chest heaved convulsively, he said, "There is one more of whom I must speak; I believe that if I do this deed it will deprive me finally of her whom I love better than my life, and if it were only the utter wreck of my own happiness that were in question, it might be nothing more than a deserved punishment, but, Mr. Trafford, I believe,"—his voice faltered,—"I believe that she too loves me, she has not hid it from me, and is she to suffer for my sins, poor guileless, trusting child?"

"If she loves you and continues true to you, I trust you will not ultimately be separated; but even if it were so, there could be no real evil to her in that which would be the distinct outcome of the law of right, and therefore the will of God. Atherstone, you know those deathless words, 'Fiat justitia ruat cælum'—let justice be done though the heavens fall; take that as your sovereign law, and follow it wheresoever it may lead you, were it to darkness—were it to death."

Atherstone rose from his seat and held out his hand. "I will, Mr. Trafford, and I thank you."

"You will let me be of use to you in the future if it is in any way possible?" said Trafford, cordially pressing his hand.

"I will gladly come to you again, if you will allow me, when I have thought out the details of my future proceedings; I shall be truly glad of your advice."

So they parted, and heavy-hearted as Atherstone was, he lifted up his head to meet the keen pure morning air with a sense of being restored to himself, which gave him infinite relief after his long course of self-deceit.

(To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

X.—WITH THE LITTLE ONES.

YES, and amidst the mystery of suffering and pain,—the beginning of that discipline which commences very early, and continues, for many of us, during a whole lifetime, at such intervals as may be necessary for the consummation which we can only faintly discern when we begin to see that which is invisible to the eyes of flesh and of human understanding, and is revealed only to the higher reason—the essential perception which is called faith.

I want you to come with me to that eastern district of the great city which has for so long a time been associated with accounts of distress, of precarious earnings, homes without food or fire, scanty clothing, dilapidated houses, dire poverty and the diseases that come of cold and starvation. The place that I shall take you to is quite close to the Stepney Station of the North London Railway. The district is known as Ratcliff; the streets down which we shall pass are strangely destitute of any but small shops, where a front "parlour" window contains small stocks of chandlery or of general cheap odds and ends. The doorways of the houses are mostly open, and are occupied by women and children, of so poor and neglected an appearance, that we need no longer wonder at the constant demands made upon the institution which we are about to visit. Just here the neighbourhood seems to have come to a dreary termination at the brink of the river, and to be only kept from slipping into the dark current by two or three big sheds and wharves, belonging to mast, rope, and block makers, or others connected with that shipping interest the yards of which are, many of them, deserted, no longer resounding to the noise of hammers. The black spars and yards of vessels alongside seem almost to project into the roadway as we turn the corner and stand in front of a building, scarcely to be distinguished from its neighbours, except for the plain inscription on its front, "East London Hospital for Children and Dispensary for Women," and for a rather more recent appearance of having had the woodwork painted. But for this there would be little more to attract attention than might be seen in any of the sail-makers' dwellings, stores, and lofts in the district; and, in fact, the place itself is—or rather was—a sail-maker's warehouse, with trap-doors in the rough and foot-worn floors, steep and narrow stairs, bulks and baulks of timber here and there in the heavy ceilings and awkward corners, not easily turned to account in any other business. Some of these inconveniences have been remedied, and the trap-doors as well as the awkwardest of the corners and the bulks have been either removed or adapted to present purposes, for the business is to provide a home and careful nursing for sick children, and the long rooms of the upper storeys are turned into wards, wherein stand rows of Lilliputian iron bedsteads, or tiny cribs, where forty boys and girls, some of them not only babes but sucklings, form the present contingent of the hundred and sixty little ones who have been treated during the year. Not a very desirable-looking residence you will say, but there are a good many inmates after all; and the scrupulous cleanliness of the place, as seen from the very passage, is an earnest of that plan of making the best of things which has always been characteristic of this hospital at Ratcliff Cross. Some eight or nine grown-up folks, and from thirty to forty children, make a bright, cheerful home (apart from the suffering and death which are inseparable from such a place) in that old sail-maker's warehouse, if brightness and cheerfulness are the accompaniments of good and loving work, as I thoroughly believe they are.

It was during the terrible visitation of cholera, nearly ten years ago, that this work of mercy was initiated, and the manner of its foundation has about it something so pathetic that it is fitting the story should be known, especially as the earnest, hopeful effort with which the enterprise began seems to have characterised it to the present day. Among the medical men who went about in the neighbourhood of Poplar and Ratcliff during the epidemic, was Mr. Heckford, a young surgeon, who having recently come from India, was attached to the London Hospital, and who took a constant and active part in the professional duties he had undertaken. In that arduous work, he, as well as others, received valuable and indeed untiring aid from the ready skill and thoughtful care of a few ladies, who, having qualified themselves as nurses, devoted themselves to the labour of love amongst the poor. To one of this charitable sisterhood who had been his frequent helper in the time of difficulty and danger, the young surgeon became attracted by the force of a sympathy that continued after the plague was stayed in the district to which they had given so much care, and they had time to think of themselves and of each other. They went away together a quietly married couple; both having one special aim and object in relation to the beneficent career upon which they had entered in company. Knowing from hardly-earned experience what was the dire need of the district, they at once began to consider what they could do to alleviate the sufferings of the women and children, so many of whom were sick and languishing, in hunger and pain, amidst conditions which forbade their recovery. If only they could make a beginning, and do something towards arresting the ravages of those diseases that wait on famine and lurk in foul and fœtid alleys;—if they could establish a dispensary where women—mothers too poor to pay a doctor—could have medicine and careful encouragement; if they could find a place where, beginning with a small family of say half a dozen, they might take a tiny group of infants to their home, and so set up a centre of beneficent action, a protest against the neglect, the indifference, and the preventible misery for which that whole neighbourhood had so long had an evil distinction.

The question was, how to make a beginning: but the young doctor and his wife had been so accustomed to the work of taking help to the very doors of those who needed it, that all they wanted was to find a place in the midst of that down-east district where they could themselves live and work. Out of their own means they bought the only available premises for their purpose—a rough, dilapidated, but substantial, and above all, a ventilable sail-loft with its adjacent house and storerooms, and there they quietly established themselves as residents, with ten little beds, holding ten poor little patients supported by themselves, and in the hope that voluntary aid from some of the benevolent persons who knew what was the sore need of the neighbourhood, would enable them in time to add twenty or thirty more, when the big upper storeys should be cleansed and mended and made into wards. That hope was not long in being realised, and on the 28th of January, 1868, after a determined effort to maintain the institution and to devote themselves to its service, a regular committee was formed and commenced its undertakings, the founders still remaining and working with unselfish zeal. From twenty to thirty little ones were received from out that teeming district, where a large hospital with ten times the number of beds would not be adequate to the needs of the infant population, the mothers of which have to work to earn the scanty living which in many cases alone keeps them from absolute starvation. The struggle to maintain even the wards in the old sail-lofts was all the harder, from the knowledge that in at least half the number of cases where admission was necessarily refused, from want of space and want of funds, the little applicants were sent away to die, or to become helpless invalids or confirmed cripples, not less from the effects of destitution—the want of food and clothing—than from the nature of the diseases from which they were suffering.

How the young doctor and his wife dwelt there, and with cultivated tastes and accomplishments submitted to all the inconveniences of a small room or two, from which they were almost ousted by the increasing need for space: how with a bright and cheerful alacrity they adapted those very tastes and accomplishments to supplement professional skill and tender assiduous care: how the lady—herself in such delicate health that her husband feared for her life, and friends anxiously advised her to seek rest and change—used books and music to cheer the noble work, and always had a picture on her easel, with which to hide the awkward bulges and projections, or to decorate the bare walls and brighten them with light and colour.

It was at Christmas-tide five years ago that I first visited the hospital, and there were then very pleasant evidences of the season to be discovered in all kinds of festive ornament in the long wards, and especially in the smaller rooms, where this loving woman had attracted other loving women around her, as nurses to the suffering little ones; and was there and then engaged in the superintendence of a glorious Christmas-tree. But the time came when the hoped-for support having arrived, Mr. and Mrs. Heckford felt that they could leave the family of forty children to the care of those who had taken up the work with heartfelt sympathy. They had laboured worthily and well, but, alas!—the reward came late—late at least for him, who had been anxious to take his wife away to some warmer climate, in an endeavour to restore the strength that had been spent in the long effort to rear a permanent refuge for sick children in that dense neighbourhood. It was he who stood nearest to shadow-land,—he who was soonest to enter into the light and the rest that lay beyond. Mr. Heckford died, I believe, at Margate, after a short period of leisure and travel, which his wife shared with him. His picture, presented by her to the charity which they both founded, is to be seen in the boys' ward. Another portrait of him—a portrait in words written by the late Mr. Charles Dickens, who visited and pathetically described the children and their hospital in December, 1868, conveys the real likeness of the man.

"An affecting play was acted in Paris years ago, called the Children's Doctor. As I parted from my Children's Doctor now in question, I saw in his easy black necktie, in his loose-buttoned black frock-coat, in his pensive face, in the flow of his dark hair, in his eyelashes, in the very turn of his moustache, the exact realisation of the Paris artist's ideal as it was presented on the stage. But no romancer that I know of has had the boldness to prefigure the life and home of this young husband and wife, in the Children's Hospital in the East of London."

What the hospital was then it has remained—but with such improvements as increased funds and a more complete organisation have effected. It is still the ark of refuge for those little ones who, smitten with sudden disease, or slowly fading before the baleful breath of famine or of fever, or ebbing slowly away from life by the fatal influences that sap the constitutions of the young in such neighbourhoods, are taken in that they may be brought back to life, or at worst may be lovingly tended, that the last messenger may be made to bear a smile. But the hope for the future of this most admirable institution has grown to fill a larger space. It is indeed essential to any really permanent effort in such a district that it should be increased, and the founders looked forward with earnest anticipations of the time when, gathering help from without, they could enter upon a larger building, if any such could be found. None has been found which would be anything like adequate to the needs of such a teeming population, for the area embracing Poplar, Mile End, Whitechapel, St. George's, Limehouse, Ratcliff, Shadwell, and Wapping numbers some 400,000 inhabitants, and strangely enough—as it will seem to those who have not yet learnt the true characteristics of the really deserving poor—many of the distressed people about that quarter will conceal their poverty, and strive as long as they are able—so that when at last they go to ask for aid the case may be almost hopeless, and the delay in obtaining admission may be fatal. There are already so many more applicants than can be received that it may be imagined what must be the vast amount of alleviable suffering awaiting the opportunity of wider means and a larger building. It would be easy to shock the reader by detailing many of the more distressing diseases from which the poor little patients suffer, but on visiting the wards you are less shocked than saddened, while the evident rest and care which are helping to restore and to soothe the sufferers ease you of the greater pain by the hope that they inspire.

It is Sunday noon as we stand here in the dull street, where, but for the sudden opening of a frowsy tavern and the appearance of two or three thirsty but civil customers, who are not only ready but eager to show you the way to the "Childun's 'orsepital," there would be little to distinguish it from a thoroughfare of tenantless houses. Ratcliff is at its dinner at present, but we shall as we go back see the male residents leaning against the doorposts smoking, and the women and children sitting at the doors, as at a private box at the theatre, discussing the sordid events of the streets and the small chronicles of their poor daily lives.

But we must leave the cleanly-scrubbed waiting-room and its adjoining large cupboard which does duty as dispenser's room. It is dinner-time here too, or rather it has been, and there are evidences of some very jolly feasting, considering that, after all, the banqueters are mostly in bed and on sick diet, which in many cases means milk, meat, eggs, and as much nourishment as they can safely take. Indeed, food is medicine to those who are turning the corner towards convalescence—food and air—of which latter commodity there is a very excellent supply, considering the kind of neighbourhood we are in. Here and there we see a little wan, pinched, wasted face lying on the pillow; a listless, transparent hand upon the counterpane—which are sad tokens that the tiny sufferers are nearing the eternal fold beyond the shadowy threshold where all is dark to us, who note how every breath bespeaks a feebler hold on the world of which they have learnt so little in their tiny lives. There are others who are sitting up with picture-books, or waiting to have their abscesses dressed, and arms bandaged, or eyes laved with cooling lotion. Hip-disease and diseases of the joints are evidence of the causes that bring so many of the little patients here, and there are severe cases of consumption and of affections of the lungs and of the glands; but as the little fellows wake up from a short nap, or catch the eye of the "lady nurse"—a lively and thoroughly practical Irishwoman, who evidently knows how to manage, and has come here, after special training, for the love of doing good—they show a beaming recognition which is very pleasant to witness. With all the nurses it is the same. They are young women who, receiving small pay, have come to devote themselves to the work for Christ's sake and the Gospel's—that is to say, for the love of humanity and of the good tidings of great joy that announce the love of Him who gave Himself for us.

In the girls' ward there is the same freshness and cleanliness of the place and all its belongings, the same wonderful patience and courageous endurance on the part of the baby inmates, which has been my wonder ever since we went in. Here is a mite of a girl sitting up in bed, holding a moist pad to her eye, her poor little head being all bandaged. She never utters a sound, but the little round face is set with a determined endurance. "What is she sitting up for?" She is "waiting to see muvver." Another little creature, who is suffering from abscesses in the neck, submits to have the painful place poulticed only on the condition that she shall decide, by keeping her hand upon the warm linseed-meal, when it is cool enough to put on. These are scarcely pleasant details, and there are sights here which are very, very sad, and make us shrink,—but I honestly declare that they are redeemed from being repulsive because of the evidence of love that is to be witnessed,—the awakening of the tender sympathies and sweet responses of the child-like heart. But for its being Sunday—which involves another reason to be mentioned presently—the beds would be strewed with toys and picture-books, while a rocking-horse, which is a part of the hospital property, and a fit kind of steed to draw the "hospital-carriage," which is represented by a perambulator—would probably be saddled and taken out of the stable on the landing. On the topmost storey we come to the real infants, the little babies, one of whom is even now in the midst of his dinner, which he takes from a feeding-bottle, by the aid of an india-rubber tube conveniently traversing his pillow.

Everywhere there are evidences of the care with which the work is carried on, and as we descend to the waiting-room again we have fresh proofs of the benefits that are being effected in the great district, by the provision made for the little creatures, many of whom would otherwise be left to linger in pain and want. For the waiting-room is filled—filled with mothers and elder sisters and little brothers, tearfully eager and anxious for the weekly visit to the fifty children up-stairs. Here is the secret of the brave little patient faces in the beds and cots above. It is infinitely touching to think how the prospect of "seeing muvver" sustains that chubby little sufferer,—how the expected visit nerves the stronger ones to endurance, and sends a fresh throb of life through those who are still too weak to do more than faintly smile and hold out a thin pale hand.

If Mr. Ashby Warner, the Secretary at this Hospital for Sick Children at Ratcliff Cross, could but send some responsive thrill into the hearts of those who, having no children of their own, yet love Christ's little ones all over the world,—or could bring home to the fond fathers and mothers of strong and chubby babes the conviction that to help in this good work is a fitting recognition of their own mercies; nay, if even to sorrowing souls who have been bereaved of their dear ones, and who yet believe that their angels and the angels of these children also do constantly behold the face of the Father which is in heaven, there would come a keen recognition of the blessedness of doing something for the little ones, as unto Him who declares them to be of His kingdom—there would soon be no lack of funds to finish building that great new hospital at Shadwell, which is to take within its walls and great airy wards so many more little patients, to help and comfort by advice and medicine so many more suffering mothers and sisters than could be received in the old sail-loft and its lower warehouse at Ratcliff Cross. For the hope of the founders and their successors has at last being realised—a larger building than they had at first dared to expect is to be erected on ground which has been purchased, still within the district where the need is greatest—and when the time comes that the last touch of carpenter and mason shall have been given to the new home, and the picture of Mr. Heckford shall be hung upon another wall, there may well be a holiday "down east"—as a day of thanksgiving and of gratitude, to those who may yet help in the work by giving of their abundance.

PATIENCE.

THE STORY OF A BLIND BOY. IN THREE PARTS.

PART I.

"WELL, I must say it's more than I can see to the end on; it beats me, it does. What's the use of your living on, fit for nothink—allus a sufferin' chap, not able to earn a honest penny, and them two as made their own livin' and a summat beside, taken?"

"God's ways are not as our ways, father, and He knows how gladly I'd be where they are, and no trouble to nobody."

"What do you mean by talking about God?" retorted the elder, with a fearful frown, "when you know I can't abide it? I don't believe there is one myself, things here are managed so awfu' bad."

"Oh, father!—dear father, don't ee speak like that. We can't tell what's for the best. We don't know now; we shall some day."

"None o' your confounded preaching to me, lad, because I won't stand it—I won't! I didn't come home to find you turned parson, but to see my bonny Madge and sweet little Jess again; and they—they're both dead—took away from me, and only you here in this miserable place, and you stone blind, and fit for nothink."

"And if he is stone blind, master," said a brisk cheery voice, "it's all the worser for him, rayther than you, and sight's a mercy you'd need to be thankful for yourself."

"Thankful!" muttered the man; "it isn't much thanks as'll be got out of me," and knocking the ashes out of his pipe he rose from the unmade bed on which he had been lying, to lounge in the doorway, as he added, in a louder key, "thankful! you say, mother! it's little, indeed, I've to be thankful for, either to man or to God—if there is one!"

"Whist! neighbour, whist! worse luck may come to you if you talk like that."

"Things couldn't be worse with me, I lay, than they be now;" and slouching his sailor's cap over his eyes, the elder speaker, with his relit pipe in his mouth and his hands in his pockets, moved lazily into the narrow street, and passed slowly out of sight.

"Cheer up, Robert, lad, and don't mind father's hard words; he don't mean half he say, and sailor folk have roughish ways sometimes;" and herewith Robert's friend and neighbour, Mrs. Barber, began to tidy up the room, sorely needing womanly care, being, however, actively helped by blind Robert in her sweeping and cleaning.

"And now that all's neat again, I'll sort your beads for you, lad, for another basket is wanted up there at the big house. My Sally brought word this mornin' as she took the butter to market."

The boy's face lighted up with a bright smile as he exclaimed, "How good you are to me, Mrs. Barber! I wish I knew how to thank you."

"Don't waste your breath in thanks to me, child, I loved your mother, that I did, if ever I loved woman—loved her when we was both little, you know, and went to Sunday-school over the fields together. Ah! that was a pretty place to live in—our little village; and then your Jess would ha' been my daughter by this time if she'd lived, so what little I du for you, Robert lad, you're as welcome tu as I can say."

The blind boy was soon busily at work over his bead basket-work, of which as yet his father knew nothing. The poor lad durst not let him have the earnings he was saving up against a "a rainy day," for he knew that all the sailor had brought home was finding its way rapidly into the numerous public-houses, which—unfortunately for him and many others—flourished in that neighbourhood. So whenever alone, and that was pretty often, Robert worked steadily at his little trade, which was becoming more profitable than he had dared to hope, and Mrs. Barber took care of his "profits" and bought his materials for him.

Robert's mother, Margaret Blake, had been a dress-maker with a very fair business, and his sister, apprenticed to a milliner, had what was considered a good start in life, and it must be owned that when father was not ashore, matters had usually gone smoothly enough, and the blind boy had had a very happy home when the loving mother and sister were there to cheer and nurse him. He did not want pity, but he did need love, and that from the father, who was anything but a credit to the British merchant service, he had never had.

There are two classes of sailors—one, rough in speech, but noble, manly at heart, and "tender as a woman" to the feeble and the young. Jim Blake was not of this type, he belonged to the coarser species, bold and reckless rather than courageous; a braggart, if not exactly a coward; fond of low pleasures and low associates, and sadly addicted to that one failing which lowers the most refined to the level of the brute, and makes the brutish man more brutal. His associates had been too often even worse men than himself, and under their influence his nature had sunk lower and lower with every voyage, so that the love which poor Margaret had once cherished for her handsome sailor-lad had gradually given place to a feeling of pity more akin to contempt than anything else. Whilst away from her, she would pray that he might be preserved to come home to her once more, clinging ever to the hope that he might return less hardened, less repulsive, less godless than on his last home-coming, but when he had been back again for a few days, she found herself unwittingly looking forward to the time of his next voyage; his presence effectually dispelled the picture of her girlhood's lover, upon which during his absence she liked to dwell, and her love for the blind boy often rendered her doubly thankful when he could be no longer exposed to the jeers and taunts directed against him, and that dreadful coarseness of language which so sorely tried her gentle, refined nature, and grated as harshly upon poor Robert's ears. It was now two months since Blake had returned to find both wife and daughter recently dead from fever, and the lad Robert, thirteen years of age, the solitary inmate of the now dreary house at Portsea. Lodgers there had not been since the fever, the landlord not having been willing to go to the necessary expense for making the rooms habitable, and father's ship being due soon Robert could not be persuaded to leave the one room he had occupied since his mother's death, and for the rent of which her savings had hitherto paid. Her business had been carried on in other premises, more fashionably situated, and where she had no fear of her husband's presence interfering at any time with her interviews with customers; but the lonely boy had many friends to look after him when mother was at work, and now too that she was at rest from all sorrow. He was a patient, gentle boy, very intelligent and painfully anxious to learn anything and everything that could be gained by the books which Jessie or others read to him. But as yet he had had small chance of learning anything by which he could ever hope to make a living. That was the one great desire he cherished, the subject of ceaseless prayer night and day, to be able to work for himself, and not be a burthen to any one if obliged to live on—instead of going to heaven with mother and Jessie. And the boy had a feeling that in some way, how he knew not, his prayer would be answered, and this trust in his heavenly Father as a hearer of prayer—even such prayers as his—was the secret of much of the patience and gentleness with which he bore up under the heavy trials, which he felt more keenly than any one knew save the God who sent them.

His first attempt at using his fingers at all had been make with Jessie's help. She had bought him some beads and wire at the suggestion of a fellow-apprentice, who lent her a pattern basket which had been made at a blind-school in London, and had guided his fingers till they became accustomed to threading the beads and distinguishing the round from the squarer shaped. She had taught him as an amusement, and proud enough they both were when the first basket—their joint labour—was completed, still prouder when, after much perseverance by himself, he had accomplished one without her assistance. No thought of a sale for such work had entered into the head of either pupil or teacher, till a lady from the "big house," as Mrs. Barber called the residence of a Portsmouth naval officer, when visiting the two sufferers in their last illness, had purchased one and ordered another for a friend, since which unlooked-for piece of good fortune Robert's idea of "keepin' hisself" some day had taken more tangible shape. The fever had not touched him, and, thanks to the efforts of the lady from the big house and the kindness of neighbours to the poor boy, he had been taken out of the polluted atmosphere, whilst the one room he was permitted to live on in underwent a thorough cleansing and whitewashing, so that till father came home it had not presented that comfortless, untidy appearance now habitual to it if he were present. There was more furniture, too, than now, for Robert noticed that many things which mother had loved, and had procured to adorn and add to the comfort of their home, had vanished from their accustomed places. Father spoke of things being out of repair, mother's favourite chair and her work-table amongst them, but Bobby did not quite believe that. If they were only sent to be mended, why were they invariably taken away when he was out with Phil Barber, or some other kind neighbour; and why, too, did they never come back again?

Father might think that because he could not see he would not miss things, but he did though, and knew exactly where they had always been kept, and how mother's table stood on one side of the door with a glass of flowers, a workbox, and a Bible on it, and dear Jessie's little table, Phil Barber's gift and his own workmanship, stood in a niche nearer the fire and close by the low cane chair in which she used to sit working, with Bob at her feet, listening to the pretty hymns and songs she could sing. How often had Phil stopped by the open window to listen too, before interrupting her with his pleasant chat of what was to be in the future—that future which never came to pretty Jessie as Phil's wife. Ah! home was a different place to the poor blind boy now.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

284. Show that the Passover was not the only ordinance by which the children of Israel commemorated their deliverance from Egypt.

285. Give three examples of the word "Christ" being used to denote the doctrine of Christ.

286. What is the number of miracles recorded respectively by St. Mark and by St. Luke?

287. What remarkable differences are observable in the miracles of restoring dead persons to life as performed by Elijah and Elisha and our Lord?

288. "Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows," said the Psalmist of the Saviour. Which one of the New Testament writers quotes these words?

289. On what occasion was St. Paul for the second time favoured with a vision of the Lord Jesus Christ?

290. Enumerate a few instances when the Evangelists tell us that the persons addressed by the Saviour "understood not that saying."

291. Quote the exact words of that verse in which the prophet Isaiah uses the words "the name of the Lord," when announcing the doom of the Assyrian army under Sennacherib."

292. Mention the names of a few individuals whose violent deaths may be regarded as the consequence of their covetousness.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 640.

269. With prayer. See John xvi. 23, 24.

270. No; the only fast in the year was that of the Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 29, 30; Numb. xxix. 7).

271. "What sign showest Thou?" (John ii. 18.)

272. Zech. ix. 9. See Matt. xxi. 1—5.

273. Jeremiah (xi. 4).

274. Caleb made the offer, and his nephew Othniel captured the place. See Josh. xv. 16, 17.

275. Moses (Deut. xii. 5). See 1 Kings xiv. 21; 2 Chron. xii. 13.

276. To St. Matthew (viii. 26). See Mark iv. 35—41; Luke viii. 22—25.

(Drawn by M. FITZGERALD.)

THE VIEW BY THE TREES.

FROM up on the hill I see, out through
The gap in the widely broken rank
Of elm-trees along the hillside bank,
The meadows and slopes, to hills of blue:
And roads where, from time to time, all day,
The people come on, and pass away.

There low-headed horses slowly haul
The newly-made hay, uploaded high,
To ride on the wagon, rustling dry,
To rick up beside the brown-roof'd stall:
And still, as a load is on its track,
An emptied wagon rattles back.

And down at the bridge the children look
Out over the stone-built wall to see
The angler, below the willow-tree,
Outfling on the stream his baited hook:
The while, from an arm-load bent awry,
The home-going maiden passes by.

And there, as beneath the sinking sun,
The cows, at the boy's loud cry, "How! how!"
Go home to the pail; some ling'ring cow
Before the loud dog begins to run;
While horsemen along the road may go,
And each in his business, quick or slow.

There passes the girl to choose in shops
In town a new dress with dainty taste;
And there the sad mother steps with haste
Back home with the precious medicine drops;
Still sobbing a prayer that they may save
Her dear little child from, oh, the grave!

W. Barnes, M.A.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER XVIII.

HOW MAGGIE'S PICTURE WENT TO THE ACADEMY.

"I WOULD give all the world if I could only pay him!" thought Maggie. "I cannot bear the idea of his going away, and my father in his debt. I do not care about his going for any other reason, I have conquered that now," she said with a sigh, "but I feel as if I must get the hundred pounds, if I die for it." There was not the slightest chance of her getting it, though. Even the trifling difference made by the visits of Charley taxed her slender resources. Hetty too, declaring that she would not be mixed up in the quarrel, had stormed the garrison, as she called it—i.e., come and pleaded her own cause with her uncle—and she too made poor Maggie's load harder to bear. Still she would not complain, but worked bravely on, and Hetty sometimes took care of the old man while she, Maggie, was busy teaching.

She wondered sometimes what would become of them if she fell ill; she supposed their friends would keep them out of the workhouse, but then the idea of existing on the charity of friends was terrible. She did not feel very strong either, and she felt, too, as if she had drained all the happiness out of her life, and that when the old man had gone there would be little left for her to do but to wait till dying-time came. Surely it was a little hard, she thought now and then; things had happened so differently from what both she and her father had expected; and then she thought of a passage in a book Stephen Bowden had lent her a year ago, describing the career of an individual man, how in old age "the realities of life undeceive him at last, and there steals over the evening of his days an unwelcome conviction of the vanity of human hopes. The things he has secured are not the things he has expected; he sees that a Supreme Power has been using him for unknown ends." She stopped. "Oh, how wicked I am!" she cried. "God knows best; and He sees our lives as a whole, and shapes them for us and directs our steps, and if the roads are rugged, they will lead to some wise end at last." And then she thought of the words which had comforted her so often lately, and nerved herself for the daily fight again. "If my daddy would only get strong," she said to Miss Charlotte, "and pupils would only flock in faster, it would be all right," and there was a touch of the old happiness in her voice, coming as a flash of sunshine before a storm. "Only, oh dear Miss Charlotte, he fails so, and he sits dozing over the fire all day, or reading his Bible; and it is so dreadful, Miss Charlotte he seems to read it sadly, as if against his will he is making ready to die!"

"Ah, dear," Miss Charlotte answered, "the best preparation for death is to try and live one's life well; the rest we can leave to God's mercy," and Margaret, pondering over those words, learnt to weave her religion into her daily life, until it became a part of it; learnt, too, to understand how God's love can be made a refuge and source of comfort while we live, and not merely a plea for mercy when we die.

That evening the picture came home from the framer's, and Maggie put a card with her own name and that of the picture on the back, and then proceeded to write the usual note to the secretary of the Academy.

"I had better put a price on it," she said to Charley, "because I am not quite sure whether it will be allowed to go in, even if it passes the committee, unless I do. I shall say 'price one hundred pounds,' that will prevent its being sold," and she thought it was just the sum her father owed to Stephen. "There, now it is ready. Of course it will be sent back again; but I shall feel that I have treated my father's portrait with more respect in letting it try its fortune."

"They will be a lot of muffs if they don't take it," Charley said, with his usual characteristic want of respect. "If it comes back, Maggie, I shall say that the fact is they were all jealous."

"Charley!" she laughed.

But Hetty backed him up with, "So shall I, Maggie; and I won't go near the Academy all the summer if they do not accept it, and hang it near the line too."

Two days later, and the sending-in days had come. There was no little eager crowd to visit poor Maggie's studio while doing a "round," but Charley said it would be better not to send it till the last day, "because," he explained, "it will look as if a critical populace had been to inspect it." Then, at three o'clock on the Tuesday, when Maggie had an hour free from the routine of teaching, and the old man seemed well enough to be left alone, Charley and Hetty came in high glee, and a cab was fetched, and the picture put tenderly on the back seat, and all three crowded on to the opposite one, and commenced a triumphal journey to Trafalgar Square. The tears came into poor Maggie's eyes, for she thought how a year ago she had planned "Troilus and Cresseide," that picture which now would never be painted, and of how she had longed to be famous just to make one man proud of her, to whom now her fame would be nothing.

"Maggie, you are not to mope," Charley exclaimed. "The rising artist of the day should never mope, should she, Hetty, you little duck?"

"No, of course not," Hetty answered, stoutly; "but you must'nt call me a 'little duck' before any one; it isn't proper."

"I shall call you what I like before Maggie. She isn't jealous—are you, Maggie? and, besides, one doesn't go down to the Academy three on one side of a cab with the picture of the year on the back seat very often in one's life. Maggie, how do you feel—exalted?"

"No," she laughed, "not at all."

"Oh, Charley, how can you be such a stupid!" laughed Hetty, with the dimples flickering all over her face; but before he could reply the cab pulled up in front of the steps leading to the door at which artists used to deposit their contributions. Hetty stayed in the cab, while Charley manfully shouldered the picture, and Maggie restlessly followed, looking at the many fellow-artists she passed and re-passed, all brought hither on a like errand. She had never realised what "sending-in day" was before, she thought, as she tried to get a peep at what was contained within some of the four sides of the bright gilt frames; and her heart sank, for she recognised so many faces of well-known painters, and there seemed to be an endless number of pictures going in, surely there would be no room for hers! And yet she had had a latent hope of its being accepted, and a wild idea that if any one, thinking that the face of the dear old man was rather a grand face, should take a fancy to it and buy it, in spite of the fancy price she had put upon it (for she never supposed it would be bought through any merit of hers), why, she could pay Stephen Bowden the debt which it grated so sorely on her pride to remember. They reached the top of the steps—Maggie and Charley—gave in the picture to the porter, with the note to the secretary, then went back to Hetty, and drove home. And so Maggie's first picture went to try its fortune.

"Maggie," said Hetty, a few days later, "Herbert said the other day he should so like to see you again. Do you think uncle would shake hands with him if he came?"

"He shall!" Maggie exclaimed, with the first really happy smile she had worn for a long time. "I will make him. I am so glad that Herbert wishes to come."

"He was engaged to Rose Morton this winter, but it is broken off: you know that?"

"Did he care much for her?" asked Maggie, carelessly.

"No, I think not," Hetty answered, with a graver face than she usually wore. There was greater depth in the little dimpled girl than most people imagined. "Herbert never cares for any one very much. I wish he did, for I always think there is something missed in his life."

"So there is," said Maggie, "a great happiness missed, which is worth having, though paid for by any amount of sorrow;" and she thought, "I do not think Herbert could care much for any one; he is too much taken up with his own life. He likes many people in a lukewarm way, and pretty well, but he seldom individualises them. He considers that to those who are related to him he owes a certain amount of attention, and he pays it, not for affection's sake, but for duty's sake, just as he would pay any other debt. He understands feeling, and admires it to a certain extent, just as he would admire a book he could not write; but he only plays the part of a spectator. He has admiration and reverence for those who are far above him, from an intellectual point of view, but no affection for those around him."

"He is very like Stephen Bowden," Hetty said.

"Yes," she answered, absently, "as much as the dim shadow is like the substance. Herbert might have been vastly different. Oh dear," she sighed, "how many 'might have beens' there are in all our lives—in all our natures!" Nevertheless she liked Herbert in a negative sort of manner, partly for the many good qualities that really existed in him, and which she gladly recognised, and she was only too glad to try once more and end the quarrel. The old man looked up almost gladly at her request, though he had refused it many times before.

"Yes, I should like to see him," he said. "We will never quarrel any more, dear." And so Herbert came, and was very agreeable to his uncle, and a little offhand to Maggie, yet civil withal. He rather liked Maggie, but thought there was not very much in her, in spite of her knack of drawing. Still he considered she was entitled to some respect, for the manner in which she kept her father now, and stoutly refused all help, and he always gave people their due.

"So you have a picture at the Academy, Maggie," he said.

"Yes," she answered, "it is there waiting to be rejected."

"Well, I don't suppose it has much chance," he said, and Maggie's heart echoed the supposition. She made a secret journey down to Trafalgar Square the next day, and inquired almost tremblingly if anything was known about it. It wanted a fortnight yet to the first Monday in May, and it seemed so long to wait. Nothing was known, but a list of doubtful and rejected pictures was referred to, and her name was not among them, and she went away with a hope she did not dare express.

"Maggie, does not your birthday come round next week?" asked Charley.

"Yes; why?"

"Nothing, only aunt said she thought it was on Wednesday. She has some trinkets she has been keeping for you when you came of age, only I suppose I ought not to have let it out—that's all."

(To be continued.)

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC., ETC.

I.—"EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF."

"EVERY man for himself" is the world's motto, and its practice too; "No man for himself alone" is the Christian's motto—blessed indeed would it be for the world and for themselves, if this were carried out fully in practice also. The truth, however, is in nowise affected by the imperfection of those by whom it should be carried out; it retains its own majesty and beauty in spite of its evil surroundings, just as the sun retains his splendour in the heavens though the earth is shrouded with fog which intercepts his beams.

So then, although Christians so poorly set forth this truth that there is but little of it seen in the world at all, we must believe in the truth itself, "No man for himself alone," and that this is one of the great laws of the Divine life.

Now, this is not a flesh-and-blood truth. Flesh-and-blood have their own way—or we may say, its own way—of guiding its life. "Every man for himself," says Flesh-and-blood; or, if you like to have the same idea in a handy form, "Take care of No. 1." "This will carry you through the world," says Flesh-and-blood, "this will make you happy, this will keep you out of no end of trouble; if you take this maxim as your guide in life you will have all you get for yourself. You won't have other people's troubles to bother you, and you will be saved no end of worry and loss. You can be like the hedgehog, with all the soft wool inside for yourself, and with all the prickles for the world outside; and when you roll yourself into a ball, few people will care so much as to give you a kick, and even if they do, it will do you no harm. If you have a good warm fire yourself, you need not trouble if others are cold; and if you have a good coat and a good dinner, why should naked or hungry people trouble you? if you are all right, why, let them get all right too, as best they can." "And I'll tell you," says Flesh-and-blood, "another good result of following my maxim. You can go ahead, and no mistake. 'Every man for himself' means to push, and squeeze, and screw, and elbow, and kick, and jostle, and pinch, and run amuck against every one in your way, and make every one stoop down, and you go leapfrog over them; no matter who is left sprawling on the ground, so that you come in first. There is no knowing what you may lose if you are troubled with scruples. Go ahead at any price. Every man for himself, and No. 1 will be sure to win the day. You may blow the whistle if you like, for if people will get out of the way, nothing is to be got by cutting them in two; but if they won't, then so much the worse for them; you turn on the steam and go ahead; if people will be cut in two or mashed up in feelings, or pocket, or comfort, or anything else, it is no affair of yours, 'tis all their own fault for not doing as you do—looking after No. 1."

It seems rather a ticklish thing to meddle with either of the folk who represent these worldly and selfish principles. How shall one handle the hedgehog, or how escape being run over by the man running amuck?

I cannot do better than meet such people on somewhat of common ground. They say they believe the Bible, and I believe it too; so we shall just see what that old Book says about such things.

It is somewhat unfortunate for you, my hedgehog friend, that amongst many ugly photographs which I find there, I have come upon you, taken to the very life. There are many beautiful faces and forms there, but there are many ugly ones too, and, really, after looking at them all, I doubt whether you are not one of the ugliest of the lot.

There is a full-length of you in Luke xii. 19. You were thought worthy of being taken from top to toe. If that is any comfort to you, you are welcome to it, for I don't see much for you anywhere else about. I can see in your face all about you. You have had a wonderful harvest; you were rich before, but are much richer now; you are actually puzzled to know what to do with your goods; and now you are quite happy; you have solved the riddle, you will keep everything for yourself, you will be a hedgehog with plenty of fur; but though you are for yourself, God is not for you. So far from it, He is against you; and if only we had a likeness of you after He said those words, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided?" I think we should scarce look at it for the horrid contortions of the face, its woe, and agony, and despair, and rage, and helpless hopeless misery. After looking on such a picture, which of us would commit such an outrage upon truth as to write under it, "He took good care of No. 1?"

It would be quite impossible for any one volume to contain portraits of all the members of this unhappy family; but the Bible has several most useful specimens of them.

Amongst those far back we find one in 1 Sam. xxv. This man was very great, so far as worldly goods were concerned; he had plenty of sheep and goats, and better than all the sheep and goats put together, he had a first-rate wife, a woman of good understanding and of a beautiful countenance. With him No. 1 was everything. I dare say he did not care the least for "the woman with good understanding and a beautiful countenance," compared with himself. Well, he came to grief in what I might almost call a ridiculous way. His wife gave away—or as he would put it, he lost—two hundred loaves, and two bottles of wine, and five sheep, and five measures of parched corn, and a hundred clusters of raisins, and two hundred cakes of figs. To put it at the very outside, and make the best case we can for him, £50 would have covered the whole; and when he heard of this, as he thought tremendous loss, his heart died within him, and he became as a stone, and ten days afterwards he died.

The Scriptures give us an account of another also who came to grief by this principle of "Every man for himself," and "take care of No. 1." In this instance the foolish man was an erring child of God. You will find about him in Gen. xiii.

Lot went with Abram, and had flocks, and herds, and tents, and was so rich that the land was not able to bear Abram and him. Abram gave Lot the choice of the country which lay before them, and he, thinking only of No. 1, never caring for the interests of Abram at all, chose all the plain of Jordan, which was well watered everywhere. He got amid bad company in Sodom and Gomorrah, even though he vexed his soul with their unrighteous deeds, and the end of that matter was that he escaped with just the clothes upon his back, and even that, was of the great patience and mercy of God. When God's people will act on worldly principles and go in the world's ways, they must expect to take the consequences. They cannot escape because they are the Lord's. On the other hand that is all the more reason why they should be chastened, and find out that the transgression of God's commands can bring with it nothing but sorrow. Many of the Lord's people have experienced this. Jacob, and Eli, and David, and others, indulged "self" in one form and another, and they all came to grief thereby.

Sometimes we have to answer a fool according to his folly, and take a man upon his own low ground in argument, and show him that even upon his own principles he is wrong. Perhaps we can do no better now than act on this plan with regard to our friend who thinks he is so well able to take care of himself.

And first of all, don't think, my friend, that you and I have not some common standing ground. We have. I am just as fond of "No. 1" as you are. I take the greatest interest in him. I assure you I would go a good bit out of my way to serve him. I wouldn't hurt him on any account whatever. I am always thinking of his true interests, and trying to help him up when he is going up, and to pick him up when he tumbles down. So we have at any rate enough in common to make us have a talk together, and even that is something towards understanding one another.

And what is more, I take a very strong religious view of this matter, and believe that God intended every man to take great care of all the real interests of No. 1; and that No. 2, and 3, and 4, and 40, and 400, and 4,000, must come only in due course after this No. 1.

But the point on which you and I will probably join issue is the word real. What is a real interest? what is our real self? what is No. 1 at all? I dare say you would be very much astonished, if I were to say to you, What you believe to be yourself, to be No. 1, is not really so at all; you don't even know what your real self is. However, not to enter on that point at present, I shall just proceed to show you why this selfishness which embodies itself in the cry, "Every man for himself," and "Take care of No. 1," is not likely to come to any good, but very certain to come to a deal of harm.

If following out your idea of these words, you are for getting everything for yourself, and consulting only your own ease and pleasure, and have no sympathy with others, then mark this first of all—you are unlike Christ.

Now let me tell you, my friend, that this is very serious. I do not suppose that you don't care that No. 1 should go to heaven, or that No. 1 should be happy for ever and ever, or that No. 1 should be beautiful and rich by-and-by, with a beauty which shall never fade, and a wealth which never can be lost. You want No. 1 to have a share in all the good things going in that land where Christ shall be King. Well, I say, if you want all this, you must become like Christ. Christ died for you, not to let you be safely selfish, but to make you like Himself. He so lived as to show you that there was a nobler "self" than what men call self. He gave Him*self* up for us all; He His own self bare our sins in His body on the tree; He counted not His life dear unto Him*self;* He sought not His own glory; He lived for others; He found His pleasure in helping and blessing others; and He expects that you will seek to be like Him. Indeed, if you don't get like Him, you will never be fit for living in that blessed land where He reigns.

All the little pleasures which you used to make so much of, you would not now care for; all the little privations and pains you would not now feel; the great real No. 1, the No. 1 which God made to have to do with eternal things (and with things here only as preparatory to them), has now nothing; you made it as unlike Christ, as unfit for heaven as you could, and if you were admitted there, you would be miserable; you would be so unlike Christ, and so unlike all the people there like Him, that I don't think you could ever stay there; and then I think you would say (though it would be too late to mend the matter) that you had made a great mistake—that when you cried, "Every man for himself," you were not for your real self at all; that with all your selfishness and miserableness, you never really took care of No. 1.

I would remind you, too, that in your sense of taking care of No. 1, you are breaking God's law. Now no man can break God's law without suffering for it; and any man who willingly and determinately makes breaking it the habit of his life, must expect to fare accordingly. St. Paul tells us (Rom. xv. 1) that "we that are strong ought to bear with the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves;" and one of the signs of the bad times given us in 2 Tim. iii. 2, is that men shall be lovers of their own selves. We are not our own, we are told, we are bought with a price, and therefore must glorify God with our bodies and spirits, which are His. We are to look, not every man upon his own things, but every man also upon the things of others; we are to bear one another's burdens, and so fulfil the laws of Christ.

Now, if we will not do these things, but think of ourselves, and ourselves alone, or of ourselves so chiefly as to practically exclude all others, then we are breaking God's law—we are sinning not only against the instructions He has given us, but against the whole bent of His nature. His law is only the outcome of His nature; and is it, can it be good for any one to put himself into antagonism with God? "No. 1" will soon find that it will come off second best in a trial of this kind. Ah, it is a bad taking care of No. 1, a poor way of looking after its interests, to bring it into conflict with God!

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XVIII. CHRIST DEALING WITH INDIVIDUALS. No. 1—THE WOMAN OF SAMARIA.

Chapter to be read—John iv. 1—42.

INTRODUCTION. Ask a few questions upon our Lord's travels. To whom did He come first? How did His own people receive Him (John i. 11)? Where did He principally labour? But did not always remain in Galilee. Made several journeys to and from Jerusalem. Almost every journey has some special incident connected with it. Always tried to do good on His way. How unlike some travellers—think only of selves and own comfort. Where was He now going (ver. 3)? By means of a map show His route. Ask about the Samaritans and their worship on Mount Gerizim, and tell of their deadly animosity to the Jews.

I. THE STORY. (Read iv. 1—9.) Describe our Lord's journey with His disciples; on foot—no carriage-roads; and our Lord lived in poverty, not even mounted on an ass or camel. Midday approaches; sixth hour being the same as our noon. Sends disciples away—why (ver. 8)? Was it only to buy meat? He knew who would be coming, and wished to talk to her alone—confidentially. Remind of great heat of that climate. Where did Christ sit? Read Gen. xxxiii. 19, for account of the purchase of the well by Jacob. Christ sat "thus," or as a tired man would sit—alone, patiently waiting to do good. As examples of women coming to draw water, remind of Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 16) Rachel, Jethro's daughter, and others. Now describe the woman coming;

Christ wishing to talk to her; asks for water to draw her into a conversation; and takes the things of earth to teach about things of heaven—i.e., teach by a parable.

II. THE LESSONS. (1) The living water. (Read 10—15.) For what did Christ ask? why did she express surprise? how did Christ answer her (ver. 10)? and what water does He speak of? did the woman understand Him (ver. 11)? As regards the well being deep, tell the children that it still exists; that Mr. McCheyne, a Scotch clergyman, stooping over, let his Bible fall in accidentally, thirty years ago: impossible to recover it. Show the veneration with which Jacob was regarded for this gift seventeen hundred years before; the woman thought no one could be able to give better water than Jacob had given. What does Christ say about the living water (ver. 13, 14)? What water did He mean? As regards this water of life, see John vii. 38, 39, to show that He alluded to the Holy Spirit. Now work out the idea of the Holy Spirit being like water (a) It cleanses. The children will tell some of the properties of water. This one of the principal. Show how the Spirit convinces of sin (John xvi. 8); cleanses the heart from sin (Ps. li. 11); produces Christian virtues (Gal. v. 22). (b) It satisfies. Remind how pure water is really the best of all drinks—cooling, pure, unadulterated, wholesome, yet after drinking soon require more; so the Holy Spirit is best, because author of all other graces. Satisfies the soul. Remind how John the Baptist was filled with Holy Ghost from birth (Luke i. 15); and was able to testify to Christ. Stephen, full of Holy Ghost, did great wonders, and, particularly, laid down his life (Acts vi. 5). (c) It lasts. What does Christ compare it to? Why does a well not dry up? What dries up streams in summer? Where does a well draw its water from? Springs below surface not affected by drought, so water of life lasts. Like river rising in distant mountains gets larger, fed by other streams, till lost in ocean; so this stream, at first so small, scarcely seen, fed by means of grace, at last lost in eternity. Apply this to children. All may have this Holy Spirit. Given in answer to prayer. Is as free as water, and far more precious. Are they seeking it daily, eagerly? will give life which shall last for ever.

(2) Spiritual worship. Let the children notice how Christ by His questions showed that He knew all about this woman, and the effect produced upon her. She recognised in Him a prophet. From past lessons draw out the nature of prophets as inspired teachers. The woman defends her own religion. Why had she worshipped on Mount Gerizim? Also she connected her worship entirely with a particular place. From our Lord's answer, show the true nature of worship. It must be (a) heart-felt—i.e., in spirit, and not merely in sacrifices and repetition of words. (b) Universal—i.e., no longer confined to one temple or place. See this taught in Stephen's speech (Acts vii. 48). (c) Intelligent. The Samaritans could give no account of their worship (ver. 22). So the Athenians worshipped an "unknown God" (Acts xvii. 23).

Apply this to the children. Ask why they worship; reminding how God, being a Spirit, knows all the motives of the heart. Where they worship; only at church or everywhere—at home, in private, &c.; how—i.e., with lip-service or heart-worship. Remind of our Lord's warning (Mark vii. 6, 7).

III. THE EFFECT. (c) On the woman (ver. 25). She was awakened—i.e., she began to understand the spiritual truths. Also, she was convinced (ver. 29). Ask who cried "hosanna" one day, and "crucify" two days afterwards! What did this woman do? whom did she tell about Christ? This shows she was anxious for others. What an example to children. Would not keep good news about a holiday, and so on, to themselves—so should try and spread the good news of salvation to all. (b) On the Samaritans. (Read 39—42). They were anxious to hear—pressed Christ to stay—listened—were convinced—believed. See what good one conversation did.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the situation of Samaria.
2. What do you know about Jacob's well?
3. What were the two great topics of our Lord's conversation?
4. Show how the Holy Spirit is like water.
5. Describe the nature of true worship.
6. What was the result of the conversation?

THE BREATH OF MORNING.

O FADING beauty, come and seek
Fresh roses for thy pallid cheek;
The breath of morning offers thee
Life from the mountain and the sea.
I know thou wouldst be strong and fair,
Then rise and smell the morning air.

Hers is a cup of pure delight,
Made in the presses of the night,
By breezes, culling as they pass
New fragrance from each blade of grass,
New riches for the poor and wise,
Who with the morning choirs arise.

Forsake the ball-room's heated air,
The theatre's unwholesome glare,
The pleasures of the midnight meal,
And in thy chamber early kneel;
Compose thy soul with prayer for rest,
The Evening Hymn her latest guest.

Awake, and dreams behind thee cast,
Kneel, and give thanks for perils past,
And when thou risest from thy knee,
Go, taste the banquet spread for thee,
With pity for the pillowed head
To morn's surpassing glories dead!

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

UNA DYSART, a few weeks later, was standing at the window of the drawing-room in Vale House, looking with a wistful anxious gaze down the avenue. She had arrived at home two or three days previously with Lady Elizabeth and Miss Grubbe, and during the whole of the tedious journey, which had been much retarded by the caprices of the invalid, her mind had been entirely occupied with the struggle which had been raised in it by the letter she had received from Miss Amherst the night before her departure from Cannes.

The one question which she debated with herself perpetually was simply this—was she or was she not to reveal to Humphrey Atherstone the contents of that letter, of which, like Miss Amherst herself, she believed him to be entirely ignorant? Would Una Dysart have hesitated on this point one single moment had she been even now steadfast in the resolution she had formerly taken, to make her one only life pure and true and noble? It was very clear that truth and justice alike required of her to make known to him at once the facts which she imagined he could learn from no other source; but in the hour when by the dim twilight sea she had succumbed to the mighty power of the love she bore him, and resolved to give her life to him at any cost, she had in truth taken that love for the law of her being, instead of the perfect righteousness, which to seek first of all is to worship God.

And now, although she knew that to conceal the truth was to rob Edward Atherstone of his just due, she could not bring herself to inflict on Humphrey the bitter pain she felt it would cause him to have to deliver up the beloved home of his ancestors, and the people whom he had cherished with a brother's care, to the dishonoured hands of the base cruel man whom his own forbearance alone had saved from a convict prison. Una was also well aware that if she revealed the fatal secret, which had become known to her she would sound the death-knell of all hope of happiness in this world for either him or herself. He would no longer be in a position to ask her to be his wife; nor would it be possible to obtain her guardians' consent if he did; and to consign him as well as herself to the hopeless misery of a final separation was more than, in her present uncontrolled weakness, she could endure even to think of. Were she happily married to him, it would be a matter of perfect indifference to her whether they were rich or poor, and her own little fortune would be sufficient to keep them from any actual pecuniary difficulty, so that if the secret then transpired it would not be to either of them the dreadful evil which it now appeared; and so at last Una Dysart settled into a compromise with her conscience, and resolved that, at least until she was Humphrey Atherstone's wife, she would say nothing whatever to any human being of the fatal knowledge she had acquired, and the letter written with so solemn a purpose from the very brink of the grave should be hidden away and forgotten—if she could forget it—even by herself.

Thus Una Dysart yielded to the strongest temptation she had ever known; and yet behind all the sophistries, all the false reasonings with which she strove to deaden her sense of right, that divine instinct never really slept which the God of Truth has planted in every living soul, there to vindicate the sovereignty of justice and righteous dealing against the subtlest casuistry that ever sought to obscure the claims of their immaculate purity. She was restless and uneasy, vaguely dissatisfied with herself, and making not even an effort to control the passionate longing she felt to see once more the man who had become her all. She never doubted for a single moment that their very first meeting would settle their marriage and bind her to him for life. It was true that, as matters stood at present, she had distinctly refused him, and had never revoked that refusal, and therefore it was quite open to him if he pleased to make no further attempt to win her; but his manner to her on the night of her father's death had satisfied her that he would never rest till he had induced her to give up the scruples which alone stood between them, and as she had already done so in her heart, it needed but that they should meet for all uncertainty to be at an end.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"'It is perfectly false!' said Una."—p. 683.

It was for Humphrey Atherstone that Una was watching now, as she stood at the window with straining wide open eyes and beating heart. She had not seen him since her return, but she knew it was no fault of his. The only visitor whom Lady Elizabeth Molyneux had received as yet was Mrs. Northcote, who had called upon her the previous day, and who, having asked to see her alone, had been closeted with her for at least an hour. Una had been somewhat disquieted by this proceeding, as she had very little doubt that Mrs. Northcote was seeking to prejudice her aunt against Atherstone; but she relied upon Mr. Cunliffe's support to carry her marriage through in spite of any opposition which might be raised by her other guardians, and as her aunt made no remark, she trusted that any charges Mrs. Northcote might have brought against him had failed to take deep root in her mind; and then she trusted Lady Elizabeth would see him, for Una felt sure he would come so soon as he heard of their arrival, and to her partial love it seemed impossible that any one could look on his noble face and fail to trust him; so she had shaken off her fears, and had begun the day before to watch for him, as she was watching now.

But a great disappointment had awaited her on the previous afternoon, for Miss Grubbe had suddenly come to her room, and with a peculiarly disagreeable smile, requested her to take her place in driving out with Lady Elizabeth that afternoon, as she herself would be occupied in the house.

"But I particularly wish to remain at home myself to-day," Una had said, for she believed she would be very likely to miss Atherstone's visit if she went out.

"I conclude you do not wish her ladyship to be deprived of the exercise which is so essential to her health," said Miss Grubbe, with a malevolent glance of her small cunning eyes towards Una, whom she secretly detested, partly because she was jealous of her position in the house, partly because she was young and bright, and possessed of many a charm to which Miss Grubbe in her best days could never have aspired.

"You know I do not, Miss Grubbe," said Una, "but I should be much obliged to you if you would go as usual. Why should there be any change just this one day, when I so particularly wish to stay at home?"

"Because it suits her ladyship's convenience and mine that you should go, Miss Dysart; if you do not, your aunt will lose her drive."

Poor Una said no more, and went patiently through the dull monotonous drive, which Lady Elizabeth made distinctly longer than usual, and when she came home her worst fears were realised, for Miss Grubbe came forward into the hall to receive her lady, and at once drew her attention to Atherstone's card, which lay on the oak table. "You will be surprised to hear that this gentleman asked for Miss Dysart, and not for your ladyship, and that he said he should call again to-morrow."

Lady Elizabeth tossed the card aside with a contemptuous gesture, but made no remark, and Una determined that even if Miss Grubbe refused to drive again the next day, she would not leave the house.

Nothing further had been said to her, however, and on this afternoon she had the satisfaction of seeing her aunt and her companion depart for their drive at the usual hour, leaving her alone in the drawing-room, where we find her waiting for him she so longed to see. She leant against the side of the window, watching, watching, and slowly the moments dropped away, till suddenly a turn in the avenue brought into view the figure she so pined to see. She started, and her heart beat almost to suffocation. He could not see her where she stood, and she watched him as he came on towards the door; his firm step ringing on the gravel, his dark eyes eagerly scanning the house. She noticed that he looked ill and worn, and that his face wore an expression of suffering which she longed to efface by her own care and tenderness. He reached the door, and the bell echoed with a sharp reverberating sound through the hall. Una trembled with agitation so that she could not stand, and she dropped into a chair, listening intently for his step coming towards her; she heard the servant go to the door, and a few words spoken, a brief delay, and then the door closed; now—now he would come; she could scarcely hear for the beating of her heart; yet surely no steps were coming this way!—she heard the servant go back to his own part of the house, then a rapid footfall going away from the outer door. With a cry of anguish and dismay she flew to the window—yes, it was but too true, the tall stately figure was just disappearing among the trees; Atherstone was hastening away with a quick haughty tread. What did it mean? She rang the bell, and stood shivering with impatience and misery until the servant came. "Why was Mr. Atherstone not admitted?" exclaimed Una; "you knew I was at home."

"Miss Grubbe brought me orders from my lady, ma'am, that if Mr. Atherstone called I was to say neither you nor her ladyship could see him," replied the servant, calmly.

Una looked at him for a moment, as if unable to take in the sense of his words, and then making him a sign to leave the room, she sunk into a chair, completely overwhelmed.

CHAPTER XXIX.

For the first few minutes after her bitter disappointment Una felt too stunned and wretched to be able to collect her thoughts; but very soon a passionate indignation took the place of every other feeling. She was naturally gentle and sweet-tempered, but her whole nature was disorganised at this time, under the influence of the one dominant affection which had taken such entire possession of her. She started to her feet with flashing eyes and burning cheeks, as she heard Lady Elizabeth's carriage drive to the door. "What right," she asked herself, "had her aunt to treat either herself or Humphrey Atherstone in this insulting manner? she would go at once and tell her that she would not submit to it. It was no light matter for her; it was her very life; and she would not let her whole hopes of happiness be trampled in the dust to gratify the prejudices of either Lady Elizabeth or Mrs. Northcote!" So, without waiting another moment, she sped away through the long corridors till she reached her aunt's boudoir, and, giving a hasty knock, opened the door at once and went in. Lady Elizabeth, a faded, irritable-looking elderly woman, with small features and a weak, undecided expression, was reclining on the sofa, while Miss Grubbe, her tall thin figure bent at a most uncomfortable angle, was obsequiously engaged in exchanging the lady's boots for her velvet slippers. Straight up to the sofa walked Una Dysart, her great brown eyes blazing with unwonted fire, and a scarlet flush on her fair young face.

"Lady Elizabeth, I wish to know the meaning of the treatment Mr. Atherstone has received at this house; he is my friend and my father's friend, and I was at home and wished to see him; why was he not admitted?"

"Because he is a suspicious character, and an objectionable acquaintance for you."

"Aunt, it is perfectly false!" said Una, with much agitation; "he is a true and noble gentleman, who has been cruelly maligned."

"You are not a proper judge of the matter, Una."

"But my father was," she exclaimed; "if he thought Mr. Atherstone a suitable friend for me, who shall dare to gainsay it?"

"I do," said Lady Elizabeth, angrily; "I am your chief guardian now, and I shall not allow you to be exposed to the attentions of such a man."

"It is painful to see what an evil influence he already exercises over Miss Dysart," said Miss Grubbe, in her sleek voice, "or she could never speak so to you, my lady."

"Ah, yes, indeed!" said Lady Elizabeth, immediately assuming an injured air, "your conduct is most reprehensible, Una; let me hear no more of this."

"Aunt Elizabeth, you do not know what you are doing!" said Una, clasping her hands tightly together in her bitter pain, while burning tears rushed to her eyes, "but I cannot bear it; I must and will see him!"

"Oh, my dear lady!" exclaimed Miss Grubbe, "this frightful scene will be quite too much for your delicate nerves; let me bathe your head with eau-de-cologne, I fear it throbs dreadfully. Ah, yes, indeed! and I am sure your pulse is agitated. Let me entreat you to retire, Miss Dysart, you have done harm enough already."

"Yes, go, Una, go!" said Lady Elizabeth, "I fear I shall faint;" and she sank back on her pillows.

"Aunt," said Una, with a sob in her voice, "let me say one word."

"Stop!" exclaimed Miss Grubbe, flinging out her arm theatrically, "I will defend my lady's life and health at any cost; her sensitive frame is already, I fear, severely injured by the violence done to her nervous system, and I take upon myself—I, her poor but faithful friend—to desire that you leave the room."

"Dear Miss Grubbe, you are right," gasped the lady, who showed not the smallest symptom of faintness; and Una, with heaving breast, turned and walked away. She carried her graceful little head haughtily enough so long as she remained in her aunt's room, but no sooner had she reached her own, and bolted the door to avoid intrusion, than she flung herself down on the couch and gave way to a passionate burst of tears, such as never had rained from her eyes before. She felt as if her very heart was breaking, she was so helpless, so desolate now, in the very crisis of her fate, and everything was turning against her. She saw that it was quite in the power of these two women—the one silly and easily led, the other artful and deeply scheming—to ruin her whole hope of happiness in this world. It was certain that Atherstone would consider the dismissal he had received as an intimation that she meant to hold by her refusal, and would not so much as see him; and dearly as she knew he loved her, he was too proud a man to brook a second insult such as virtually had met him at her door that day. How was he ever to know that all the while her very heart had been crying out to him to come to her—that she loved him better than all on earth—better—though she would not admit it to herself, even than duty? If he never knew it, this day had perhaps severed them for ever! Yet there was no way in which, under the circumstances, she could communicate with him. Could she write to Mr. Cunliffe, and ask him to help her? No, her delicacy revolted against the very idea of such a step. It was, of course, within the bounds of possibility that Atherstone did not intend to ask her again to be his wife, and it was utterly out of the question that she should take the initiative herself in the smallest degree. She could see no ray of light in her difficulty, and every sort of gloomy foreboding surged in upon her sinking heart. Perhaps she was to have a fate like poor Miss Amherst, whose cruel friends had stood between her and her happiness in early youth; then not all the sacrifice and anguish of her life could suffice to win her back one golden gleam from the light of love that had shone around her once! Nor was it for herself alone poor Una wept those bitter tears, but for him whom she loved so well; she had a sure instinct that he was suffering cruelly. He had so long been sad and lonely, living a joyless existence, with none to cheer him, till she had filled his life with one bright hope, which he had given up all his former plans to win, and now, when he came to claim at least her promised sympathy, she shut her door against him without so much as a word of explanation.

It pierced her tender heart with an almost unendurable pang to know that she must seem so cold and cruel to him, for whose welfare she would have been content to die; and so the poor child lay like a flower beaten down by the tempest, struggling under her load of pain, and feeling as if she never cared to lift up her head again. But she was young: and at her age no weight of care can altogether quell the up-springing waters of the fountain of hope. She was yet far from the time when it is possible for a human spirit to look round upon the earth in helpless desolation, and see no faintest gleam of consolation, save in the pale mysterious light that shines through the gate of the distant tomb.

Gradually Una began to say to herself that all could not be lost thus suddenly, thus miserably; it must be that somehow they should meet again, living as they did in the same neighbourhood, and one glance into her face would surely show him that she was neither cold nor false to him. They might meet out of doors—that was her best hope—in the village perhaps, or at the Eagles' Nest, which, to please her in their last happy days, he had made accessible by a good and easy road. Oh, it must be that she would see him soon! This miserable day was near its close, and to-morrow the sun would rise with golden possibility in its coming hours. So at last Una rose, and bathed the poor bright eyes, now dim and sad—which her father used to call his household stars—and tried to go patiently through the rest of day as best she might.

And the sun did rise no doubt next morning, only it would have been quite possible to feel rather sceptical on the subject, for it was hidden behind impenetrable clouds, and it poured of rain incessantly the whole day long. Poor Una! how wistfully she looked upon the soaking muddy roads, and felt even if it were possible for her to venture out on them, there could be no chance of meeting Atherstone. Inside the house the atmosphere was quite as cheerless as it was outside; no allusion was made by any one to the scene of the day before; but Lady Elizabeth treated her with the greatest coldness, and Miss Grubbe went about with a lurking smile of triumph on her sharp disagreeable face, which Una felt augured ill for her future. Next day, however, was bright and sunny, and like a bird released from its cage Una made her escape from the house as early as she could, and soon was walking with her light step down the village, greeting the poor people with her charming smile, and receiving a hearty welcome wherever she went; but not a glimpse did she gain of Atherstone, nor did she hear a single word concerning him, for she had not the courage to name him, and the villagers were so entirely engrossed with another subject, that they seemed unable to talk to her of anything else; the one theme on which they all expatiated with the greatest interest was the goodness of their new clergyman, Mr. Trafford—there was no limit to what they had to tell of his self-denying life and his wonderful kindness to themselves, till Una, with her whole heart full of another name, grew weary of hearing the sound of his, and, sadly dispirited, returned home. She believed her chances of seeing Atherstone were at an end for that day at least, so that when her aunt asked her to drive with her in the afternoon, she assented, caring very little what she did, and understanding quite well, as Miss Grubbe was going too, and she was not really required, that the object of the two ladies was simply to prevent the least risk of her seeing Atherstone if he should call again. "But he will not do that," she said to herself with a heavy sigh; "never more perhaps—never more!"

They went out in an open carriage, and drove slowly along the most sheltered road for a few miles, Una striving to speak pleasantly to her aunt, for her gentle nature could retain no rancour, and when she was met by silence or short replies, turning away her head to look over the well-known fields, that she might avoid meeting the hard malevolent eyes of Miss Grubbe staring at her from the opposite seat. They were returning home, and the carriage was rolling swiftly along the road towards the gate of Vale House, when suddenly Una's heart gave a bound, and a light of joy flashed into her eyes, which served as a very speedy revelation to the astute Miss Grubbe. She had seen Humphrey Atherstone pacing rapidly to and fro in front of the gate, and scarcely had she realised that it was indeed himself when the carriage stopped, while the coachman hailed the lodge-keeper, and in that instant Atherstone had sprung to her side. Her hand was in his almost before she knew what she was doing, while, lifting, his hat apologetically to her aunt, he said, "Pardon me for detaining you, but I must ask you to let me say just one word to you."

Lady Elizabeth looked round startled, and Una's natural instinct of courtesy prompted her to name them to each other, but the next instant Atherstone had said words which made her forget all conventional proprieties.

"Miss Dysart, I could not finally quit England without taking leave of you, in spite of your refusal to see me."

"Quit England!" she exclaimed, "oh, where are you going?"

"To Australia—I start to-night."

Una's face grew white as the driven snow, and her trembling lips could scarce articulate. "Why——" she began, but Miss Grubbe vehemently broke in—"My lady, my lady! will you not order the coachman to drive on instantly? Independent of everything else, it will kill you to sit here in the cold wind."

"Yes, yes!" exclaimed Lady Elizabeth; "drive on, coachman, at once."

The man obeyed, and the horses started forward. Atherstone still held Una's hand clasped in his own, but they were torn apart, while he had to spring back to avoid being knocked down by the wheel. Almost desperate, Una stretched her hands out to him, exclaiming, "Oh, when will you come back?" and she had just time to hear his brief sad answer, "Probably never!" when the carriage dashed through the gates, which closed behind it with a harsh grating noise, and she was borne away from the sight of his beloved face with the cruel fiat ringing in her ears, which told her that perhaps she might look on it no more for ever.

(To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

XI.—IN THE KINGDOM.

"OF such are the kingdom of heaven;" and "whosoever doeth it unto the least of these little ones, doeth it unto Me." Surely there is no need to comment again on these sayings of Him who, in His infinite childlikeness, knew what must be the characteristics of His subjects, and declared plainly that whosoever should enter into the kingdom must become as a little child. One thing is certain, that those who are within that kingdom, or expect to qualify themselves for it, must learn something of the Divine sympathy with which Christ took the babes in his arms and blessed them. Thank God that there is so much of it in this great suffering city, and that on every hand we see efforts made for the rescue, the relief, and the nurture of sick and delicate children. Would that these efforts could relieve us from the terrible sights that should make us shudder as we pass through its tumultuous streets, and witness the suffering, the depravity, and the want, that comes of neglecting the cry of the little ones, and of those who would bring them to be healed and sanctified.

Only a few days ago I asked you to go with me to Ratcliff, to see the forty tiny beds ranged in the rooms of that old sail-maker's warehouse which has been converted into a Hospital for Sick Children. There is something about this neighbourhood of Eastern London that keeps us lingering there yet; something that may well remind us of that star which shone above the manger at Bethlehem where the Babe lay. The glory of the heavenly light has led wise men and women to see how, in reverence for the childlikeness, they may work for the coming of the kingdom, and those who enter upon this labour of love, begin—without observation—to find what that kingdom really is, and to realise more of its meaning in their own hearts.

To the cradle in a manger the wise men of old went to offer gifts. To a cradle I would ask you to go with me to-day; to a whole homeful of cribs; which is known by a word that means crib and manger and cradle all in one—"The Crèche."

There is something, as it seems to me, appropriate in this French word to the broad thoroughfare (so like one of the outer boulevards of Paris) out of which we turn when we have walked a score or two of yards from the Stepney Station, or where some other visitors alight from the big yellow tramway car running from Aldgate to Stepney Causeway. The Causeway itself is a clean quiet street, and is so well-known that the first passer-by can point it out to you, while, if the inhabitants of the district can't quite master the crunch of the French word, they know well enough what you mean when you ask for the "babies' home," or for "Mrs. Hilton's nursery." The home itself is but a baby institution, for it is only three years old, but it might be a very Methuselah if it were to be judged by the tender loving care it has developed and the good it has effected, not only on behalf of the forty sucklings who are lying in their neat little wire cots upstairs like so many human fledglings in patent safety cages, and for the forty who are sprawling and toddling about in the lower nursery, or the contingent who are singing a mighty chorus of open vowels on the ground-floor; but also in the hopeful aid and tender sympathy it has conveyed to the toiling mothers who leave their little ones here each morning when they go out to earn their daily bread, and fetch them again at night, knowing that they are fresh and clean, and have been duly nursed and fed, and put to sleep, and had their share of petting and of play.

The sound of the forty singing like one is not perceptible as we approach the house, which, with its large high windows open to the soft warm air, lies very still and quiet. The wire blinds to the windows near the street bear the name of the institution, and over the doorway is inscribed the fact that the Princess Christian has become the patroness of this charity, which appeals to all young mothers, and to every woman who acknowledges the true womanly love for children. Each day, from twelve to four o'clock, visitors are welcomed, except on Saturdays, when the closing hour is two o'clock, as, even in some of the factories down east, the half-holiday is observed, and poor women working at bottle-warehouses and other places have the happiness of taking home their little ones and keeping them to themselves till the following Monday morning. Do you feel inclined to question whether these poor toilworn women appreciate this privilege? Are you ready to indulge in a cynical fear that they would rather forego the claim that they are expected to assert? Believe me you are wrong. One of the most hopeful and encouraging results of the tender care bestowed upon these babes of poverty is that of sustaining maternal love, and beautifying even the few hours of rest and family reunion in the squalid rooms where the child is taken with a sense of hope and pride to lighten the burden of the day. Early each morning the little creatures are brought, often in scanty clothing, sometimes shoeless, mostly with a ready appetite for breakfast. Then the business of matron and nurses begins. But, come, let us go in with the children, and see the very first of it, as women, poorly clad, coarse of feature, and with the lines of care, and too frequently with the marks of dissipation and of blows upon their faces, come in one by one and leave their little living bundles, not without a certain wistful softened expression and an occasional lingering loving look.

The house—stay, there are actually three houses, knocked into one so as to secure a suite of rooms on each floor—is as clean as the proverbial new pin; and as we ascend the short flights of stairs, there is a sense of lightness and airiness which is quite remarkable in such a place, and is by some strange freak of fancy associated with the notion of a big pleasant aviary—a notion which is strengthened by our coming suddenly into the nursery on the first-floor, and noting as the most prominent object of ornament a large cage containing some sleek and silken doves, placed on a stand very little above the head of the tiniest toddler there.

There is enough work for the matron, her assistant, and the four or five young nurses who receive these welcome little guests each morning. The rows of large metal basins on the low stands are ready, and the morning's ablutions are about to commence, so we will return presently, as people not very likely to be useful in the midst of so intricate an operation as the skilful washing and dressing of half a hundred babies.

There is plenty to see in the neighbourhood out of doors, but we need not wander far to find something interesting, for on the ground-floor of these three houses which form the Crèche—the babies' home—provision has also been made for babies' fathers, in the shape of "a British Workman" or working-man's reading, coffee, and bagatelle room, with a library of readable books, and liberty to smoke a comfortable pipe.

Of the servants' home, which is another branch of this cluster of charitable institutions, we have no time to speak now, for our visit is intended for the Crèche, and we are already summoned to the upper rooms by the sound of infant voices. Doubt not that you will be welcomed on the very threshold, for here comes an accredited representative of the institution, just able to creep on all fours to the guarded door, thence to be caught up by the gentle-faced young nurse, who at one consigns the excursionist to a kind of square den or pound, formed of stout bars, and with the space of floor which it encloses covered by a firm mattrass. There, in complete safety, and with two or three good serviceable and amiably-battered toys, the young athletes who are beginning to practise the difficult feat of walking with something to hold by, are out of harm's way, and may crawl or totter with impunity. They have had their breakfast of bread and milk, and are evidently beginning the day, some of them with a refreshing snooze in the little cribs which stand in a row against a wall, bright, as all the walls are, with coloured pictures, while in spaces, or on low tables here and there, bright-hued flowers and fresh green plants are arranged, so that the room, necessarily bare and unencumbered with much furniture, is so pleasantly light and gay, that we are again reminded of a great bird-cage. Out here in a little ante-room is a connected row of low wooden arm-chairs, made for the people of Lilliput, and each furnished with a little tray or table, and, drumming expectantly and with a visible interest in the proceeding, sit a line of little creatures, amidst whom a nurse distributes her attentions, by feeding them carefully with a spoon, just as so many young blackbirds might be fed. Already some of the little nurslings are sitting up in their cribs, quietly nodding their round little heads over some cherished specimen of doll or wooden horse. One wee mite of a girl, quite unable to speak, except inarticulately, holds up the figure of a wooden lady of fashion, with a wistful entreaty which we fail to understand, till the quick-eyed lady who accompanies us spies a slip of white tape in the tiny hand, and at once divines that it is to be bound about the fashionable waist, as an appropriate scarf, and at once performs this finishing stroke of the toilet, to the immeasurable satisfaction of everybody concerned. This is in the upper room, the real baby nursery, where the age of some of the inmates is numbered by weeks only, and there is in each swinging cot a sweet sleepy sense of enjoyment of the bottle which forms the necessary appliance of luncheon-time. At the heads of several of these cots are inscribed the names of charitable donors, happy parents, bereaved mothers, sympathetic women with babies of their own, either on earth or in heaven, who desire to show gratitude, faith, remembrance, by this token of their love for the childlikeness of those they love and cherish in their deepest memories, their most ardent hopes. In more than one of the little beds there are signs of the poverty or the sickliness in which the children were born, and the effects of which this home, with its freshness and light and food, is intended to remedy. No cases of actual disease are here, however, since a small infirmary for children suffering from more serious ailments has been added to the institution, and the Sick Children's Hospital is but three street lengths distant.

The first most remarkable experience which meets the visitor unaccustomed to observe closely, is the freshness and beauty of the children in this place. Squalid misery, dirt, neglect, starvation, so disguise and debase even the children in such neighbourhoods, that squeamish sentimentality turns away at the first glance, and is apt to conclude that there are essential differences between the infancy of Tyburnia or Mayfair and the babyhood of Ratcliff and Shadwell. Yet I venture to assert that if Mr. Millais or some other great painter were to select his subjects for a picture from these rooms of the old house in Stepney Causeway, he would leave the galleries of Burlington House echoing with "little dears," and "what a lovely child!" and popular prejudice would conclude that from birth the little rosebud mouths were duly fitted with silver spoons instead of being scant even of the bluntest of wooden ladles.

(To be concluded.)

PATIENCE.

THE STORY OF A BLIND BOY. IN THREE PARTS.

PART II.

"SO the old un's off again, is he, lad?"

"You mean father's no' in? No, and I dunno' where he is or when he'll come, it's two day since I see him."

Bobby, like many other blind folks, always spoke of seeing people.

"Dunno' where he is? Why he's off to sea, to be sure."

"He didn't say good-bye to me!" answered Bobby, with flushed cheeks and a tremble in his voice, at the thought of his father having possibly gone off in such a heartless way, without making any plan for his being cared for during his absence.

"Forgot it, maybe!" was the blunt rejoinder from the unexpected visitor, Mr. Drane, carpenter, builder, undertaker, Phil Barber's master, landlord moreover of the now unprepossessing and dismantled-looking room which was all that remained to Bobby of home. "Well, child, he's off sure enough," resumed Mr. Drane, seating himself on the one comfortable chair remaining, with the air of a "monarch of all he surveyed;" "he's got another ship all in a hurry, I expect, but he's squared up right enough with me, and if I please to take the few remaining rattle-traps there are in this room, you may keep in it another ten days or so."

"And then!" inquired Bobby, breathlessly, his whole body quivering with suppressed excitement.

"Why, then you must shift for yourself, you know, and turn in somewheres else, you see, because I've made a bargain to sell the whole of this place, and it don't stand feasible that you could go on living here alone; it was all very well till your father came, but he aint stayed here, you see."

"But Phil Barber has always been here o' nights, and his mother and other good people come to look after me in the day."

"Well, my lad, it would be much better for an afflicted chap like you to have a room with one of them," said Mr. Drane, in a gentler voice, "much handier for other folks, wouldn't it, than their putting theirselves out like to look arter you? Oh, by-the-bye, I forgot, here's a slip o' paper father gave me for you, it's his good-bye, maybe—shall I read it to you?"

Bobby assenting, Mr. Drane read out: "'Mrs. Martha Ball, the Abbey, Laughton, get somebody to write to her and ask her to take charge of you, she'll do it maybe for her brother Jim.' Here, lad, take the paper, and get Phil or some one to write, and I dare say you'll have a comfortable home with Aunt Martha."

Young Barber came in just as the unwelcome visitor departed, and to him poor Bobby told all his sorrows. Phil, whose heart ached for the blind boy, dear to him for his own sake, as well as for that of his lost Jessie, listened sympathetically to the story, often interrupted by sobs, for Bobby felt very desolate indeed at the prospect of leaving the home in which he had known so many happy days, and where he seemed nearer to the dear ones in heaven than he could do in a strange place with an unknown Aunt Martha, to whom he would be a burden.

"P'raps mother 'll take you in, Bobby, there's a tiny room next mine we never uses for nothink; might be your'n for your things and your basket-making, and you could sleep there, and call me if you wanted, you know. Any way, cheer up, there's a good lad, and come and have a bit of supper with us, and remember to-morrow's Sunday. Give me that 'ere slip of paper, and we'll talk to mother about it."

Sunday was always a day for Bobby to look forward to, in spite of the taunts and sneers, and still worse language, in which his unhappy father had indulged, hoping to put a stop to his regular attendance at some place of worship with Mrs. Barber or other kindly neighbours, and on this particular Sunday a great deal was to happen for which he had reason to be thankful; for Sally had left word at her mother's with whom she had "a dish of tea," that after morning service Bobby and Mrs. Barber were expected to dine in the servants' hall at the "big house," where a lady who was visiting Captain Morland, and had purchased one of his baskets, wished to see him.

"What could it be for?" Bobby tried not to think very much about it in church, and at last succeeded when listening to some of the hymns he liked so much; then came the good old vicar's sermon, so earnest and loving, and at the same time so simple, that Bobby could find much to comfort him in it. It happened to be a charity sermon for the benefit of an orphan asylum, and the text, "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up," arrested the poor boy's attention at once. Yes, he knew it to be true, God would take care of him, and although only a poor blind boy, he was, as the vicar said, "sent into the world to do some good in it." God would watch over him, and, thought Bobby trustfully, "help me to earn a livin' some way."

After a very comfortable meal in the servants' hall, Mrs. Barber and her little charge were asked to "walk up-stairs," and shown into a room where were three ladies, Captain Morland, and the vicar whose church they had so recently left. Mrs. Barber did not always attend service there, as it was some distance from her home, but he had often exchanged a few kind words with her, and not so very long ago had prepared Sally for confirmation.

"So this is the little man who makes bead-baskets," he said, laying his hand kindly on the boy's curly head.

"I have not made many yet, sir," answered Bobby, shyly, "but I hope I shall sell some more."

"Would you like to learn to make other kinds of baskets, straw and wicker for instance, cages for birds, mats, brooms, and ever so many other things to sell?"

"Indeed I should if I could be teached!" said Bobby, eagerly, all shyness vanishing in his earnestness, "but you see I'm blind," he added, as though afraid his questioner had been unaware of that misfortune.

"Yes, my child," said a kindly voice, not that of the vicar, "but God has given you a pair of hands, which look made to be useful."

"And that indeed they are, ma'am," put in Mrs. Barber; "it's wonderful how clever-like and careful he is in handling things. He does my washing up for me a'most every day, and never broke a cup nor a plate yet."

"That's a good lad," said the vicar, warmly. "And you will be glad to know that we are talking of having a school opened in my parish entirely for blind boys and girls who want to learn to be useful. Captain Morland is going to help us, and a good friend of his, a lady here, who has founded a school and home in another part of the country proposes helping the Hampshire blind people in the same way, and living amongst us to teach them. Would you like to be a pupil?"

Tears came into Bobby's sightless blue eyes, so gentle in their expression, and he could scarcely say how much joy it would be to him. All at once his face clouded over as he whispered aunt Martha's name to Mrs. Barber; "should he be obliged to go and live with her—and if not, how was he ever to pay for his schooling?"

We need not record all the conversation that took place, or the arrangements that subsequently resulted from that Sunday visit to the big house.

(To be concluded.)

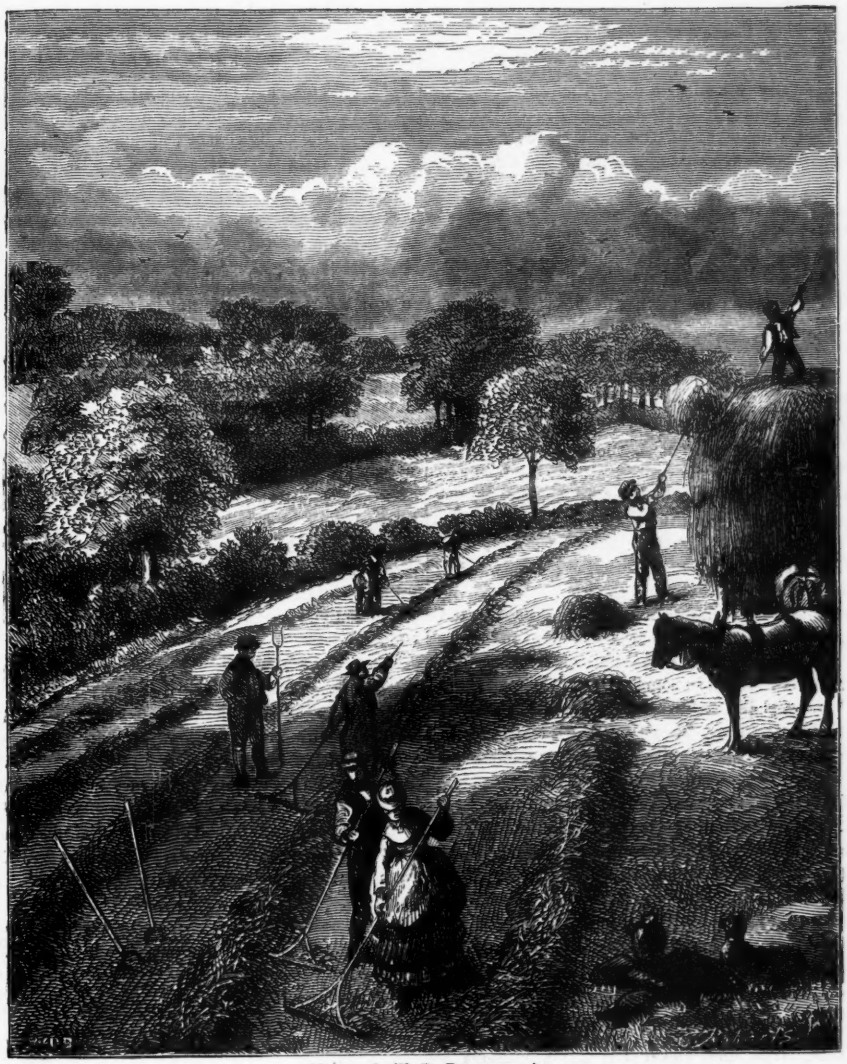
"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

293. "Lord, save me," said the Apostle Peter to the Saviour (Matt. xiv. 30). Is there any passage from which we may gather that St. Peter could swim?

294. How frequently is the term holy applied to a mountain in Holy Scripture?

295. Give two passages from St. John's Gospel which record the attempts made by the Jews to stone the Lord Jesus.



296. "Knowing," said St. Peter, "that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath showed me." Was the communication of our Lord to St. Peter uttered before or after Jesus was crucified?

297. It is distinctly stated by St. John in the Apocalypse whither Satan was cast when he was hurled out of heaven. Give chapter and verse.

298. Point out the particular statement of the Lord Jesus Christ's which first excited enmity.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 656.

277. John xvii. 3.
278. Luke viii. 4.
279. Numb. xii. 6; Job xxxiii. 15; Joel ii. 28.
280. 2 Sam. xvii. 19, 20.
281. Gen. iii. 15; xii. 3; xviii. 18; xxii. 18; xlix. 10.
282. Gen. xl. 20; Matt. xiv. 6.
283. St. John (John xxi. 7).

(Drawn by W. D. Blatchett.)

HAY-TIME.

BLOWN by chance across my way
Comes the sweet scent of the hay,
And in fancy I behold
Visions bright and manifold.

First a field of waving grass
See I in a vision pass;
While a carol clear and loud
Hails me from a golden cloud.

Then a mower, free and blithe,
Whistling o'er his gleaming scythe,
Keeping time, in sun and shade,
To the swinging of his blade.

Next a batch of village girls,
Rosy cheeks and dancing curls,
Busy hands and toil-embrowned,
Bright eyes glancing round and round.

Brawny men with dusty throats
Shouting in discordant notes;
Children running here and there;
Swallows skimming through the air.

Now a wagon on a road
Creaking with its welcome load,
Underneath an arch of trees
Swaying in the ev'ning breeze.

Ricks beside a straw-roofed farm;
Bees around it in a swarm;
Cattle housed in shed and stall—
Peace and plenty over all.

These and many more I see—
Pleasant sights they are to me—
Blown by chance across my way
With the sweet scent of the hay.

MATTHIAS BARR.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.
MAGGIE'S BIRTHDAY.

THE old man was failing fast, and both he and Maggie knew it. The latter never forgot that long dreary April in which she worked all day for food and shelter, and sat of an evening by her father's side talking in the twilight of sacred things. The conversation always took that turn now, each knowing why, and yet neither saying; each waiting—the one to die and the other to weep.

"Maggie," said the poor old man, kind-hearted and mistaken, and seeing it at last, "I wish I could live my life over again; I would act quite differently. I've been very foolish in some things, dear, and when I am gone I shall leave nothing for you, as I ought to have done, and you have been a great blessing to me. I wonder if we are punished for our mistakes, Maggie."

"No, daddy, God knows and understands——"

"I wish I had never borrowed the hundred of Bowden. That grieves me sadly, for he lent it so readily, and was generous over it. I'd give anything if that were paid!" and Maggie's heart echoed his words, though her lips made no reply.

Two days later Maggie was twenty-one, and, in accordance with a request she had received through Charley, she went to Miss Campbell's. The blind woman rose as she entered, and, stretching out her hands, welcomed her. She had always been fond of Maggie; and she said many kind words now in her grave, formal manner, which had, nevertheless, a lurking sweetness in it.

"I have hardly had a chat with you since I returned, my child; so let us have one now. I can scarcely believe that you are twenty-one. Do you know, my dear, I had always hoped that by the time you were that age you would belong to me—that you would have been Charles's wife."

"Oh, Miss Charlotte, he will be far happier with Hetty!"

"Yes, dear," she said, thoughtfully, "I think he will; she is more suited to him. You require a cleverer man than my nephew. He told me all about it, dear," and she put her hand softly down on Maggie's rumpled head; "and says that the reason he learnt to like Hetty was that she was always so ready to talk of you. Oh! here is Hetty, I think. My dear," she said, turning to the little dimpled girl, "we were talking of you and Charles, and how he first liked you because you were always ready to talk of Margaret."

"Yes," she laughed, "I was never able to tell Maggie about it myself, but that was the reason, and our common love for her drew us together, and I am not a bit jealous, you know, for he always says Maggie is his ideal and I am his reality, and so he can like us both, and no harm either," she said, in high glee. "And now I know Miss Charlotte wants to talk to you, Maggie, so I'll give you a hug because it is your birthday, and then be off; I've been here an age already;" and she gave her the hug, and departed.

"And now, Margaret, I want to give you these as a keepsake from me on your birthday," and Miss Campbell drew from the table a square case, and put it into Maggie's lap. "I had meant them for Charles's wife——"

"Then, dear Miss Charlotte, should they not be Hetty's?"

"No, they are for you. I am not poor in jewels," she added, getting back into her old formal manner again, "and there will be plenty for Hetty." Then Maggie slowly opened the case, and gave a little cry of wonder and joyful surprise.

"Oh, Miss Charlotte, how lovely!"

"My father gave them to me after my mother died; they were his gifts to her." Maggie bent down and kissed the blind woman's hands, which were resting in her lap, and then looked long and almost sorrowfully at her jewels.

"Miss Charlotte, are they not very valuable, and is not that one reason why you give them to me?"

"Yes, my dear."

"Are they worth more than a hundred pounds?"

"I do not know; but I should value them at much more than that sum," she said, stiffly, almost coldly, for she did not understand these questions. Maggie put the case down on the table, and, kneeling before the blind woman, said:—

"I want to tell you something, Miss Charlotte," she said, softly, a strange hope flashing upon her. "During these winter months we have been terribly poor. I never confessed it till now. I could not bear to do so. My father failed in health and strength, you know, and at first I could not get work to do, and sometimes we had scarcely bread to eat; but while my father did not know how near starvation was to us, I could never have told." She struggled for a moment to keep down her pride, and then went on. "It is better now, for I have pupils, and do not want help—nay, more, would not accept it, even from you," and she stooped and kissed the proud grave face. "But there is one debt we owe—it is a hundred pounds. I have no hope even of paying out of my own means; and, oh, Miss Charlotte, I would give the world to obtain it in time to pay it to the person to whom we owe it before he leaves England next month. He will never ask for it, but this debt worries my father and me sadly. I could never have told you this if you had not given me those jewels just now, and said they were worth so much."

"And you want me to give you the money——"

"No—yes," she was almost in despair, though Miss Campbell was stroking her hair in kindly fashion, but it was such a terrible trial to her pride. "I want you to let me have it, and keep the jewels until some day I shall have earned enough to redeem them, for the idea of possessing anything that is worth the money we owe, and not endeavouring to realise it, jars upon me, and does not seem right."

"You shall have the money, Margaret; I can afford it;" and she kissed the girl again, and brushed away the tears she felt rolling down her cheeks. "And you shall have the jewels too."

"No, no! I could not!" she answered. "I value your gift dearly, Miss Charlotte, and I am as vain as most women, and like jewels; but keep them for me, and you will see that some day I shall redeem them. But let me feel that I have done something more than merely ask you for the money. I shall be so proud of them some day, and remember the blessing they brought me; and, oh! Miss Charlotte," and she clasped her hands, and tried in vain to control herself; "it has been so terrible to say all this! How can I ever thank you sufficiently?"

She almost flew back to the old man, and putting the notes into his hand, made him write at once to Stephen Bowden, returning the money, and thanking him for his kindness, and then she waited breathlessly for the acknowledgment, which she knew he must send. It would be something, she thought, even to see his handwriting again, and who knew what he might not say? Oh, that foolish Margaret!

CHAPTER XX.

NEWS.

HETTY and Charley came that evening, in honour of Maggie's birthday. The two suited each other perfectly, though Hetty's first attraction for her lover had been that she was as enthusiastic as himself about Margaret. In the winter-time in Scotland it had dawned upon him how much more at home he was with her than with her cousin. "There isn't any one like Maggie," he thought; "but I can't talk of all those musty old things she likes, and I should feel such a fool all my life if I married her;" and so gradually he thought it would be very nice if he and Hetty were always together. "She's so jolly, and she knows all about Maggie," and so it was it came about.

"Do you know, Maggie dear," Hetty said, with the characteristic liberality of people in love, "I cannot think how it was you liked Stephen better than Charley." The two girls were sitting alone together in the twilight, as they had done once before. "Charley is so amusing. Why, you and Stephen were often together and never talked at all."

"It was that which was so pleasant," answered Maggie, musingly. "That silence which falls between people who understand each other—a silence in which each, perhaps, thinks independently, and yet is conscious of the other's presence, and as to all about them, they know that they see, and hear, and feel together, and so have no occasion to discuss each common sight and sound—words would only be terribly in the way."

"But were you never dull?"

"No, never, because there was perfect sympathy between us, which, you know, I think as necessary as love between two people who have to be much together, for without it love often wears itself away for want of a support. Charley felt the want of it in me, even when he liked me best, and we should have been a life-long disappointment to each other. He felt the charm of it in you, dear, for you can talk and laugh together as we never could, and so out of that feeling love has grown."

"Well, then," said Hetty, with a sigh, "I wish Stephen had not had such a disagreeable nature."

"It was his manner, not his nature," Maggie answered, "and the two are vastly different. We often wear the one as a sort of garment to hide the other."

"Until it spoils it."

"Yes, perhaps, it does spoil it in the end, unless, like the garment, we can throw it aside."

"Do you care for him still, Maggie?"

"No," said Maggie.

"But you would again in a week."

"No, I should not," she answered, almost sorrowfully. "I shall never wonder when I remember how much I did care for him; but then it was before I thought he was capable of being what he has been. I admire him greatly in most things still, but as for being in love with him again—it is easier to build a new idol than to put a shattered one together again."

"But could you not build a new one?"

"No, never, as long as I live," she said, almost bitterly. "I expended all my strength upon that one; I could never care for or thoroughly believe in any one again. One seldom climbs the height twice, Hetty dear, and I could never get back the feeling I had for him, or give it to any one else in the world. So" (and she laughed as she rose and led her cousin back to the sitting-room), "Margaret Ashbury will be a spinster to the end of her days."

"Maggie, here is a letter for you from the Academy," the old man said, as she entered.

"For me! Oh, it is to say the picture is rejected, of course. I did not know they sent a notice." She opened it with a forced laugh and a nervous trembling of the hand. "Charley, see what it is," she said. He took it up and read it, and then gave a jump like a big schoolboy. "Maggie's picture is accepted! Didn't I say so. Here's a notice to come and varnish. Bravo, Maggie! Behold the artist of the day!"

"Oh, Charley, pray don't be such a dreadful stupid," said Hetty, imploringly. "But let us see what it says." Then Charley condescended to read the formal notice.

"Why, they must have hung it near the line," said Maggie, "for they do not let those artists varnish whose pictures are skyed, Daddy," and she turned and kissed the old man. "Your portrait has been accepted, darling; it was all through your having such a grand old face, and not a bit through any merit of mine." But the old man had turned away after the first excitement of the moment, and the dull aching pain which had been in Maggie's heart so long came back again.

"Nothing rouses daddy now!" she said, sadly.

(To be continued.)

EXTRACTS FROM AN EXPOSITOR'S NOTE-BOOK.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, NOTTINGHAM, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC. ETC.

FREEDOM BY OBEDIENCE.

Ps. cxix. 45.

THERE can be no doubt, I think, that the writer of this psalm loved the law of God with a sincere and profound affection, although he took a very quaint way of showing his love. He said within himself, "I will write a psalm all about the Divine Law. My psalm shall have as many stanzas in it as there are letters in the alphabet. Each stanza shall consist of eight verses; each of the verses in every stanza shall begin with the same letter; and there shall not be a single verse in the whole psalm which shall not contain one of the names by which the Divine Law is known among us. The task will be hard, but God will help me to achieve it. And the harder the task, the more it will prove how much I love His law."

Now, when a man is so very ingenious, we are apt to suspect his ardour, and even his sincerity. And, indeed, the very inspiration of this psalm has been called in question on the express ground that it was not likely the wise Holy Spirit of God would move a man to write a fanciful and elaborate alphabetical acrostic, that He would only use simpler and more genuine forms of literature. But we must remember both that love is sometimes fantastic, and that there are periods in which literature takes quaint and ingenious forms without ceasing to be sincere. There was a time in our own national history when very sincere and devout poets—such as Dr. Donne, and Quarles, and George Herbert, for example—expressed their devotion in very quaint and elaborate devices. Custom made that familiar to them which is strange to us; the fashion of the age gave that a charm which to us is unattractive and even repulsive; and though we have gained in simplicity, who will venture to affirm that we serve God with a devotion more profound, or love Him with an affection more sincere, than the holy men whose names I have just mentioned? For us to construct "emblems" like those of Quarles would be an absurd affectation; but it would be still more absurd were we to conclude it an affectation in him, and to take his quaintness as a proof of his insincerity.

A very true and genuine love may, therefore, express itself in quaint devices and elaborate ingenuities of form. And hence, despite the alphabetical and other ingenuities of this psalm, we may well believe that its unknown author had a sincere love for that Divine Law of which he sang. Although he did not "walk in liberty," at least while composing his psalm, he nevertheless sought and loved God's commandments. David, in Psalm xix., wrote a larger because a freer song on the same theme; but, even in this cxix. Psalm, there are many verses as beautiful in form as they are true in substance: the writer of it shows that he had solved many spiritual problems, mastered many spiritual secrets.

(1) He had learned, for instance, that to obey is to be free; and this is a secret of the spiritual life of which, even in this late age, many good men have not possessed themselves. He affirms that only as we seek God's commandments do we walk in liberty—or, "walk at large," as the Hebrew phrases it, "walk in a wide space"—where there is nothing to check or hinder freedom of action; and, as we know, to "seek" God's commandments is to "find" them—for God is always found of them that seek Him—no sooner do we try to acquaint ourselves with His will, than we discover that we already know the rudiments and first elements of His will. No sooner do we know, or discover that we know, some parts of His will, than we seek to discover that which as yet we do not know. Seekers to the end, we are finders from the first. The further distances, the terminal miles of our journey, may be hidden from us; but there is light where we walk, and we can see where our next step should be planted, and our next. As we climb the steep of duty, the broad table-land at the summit of the mountain—to which our God Himself is sun and moon—and much of the prospect on either hand, may be concealed from us by driving mists, which yet have a beauty of their own; but for a little distance onward our path lies plainly before us, a track worn and smoothed by many feet, and at least the nearer prospect lies open to our view. If we are seeking God's commandments, we have found at least some of them, at least those which bid us seek, and are walking therein. And so far as we are walking in them, says the Psalmist, we walk in liberty. To obey is to be free.

Now, there are many secrets of the spiritual life which sound very mysterious when put into words, but which, nevertheless, solve themselves quite easily and happily in our actual experience. When, for example, we hear that, in the kingdom of God, in the spiritual realm, to serve is to rule, or that to lose is to gain, or that to suffer is to be blessed, or that to die is to live, or that to obey is to be free—all these axioms—for they are axioms—of the spiritual life, sound like paradoxes and contradictions; yet, if we accept them, and act upon them, we find that they are simply and accurately true. When we "serve" others, we find that we do "rule" both them and ourselves, that we can only serve them as we rule and deny ourselves, and that by serving we gain influence and authority with them. When we "lose" cheerfully much that we love, we find that we have "gained," and gained immensely, in force of character, in manliness, in consideration for our neighbours, in aspiration after brighter and more enduring good. When we "suffer" patiently, our suffering is "blessed" to us; we find that our sufferings have a cleansing and healing virtue; that to suffer is to be strong; that we can only reach the divinest joys as we pass to them through the dark avenues of sorrow and pain. When we "die" to sin, we "live" to righteousness; when we "die" to self, we "live" unto God; when we "die" out of time, we "live" in eternity. And, in like manner, when we "obey" we are "free;" we find, by happy experience, that we are never so much our own men as when we keep God's commandments; that we never get so much of our own best will, as when we do His will. Take the mere words—"We can be free only as we obey"—and they sound like a clear contradiction. But act on them; begin to keep God's commandments, and you find yourself, you know not how, in a happy liberty. The mystery clears off from them as you approach them. Life interprets and demonstrates the theorem that seemed paradoxical and absurd. How obedience sets us free may not be plain to our reason; we may not be able to put it into words: nevertheless, we have tested and verified it for ourselves, and know it to be true. Life takes up the harp of thought, smites its trembling chords, and, lo! all its murmuring and uncertain vibrations rise into clear musical tones, all its discords melt into harmony.

It is well, however, that the truths which life interprets should become clear to reason, that we should be able to put into words what we have put into our deeds, and found to be true, though once it seemed not true. And if we once get the clue, there really is no difficulty whatever in seeing, and saying, how it comes to pass that obedience is the only path to freedom.

No doubt this axiom, simple as it is, puzzles us all at times, and especially when we are young, and have not sat long in the school of experience. Then, our conceptions of "law" and "liberty" being as yet unperfect, we think of them as opposites. Law is restraint; liberty is freedom from restraint, and, therefore, freedom from law. How, then, can we rise through obedience to law into liberty? This problem, I say, sadly perplexes those who are young in thought, however old they may be in years, although the answer to it is so obvious, that one wonders how they can miss it.

For consider: if you want to master any art or craft, must you not serve and obey that you may master it? If you want to be a mechanic or an artist, you find that every craft, every art, has its rules, which rules are simply the results of long experience; they simply point out the easiest and best methods of—making a chair, let us say, or painting a picture. How are you to become a good carpenter or a good painter? by obeying those rules, or by disobeying them?—by using your tools or your brushes as the whim of the moment prompts, or by learning to use them according to the laws which wisdom and experience have laid down? You know very well that you must study and obey those rules, that you must faithfully and patiently serve them, if you would become masters in your art or craft. You know very well that, if you would become what we may call a free carpenter or a free painter—if, that is, you would do your work freely and happily, without so much as once thinking of the rules you nevertheless observe you can only rise to that freedom by having obeyed the rules so long and well that your obedience has come to be unconscious, automatic, and you do your work as one who follows an inward instinct, rather than as one who keeps an outward law.

It really does not matter into what province of life we go; everywhere the axiom holds good, that obedience is the only path to liberty. Look, for example, at that boy sitting at his school-desk, with the pen in his unaccustomed fingers. With what difficulty he frames a few letters, looking ever at his copy, blotting his book, inking his fingers, his straight strokes a waving line, his curves irregular angles, his whole body painfully sympathising with his laborious hand, even to the tongue which makes strokes and curves within his mouth. What a task is his! how many rules has he to observe! how often do his tears fall with his ink on the blotted page! and what a tyranny it seems that his natural liberty should be curtailed, and that he should be compelled to drudge at that weary work when he would so fain be playing in the fields! Yet only thus, only by long and painful observance of rules, can he become a rapid and masterly penman, writing without a thought of rule and filling his page with words that cost him no labour. And the axiom holds good in the spiritual as in all other provinces of life. Here, in this spiritual province, the end pursued is that we may become like God, the great perfect Spirit, that we may become good and pure and kind as He is; that, like Him, we may become perfect in kindness and purity and goodness. For the attainment of this end certain rules or laws are laid down, which rules God has revealed to us in the words and lives of the holy men who were before us, and, above all, in the words and life of his only perfect Son. These rules embody both the wisdom of God and the experience of the wisest and best of men, who have tried them and found them come true. They must be good rules, therefore; they must be infallible rules, although our interpretation of them may be imperfect. And we can only rise into spiritual life, and secure its end, as we obey these rules. If we would rise into free spiritual life, we must study and obey them till we can observe them, as by an inward spiritual instinct, without thought and without pain.

Mark how the skilled mason builds a house with a labour that is pleasant to him, and no longer irksome. He can whistle and sing, and laugh and talk, over his work; yet all the while his cunning dexterous hand is busy, and his heart takes satisfaction and a wholesome pride in the ease and certainty with which his work is done. The law of his work is in his heart, and therefore none of his strokes fail. The law is in his heart, made his by long obedience, and therefore he walks and works "at large." And only when, in like manner, the statutes of God have become our songs, shall we build up the edifice of spiritual character with happy freedom, in perfect liberty.

Thus, then, we may see, as well as feel, that obedience is freedom. The paradox—to obey is to be free—becomes as clear to our reason as it is true to our faith and experience.

(To be concluded.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

XI.—IN THE KINGDOM—(concluded.)

AT this Crèche at Stepney Causeway the reasons of the true childlike freshness, alacrity, and even the engaging impetuosity and loving confidence which characterise these little ones, is not far to seek. As you came up you noticed row after row of blue check bags, hanging in a current of fresh air on the wall of the staircase. Those bags contain the clothes in which these children are brought to the Home in the morning. They are changed with the morning's ablutions, and clean garments substituted for them until the mothers come in the evening to fetch away their bairnies, and by that time they have been aired and sweetened. It is noticeable that this has the effect in many instances of inducing the women to make praiseworthy efforts to improve the appearance of the children, and, indeed, the whole tendency of the treatment of the little ones is to develop the tenderness and love which lies deep down in the hearts of the mothers. Even the endearing nicknames almost instinctively bestowed upon the tiny darlings have a share in promoting this feeling, and the pretty rosy plump little creatures, or the quaint expressive bright-eyed babies, who are called "Rosie," "Katie," "Pet," "Little Old Lady," and so on, all have a kind of happy individuality of their own in the regards of the dear lady who founded and still directs the institution, and in those of the nurses who tend them. Sometimes the names arise from some little incident arising when the children are first brought there, as well as from the engaging looks and manners of the little ones themselves. "The King," is a really fine baby-boy, the recognised monarch of the upper nursery, but his sway is strictly constitutional; while a pretty little wistful, plump lassie, is good-humouredly known as "Water Cresses," and has no reason to be ashamed of the name, for it designates the business by which a hard-working mother and elder sister earn the daily bread for the family.

Did I say that the charge for each child is twopence daily? Nominally it is so; and let those who desire to know something of the real annals of the poor remember that even this small sum—which of course cannot adequately represent anything like the cost—is not easily subtracted from the scanty earnings of poor women engaged in slopwork, or selling dried fish, plants, crockery, and small wares in the streets, or going out to work in warehouses, rope-walks, match-making, box-making, and other poor employments, where the daily wages will not reach to shillings, and sometimes are represented only in the pence column. Let it be remembered, too, that the husbands of these women (those who are not prematurely widows, or whose husbands have not deserted them) are employed as dock labourers, and are often under the terrible curse of drink, or are in prison, while the women struggle on to support the little ones, who, but for this institution, would perhaps be left hungry, naked, and sickly, to the care of children only two or three years older than themselves; or would be locked in wretched rooms without food or fire till the mother could toil homeward, with the temptation of a score of gin-shops in the way.

Each of the bright intelligent little faces now before us has its history, and a very suggestive and pathetic history too.

Look at this little creature, whose pet name of Fairy bespeaks the loving care which her destitute babyhood calls forth; she is only ten months old, and her mother is but nineteen, the widow of a sailor lost at sea two months before the baby was born.

Katie, of the adult age of five years, is the child of a man who works on barges. Rosie, one of the first inmates, has a drunken dock-labourer for a father, and her mother is dead. Dicky represents the children whose father, going out to sea in search of better fortune for wife and children, is no more heard of, and is supposed to be dead. "The King" is fatherless, and his mother works in a bottle-warehouse. The pathetic stories of these children is told by Mrs. Hilton herself, in the little simple reports of this most admirable charity. They are so touching, that I cannot hope to reproduce them in any language so likely to go straight to the heart as that in which you may read them for yourself if you will either visit the Crèche, or send ever so small a donation, and ask for a copy of the modest brown-covered little chronicle of these baby-lives. Standing here in the two nurseries, where the dolls and Noah's arks, the pictures, and the doves, nay, even the baby-jumpers suspended from the ceilings, are but accessories to the clasp of loving arms and the softly-spoken words of tender womanly kindness, I wonder why all one side of Stepney Causeway has not been demanded by a discriminating public for the extension of such an institution. Loitering in the lower room, where one little bright face is lifted up to mine, as the tiny hands pluck at my coat-skirt, and another chubby fist is busy with my walking-stick, I begin to think of the workhouse ward, where mothers are separated from their children night and day; of a prison, where I have seen a troop of little boys, and a flogging-room provided by a beneficent Government for the recognition by the State of children who had qualified themselves for notice by the commission of what the law called crime.

A pleasant odour of minced beef, gravy, and vegetables, known as "Irish stew," begins to steal upon the air. The wooden benches in one of the rooms are suddenly turned back, and, like a conjuring trick, convert themselves into tiny arm-chairs, with convenient trays in front for plates and spoons. The little voices—forty like one—strike up a fresh chant, and a whisper of rice-pudding is heard. So we go out, wondering still, and with a wish that from every nursery where children lisp "grace before meat," some gracious message could be brought to aid and strengthen those who believe with me that the most profitable investment of political economy, the most certain effort of philanthropy, is to begin with the men and women of the future, and so abate the fearful threatenings of coming pauperism, and the still more terrible menace of a permanent "criminal class."

The policy of the authorities, says Mrs. Hilton, in her interesting narrative of the Crèche, in stopping out-door relief to poor widows with children is causing much sorrow. The 2s. 6d. or 3s. received from the parish secured their rent, and they managed, with shirt-making or trouser-finishing, to earn a bare subsistence; but now the battle for a mere existence is terrible. Doubtless, the children would be better cared for in the House, but mothers cannot be persuaded to give them up. One such case has just passed under my notice; but the woman shall speak for herself. "'Oh, Mrs. Hilton, they have taken off my relief!—I, with four little ones who cannot even put on their shoes and stockings. They offer me the House; but I never can give up my children. Look at baby; he is ten months old; his father died of small-pox six months before he was born; he was only ill five days.' I told her I was afraid she would not be able to earn enough to keep them all. 'Well,' she said, "I must try—I will never go into the House.'"

"But these women have very little feeling for their children, they are so low and brutalised." Are they? Let those who think so visit this Cradle Home, and witness the bearing of the mothers who come to take their little ones home, or to nurse the sucklings at intervals snatched from work. Let them hear what such poor women will do for children not their own, even to the extent (as recently took place, in one instance, at least) of sharing with their less necessitous babes the natural sustenance that the mother cannot always give.

Sixty-five children received daily, and a hundred or more on the books, with space needed for many more than can be admitted; children who, some of them infants as they are, have learned to lisp profane oaths and babble in foul language, and to give way to furious outbursts of passion, the result of neglect and evil example, and the life of the street and the gutter. It is but a short time, however, before this strange dreadful phase of the distorted child mind disappears, and the pet name is bestowed along with the gentle kindness that obliterates the evil mimicry of sin. The baby taken home from this purer atmosphere of love becomes a messenger of grace to many a poor household, as the short annals of the Crèche will tell; and even the pet names themselves are adopted by the mothers in speaking of and to their own children. One short story from the first report sent out by Mrs. Hilton, and we will go our way with a hope that some words of ours may win a fresh interest for these little ones.

"A precious babe died, and the mother, too poor to bury it, sent for a parish coffin. The child was very dear to us, and we had named her our nursery Queen, which had degenerated into 'Queenie.' It was a sore trial to us to see the golden curls mingled with sawdust, which is all that was placed in the coffin; and yet we could not spend public funds on the funeral, and feared to do it privately. In a few hours a mother came and said, 'Come and look at your Queenie now.' We went, and saw that loving hands had softened all the harsh outlines. A little bed and pillow had been provided, a frill placed round the edge, and some children had lain fresh-gathered flower on the darling's breast. The cost had been 9½d., paid for by those mothers, and although so freely and lovingly given, it was the price of more than a meal each."

If every mother in London with a well-stocked larder would give the price of a meal for the sake of a living child—but, there! my duty is not to beg, but to describe.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XXX.

WHEN Humphrey Atherstone left Mr. Trafford's house, after having held with him the interview we have recorded, he felt almost as if he had entered into a new sphere of being, where he was as yet a stranger. All the future was changed before him—his home, his people, would be rent away from him as the kingdom was rent from Saul in the day of his error and defeat; and he who had lived all his life in luxury, with somewhat of the feudal state of his ancestors, would be left, with only the slender provision his father had inherited as a younger son, to find a profession and a home for himself as best he might. And under such circumstances what chance had he of winning Una Dysart from her friends? Was it not indeed possible that she herself might refuse him the love that once she had surely given, not because of his change of fortune—she was too noble, too pure-hearted to be moved by such a cause—but because she would learn his failure in justice and in honour, and might cease to deem him worthy of the precious gift of her affections? This much was plain, however, he could have no right to ask her again to give herself to him till he had accomplished the restitution of the estates, and could stand before her and her friends under no false colours, with little perhaps to offer her, but that little justly his own, and at least a stainless name, cleared from the dark suspicions which hung around it now.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"Found them walking together in the avenue."—p. 700.

One great fear had risen up dark and menacing before Humphrey Atherstone, in the very first hour when he had recognised that restitution was required of him by all the laws of justice, and that if he failed in it he was for ever dishonoured in the sight of God and man. He feared that by his own deed he had perhaps made this reparation of his errors an impossibility; he might never be able to find Edward Atherstone again.

The dread of this possible retribution, just as he could not but acknowledge it would be, goaded Humphrey Atherstone to immediate action, and the very day he saw Trafford he obtained the name of a suitable agent in Sydney, and telegraphed to him such instructions as he thought most likely to ensure his cousin's speedy return home. The man was to seek out Edward, who could only have arrived from England a short time previously, and he was to inform him that he had been recognised as the son of Maurice Atherstone, and the heir of his estates, and that he was requested to return home at once to take possession of them.

Then Humphrey waited day after day with the keenest anxiety for the answer. When at length, after a somewhat tedious delay, it arrived, his hands literally shook, strong man as he was, while he opened it. It proved to be hopelessly unsatisfactory. The agent had ascertained that Edward landed at Sydney from the ship whose name Humphrey had telegraphed to him, accompanied only by his little boy; there had been fever on board, and several passengers had died, amongst them Ashtaroth, Edward's wife. He had remained only a few days in Sydney, and had then gone with his child into the interior of the country, along with some persons whose acquaintance he had made on board; from that point all trace of him was completely lost. The agent had made every possible inquiry in vain, and he could do no more.

It was evening when this telegram was brought to Atherstone; he stood by the window to catch the failing light upon its lines, and when he had read it through he let it drop from his hand to the floor; then he raised his dark mournful eyes to the dim sky with an appealing glance, for he was learning even then the bitter lesson that repentance, however true and deep, is not enough to ensure the power of reparation for an error; if once we depart from rectitude and justice, it may be that never on this side of the grave will it be permitted to us to remedy the evil we may have wrought, either to ourselves or to others. It was of Una that Humphrey thought as he stood gazing out on the sky, where not a star appeared, for his heart was wrung with the conviction that this telegram was the death-warrant of their mutual happiness. His memory flew back to the day when her bright presence came like a sunbeam into his old halls, and the echo of her happy childlike laughter rang as sweetest music through his home. How guileless and light-hearted she had been! how cloudless her soft brown eyes! how lovely and serene her winning face! and what if he had cast a shadow on that fair young life which he could never more dispel?—what if the wrong he had done his cousin was to recoil in bitter pain, not only on himself, but on her whom he would have shielded from sorrow with his life, poisoning all the springs of joy within her?—what if he who had done his utmost to win the love of her pure tender heart, was now compelled to turn away from her with closed lips, and never perhaps look upon her face again? Truly these were thoughts to shake a man's composure to the very centre, and the stamp of a mortal anguish was on his brow as he stood there facing his bitter destiny. But Atherstone was one who could well have endorsed the poet's lines—

> "Fallen cherub, to be weak is miserable > Doing or suffering——"

Though he had erred, he was strong—strong both to do and to suffer, and it did not take him many minutes to make up his mind as to the course he was bound to pursue. Ringing the bell, he ordered his horse to be brought round, and very soon Nightshade was bearing him at a rapid pace towards the Rectory.

He found Trafford seated in the midst of a group of rough unkempt-looking lads, whom he was teaching with the patience and tenderness of a father amongst his children, though the manner in which they were slowly ploughing their way through the first rudiments of knowledge must have been very trying to a man of his energy.

"I shall not detain you from your scholars more than a very few minutes," said Atherstone; "I only want to ask you a single question."

Trafford rose, and came out into the vestibule, shutting the door on his class, who were soon heard shouting and laughing with an unceremonious vehemence, which demanded that the gentle restraint of his presence should be restored as speedily as possible. In perfect silence Atherstone put the telegram into the clergyman's hands. Trafford read it, and then looked full into Humphrey's face with his eloquent eyes. He answered at once to their mute language.

"You think I ought to go to Sydney myself to seek out my cousin?" said Atherstone.

"I do," replied Trafford; "no one would prosecute the search with the energy and perseverance that you will be driven to give to it by the weighty reasons that you have for desiring that it should be successful. Heaven grant it may! for should it fail, your position would indeed be disastrous."

"It is that which I dread above all," said

Humphrey; "it would be the most terrible retribution that could befall me. I will go, Trafford, but it must be on the condition that you will take care of my people in my absence."

"That I will gladly," he answered, heartily.

"I will leave ample means with you to supply their wants, and I can place the Abbey under the care of my faithful old servants. But, Trafford, with you alone must rest the secret of my painful exile. I have not touched a shilling of the revenues of the estate since I determined to restore it to the rightful owner, and if I possibly can I shall refund even the arrears that are due to him, but it would be very injurious to the interests of the tenantry that the truth should be known while I am in my present uncertainty. Do not suppose that I intend ultimately to conceal the fact of my great error; I shall tell all whom it may concern the whole circumstances of the case so soon as I have found Edward Atherstone; and until I have found him I shall not return to England."

"You are right, Atherstone," said Trafford, warmly grasping his hand; "and that being the case, you may carry a light heart even under your load of care. You will not doubt that you have my deepest sympathy, and of course I need not say that your secret is safe with me; but let me give you one piece of advice—do not delay starting on your search an hour longer than you can help; every day that passes without your cousin being found will render it more difficult to trace him. In your place I think I should set out to-night," he added, with a smile.

"To-night!" exclaimed Atherstone, while his brows contracted with sudden pain. For a moment he did not speak; then he said, "Not to-night, Trafford, that is an effort beyond me for reasons I cannot explain; but soon, do not doubt it; knowing, as you do, all that is at stake for me in this search, you may be very sure that I shall not postpone it longer than is necessary."

"Well, the sooner you are gone the better; but, meantime, the experiment of a republic in the next room seems to be of doubtful success, so I think I must go back to my charge. Good-night, and God be with you!"

So they parted; but as Atherstone rode away from the door he did not turn towards the Abbey, but took the way to Vale House. Trafford's counsel to him to start on his distant journey that same night had seemed like a stab into his very heart, for he felt that it was beyond the power even of his iron will to leave England without looking once again on the face of Una Dysart. He knew, with bitter, almost maddening regret, that he could give her no explanation of his departure, and that he could make no renewal of his entreaty to her to become his wife; but he must at least let her read in his eyes that, whatever might be the cause which parted them, it was not because he had ceased to love her. He galloped up at once to the house which he knew was soon again to be her home, and inquired from the servants there when they expected Miss Dysart and her aunt to return. The day fixed was at once named to him—exactly ten days from that time. Then Atherstone turned and rode home, resolved that he would see her just once, and then he would turn away from the sight of her sweet face, and depart on his bitter pilgrimage, bearing her image in his heart, and certain that he could know neither peace nor joy till the day came, if ever it did, when he should be able to take her by the hand once more.

But Atherstone did not calculate on the malice of one cold-hearted woman, which, as we have seen, thwarted fatally the last and only chance he had of ascertaining Una's real feelings. In that final interview, when Miss Grubbe caused the carriage to dart on with such speed that he himself was nearly flung into the road, he got one last glimpse of the lovely face—white, and startled-looking—and then it vanished from before his longing eyes, and he felt, as he turned away heartsick and well-nigh hopeless, that the very light of his life was for the time at least utterly extinguished.

CHAPTER XXXI.

And Una, how did it fare with her that same night, while Humphrey Atherstone stood on the deck of a vessel bound for Sydney, and watched the shores of England receding from his view? Poor child! her trial was greater far than his; for he at least knew wherefore it was that they were parted, and he had the approval of his own conscience to temper the keenness of his suffering; but for her all was bewilderment and misery, with a strong underlying consciousness that she had done a grievous wrong in withholding from him the momentous letter she had received from Miss Amherst; yet of this she did not even now repent, although the sense it gave her that she could no longer stand in unblemished integrity before her God, deprived her of the consolation which in this dark hour she might have found in the heavenly hopes that, like the stars, shine ever brightest when the earth has deepest gloom; rather was it her one comfort that she had saved him the pain which she believed that letter would have caused him.

The fact, however, that she supposed Humphrey Atherstone to be in perfect ignorance of his cousin's rights prevented her from imagining that his sudden departure for Australia was in any way connected with Edward, and the consequence was that she attributed it to a cause which above all others was bitter and painful to her tender heart. She concluded that his affection for herself had either died out, or been replaced by a deeper love for some more attractive woman, and that his purpose in leaving his home for so distant a journey immediately on her return, had simply been to put an end decidedly to his former connection with her, and to the expectations it must have excited in her mind.

He could not but be aware, from the terms on which they parted at the time of her father's death, that she must anticipate a renewal of his petition to her to become his wife; if he no longer desired to win her, how could he meet her continually without some explanation, and how could he explain, without insulting her, that he had simply ceased to love her? It seemed to her that if this were indeed the case, he had no alternative but to take refuge in flight, and to remain absent till his own marriage or hers to some other person should wholly blot out even the memory of the past. So far as Una was herself concerned, she knew that her unreserved affection for Humphrey Atherstone was the one love of her life, and that not only no other man could win the heart she had given to him once for all, but that she could never cease to be as entirely devoted to him as she was at that hour, even though she knew him to be false and changed.

This indomitable constancy would to many women seem quite incomprehensible, for the conviction, such as Una possessed, that they were forsaken, would be sufficient in most cases to turn their affection into hatred for the man who had betrayed them; but there are some natures—rare and precious as the jewels of purest water that are found among inferior stones—whose changeless truth to the love of their first allegiance can never be shaken while life endures, however cruelly it may be assailed, and of such was Una Dysart; still, though she knew she never could love Atherstone less, or share with any other the life that would have been so blest with him, she was keenly alive to the bitter humiliation which had been brought upon her by his desertion. But here the proud spirit of her race came to her aid; she inherited the high-toned qualities of a long line of ancestry, and knew well how to bear herself with the haughty delicacy of true maidenly self-respect. She knew that her love was indestructible, and that, betrayed as it had been, it would lie as a canker in her heart so long as life should last, poisoning every joy and quenching every hope, but no human eye should ever see it, no pity for her rejected affection should ever bring the hot blood to her cheek. She would bury it finally from that hour in the depths of her own sad soul, and confront the world with a brave calm aspect, which should quell all suspicions of the truth.

Una carried out this resolution with a courageous firmness which effectually secured her object. In vain did Miss Grubbe's small eyes, full of a spiteful triumph, try to read the hidden pain in the fair proud face; in vain did even her aunt, whose cold nature had been stirred by some slight uneasiness as to her own treatment of her niece, look for traces of sorrow; there was no gloom on her tranquil brow, no tears in her soft brown eyes, and she quietly resumed her usual habits of life and her intercourse with her neighbours, as if her happiness had received no shock, excepting that which had been occasioned by the death of her father. Yet her friends were conscious of a change in her, which they could not define; her smile was as frequent and her manner as gentle and sweet as it had ever been, but she was no more like the bright impulsive Una of the previous year than the white frozen streamlet is like the sparkling summer brook, that danced in the sunshine and rippled its laughing waters over the shining stones with a ceaseless song. Still she was as much as ever a favourite in the neighbouring houses, and she systematically accepted the invitations made to her, both for the sake of appearances, and also because she was glad to have her thoughts drawn away even for a short time from the one bitter subject which always occupied them in the dull monotony of her home. Her chief solace, however, was being again with Wilhelmina Northcote, to whom she had become much attached in their former intercourse, and whose parents were both very kind to her now. No doubt the breaking off of her connection with Atherstone had partly occasioned Mrs. Northcote's softened demeanour, but Una soon became convinced that there were other causes for it also. She noticed with pain that there was a certain gloom hanging over the household, which had not existed formerly, and which various little circumstances showed her to be in some way connected with Rupert, the only son of the house. He was no longer there; his name was never mentioned by any member of the family; and an accidental allusion which Una once made to him brought so painful a flush over little Wil.'s pretty face, that she was very careful never to speak of him again.

There was one element of cheerfulness at Northcote Manor now, however, which Una, from the very failure of her own happiness, was the more delighted to perceive—for it was caused by the frequent presence of Hervey Crichton, whose frank friendly manner to herself showed that he had completely overcome the disappointment she once had occasioned him. His regiment was stationed only a few miles off, so that the absence of his brother from the Rectory did not prevent him coming to the Manor as often as he pleased.

Una remarked on his constant visits one day to Miss Northcote, when she had found them walking together in the avenue with Hervey's well-trained horse following behind as obediently as a dog. After a few words to herself, he had mounted and ridden away; and then Una looked round with a smile into the piquante face of her companion.

"How singularly often I meet Mr. Crichton here," she said; "you find him very pleasant, do you not?"

"Of course I do, there is no mistake about it; we are particular friends, he and I," replied Wil., boldly.

"Only friends, Wil.?"

"Oh dear yes, only friends, but quite confidential. You know he has told me all about you, Miss Una, and how badly you have behaved to him."

"Have I?" said Una, laughing; "I believe, if you were to ask him now, he would own that he was very much obliged to me for not having prevented him from trying whether you would behave any better."

"If it were so, Una, I do not think I need feel indignant at only coming after you, because you are so good and so beautiful, and I am such a little monster. But I solemnly assure you he has not said a word on the subject yet."

"Not yet; no, I dare say not; naturally it will take him some time to make up his mind to such a monster. But seriously, Wil., I am so glad, for I like him much, and I love you dearly, and I want you both to be happy, if happiness is possible in this strange world."

"Oh, Una, what a sad speech! That is very unlike what you would have said last summer, when you were always so merry. Of course I know what a loss you have had since then; but still I hope you have no cause to doubt the possibility of happiness for yourself?" and Wil. looked at her anxiously.

"Why should you imagine such a thing?" answered Una, with a vivid blush; then hastily changing the subject, she said, "but let us leave Mr. Crichton for the present, Wil., for I have always wanted to ask you some day, when we were alone, to tell me the truth about poor Lilith Crichton; beyond the fact that her brother has taken her away for her health, and that they are established at Torquay, I cannot get any reliable information about her at all. She wrote me a few lines, very sweet and loving, not long ago, but begged me not to expect to hear from her again, as she was too weak to write—yet no one seems to give her illness a name."

"It would not be easy to do so," said Wil., with a sigh; "it is not consumption, as people said it was—that at least I know."

"Do you think she is seriously ill?" asked Una.

"Ill! I think she is dying," said Wil., sadly.

"Dying! but of what malady? there must be some cause," said Una.

"If you want to know exactly what I think, Una, I believe she is dying of a broken heart. I used always to fancy such cases only existed in novels; but I am quite convinced now that human beings can die from such a cause, and that Lilith will. The doctors say she has literally no complaint, except prostration and failure of the vital powers; but at the same time they have given up all hopes of her recovery."

"Is it possible! Dear sweet Lilith! I had no idea her case was hopeless; it seems terrible to think of her suffering so much grief as even to die of it; but what has caused it, Wil.? what is the meaning of it all?"

She drooped her head without answering, and as Una turned, surprised, to look at her, she saw that tears were raining from the dark eyes, usually so bright and merry.

"Oh, darling Wil! forgive me for asking you; I did not know it would distress you so!"

"The subject is a very painful one to me, Una, but I cannot enter on the causes that have made it so, I am not sure that I understand the whole truth myself; but of one fact I am convinced——You remember the cricket match, do you not?"

"Oh yes, most clearly."

"Well, on that day some terrible blight seemed to fall on Lilith Crichton, beneath which her life has wasted away, as if the very springs of her existence had been poisoned at their source. A great shadow fell over her then, which has deepened and deepened till it has become the shadow of death, and in death it will end." Wil. spoke so sadly, that Una shrunk from asking further questions, and only said softly—

"Dear Lilith! I wish I might hope to see her once again; she was so wonderfuly good and sweet, I always felt it made me better only to be with her."

"Yes," said Wil., with a sad smile, "Lilith will be with congenial companions when she is taken to be among the angels of God, so I suppose we must not grudge her to them," and, dashing the tears from her eyes, she made an effort to change the conversation.

Una said no more, but she went home thoroughly convinced that the fatal change in poor pretty Lilith was due in some way to Rupert Northcote.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XIX. CHRIST DEALING WITH INDIVIDUALS. No. 2—NICODEMUS.

Chapter to be read—John iii. 1—21.

INTRODUCTION. Ask the children to whom Christ came, and for whom He died. To what people did He go first, and why? How was He received by the Jews (John i. 11)? but especially rejected in Jerusalem. What kind of people would be found in the capital? Remind of the scribes summoned by Herod (Matt. ii. 4); the council of chief priests and rulers assembled (Matt. xxvi. 57). Now one of these very rulers comes to Christ.

I. THE VISIT. (Read iii. 1, 2.) Ask which people mostly followed Christ. Remind of the multitude without food; the poverty of most of the disciples; the common people assembling to hear Him gladly also, what did Christ profess to be? Not merely Saviour but teacher. Refer to His beginning His ministry by preaching repentance (Matt. iv. 17). Also to Sermon on Mount; (Matt. v., vi., &c.) Now a Jewish teacher claiming Him as brother comes to see and hear Him. Picture the interview. Christ as yet known only as the carpenter's son; probably in some poor lodging in a back street in Jerusalem resting after day's work; knock at the door; learned ruler (or Rabbi) enters; face partly concealed—anxious to escape recognition; welcomed; invited to sit down; conversation begins. Let the children notice three things. (1) He was in earnest. Christ was now a wonderful man; had worked many miracles; taught openly; every one was talking about Him; How few cared to inquire further. Nicodemus had been impressed; seed had dropped in heart; not caught away at once (Parable of Sower); wanted to learn more, so took some trouble to come to Christ, and subsequently became a true disciple. (2) He was cautious. Why did he come by night? of whom was he afraid? Did Christ reprove him? then we need not. Better to come timidly than, like the others, not at all. Was he always timid? See John vii. 50, 51, where he spoke boldly for Christ in the council, and xix. 39, where, when all disciples had forsaken, he boldly showed his devotion. (3) He was respectful. Remind of way so many asked questions of Christ—rudely, mockingly (John vii. 25, 30, &c.); Nicodemus asked humbly, inquiringly, as if really wishing to learn. Therefore received honour of long private conversation with Christ.

Practical. Let the children see the advantage of learning about Christ. Nicodemus' character strengthened. Let children begin well; like Timothy, learn from childhood; will know God, and learn more to love God; be strengthened in temptations; able to confess Christ boldly at home, school, and work.

II. The new birth. (Read 3—11.) About what does Nicodemus ask instruction? Under whose power were the Jews? What did the wise men ask as to the babe born (Matt. ii. 2)? On what charge was Christ accused before Pilate (Mark xv. 2)? So Nicodemus inquires about the kingdom; just as disciples did before Ascension (Acts i. 6). So Christ shows the nature of God's kingdom. The Jews expected a temporal king; this kingdom spiritual—i.e., over souls of men. (See John xviii. 36.) Notice two things (1) The nature of the new birth. What birth did Nicodemus think was intended? How is this birth like the other? It begins new life: a baby comes into new world; perceptions developed gradually; requires food, nurture, &c. So in spiritual life: soul becomes changed. What change had John the Baptist taught? Repentance means change of mind. How is it shown? What is the outward sign of Christian profession (Matt. xxviii. 19)? Remind of John baptising; Peter on Day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 41). But is this all? What causes change of life? The influence of the Holy Spirit upon our hearts. (2) The continuance of the new life. What is it compared to? (ver. 8). Let the children name some of the properties of the wind. (a) It is invisible: can be heard, felt, but not seen. So with Spirit in heart; can hear "still, small voice." What does it speak by? Can feel its working—touching conscience, &c., but not see it. (b) It is powerful. How does the wind blow? Describe it on a spring day, soft and balmy; then in a storm, rooting up trees, &c. Remind of Lydia; heart softly opened to receive Paul (Acts xvi. 14). Also of the Day of Pentecost; how many converted? So always; feel soft daily influences in heart. Sometimes strong stirrings of conscience—e.g., gaoler at Philippi (Acts xvi. 30).

Practical. Bring home to children—Is the Holy Spirit influencing hearts? Is always striving: is He resisted or sought? This a test as to whether are truly God's children (Rom. viii. 14, 16).

III. The plan of salvation. (Read ver. 13—21.) Ask for the story of the brazen serpent (Num. xxi. 9). Describe the scene. Israelites lying about bitten by snakes; in agony; many dying; Moses coming forward, erecting brazen serpent, issuing command, "Look and live." Incredulity of some; apathy of others; faith of many; turning eyes as commanded—at once whole. Show the resemblance. Christ, who did no sin, treated as if had sinned (Rom. v. 17, 18); commanded "believe and be saved" (Acts xvi. 31, Rom. v. 1). Make the children show the contrast; deliverance from bodily pain and death of the Jews; deliverance from eternal death of all. Also the unconsciousness of the brazen serpent contrasted with the voluntary sacrifice of the Son of God. Show how simple is God's plan of salvation. His justice satisfied by death of Sinless One; man's part to accept offered salvation. Do all do so? For what will they be condemned (ver. 19)? How is true faith shown (James ii. 20)? What work must all do first? Giving up sin as hateful to God, and cause of Saviour's death. So close connection between repentance (or new birth), faith and holiness. What is our belief? merely words? or deeds which will bear the light (ver. 21)? Then the new birth will be manifest; men will see that we are born of the Spirit.

Questions to be answered.

1. Show the progress in the character of Nicodemus as seen on the three occasions on which he is mentioned.
2. What two things may be noticed in his visit?
3. How is a change of heart like a birth?
4. How does the Holy Spirit resemble wind?
5. Give the story of the brazen serpent.
6. What does Christ say about faith?

PATIENCE.

THE STORY OF A BLIND BOY. IN THREE PARTS.

PART III.

AUNT MARTHA, now first informed of her sister-in-law's death, obtained a fortnight's holiday from the owners of Laughton Abbey, to whom she had been for many years housekeeper and confidential servant, and energetically set to work to do the best she could for her blind nephew. She called on the dressmaker now carrying on business in her sister-in-law's rooms at Southsea, and found there were many little sums of money due from customers for goods supplied by Bobby's mother, which her successors had not been authorised to collect. All the money that had come in, and a certain amount which she had promised to pay for the business, had been carefully put by for the blind boy, whose mother, in her last illness, had communicated all her wishes to her assistant, Mrs. Betts, on the subject, begging her to keep the money from her husband, if possible, and not name that she had it till he was off to sea again, and Bobby alone. This was unexpected good fortune. The vicar and other friends decided that a certain sum should be paid in to a savings-bank for him in case of future illness, or incapacity for work; also, as it was his own wish, and he was not really a pauper child, that he should pay something towards his education at the school where he would have board and lodging, and be, as his aunt felt, far happier than he could be with her, although, under other circumstances, she would readily have taken charge of him herself at Laughton Abbey, with her master's sanction. Bobby's favourite chair and table were re-purchased for him, and taken care of by Mrs. Barber, to whom, at his request, mother's work-box, Jessie's inkstand, and a few other family treasures were given.

But all these things happened long ago, for it is some years since the Hants and Isle of Wight School and Home for the Blind was first established in Park Lane, Southsea—years during which, in a quiet and unostentatious way, it has effected far more good than was ever anticipated by the foundress and her friends. Money has been scarce sometimes, and the funds at a terribly low ebb, for it is not a cheap charity to carry on with so little public support, but help, when most needed, has generally been forthcoming; and many a girl and boy, many an adult also, has been grateful for the teaching received there. Every year sees some new trade introduced, or increased accommodation for pupils provided. Visitors to the Isle of Wight, to Portsmouth and its neighbourhood, occasionally find their way to buy baskets, wicker cages, brushes, mats, &c., made on the premises. Not very long ago two ladies, anxious to see the institution, were taken through it by the foundress, herself an almost daily visitor. The matron, who is resident, was instructing a class of girls; some were knitting stockings, others reading around her. One pupil had a bead-basket in hand similar to those once made by Bobby Blake. In another room boys were occupied with rope-mat making, music was going on in a third apartment down-stairs where were an organ and piano. Concerts and readings are often held in this part of the building, the tickets of admission bringing in small but welcome additions to the funds.

The purchase of materials and the payment of instructors are large items in the expenditure, as may be supposed. All work by the blind connected with the institution is paid for on completion, but a rapid sale does not invariably follow, so that "straitened circumstances" are not unusual. More pupils, all lads, were in a room leading out into the garden, in which are various outbuildings for stores, also a separate class-room for adults. Here wicker-work of various kinds was going on, also chair-caning. Before a recently-commenced mat, suspended in a kind of frame against the wall, stood a tall delicate-looking young fellow, working with a sharp sort of instrument in his hand, under the direction of a teacher, who stood beside him, and occasionally guided his fingers. "Do not go too near," said the foundress to one of her visitors, "he is a nervous lad, new to this kind of work, and you might cause him to cut his fingers. He is getting on very well, for he is a quick industrious boy, and one of my earliest pupils, also a great favourite of mine. Do you know?" added the lady, as they passed out into the garden, "that youth earns fourteen shillings a week by his labour, and supports a crippled father, once a very good-for-nothing man, and now quite unable to work for himself; he fell from a broken ladder he had climbed for a bet when far from sober, and, after months passed in the infirmary, is now living very near the school, kept by the son whom he used formerly to taunt with his uselessness and infirmity."

And thus it was that Bobby had, by God's help, realised the one great wish of his life; indeed, had done more than he ever dared to hope—earned not only his own living, but enough to keep his father, now happily in many respects a very altered character to that of the reckless godless sailor introduced at the beginning of this story. The capital in the savings-bank has not as yet been touched, as Bobby is always thinking a rainy day may come, for he is not very strong, and might not be able to earn quite so much years hence as he does now. Y. S. N.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

299. Ezekiel has a remarkable statement respecting the burdensome nature of some portion of the law of Moses. Give chapter and verse.

300. Quote the exact words used by the Lord on the first occasion of His being sternly indignant with His opponents.

301. On what occasion did Jesus ask, "What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

302. State which of the Evangelists relate the feeding of the five thousand, and give the references.

303. We read in St. Matthew that "when the chief priests and scribes saw the wonderful things that Jesus did, and the children saying, Hosanna to the Son of David, they were sore displeased." To which of the Psalms did the Lord refer in His reply?

304. When our Lord asked His disciples, "Whom say ye that I am?" the words St. Peter used in reply are almost identical with those he uttered on another occasion when our Lord asked a different question. Quote the exact words.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 672.

284. Exod. xxix. 38—46.

285. "Put on Christ" (Rom. xiii. 14); "grow in Christ" (Eph. iv. 15); "learn Christ" (Eph. iv. 20).

286. St. Mark gives eighteen; St. Luke, nineteen.

287. Both Elijah (1 Kings xvii. 21) and Elisha (2 Kings iv. 35) used great supplication and prayer: but Christ (Luke vii. 14; Mark v. 41) instantly, by using but a single word.

288. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (i. 9)

289. When he was praying in the Temple in Jerusalem. See Acts xxii. 17, 18.

290. See Mark ix. 32; Luke ii. 50; xviii. 34.

291. "Behold, the name of the Lord cometh from far, burning with His anger, and the burden thereof is heavy: His lips are full of indignation, and His tongue as a devouring fire" (Isa. xxx. 27).

292. Balaam (2 Peter ii. 15; Numb. xxxi. 8); Achan (Josh. vii. 20—25); Ahab (1 Kings xxi.); Ananias and Sapphira (Acts v.); Judas (Matt. xxvi. 15, 47—50; Acts i. 18).

"THE QUIVER" FUND FOR THE RELIEF OF THE FAMINE IN BENGAL.

FIFTH LIST.

In presenting the fifth List of Subscriptions to the readers of THE QUIVER, the Editor cannot but again express his gratification at the ready response which has been made to his appeal. Further amounts received since the 4th of June will be acknowledged, and a complete balance sheet submitted to the subscribers as soon as possible.

	£	s.	d.
Amount previously acknowledged in first, second, third, and fourth lists ..	1970	8	10
Thos. Sisman, 55, Waterloo Street, Tipton, Staffordshire	0	8	0
W. O. B. Rhind, Torquay ..	0	5	3
J. F., Crainlington, Northumberland	0	1	0
A Reader of THE QUIVER at Blackheath, Kent ..	0	2	0
J. P., Wolverhampton	0	5	0
Mrs. J. C. Small, Bridgwater	0	9	0
Lucy Paget, one of the Inmates of Michael Yoakley's Charity, Margate ..	0	4	6
Wm. Stenhouse, 5, Park Side Street	0	15	6
Sarah S. Schofield, 59, Waverley Street, Hull	0	7	3
Bertha Risch, 9, Armstrong Terrace, Charlton, Kent	0	11	0
The Misses and Master Geddes, 26, Manor Road, Lewisham High Road, New Cross	0	8	3
O. W. J., London	0	2	2
A. W. A., Salisbury	0	4	3
Mary M. Guyatt, Padbury, Buckingham	0	2	6
Rev. Francis Bedwell, 11, Clytha Square, Newport, Mon.	0	10	0
P. L., Bilston	0	5	0
P. Boxhorn, Sevenoaks ..	0	3	6
Annie Smith, The Laurels, Offenham, Evesham ..	1	8	11
W. Gibson, Neva Stearine Works, St. Petersburg ..	8	7	3
Louie, Forest Hill, S.E. ..	0	14	3
Miss Sims, Ickham, near Wingham	10	0	0
Lucy B. J., Clifton, Bristol ..	0	8	0
Boys of Bloxwich National School, per W. A. Dunstone	0	13	0
L. C., Liverpool	0	2	0
Fanny C. Mitchener, 8, Gloucester Street, St. Paul's, Bristol	0	16	0
Carried forward £	1998	2	5

	£	s.	d.
Brought forward ..	1998	2	5
Willie Mayoss, Shirley, Southampton	0	10	0
Martha Robins, Tredegar Iron Works, Glan Rhyd ..	0	4	6
Richard Ainby, 5, Romney Place, Leeds	0	5	0
J. W. Mark, 23, Heywood Street, Cheetham, Manchester	0	7	2
A. M. C., London, N.	1	3	1
Emily Louisa Williams, Simon's Town, Cape of Good Hope	1	8	0
Miss Bodkin, West Hill, Highgate	1	1	0
Mary J. Edge, Stoke-on-Trent	0	14	6
R. A. L., Crewkerne, Somerset	0	4	0
Miss A. and M. Bennett, Ivy House, Redcar	2	17	0
R. S. P., Coleshill, Warwickshire	0	3	0
Henry Ottewell, 21, Siddal's Road, Derby	0	5	6
A. K. Harbord, Old Barracks, Fermoy, Co. Cork, Ireland	1	0	0
Master W. E. Frith, 21, Queen Street, Cefn, near Ruabon, North Wales ..	0	7	6
John S. Emery, 49, Belle Vue Road, Leeds	2	4	8
Annie Rosalie Vining, Newport, Isle of Wight	0	2	2
Frederick Henry Wright, New Park Street, Castle Fields, Shrewsbury .	0	3	1
J. P., Whitehall	0	3	0
John Hamilton, Crosshouse, Kilmarnock	0	7	6
Miss C. Matthews, Merton Watton, Norfolk	0	10	6
C. B., Ramsbury	0	3	6
From Six Poor Boys, Belfast	0	6	0
W. Heath, 5, Albert Terrace, Great College Street, N.W.	0	5	0
John Stephenson, Darwen ..	0	7	6
A. M., 59, Cadogan Place, Belgrave Square	0	5	0
Carried forward £	2013	10	7

	£	s.	d.
Brought forward ..	2013	10	7
Geo F. Watts, 20, Leipsic Road, Camberwell	0	4	6
Mrs. Delany, 60, Moss Lane West, Manchester	1	0	0
E. B. Whittle, M. S. & L. Railway Station, Gainsborough, Lincolnshire ..	0	6	3
Barbara Bewley, Edington Clara, King's County, Ireland	0	14	0
Peeps	0	10	0
H. D. C., 3, Marquis Terrace, Camden Square	0	5	0
J. B. A., Edinburgh	0	7	6
James MacKenzie, Bridgetown, Barbadoes, W. I. ..	1	0	0
Christopher Stone, Stoke Ilminster	0	5	6
Margaret Doble, Tysellach Cottage, Mylor, Falmouth	0	11	0
R. Ackle, Morpeth	0	1	11
S. L. Goodey, Wilton, Redcar, Yorks	0	8	0
A. Martin, Waterloo	0	10	6
E. S., Cheltenham	0	4	3
C. H., Ipswich	0	2	0
M. Rows, 11, Newton Street, New North Road	0	4	6
M. S. O., Junction Road, Upper Holloway	0	3	4
S. Waters, Post Office, Horsmonden	0	10	6
W. A. Cruickshanks, 4, Atholl Terrace, Edinburgh	0	7	6
E. E. Wright, 39, Gardner Street	0	6	6
A. C., Sunderland	0	4	6
Chrissie, Bessie, Joey, and Nellie Smith, Assembly Rooms, Ludlow, Salop ..	0	5	9
J. Durie, Ottawa, Canada ..	3	10	7
Miss Meta Dowie, Birkenhead	1	2	6
H. E. J., Islington, N.	0	5	0
J., London, S.E.	0	2	6
H., London, S.E.	0	2	6
Anne Smith, Bideford, North Devon	0	5	0
Anna Roberton	1	0	0
Carried forward £	2028	11	8

	£	s.	d.
Brought forward ..	2028	11	8
Catherine Roberton	1	0	0
Victoria Roberton	0	5	0
Robert H. Roberton	0	5	0
Georgina Murdoch, Nothiemay, by Huntly	0	8	6
A Reader of THE QUIVER, Hartlepool	0	0	6
James Morley, Diss, Norfolk	0	2	6
Rosy King, 2, Oak Villas, Gipsy Road, Lower Norwood	1	0	0
A Friend, Great Easton ..	0	9	6
Emma Peace, Hanover Sunday Schools, Stockport	0	15	4
Anonymous	4	0	0
Lavinia Rose, High Street, Ramsey	0	5	0
J. Y. Carrington, Bowdon College, Cheshire	1	13	0
Annie Gardiner, Ardleigh, near Colchester, Essex ..	0	10	0
Nine Sisters, Bridgnorth ..	0	4	6
E. W. Taylor, Stafford	0	7	0
For His sake, who fed the multitudes	0	3	0
W. C. and Friends, Tydd ..	0	16	6
L. J. Collins, 5, Alexandra Terrace, Addiscombe Road	0	13	3
Herbert S. Cousins, 16, Orange Street, Bloomsbury, W.C.	0	6	0
M. Simms, Windlesham, Bagshot	1	0	0
M. and A. Collard, Ocklynge, Eastbourne	0	10	0
Henry John Golding, Hurn Bridge, Christchurch, Hants	0	8	9
M. S., Tarbolton	0	3	0
Miss Annie Laura Reddy, 24, South Georges Street, Dublin	0	6	6
M. B., Rattlesden Hall, Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk ..	0	7	0
Miss S. Millhouse, 15, Shakespeare Villas, Nottingham	1	10	0
Gertrude Smith, Rotherham	0	1	0
Miss Elizabeth Palmer, Manton	1	0	0
£	2047	2	6

Being amounts received up to and on 4th June, 1874.

XUM

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

THE REST.

AS workmen left their work of day,
That called for light to keep it on,
And now the sun had sunk away
Adown the sky that faded wan,

O'er leaning slopes, the slopes that lean
Towards the hill—the hill grey-green—
I saw on Wydon ridge's breast,
The clump of elms—and knew the rest.

The rest—that down the other side
Of Wydon hill the river ran
By Wycombe doors, on-purling wide
Below bridge-arches' high-bow'd span,
And there was heard, I there could hear,
A peal of bells, of five bells clear;
From o'er the church for worship blest
I heard the bells—and knew the rest.

The rest—that there, a dear good maid
Was led to church that day forenoon,
Jane Dean below the morning shade,
Jane Hine ere yet arose the moon.
A happy day, a day well blest
To him that Jenny liked the best.
Gay rang the bells, the bells rang joy
To good John Hine without alloy,
But some there were with troubled breast—
I heard the bells—and knew the rest.

The rest—that John's dear mother lost
Her only child in that good lad,
Who took to Jenny's father's cost
The only child he ever had.
The old were sad, as sad to sing
A bird becomes with one poor wing;
The old were sad, and yet were blest
That day—and now you know the rest.

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC.

CHAPTER XXI.

STEPHEN BOWDEN,

MY DEAR SIR,

"Many thanks for the notes. I am sorry that you have given up all idea of forming a company. Wishing you a speedy restoration to health, and, with kind regards, yours very truly, "STEPHEN BOWDEN.

"P. S.—I leave England on the 12th to join my brother abroad."

That was his letter. Maggie read it over and over again, after her father, having once heard it, had put it on one side.

"This is the end, I suppose," she said, with a sigh; "I shall never even see his writing again."

A little harshness came into her heart. He had not been very generous, she thought; for the words which had parted them were hastily spoken, and she had apologised for them humbly enough in that letter which she was ashamed even to remember.

"I would have forgiven him anything," she said, and she read his note over again, and then slowly tore it up. "Good-bye," she said, as if speaking to the writer rather than to the letter, and put the fragments into the fire.

The old man failed faster and faster, and at last Maggie could not leave him alone, and yet dared not give up her pupils, for everything depended upon them, and so Hetty came daily and stayed with him while she was away, and of an evening Maggie kept up the weary watch.

So the days went by, and the first Monday in May came, and Charley and Hetty went to the Academy, and returned to tell Maggie all about it.

"There was such a dreadful crush," Charley said. "The people were like so many sardines in a box all standing on their tails. However, we pushed on, and round your picture there was a little crowd all admiring it. Don't you feel important, Maggie?"

"No," she said, "not at all. Daddy," she asked, turning to her father, "did you hear what they said about my picture?"

"Yes, dear," he answered, drearily. "It was a good name for it, 'Nearly Conquered.'"

Then Charley wanted Maggie to go and see it, but she had no heart to do so. She knew whereabouts it was, she had seen it on the varnishing day, and she did not care for success, and could not leave her father. She read the critiques on her work, however; and if hers was not exactly the picture of the year, as Charley had predicted, she received more than a moderate share of praise. Perhaps there was something pathetic in the portrait of the proud, yet feeble-looking old soldier, that touched a chord in people's hearts, or perhaps Maggie, feeling her subject, had put her best work into it; be it what it might, the papers had most of them some kindly words for it, and a little crowd of admirers was always gathered round it.

"You must come and see it!" Charley said; "Hetty will take care of the dad, and you and I can go in between your lesson-giving. We need not stay five minutes there." But she refused.

"Yes, Maggie dear, I wish you to go," the old man said; and so the next day she went; and Maggie saw for herself how many were standing before the picture she had worked at for so many weeks and months, and felt just one swell of triumph—it was not in human nature to help it. Then, when she came well in sight of the frame—that frame which had been Charley's gift, and accepted by her in consideration of his having told her that he was engaged to Hetty—she gave a little cry of surprise.

"Charley!" she exclaimed, "it is sold; see, there is a red ticket on it! And oh!" (there was regret and not exultation in her voice), "I priced it at a hundred pounds, thinking no one would give that sum for a picture by an unknown painter. I did not want it to sell, for it was daddy's portrait, and I shall never do another."

"Well, so it is!" he exclaimed. "Let us come and inquire who has bought it." And by dint of much trouble, and Maggie proving that she was the artist, they discovered that the purchaser was a Captain Gilbertson, so they were not much wiser than before.

"Hulloa, why, here's Bowden coming towards us!" Charley said, suddenly, as they were leaving the building.

"Don't stay! pray don't stay!" she said, clutching his arm. "I want to get back!" and the colour rushed to her face, and then suddenly forsook it. He seemed half inclined to halt, but Maggie, not daring to look at him, went breathlessly by. "How do you do?" she said, almost flippantly, and with a forced laugh, as she passed him.

"Going to sail on Tuesday?" asked Charley, looking back.

"Yes; good-bye." And he bowed and passed on.

CHAPTER XXII.

HOW NIGHT CAME.

Maggie had a doctor to see the old man, though she knew it was useless. He gave her no hope, but shook his head, and told her it was a gradual sinking. And so a few more days dragged by, and on the Monday—the day before Stephen Bowden left England—there was a change in him. Maggie stayed all day by his side, and would not leave him for a moment, for she felt somehow that when the morrow came the old man would be at rest. He seemed to know it himself, and turned his face towards her whenever she moved about the room, and watched her with dim staring eyes till once or twice she broke down even before him. Then he put out his hand, and stroked her hair, which was the caress by which in after years she always remembered him and Miss Charlotte Campbell.

"Don't fret, dear," he said; "I am an old man; you call me one yourself, dearie." His senses seemed clearer that last day than they had been for a long while. "What time is it?" he asked, some hours later, when evening had come; "is it nearly night?"

"No, not yet, daddy," she answered; "it is only just seven."

"The end of a day, the end of a life," he murmured, and then Hetty's mother, Mrs. Henry Ashbury, who had been in the next room, looked in, and Charley and Hetty came for a moment and stood by him, but he made a sign to Maggie, and whispered, "Tell them to go away, dear;" and Maggie, turning to them, said, gently, "Let me be quite alone with my father;" and they went.

When they were together again, Maggie opened her book and read her favourite chapter once more, and when she got to the twenty-seventh verse he repeated the end of it often—"Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." So the words which his daughter had made her comfort in life the old man took for his in death.

"Thank you, dear," he said; and, with a faint almost unconscious effort, he raised his hand and touched her head again, and she shivered, for she knew how long she should remember that last touch of his fingers upon her hair. Then, while Maggie still knelt there, that terrible silence fell which so often seems to herald death, and the sweet spring twilight faded, and darkness stole over the world and over the tired eyes of the poor old man.

CHAPTER XXIII.

STEPHEN BOWDEN'S FAREWELL.

Stephen Bowden little knew how sadly passed for Maggie his last day in England. He did not know why he thought of her so much during those last hours he had to spend in the same country with her; how once he found himself, almost without knowing it, within a few yards of the street in which she lived.

"I was a little harsh to her," he acknowledged, with a sigh; and determined to forget her, and yet remembered her all the more. "I wonder why she rushed by me in that way yesterday; I should like to have spoken to her again. I wonder if she will be happy with young Campbell;" for he had not thought of any other Miss Ashbury when he heard of Charley's fiancée. "I wish Herbert had not turned out as he did, too," he said with a half-sigh, for he had liked Maggie's rather priggish cousin, but he was not by any means a man to make the first advance after a quarrel. "Think I'll write him a line to-morrow to say good-bye, and post it just before going on board."

Then he went back to Coke Court (it was in the evening), and found a letter put under his door. It was from Herbert Ashbury, saying he had called, and should call again about nine or ten o'clock, and ask him to shake hands before he left England.

"Bravo, Herbert!" he exclaimed; "I shall be very glad to see you, old fellow!" The letter had been pushed by mistake partly under the oil-cloth which was round the edge of the room, and he had only noticed it through one white corner which had projected. "I should have been very vexed if I had missed it," he thought, and took a light to see if there were any more letters. He did not see any, but something prompted him to pull up the edge of the oil-cloth and look far under, and there he saw, and drew out, a little note from among the dirt and dust, all soiled and crumpled—a little note directed in a hand he knew well enough. "From Maggie!" he exclaimed in astonishment, a dim idea of the truth dawning upon him, and then, shaking the dust away from it, he read that penitential letter, which, months before, it had cost her so many tears to write. He could scarcely command himself. He almost shivered as he read her protestations, just as on that same evening she had done when she felt the last touch of her father's fingers upon her hair.

"If you could only understand how I care for you," she said, "you would never doubt me. I should not like to be disagreeable to every one else, it would seem a sign of weakness, as if my love for you could not stand the test of contact with others, and it can with all the world. And, dear, I have so bitterly repented those foolish words, and will gladly unsay them a thousand times over;" and then she begged him to trust her, "as I do you; and I prove how much I believe in you by writing all this, and feeling as I do, that this foolish quarrel will be over to-morrow when you have read this letter."

He put it up to his lips and kissed it, just as she had done when she had hoped that the smeared and blotted words would bring back her happiness again.

"How she must despise me!" he exclaimed.

He was literally in despair as to what to do in the matter. She was going to be married shortly, he thought, though in the face of that letter he could not understand it. It seemed almost the greatest kindness to her now (painful as the idea was to himself) to keep silence. He was going abroad in the morning, all his arrangements were made, and she was to be married shortly.

"It is too late," he said; and leaving word with the housekeeper that he would be in by nine, he strolled out to think calmly over it. "If she had not been going to marry Campbell I could understand her," he said, as for the second time that day he found himself close to the street in which she lived. "What a fool I've been to throw the love of such a woman away! I shall never find another like her."

He could not help it, he felt as if he must go by the house for once, and he did, under the shadow of the darkness. He gave one look up at the windows, little knowing that behind them Maggie was weeping, and the poor old man was lying dead; then, when he reached the end of the street, he stopped and gave one long look back at the house.

"God bless you, and good-bye, dear Maggie," he said; "I shall never see you again," and hurried on.

And this was his farewell to Margaret.

A few days later, as Maggie, after staring long and sadly at the announcement of the old man's death, turned the paper over, a little paragraph met her eye to the effect that the Juno had "sailed on the 12th, having on board," and then followed a list of passengers, and among them was the name of Stephen Bowden.

(To be concluded.)

COMFORT IN SORROW.*—I.

A GREEK dramatist puts into the mouth of one of his characters a wail very sad and full of despair—"Altogether miserable is the life of man, and there is no end of his sufferings." And this wail of the Grecian finds an echo in that sublimest of all dramas—in the lamentation of the man of Uz. "Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upwards." True it is that he sees in his God what the Greeks did not see in theirs—justice as well as omnipotence; and though he cries in anguish of spirit and bitterness of soul, "That it would please God to destroy me," yet is his confidence unshaken in Him who is just, though he knows not how that Just One justifies Himself. "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." "He is not a man as I am, that I should answer Him;" and so he commits his cause to God. But the despair of Job is almost as deep and dark as that of the heathen poet, and if there be a glimmer of light in that darkness which suggests an after life of readjustment, it is too uncertain to give hope. "Man dieth and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" He cries, "If a man die, shall he live again?" but there is no answer to that cry. It is not until the last, when God condescends in that magnificent remonstrance with the afflicted man, to confute him for justifying himself rather than God, showing His power and wisdom, and the utter helplessness and ignorance of man, that Job confesses all these things are too wonderful for him, sees there is a wise design in affliction, learns that he is not just, abhors himself, and repents in sackcloth and ashes. Thus man is educated one step farther. He sees that affliction is right, that God is just; but as yet he takes no comfort from that knowledge. At last comes the Master to teach him that affliction is not only just and wise, but good and merciful. David, indeed, understood that it was "good to be afflicted;" but Christ alone propounded that wondrous paradox, which proclaimed that "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." Who else could propound, with authoritative consistency, that truth apparently so inconsistent but He who was at once the "Man of Sorrows" and "the God of Consolation?"—a truth that received its fuller development in the exhortations of his followers to "glory in tribula-

* "Words of Hope and Comfort to those in Sorrow." London: Hurst and Blackett. 1874.

tions," and to "count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations." Hence we find our own great dramatist, under a diviner teaching than the Grecian, declare that "sweet are the uses of adversity."

Such, then, is the schooling of man in relation to sorrow and suffering. Despair, repining, submission in acknowledgment of its justice: hope, comfort, and at last joy in recognition of its blessedness. The helplessness of the gods of the heathen left man in despair; the sovereignty of an all-perfect God taught the Hebrew submission; but it was the fatherhood of the God of the Christian, fully revealed by Christ (though dimly apprehended before His coming), that brought comfort and joy, by teaching that suffering was a pledge of love, the chastisement of a loving Father. The waters of Bethesda brought no healing till they were troubled, and he who troubled them was an angel.

We have been led into this train of reflection by the perusal of a volume, small in compass, but of singular worth—intensely interesting, for it is intensely real—the experiences of one that seems to have walked with God from childhood to the grave. An intellect large and well stored with worldly learning, a heart most tender and most affectionate, that felt deeply every blessing with which she was surrounded, and felt all the more keenly when one by one the most of them were removed from her. But the Christian grace that sanctified her joys to her, sanctified her sufferings also. Through a correspondence of ten years, in letters written to dear friends and relatives, never intended to pass into strangers' hands, are exhibited all the beauty, meekness, patience under her own suffering, and comforting exhortations to others in theirs, that show forth a lovely and a holy life. Few, indeed, were ever more fitted by the varied trials through which she had passed, to understand and sympathise with the trials of others. In every relationship of life she was bound to others by ties the strongest, the tenderest; for the objects were ever the worthiest—father, mother, brother, sister, friend. Yet one by one nearly all were taken from her. But she ever recognised the love of the Hand that took away as well as that which gave, and so her sorrow was ever sanctified, and her weakness made strong; and we find the schooling and experience ever made her the fitter to administer comfort to each heart in its several sorrow. It is little wonder that letters such as these should have passed from hand to hand amongst those to whom she was dear. Then, many of them were printed for private distribution among those who needed the consolation they were calculated to give, and many a stricken heart in its great sorrow has acknowledged with thankfulness "that they had come as a message from God to bind up the broken-hearted, and to lead the sufferer to the source of all consolation." And so it happened that at last they reached the hand and the heart of one as exalted in her station as she is honoured in her life—reached her in the depths of a profound sorrow, in which all mourned with her in reverent and respectful sympathy. "A gracious request," writes the sister who edits the work, "was sent by one whose every wish would be esteemed an honoured command," that these letters should be published. That wish of Her Majesty the Queen has been complied with.

Before approaching the consideration of these letters we commend to the reader the touching memorial lines written shortly after the death of the letter-writer by one who knew her intimately. They give "a faithful picture of her, and of the home life so dear to many." The poem itself, and the initials subjoined to it, betray the author as the Rev. E. H. Plumptre; and we violate no etiquette in stating what becomes manifest—that the subject of that poem was the widow of the late Ven. Julius Charles Hare, rector of Hurstmonceaux, and Archdeacon of Lewes. Whoever has read the "Memorials of a Quiet Life," and "Guesses at Truth," will readily understand what an assemblage of genius, learning, wisdom, and piety surrounded the life of this lady.

"All these came there, and all a welcome found," says Mr. Plumptre, after alluding to many illustrious for genius and for piety; and all went back the better for the light, the warmth, the love, the truth of that bright home, owning, amid the priceless treasures there of wisdom and of art, one radiant smile, one loving word of hers as worth them all. In these letters we find that the experiences of the writer enable her to offer to each sorrowing heart the consolation most fitting. Thus, she writes to a widowed friend in Germany:—

"One who is herself an orphan and a widow must, indeed, feel tenderly for each in their several relations to the beloved departed one; and in both relations none was ever more blest, and therefore I can sympathise the more."

And again to one who has lost a daughter:—

"Is it not a high honour and joy which has been given you of nourishing up that precious one, of preparing her for her own home? She was a King's daughter, given you for a time to prepare her for court, to train her for dwelling constantly in her Father's presence; and can we wonder that, having made her all-glorious within, He should now wish to have her home?"

And after observing that God has seen how faithful the mother had been in fulfilling the trust which He had for a season reposed in her, she adds:—

"When I was thinking of you the other night, I was much comforted and delighted by that passage where God tells us that He bears us on eagle's wings, because we know that this is the way that the eagle teaches her young to fly.

She places them on her own wings, and then her mate flies into the air above them, calling to them to make them try and follow him. It seems to me that this is just the way our God does for us. He would not have us grovelling here on earth; He knows we are too ready to say with Job, 'I shall die in my nest,' and to settle ourselves comfortably there, as if there was no better home; and He would fain teach us to fly upwards, so He 'bears us up as on eagle's wings;' and that we may be induced upwards, He places above us some we have most loved on earth, to call us to follow them; to come up to them; to spread our wings and use them; and not remain here as if there was nothing beyond. And is not this what the removal of our dear friends is for? And must we not be glad that God desires so much to have our hearts that He will not let them rest below? He will have our conversation in heaven, and therefore invites those there with whom we love most to converse, that we may have no excuse for not being there. So that everything God does is so surely love, and with such purposes to our loving souls, that even the sharpest trials are but the manifestations of it, and will prove to be for our endless comfort."

The heaviest of the trials which she was called upon to endure, and which she did indeed endure as the Christian who learns even to rejoice in tribulation, fits her to comfort a mourner, in like wise, on the death of a beloved husband. After uttering words of encouragement in God's love and wisdom even in the sorest afflictions, who knows best what is to be accomplished in each of us—"You have prayed each for the other for the best blessings, will you complain of God for answering your prayers?" And impressing upon her widowed friend that consolation which she herself had known experimentally, in the assured belief that outward removal does not break the chain which bound together in God's love her that is left with him that has departed, she continues:—

"Don't you break it, dear ——, now, by thinking it is all over with you,—nothing but desolation left,—want of sympathy,—misunderstanding,—hard, cruel thoughts,—may-be a lonely pilgrimage through the rest of life,—this is what is your outward prospect, you will say, and say truly. On the other side of this sad picture, what is there? A faithful God, a loving Father, one who has led your dear husband through many years of joy and sorrow, who has led him through the everlasting gates, and only keeps you on the other side of them till you have fulfilled His wise and loving purposes. You would not wish to enter sooner. Be patient, therefore, dear mourner. Oh! do not belie your God, do not say that He has forsaken you, when He has just given you such evidences of His presence, such token that He has been in the midst of you, as that He has chosen the companionship of your dear one, and taken him to His presence. Don't try to feel,—you are vexing yourself needlessly,—your body and mind are exhausted. He bids you rest now, and not struggle after conscious peace."

And then she concludes with words which will find a response in many a mourning widow's heart:—

"Oh, in those hours of agony, which only God knows how to meet, how have I been sustained by the precious tenderness of those words, 'The Lord hath called thee, as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit.' So He bids us come to Him just as we are, not feeling comfort, or peace, or conscious of anything but the deepest grief, the most utter desolation; TO SUCH He reveals Himself as the Husband, the Comforter. Thus will you find Him; your sorrow is your rightful passport to Him, and in it, not from it, He will bless and help you."

In a letter to a friend, on entering a new dwelling-place, she thus writes, doubtless from her own experiences of the sanctities of family love:—

"Dreary as it is to have to 'change houses' in winter, I have felt thankful for you all that you should begin the new home-life at this Christmas season. May you, each and all, have the full blessings of the season—the blessing of knowing how completely our humanity has been taken by our Lord, and therefore how entirely He can feel for you as you each need; how He has made family love possible for us in its highest aspect, because He has given us His love as our pattern and standard. In this heavenly pattern we see how the mutual love, and forbearance, and trust, can be exemplified in the daily acts which constitute the confiding happiness and repose of family life."

It is remarkable how she ever seems keenly sensible of the recurrence of times and seasons, and never fails to draw some practical lesson of encouragement, admonition, or comfort from them. On Christmas Eve she writes to one under great trial, exhorting to cast all care on Him, so as to be enabled to rejoice evermore.

"I have this morning [she continues] been running through the principal prophecies of the coming of our Lord, and reading St. Luke i. and other passages as a preparation for to-morrow; and already I seemed to have joined company with the shepherds, and to be expecting the Heavenly Vision, and to be ready to go with them to Bethlehem. But though I say this, and feel it all, I am yet hoping for more, for as yet I feel so crushed with the immensity of wonder and mystery, that my heart and mind seem too small to take it in; I don't feel equal to it, and, like St. Paul, am blinded by the glory, and cannot see by reason of the light. I can only weep at my own incapacity, and pray earnestly for greater largeness of heart to take it in. And oh, if, poor and ignorant as I am—so incapable of receiving what yet I yearn after—may I but be permitted to go to that stable, and, if but to stand amongst the cattle, yet to look upon that Holy Child lying there, that so looking I may become like Him. There is perhaps no passage in the Bible (except the account of the agony in the garden) that has the same power over me as St. Luke ii. 1–20. As I read that, it seems to melt even me, and give a reality to everything,—the perfect simplicity and majestic beauty of the account, the wonderful fulfilment of prophecy, brought about in so unlooked-for a manner, the simple faith of the shepherds, the song of the angels—all is such a living picture of reality that one is subdued before it, and can only desire to be there too, by self-consecration and denial."

So at Easter she expatiates on the blessings revealed to the Christian at that season, and applies it to comfort one who has lost a child.

"We who have been called to many bereavements, and, above all, to one, know what that yearning of heart is towards those who are out of sight, which stretches after them, craves but for a glance, a touch, and cannot be satisfied whilst earth is so empty, have no excuse for being so 'slow of heart' to recognise Him who is evidently set forth among us, not crucified alone, but risen—risen as a man, as a present Saviour, ready to answer the yearnings of our poor hearts, and to satisfy their cravings with His presence and His fulness. Dear friend, let us not refuse Him that speaketh, let us hear His dear voice, let Him 'make Himself known to us in the breaking of bread,' and then, like the disciples of old, we shall be glad when we see the Lord. The thirst He gives us after Him—the sense of our own dryness and want—is just 'His thirst for us;' and to it He has fixed His sure promise, 'Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.' May the power of His resurrection thus raise us up on Easter wings, that so we may learn the 'felicity of His chosen!' Let us pray for each other, that it may be so, and meet also in thankful praise."

(To be concluded.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCIRPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XIX. CHRIST DEALING WITH INDIVIDUALS. No. 3. THE PHARISEE AND THE SINNER.

Chapter to be read—Luke vii. 36—50.

INTRODUCTION. Let the children glance back at the first part of the chapter, and see some of the incidents of this day: the widow's son healed at Nain; John the Baptist encouraged and exhorted (ver. 22), Christ's eulogy upon John. Tell the story of the king who kept a book in which to enter his good deeds to others; when no entry possible, used to enter, "a day lost." Did Christ ever lose a day? This day not over yet; has comforted a mother; exhorted John's disciples; must now bring influence to bear upon rich man. So in turn, all came under His notice.

I. THE FEAST. (Read ver. 36—38.) All like to give a feast or party when able; like to get clever and distinguished guests to be present. Ask about the Pharisees, rich, proud, self-righteous. Why did Simon invite Christ? Perhaps from curiosity, like Herod, who wanted to see him (Luke xxiii. 8), perhaps from condescension, to take notice of such a distinguished man. Question upon any feasts have read of in Bible, to show the Jewish customs—e.g., Joseph to his brethren (Gen. xliii. 24, 34), when the steward washed their feet, and Joseph, the host, sent messes from his own table; Christ washing his disciples' feet (John xiii. 5); a special dress provided (Matt. xxii. 11). Were these kindnesses given to Christ? (ver. 45, 46). No water for weary feet; no kiss of welcome; no perfume for the hair. What sort of welcome was it? why thus cold and ungracious? Would Martha and Mary have treated Him thus? Why not? Therefore showed no love or respect for Christ. How different to Abraham's reception of Angels (Gen. xviii. 4, 5).

Practical. Let children learn how to receive guests—viz. (1) Cordially. People think a great deal of way they are received; kind words cost little, do much. (2) Unselfishly. Children often think more of themselves than their guests at a party, but if do all honour may get the blessing of Mary and Martha.

II. THE WOMAN. (Read ver. 44—50.) Let children notice the difference in the customs of Jewish feasts, and ours—viz., the doors standing open; any one allowed to come in and watch; the guests reclining so that their feet would be outside; the anointing of the feet; the kissing, &c. Ask about this woman thought to be Mary of Magdala; her character; not told what her sin was; need not inquire. How did the Pharisees treat such persons? Remind of Pharisee in the parable (Luke xviii. 11), and the Pharisees objecting to Christ's eating with sinners (Luke xv. 2). Now picture the woman standing behind Christ at the feast; watching Him, hearing His holy words, thinking of her own wicked life, begins to weep, droops down, hides her face, tears fall on Christ's feet, wipes them with long hair, at last breaks alabaster vase, and bathes his feet with the precious ointment. Was this accepted, and why? What would Christ see in this act? (1) Repentance. Remind how this includes sorrow for the past, as in the case of Peter weeping bitterly after betraying Christ; and change of mind. How could Christ know what was in her mind? As God, saw her heart, and judged her accordingly. (2) Faith. Perhaps had heard the words, "Come unto me" (Matt. xi. 28). What did her conduct show? See how different to the others at the feast (ver. 42). See how Christ called sinners to repentance. (3) Love. How will love always show itself? Remind of many holy women longing to work for Christ: Martha, Salome, &c. (Mark xvi. 1). Did Christ ever reject, or refuse to accept?

Practical. Apply to the children. What are their thoughts about themselves? Do they feel their sins, and are they repenting of them? If so, how do they feel towards Christ? Do they show love by doing what they can? The least act accepted: kind words; kindnesses shown to others; money given for his sake shall not lose reward.

III. THE PHARISEE. (Read ver. 39—43.) Picture the master of the house, at head (or middle) of table, watching Christ and the woman. Might have fancied that the sight of her in her shame, agony, and repentance, would touch his heart into sympathy. Did it do so? What did he say to it in his heart? Must have looked cold and stern. Notice how Christ reproved him; remind of Eastern custom of teaching by parables—e.g., Nathan's parable of the ewe-lamb, to convince David; Jotham's parable (Judges ix. 8); and many others. Probably Simon, like David, did not see the application to himself at first. Now show how Christ reproved him for coldness and want of love, and commended the woman. So she, repentant and forgiven, departed in peace.

Practical. Let the children see the point of Christ's reproof to Simon. What was wrong in his conduct? It was cold, selfish, external morality, with no warmth in the heart towards God; no faith to see Christ as Son of God; no love to Him; no unselfish devotion; no self-denial, no sympathy with deep feelings of repentant woman. This not uncommon with children. Pride themselves on blamelessness—look coldly on others betrayed into sin; keep aloof from, with haughty conduct, &c. Let them learn to hate the sin, but pity the sinner; to help the sinner; to help any one in struggles after right; take heed lest themselves fall.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe one of our Lord's well-spent days.
2. Give some account of Jewish customs at a feast.
3. Contrast the conduct of the Pharisee and the woman.
4. What three feelings did the woman show?
5. Give instances of reproofs conveyed by parables.
6. Suggest some practical lessons from the whole story.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXII.

A LOVELY summer morning some few weeks later found Una Dysart walking to and fro on the terrace which skirted the front of the house. She had passed a restless night, as she had too often done since Atherstone's departure; for the very effort she made to hide her bitter pain by day, when the eyes of others were upon her, only made her give way to it the more utterly, when in the darkness none could see the burning tears she shed for the hope that was dead, and the love that lived only to wring her unforgetting heart. There was one person whose society in all intercourse with her neighbours she systematically avoided, and that was the clergyman, Mr. Trafford. Her conscience was ill at ease under the concealment of Miss Amherst's letter, and on the few occasions when she had heard him preach, she had been so impressed by his uncompromising rectitude, and the pure and lofty standard he held up before his hearers, that she absolutely dreaded the influence he might acquire over her if she held much intercourse with him. For although Trafford could not of course really know how completely she was sacrificing truth and justice in this respect to the love that dominated her whole being, yet it always seemed to her when she met him as if his clear spiritual eyes could penetrate into the very depths of her soul, and read this secret with all the rest.

It was therefore with some annoyance, as well as great surprise, that Una suddenly saw Trafford walking towards her along the avenue at this early hour of the day. She had been thinking sadly how she would have rejoiced in such a sunny morning, before the shadow of Humphrey Atherstone had fallen across her path of life and dimmed all its brightness, as she thought, for ever, and tears were still trembling on her long eyelashes as Trafford's quick step brought him face to face with her. He looked at her keenly, but he met her hurried nervous greeting with a quiet kindness which had the effect of calming her immediately.

"I am afraid my aunt has not yet left her room," she said, as she shook hands with him; "did you wish to see her?"

"Not this morning, thank you; my errand is to you, Miss Dysart. You are aware, no doubt, that your friend Miss Crichton is hopelessly ill?"

"I have heard of her state occasionally from the Northcotes, but I do not know much, except that her brother Hervey has been sent for, which made me fear she was worse."

"She is dying," said Trafford; "I have a letter from the rector this morning, which states that this is the case, and also that she has expressed within the last few days a vehement desire to see you once again before she passes away. She has been continually begging that you might be asked to go to her, but her brother shrank from requiring you to take so long a journey. Yesterday, however, she became much worse, and so earnestly implored the rector to send for you that he could no longer refuse. He thought it best, however, to write to me rather than to yourself, as he did not know whether you were well, or if you could leave your aunt. He begged me to see you, and if possible I was to request you at once to go to Torquay, in order to gratify the last earthly wish of his poor sister."

"I shall be most thankful to go," exclaimed Una; "I have been longing so much to see dear Lilith again. I do not think my aunt will make any objection; but I must ask her of course."

"If you go, however, I fear it must be this very day," said Trafford, "or you will not find her alive.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"To wish you joy! Oh, Lilith!"—p. 714.

Since I received the letter, I have had a telegram sent off at an early hour this morning, to say that the doctors are afraid an attack is impending which may bring the end very suddenly, and that it is doubtful, even if you start at once, whether you can be there soon enough."

"Oh, I hope I shall not be too late!" said Una; "there is still time for me to go by the first train. Mr. Trafford, will you wait one moment while I speak to my aunt and order the carriage?" and she flew away, all her languor and gloom forgotten in the sudden excitement. In a very few minutes she was back again, breathless and flushed, to say that Lady Elizabeth made no objection to her going, provided she had both her maid and the old butler with her as an escort.

"You will be sufficiently protected certainly," said Trafford, with a smile, "and I will meet you at the station and see you off, as you will be very much hurried."

"Will you not wait and go in the carriage, since you are so kind; it is just coming round," said Una. He agreed, and soon they were driving together to the station, with Una's maid, looking very cross and discomposed at the sudden journey, on the seat opposite to them. Una was more like herself than she had been for many a day, as she spoke with all her old animation to Trafford of Lilith's goodness, and of the warm affection she had always felt for her. He gazed with interest at her bright sweet face, and wondered what manner of soul it was which looked out of those soft eloquent eyes, and why they had been so deeply sad when he had seen her first that morning. He was perfectly aware too of her former avoidance of himself, and he thought with pleasure that the service he was now rendering to her would probably produce a better acquaintance between them. In truth, Una almost marvelled at herself for having been afraid of him, when at last they parted as the train moved away, and he speeded her on her journey with the earnest words, "God be with you!" the same with which he had sent forth Atherstone to his exile, though he had not the least suspicion that Una Dysart was that one whom his friend so mourned to leave.

It was very late at night before she reached Torquay, and heard at once from the rector that Lilith was still alive.

He thanked her for having obeyed his summons in his usual formal maner, but with a tremulousness of voice which showed how much he was really feeling. "My dear sister has expressed a wish to see you alone, Miss Dysart," he said, as he led the way to Lilith's room, "and she has asked that she may be left with you only to-night, as she says she has much to tell you. Of course, my brother and I would greatly desire to be with her at the last, but we cannot refuse her wish that you should have these precious hours, while she is still able to speak; we must trust to you to summon us if you should see that final moment approaching."

"You may be sure I will," said Una. But, thankful as she felt to see Lilith for the last time, an indefinable dread of the interview caused her to shrink back shuddering as the rector opened the door of his sister's room. She mastered her agitation, however, and entered, hearing him close it gently, and walk away. She was alone with Lilith Crichton; but if the strange chill of fear she had felt had been caused by her near approach to the shadow of the dark valley, it might well be dispelled by the mere sight of her who was now entering upon it.

Lilith, propped up in the bed, was leaning back in an attitude of complete repose, while her fair hair, spreading out over her pillows, looked like a golden glory encircling the head of a saint. Her exquisitely lovely face, though pure white as the driven snow, was brightened by a look of rapturous joy, which shone in her luminous eyes with an almost unearthly radiance; while the fresh flowers over which her little hands were folded made her seem as if she were decked for a bridal. Una thought of the wedding garments of the King's guests, and of the linen white and clean, which is the righteousness of the saints, and felt that this fair stainless child was indeed prepared for the marriage supper of the Lamb.

A single lamp burnt with softly-shaded light in the room; but through the open window the silvery crescent moon could be seen sailing over the cloudless ether, while one pure pale star hung motionless below. The whole scene, within and without, was expressive only of serene beauty and purity, and a deep sense of quiet and rest stole over Una's beating heart as she approached the dying girl. At the sound of her step Lilith seemed to withdraw her radiant eyes from the contemplation of some unseen glory, on which they appeared to be fixed, and turned to her with a happy smile.

"Thank you for coming to me, dear Una," she said; "you are still in time to wish me joy."

"To wish you joy! Oh, Lilith, how can I in this awful hour?"

"Because of the wonderful happiness which is even now so blessedly near to me. I am passing this night through the dark waters; and think, oh, think, what it will be to see HIM upon the shore when morning breaks!"

"But have you no fear, dear Lilith—no dread of the unknown, such as I should feel in your place?"

"None, none! I hope I am not presumptuous, but I cannot fear, for He is my Lord and my God, and I know how with eyes of ceaseless love He watches His own all through their troubled course on earth, and then waits to welcome them upon the other side. Oh, I cannot fear! Already I seem to have passed into the light of the sinless land, and the melodious echo of its softly pealing music fills the air around me; I hear the Master's voice calling me across the waters, and I only long to plunge deeper into them that they may bear me to His feet."

"Happy Lilith!" said Una, and tears rose in her eyes at the contrast of this expiring girl's perfect serenity with the restless misery which filled her own earth-drawn heart in all her bloom of life and health.

Lilith seemed instinctively to understand her. "Una," she said, "I must tell you why I have been so very anxious to see you. One night lately I woke from a dream I had about you, which I could not recall in its details, but which left a painful impression on my mind that you were in the midst of some great trial and temptation, out of which I ought to help you; and when I asked myself how a poor feeble girl such as I am could be of any use to you, I suddenly remembered the promise I once made to you to tell you my own history, and it seemed to me as if it were in some urgent manner necessary that I should do so now; I felt the impulse so strongly that I implored my brother next day to send for you, and I am ready, dear Una, at once to fulfil my mission, though I scarcely understand its purport myself."

Una listened to these words with a sense of awe, and felt a secret dread as to what Lilith might be about to tell her, but she only said, "It is very true, dear Lilith, that I have been in great trouble and distress, but I do not think any one can help me. Will it not fatigue you to speak so much?"

"I feel as if a special strength had been given me for that purpose; but I must be very brief, for my time is short indeed. Una, sit down and listen."

Una obeyed, and placed herself with her head resting on Lilith's pillow, so that she might catch every word spoken by the soft faint voice that so soon would no more be heard on earth.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"I THINK you know," said Lilith, "that Rupert Northcote loved me very dearly, and wished me to be his wife, but none save He who reads the depths of the heart can ever know how intensely, how entirely I loved him. I so loved him that I knew if I were parted from him I could not live, and thus it has come to pass; we were parted, and I am dying." She paused a moment to ease her panting breath, and then went on—"There was but one feeling in my soul which was stronger than my love to Rupert, and that was my earnest purpose and desire to be true and loyal to Him who died for me, and to go to Him with clean hands and a pure heart when my last hour should come, as now it has. For a long time it never occurred to me to doubt that Rupert was good and holy like my brothers, and such as I believed all followers of Christ must ever try to be; and when he first told me how dear I was to him, I did not seek to hide from him that he was enshrined in my love for ever, and that my whole heart's devotion would be his unchangeably so long as I lived on earth; so he knew quite well how entirely I was his own; and although he was not at that time in a position to make arrangements for our immediate marriage he fully expected that when he could do so he had but to claim me, and I should be ready at once to be his wife. And I was happy for a time—oh, how happy!—but gradually, as I came to know him better, dark fears stole into my mind that if I were united to Rupert Northcote in that perfect oneness of heart and soul, that unreserved confidence which constituted my idea of marriage, it would be impossible for me to preserve myself so blameless from all taint of evil as I believed a child of God should be; for I came to know that he gambled; that he had just debts which he never meant to pay; that he lived for pleasure only; and that above all he was utterly careless of the claims of religious duty. The dreadful possibility began to loom in the distance before me that I might have to choose between my Rupert, the one love of my life, and the faultless allegiance I was bound to give to Him who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity. Of course I knew that if it came to that—if I could not be his wife without conniving at evil, and morally sharing it—I must give him up, and die: there could be no question on that point; if it were right to part from him I must do it, and if I did, I knew that I should die."

As Lilith said this very calmly, very simply, Una felt her own heart sink each moment more and more in shame and terror. Had not she been tried in like manner and found wanting? She buried her burning face on the pillow while Lilith, not perceiving her emotion, went on speaking with a faint sad smile.

"Do you remember, Una, the first day I ever saw you, how you wondered that I chose to stay and watch a little wounded bird we found lying helpless on the hill-side? I knew Rupert had shot it, and I wanted to see if it would be an omen of my fate; if it had lived I might have hoped on a little longer, but it died, struck down by his hand, and now I too am fluttering in the grasp of death. The crisis came on the day of the cricket match. He had been becoming very impatient for our marriage to take place; on his side it had been delayed by want of means, for although the allowance he received from his father would have been sufficient for us if he had been moderately careful, his extravagant habits had quite impoverished him. On my side he did not expect that there would be any obstacle, although I had never consented to any regular engagement subsisting between us, just from the fear that I might not be able conscientiously to carry it out. On that day, then, he asked me to speak to him alone because he had some good news to tell me, and I met him in a quiet spot by the river-side. How well I remember it all! for it was the death-scene of my earthly happiness—the cloudless sky, the sparkling river, the mossy banks all decked with flowers, and my Rupert so bright, so winning, and glowing with the rapture he thought I was to share with him. I can hear his dear voice now, all trembling with delight as he told me he could claim me at last; he had been quite determined, he said, to wait no longer, and so he had taken a bold step, whereby he had secured quite sufficient funds to enable him to carry out our marriage, and take me abroad for a year or two, which he was sure I should like better than settling down in England. To that I only answered, that if I were with him it would matter nothing where we went, for home to me was by his side, and there alone; but I begged him anxiously to tell me how it was he had so suddenly become rich. He answered hurriedly that he made a clever stroke of business, and instantly changing the conversation, began to enter into all sorts of details about the arrangements for our wedding, which he said must take place immediately, for there was urgent need of haste; his manner was altogether so strange that a terrible uneasiness took possession of me, and I felt there was something wrong under it all. I put my hands in his and looked into his eyes, and asked him to tell me truly and plainly how he had obtained the money which enabled him to marry. He refused, trying to jest about it, and said I had no knowledge of business, and must trust all to him.

"Ah! that I could have trusted him! but I could not. I told him that if I was to be his wife he must give me his confidence, and he answered that when we were married I should know it all, for he would not be able to conceal it from others beside myself. 'Why not tell me now then?' I said. He replied, that it was because I was so terribly conscientious; I should be sure to have scruples on the subject, and I could not make allowances for the weaknesses of ordinary mortals. Una, I cannot go on telling you all the conversation, for it makes me sick at heart even to remember it, but this was the end—I came to see distinctly that it had been by using his father's name in a fraudulent manner he had obtained this large sum of money, and although he knew that in the course of a few months it must become known to Mr. Northcote, he felt so certain that his father, for the honour of his own name, would take no steps in the matter, but seek only to conceal the fault of his son, that Rupert had no fear whatever of the result; what he had done, however, was nothing less than a crime, although he tried to justify it to himself, by the false plea, that as at his father's death he must succeed to his possessions, the money was virtually his own already. Oh, Una! how can I tell you the horror that fell upon me when I came to understand it all, and to see that his one desire was to hurry on our marriage before the fraud became known, in order to escape with me to the Continent out of reach of his parents' reproaches! Instantly, with my first impulse, not pausing to think what my words involved, I told him I could never consent to be a party to a fraud or join in the smallest deceit towards his father. His eyes blazed with passion, and he grasped my arm, exclaiming, 'Do you know what you are saying, Lilith? if you do not agree to my plans, and keep my secret, you can never be my wife.' 'Never?' I asked faintly, for it seemed like my death-knell. 'No, never,' he answered; 'I have done this thing solely that I might win you to myself; but I know how it will be looked upon by my family, and by all who hear of it. I will not stay here to be reproached and disgraced; with you or without you I must leave the country. If we were married, and they knew that for your sake I had done it, in time they would forgive me, and all would be condoned and forgotten; but if I have to exile myself from England, knowing I have lost you, I shall have nothing left to make existence tolerable, but that miserable money, and I shall spend it in any pleasures that will make me forget you; then judge if I could ever return home to look my father in the face, without a shadow of excuse for my conduct, or if I should have room to hope that your pious brother would ever trust you in my hands! No, Lilith, do not deceive yourself; come to me now—you for whom I have sinned, or take your last look of my face, and bid me farewell for ever.' At these terrible words I gave a shriek and almost fell to the earth. He caught me in his firm grasp, and exclaimed, 'My own Lilith! my darling! you cannot forsake me—you will come to me I know; but you must make your choice—it is now or never,' Yes! he said truly, I had to make my choice—there, leaning on his arm, with my hand in his, and his dear eyes looking down on me with such a pleading, yearning love, and my own sinking heart knowing too well the truth, that to part from him would be to give myself to death, and worse than death while yet I lived. Oh, Una, may you never know the anguish of such a struggle as I underwent that hour!"

Lilith paused, while her agitation mastered for a moment the factitious strength that sustained her—and it was with trembling hands and quivering lips that Una applied the necessary restoratives, for she began to see with mingled terror and remorse what the lesson was which the dying girl was appointed to teach her; but Lilith spoke again, so soon as she could still her panting breath, for she felt that her time was growing very short.

"Una, you will feel as I did, that there was really no question what my choice must be, when there was the Divine Lord and the pure service I owed Him on the one side, and earthly love on the other. I thought of His words, 'What shall it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' and I turned to my Rupert and said, 'Darling, even for your sake I cannot connive at evil; if at this price only I may be your wife, I must give up the hope, though it is my very life.' 'Lilith,' he said, 'have you well weighed what you are saying? do you mean that you decide against me? Take care, for our whole future hangs upon your answer. Do you give me up?' I lifted my eyes to the pure calm sky, and asked the One Great Sufferer to give me strength to suffer, and then I gasped out, 'Rupert, I must.' It was the end. He flung me from him so that I staggered against a tree and caught hold of it to support myself, while he thundered out the words, 'Go! never let me look upon your face again, for I must forget you as swiftly, as surely, as I can. I will tear your image from my heart by every means in my power, and from this hour you are dead to me!' and then, without another word or look, he dashed away past me out of my sight, and I have never seen him since; but oh! how thankful I am now on my death-bed that I acted as I did that day, for soon I shall behold my Lord in glory!"

A sort of ecstasy seemed to transfigure Lilith's face while she thus spoke. She raised herself up in bed, stretched out her arms to heaven as if she saw some one ready to grasp her hands and draw her upward from the earth, but the effort was too great, her lips became suddenly dyed by the crimson stream that burst from them, bearing her life away. Her mission was ended; her order of release was come; she sank back, while a veil seemed to fall on the shining eyes, and the sobbing breath sighed itself out; then a light broke over her face like morning on the slumbering hills, and the fair young life passed away from earth, to revive once more in the pure airs of paradise. (To be continued.)

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC., ETC.

I.—"EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF"—(concluded.)

MANY will be condemned by-and-by simply from their taking care, as they thought, of No. 1. Then, when they see matters in the light of God's nature, and Christ's life and death, and when their own true life stands before them in its proper light, they shall see how far they had departed from God's law in the whole spirit of that life. Perhaps they will be surprised. Perhaps, like those men in the parable, they will say, "Lord, when saw we Thee an hungered, or thirsty, or naked, or sick, or in prison?" and perhaps the answer they will get shall be this, you could not see, because you would not see; you stood in your own light; you put your gross and earthly self between your real self and Me, and as you would none of My law, so now I mock at your calamity. Behold, all your life was strewn with opportunities of your living in others for Me. "Inasmuch," says Jesus, "as ye did it not unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye did it not to Me." Suppose you hear the remainder of that speech addressed to you, that a voice said to you, "Depart, thou cursed one, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels:" cannot you understand with what gibes and jeers and cruel mockings you may be received into the abodes of woe? horrible voices full of irony crying, "Here comes the man whose life-motto was, 'Every man for himself,'" your own heart's memory jeering and mocking too, and saying, "And thus miserably ends a lifelong taking care of No. 1!"

The fact is that all sin is against our real interest in the end. And so it comes to pass that a great deal of getting and keeping here may be simply dead loss, and ruinous as regards hereafter. If he that loses his life shall find it, how much more he that for Christ's sake gives up some smaller thing? If not even a cup of cold water can be given to a disciple in the name of Christ without its bringing hereafter a corresponding reward, how much more all those still larger services which it is in the power of every one to render?

Well, is it taking care of No. 1? is it being in any true sense of the word "for yourself" to lose the future great reward? Even suppose you have repented and sought Christ, and found life and safety in Him, are you pursuing your true interest when you are doing all you can to make your reward as small as possible for eternity? God has made a true sense in which a man's own interests are to be dear to him, in which his own self is to be precious; and you are missing God's way when you are following out your own. His teachings about yourself would lead you one way, your ideas on the subject lead you another; His would have landed you in gain imperishable, your own can land you in nothing but loss.

I would say to such a man, Remember this, too—and it is a very serious consideration—every day that you spend with "Every man for himself" as your motto and rule of life hardens you to the power of the Cross, and makes you move farther and farther from its influence. One of the great operations of the Cross is to penetrate "self"—to break through its hard shell, to pierce the armour in which it is encased from head to foot. And if we buckle self closer and closer still, then the more do we shut ourselves up from those holy influences which would make us like Christ and fit for heaven. "Self," in some form, is the great enemy with which the Cross has to contend; and to hug over closer the enemy of Christ is to do ourselves a deadly injury.

How can a man be said to be for himself in any sort as to good, when he is putting from himself his hope of life?

And then I say to such a one, You are losing all real pleasure. There may be a poor shadowy pleasure for a moment in doing what that "self" desires which is not of God. It is folly to say that there is no pleasure in sin. If there were none, then people would not sin. The first sin was committed under inducements of pleasure—goodness of food, pleasure to the eye, the being made wise, all gave goodly promise; and under that inducement the sin was consummated. And so it is now. The miser, the drunkard, the voluptuary, and all who commit sin, find a pleasure of some kind in it for depraved self. But it abides not, and finally it stings.

The greatest pleasures are those which we find outside ourselves; they become our own, though we do nothing for self, still all our outgoings for others come back upon ourselves; good measure pressed down and running over is poured into our bosom. There is a story of, I believe, an Italian noble, who had lived entirely for himself, and exhausted, in what he thought pleasure, all his energies. At last life became burdensome to him, and he determined to commit suicide. On his way to the water in which he intended to drown himself he was accosted by a beggar-child asking alms. He threw the child a piece of gold, and was proceeding on his way to the river, when he suddenly determined to go and see the child's sick mother, according to her earnest request when she asked for charity. He went; and the happiness he experienced in ministering to their wants and seeing their gratitude was such that he believed life was not quite exhausted, that it had some new sensations and interests still left, and henceforth he became a useful and a happy man.

Well, if all this be so, if self be likely to assume so undue a prominence, and to play us in our deepest, truest, and most real selves so false a part, surely, when we say, "Every man for himself," or when we are about to act on this principle, we had better take care what we are about. What we are called upon to do, is to take care, and to deal aright with self. Our deep, true, and real "self" has claims on us which we cannot disregard without ruin.

We must see well to it wherein our individual true happiness is to be found. Ask yourself, good reader, whether you have been making a mistake hitherto in this matter. If you have found no happiness, say to yourself, "Why am I thus?" We may feel inclined to lay the blame on this person and that, or on one circumstance and another, but in all probability the blame rests entirely upon ourselves.

You have a right to look for personal happiness; it is right that you should have no rest without it; and the way to get it is this—Come and get unburdened at the Cross, and then go and live with the unselfishness which is the doctrine of that Cross.

Take care of No. 1, as you value all that is really worth having, but take care of it in God's way. Many, while they think they are taking care of it, are really ruining it. Every man shall give account of himself to God, therefore not to take care of No. 1 would be to throw yourself away, and be unable to render up a good account when the day of reckoning comes.

Put this question to yourself, good reader, "What kind of a 'self' did God mean me to have?" and when you do this, you will find that it is impossible that it can be a self unlike His Son—the great pattern Man for all.

Be strong, and earnest, and all alive for yourself, that you may be made what He would have you be, and God will put your self right with Him, and being right with Him, it will be in right and blessed relationship with all others also.

You must indeed look well to yourself. You must not commit this all-important interest to another; you must see to it that you yourself are in Christ—that you yourself are living for Christ.

Do not expect that others will look after you—that you can offer as a valid excuse by-and-by, that if you had been properly attended to, things would have been different with you from what they are now. What can you answer if you be asked, "To whom were you of so much importance as yourself; why then did you not look after yourself?" Little do men know what error, what truth, lie in this common saying, "Every man for himself."

STORIES OF "THE QUIVER COT."

I FEEL that I ought almost to apologise to my readers, for again bringing little Willie C. before them as "the Quiver Cot patient," for it really seems such a very long time since first he was introduced to them, and though he is not actually at this time—i.e., when this paper is read—occupant of the cot, he was when it was written. What excuse can I make for my dear little friend for having so long monopolised a favoured corner of the world? If one is needed—and many people may rightly think that he has had laws and limits greatly stretched in his favour—then I must offer the true reason, which is hardly an excuse—namely, his poverty, his suffering, and his helplessness, and last, but by no means least, the great tender kindness of the hospital officers, who couldn't turn poor Willie adrift while there was a hope of strengthening and renewing the spark of his poor life. So Willie has stayed on and on, with short intervals of absence, and has been on the hospital books for more than four years. His trust in the skill, goodness, and wisdom of all those in any way connected with the place is stronger than ever. I paid him a visit a short time since, and heard all about his different little jaunts. One of his visits had been made to Brighton, which place, he explained to me, "was different to any other place, because it was large and grand, and yet there was lots of fresh air and kind people." He much enjoyed that visit. One of the ladies took him, and he had his little carriage, and used to spend many hours lying on his back close to the waves. By his own account he was intensely happy there, finding no drawbacks—"Cos you had all you wanted, and everybody was so kind." Not a bad definition of happiness, I thought.

These helps resulted in Willie's being pronounced able to be dressed, and he actually got so far as standing alone by last Christmas Day, but a slight push from another boy caused a fall, and three months in bed followed. In April he was up again, moving himself from bed to bed in his little carriage, going on errands for the nurses, and enjoying himself—grateful and happy and bright. A very sad sight was the child to me, going as I did from rosy country children; but though the little face was yellow and wan, and the scraps of arms and legs mere sticks, the old look of weary suffering, that I had so often felt my heart ache to see, was gone, and a sort of subdued brightness there instead. He chatted eagerly; and one of his first remarks was, "You haven't asked those kind people to write to me for a long time, I did so love their letters. Sometimes I feel as if I could cry, because it seems as if they didn't love me so much now I'm better."

I explained that he had been such a long time in the cot that, of course, people thought he had gone long ago. "Yes," said Willie, with a smile, "I have been a long time, the doctors got quite cross once, or somebody got cross, but they never turned me out; God let me stay; I must have cost a lot of money, but I do thank God for letting me stay here, and I try to get well, but I don't think I ever shall be very well, like other boys; and sometimes I am glad, because I love being here, and I had rather go to heaven than any other place, if I was turned away from here."

When he first went to church, the sound of the organ was quite too much for him, and he had a misty idea that it was heavenly music. Among the congregation he imagined that he recognised a dear friend of mine, who has often visited the hospital, and once worked there for some weeks. He audibly announced this fact to the lady who had charge of him, and was then advised not to talk in church, but he continued to gaze at the lady, and fancying I also must be near, he exerted himself to find me out, and was much upset at my friend's double taking no notice of him. He told me afterwards he expected to see me there, though I was at the time many miles away, and he knew it, because I had told him in answer to one of his questions, that I always went to church if I was not ill, and I then found too that he thought there was only one church.

Once Willie was taken to the Zoo., little carriage and all. Imagine his wonder and delight! I asked how he managed to see all the animals, as some of the cages are raised, and reached by steps, "Oh," said he, "the people were kind there too, and they kept on helping my carriage up." Though I had not seen the child for more than a year, he had forgotten none of our little mutually interesting topics, and inquired severally and separately after my relations and friends, confusing none of their names or affairs. The walls of the new building have indeed grown, and the dust and want of air are trying to the dwellers in the wards, but brightness and sunshine can enter at the front of the houses still, and the flowers find their way there too. I was greeted with a most pleasant odour when I opened the girls' ward door, quite like the Shropshire lanes I had just left behind, and I asked a bright-faced little girl, who was dressing her doll behind the door, "What is this nice smell?" "Tosties," she answered, and buried her unaccustomed nose in a fragrant cowslip ball. Cowslips everywhere! Kind little school-children to send them to their dear little sick sisters! God bless you for it! Tiny thin hot fingers were grasping their golden treasures in all the cots. One child was putting one on each rose-coloured little cheek, flushed with the deceitful bloom of consumption. A fit emblem of each other—fading sinless flower, and fading innocent baby. I "considered the lilies of the field," God's little flowers, and this one so soon to bloom again in the garden of the Lord. I should like to have shown the little maker of the "tosty" how it was cherished. An hour after I passed the cot again, and the little one had fallen asleep, with the two tosties on her pillow, carefully laid from the heat of her hand. Three tiny mites in the same ward were acting a little hospital scene, one being a patient, another a nurse, and the biggest (about five) the doctor. "Sit up, Katie, and show doctor your foot," said the nurse, very imperfectly. "I can't," said Katie, smiling; "ain't dot a foot, he tut it off and toot it away." This speech was followed by a burst of laughter from the whole ward, the doctor only keeping grave. At last Katie was persuaded to have her woolly boot off. She had, with the other two actors, only left her bed the day before, and the doctor's cure for an imaginary bad foot was a good tickling, the nurse so far forgetting her office as to assist, and the final result was a general upset of little low chairs, and I left doctor, nurse, and patient a bunch of thin legs and arms and red jackets on the floor. She managed to say to me, "Doo-bye, yady, do and see the boys up-stairs." One midge of two, who was very fat and unwieldy, and rather short of breath, and who by her very resplendent blue hair-ribbons I guessed to be a ward pet, sat upon a royal couch in the centre of the ward, setting out the animals of a Noah's ark. I looked at her. She at once, with an imperious nod, said, "Tum." I went, and as something in the arrangement of my head-gear took her attention, she said, "Toop down," which I did, and then the intense concentration of all her powers upon one object, and that above her, caused her complete overthrow, accompanied by a general scrimmage among the ark company. I was afraid of a regular howl, but, behold! a sort of gurgle, a broad smile, a fat hand raised, and the concise sentence, "Pit me up." I did as I was told, and then re-arranged the animals to her satisfaction, putting out all my conversational powers meantime, and when I imagined I had quite won her heart by my patience in setting up animals with only two legs instead of four, to my astonishment I heard, "Oo may do now, do on, do on!" and all the animals were tossed on to the floor. Looking up, I saw a plate and mug on the table, first sign of tea. Ungrateful little maiden! "Good-bye," I said. "Do away, do away!" said Sally; but when I got to the door her heart relented, even though the trays had come up, and she called out, "Tum back." I went of course. "Tiss me." I performed the operation, and she waved her hand towards the door. She only vouchsafed one remark to me during my time of attention to her, and that was, "You a dood dirl?" I shall not tell what my answer was. I ventured the same question, but she shook her head solemnly, so I concluded that Sally, if spared, would be an honest woman. (To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

305. What was the number of fasts enjoined by the law of Moses to be kept every year?

306. "I indeed baptise you with water unto repentance," said the Baptist, "but He that cometh after me is mightier than I; He shall baptise you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire." When was this announcement fulfilled?

307. In that part of the Jewish tabernacle designated the "sanctuary" were three articles of furniture. Name them.

308. In reference to which of Christ's announcements is it recorded that the disciples not only failed to understand what Jesus said, but were afraid to ask Him?

309. Mention three ordinances observed by the children of Israel before the Law itself was established.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 688.

293. See John xxi. 7.

294. Once only. See 2 Peter i. 18.

295. John viii. 59; x. 31.

296. After. See John xxi. 18, 19.

297. Rev. xii. 9.

298. "Thy sins be forgiven thee" (Mark ii. 5; Luke vii. 48).

THE TRANSIT OF VENUS.

MIND reckons distance by the motion—Time;
Mind, with a world, measures the sun sublime.
Now o'er the ocean, winged with steam and sail,
Speed forth ye ships of science, and return
From realms remotest; not with precious bale,
But Knowledge from the vast—truths which will burn
Like solar light for ever. Some will go
To Zealand's forest hills of fire and snow;
Some to the moist warm winter of the Nile,
Or watch the glory from a tropic isle
O'erflowed with verdure to its calm blue creeks,
Where the long billow flows, that farther breaks
In surge and rainbow on the coral reef,
Or curves in sunset like a golden sheaf;
And some 'mid desolation make their home,
Far past the conflux of tumultuous tides
Round earth's last cape—swung hugely in the sky—
Deep southward in a solitary sea
Under the pole's antarctic vaporous dome—
Isles mountainous and sterile, whose gaunt sides
Are lashed by leagues of unapproachable foam.

T. C. IRWIN.

(Drawn by M. E EDWARDS.)

TO THE LITTLE CHILDREN.

DEAR little children, how we love your voices!
Like silver bells upon the ear they fall;
Beneath their spell some aching heart rejoices
In cottage lowly or in stately hall.

How sweet to hear when weary toil is over,
And the green hills look indistinct and dim,
Their cadence steal through fields of fragrant clover,
Or mingling sweetly in the vesper hymn.

Oh, strains celestial! sounds beyond comparing!
A white-winged seraph seems each lisping tone,
Through evening mists and dying fragrance bearing
Your guileless wishes to the Saviour's throne,
Who, father-like, the messenger caressing,
While angels smile behind their golden lyres,
At your sweet wishes flings His sacred blessing
On the rough pathway of your worldly sires.

Dear little children, how we love your faces!
Pure as the lilies round the azure lake,
They greet us oft in foul and sinful places,
Where brutal oaths your fitful slumbers break;
In reeking slums, in sickly courts and alleys,
Faintly they smile—we bless them as we pass;
We meet them, too, in pleasant country valleys
Fresh as the daisies 'mid the tender grass.

The truant locks your lovely temples shading,
Some are as golden as an angel's crown;
Some like the leaves in russet autumn fading,
As rich, as clustering, and as softly brown.
Your speaking eyes, they tell us how ye love us
And thrill us often with a strange delight,
But oftener still their mute reproaches move us
As though they read our sinful hearts aright.

Dear little children, when your dimpled fingers
First clasp the kerchief o'er a mother's breast,
No sordid wish within her bosom lingers,
For, queen or vagrant, she is wholly blest!
Up to her lips the rosy palm she raises—
Why is she weeping, when she loves so much?
What has inspired her fine poetic praises?
Ah, baby fingers, 'tis your hallowed touch!

How kindly feel their eloquent caresses
To the bent brow with many a wrinkle cross'd!
Or roaming through the scant and hoary tresses,
Like summer buds amidst the winter frost—
Soft loving fingers to sad bosoms creeping!
Soothing some sorrow that is rankling there;
Tapping the cheeks grown wan with bitter weeping,
Nestling 'gainst hearts bowed down with worldly care.

Dear little children, bide with us for ever!
Slay with your meekness our unholy pride!
Nor time can rend, nor ruthless fate can sever,
The chain that binds us to the ingle-side,
Where from your love and innocence we borrow
Such sweets as strengthen us from year to year;
Few, few could bear their meed of toil and sorrow,
Dear little children, if ye were not here!

FANNY FORRESTER

AGAINST HERSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.
BY THE SEA.

MAGGIE was too ill and worn after her father's death to teach again for some time, and Herbert—somehow Herbert had been kind and considerate to her lately—who, now that she had lost her father seemed to think it was his business to look after her a little, insisted on her giving her pupils a six weeks' holiday.

"Dead!" said little Grace Fraser, when Maggie went to say good-bye to her—"is your poor papa dead?"

"Yes, dear," she answered.

"Then you'll never see him any more?"

"Yes, I hope I shall," she replied; "he has gone to heaven, where your little brother and sister are waiting for you. I hope I shall go there too some day, and then—then I shall see him again."

"Perhaps he'll come to the gate to meet you," said the child, wistfully, thinking of the manner in which she had been in the habit of meeting Maggie.

"I shall always remember those words of Gracie's," she thought, as she went back to Mrs. Ashbury's, where she was staying for the present; "they have comforted me almost more than any others." A little later, and Miss Campbell was going to Broadstairs to stay a month, and invited Hetty and Maggie to go with her, and they were glad to go.

"You will soon get strong again here, Maggie," Charley said, when they had been a week at the quiet little watering-place; "only fancy how nice it will be to take long walks when you are stronger—you, and I, and Hetty."

"No," she said, "I will let you go, and I will sit and look at the sea; I like that best." And she thought how pleasant it was to sit dreamily watching the waves as the tide came in and stole on, fold on fold, over and over the sand and shingle, just as time steals over our pleasantest days, till, like the vanishing shore, they are only a memory.

"Oh no," said Charley, "I shall make you go too—over the cliff to Margate, which is all windmills and pretty girls, and through the fields to Ramsgate; wouldn't you like that, Maggie? Fancy a good mouthful of sea-air and an eyeful of green with it, and all the daisies winking their yellow eyes at the sun."

"No," she said, "I would rather be quiet, and read of a day to dear Miss Charlotte, and sit on my favourite seat in the twilight." That was how Maggie passed her time, reading aloud to the blind woman (whom she had learnt to love dearly) in the day-time, and of an evening sitting on a seat, which she generally had to herself—a seat which stood, almost hidden from sight, on a bit of projecting rock to the right of Chandos Place.

"I do so wish we could rouse Maggie a little more," said Hetty; "she has grown so silent and sad, though she evidently tries her best to be cheerful, and her cheeks are as white still as they were six weeks ago, when poor uncle died."

"Well, Herbert is coming down by the eight o'clock train to-night; perhaps that'll do her good."

"I don't see why it should."

"She likes Herbert ever so much better than she used."

"Yes," said Hetty, "and Herbert thinks Maggie quite a wonder now, and he used to be almost patronising to her."

CHAPTER XXV.

"WHILE THE SANDS O' LIFE SHALL RUN."

"COME down to the station and meet Herbert, Maggie, it's half-past seven," Charley said, after dinner, when Miss Campbell was taking her evening doze.

"No, I am too tired," she answered; "I will wait for you all in my usual place." And when they had gone she wrapped a shawl around her, and betook herself to the seat on the cliff. It was a lovely evening, after the sultry day, with not a breath of air to stir the motionless boats. She could see nothing but the sea from where she sat, and the dim ships far away in the hazy distance. Yes, there was the crimson glow of the sunset lingering still in the west, and dipping down upon the water till she could fancy that every wave had flushed beneath the glory of heaven. "It looks like one of the portals of the eternal city," she said, and she thought of her father and of Gracie's words, "Perhaps he'll come to the gate to meet you." A soft breeze stole over the water with the first thin veil of twilight, and soothed and lulled her. It was very pleasant, sitting there alone. Now and then she heard the hum of voices, but the seat was almost hidden from sight, and they died away in the distance. Yes, how pleasant it was to go on—as one often does at evening time and most of all when by the sea—dreamily from thought to thought. She felt, too, while she sat there with only the sea before her and sky above her, nearer to the old world and the old life, nearer to the dear old man in heaven and to Stephen Bowden on the sea. She supposed he was on the sea still—she did not know—and if so, he too had the sound of the rushing waves in his ears and the breath of the soft wind upon his face. Why should she care about Stephen Bowden now, though; and why think of him at all, when she had resolved to shut him out of her heart for ever? Then there came into her head the verse of a song she had sung to him many a time—

"O last love! O first love!
My love with the true heart,
To think I have come to this your home,
And yet we are apart."

She did not know why she thought of it now; he had not been very true, so it had no connection with him, save that she was by the sea and he was on it. How foolish she was! for she felt, as she sat there in the summer twilight, that she would give all the world, even now, to see his face just once again, and, having seen it, to die before it faded from her memory. Oh, how life had cheated her! Then she roused herself a little; it was surely time for Herbert to come; it was getting dark; and how delicious was the sound of the crisp waves breaking upon the shore beneath! Ah, there was a footstep! She would pretend to let him take her by surprise. Yes, someone was coming to the seat at last.

"Maggie," said a voice that made her start to her feet.

She turned round, and there, facing her in the summer twilight, was Stephen Bowden. She put out her hands, on the impulse of the moment, over the back of the seat, then drew them quickly back.

"I thought you were far away," she said, simply, without even a shade of surprise in her voice.

"Did you?" he answered, coming round to the front of the seat, and sitting down beside her.

She drew her shawl closer around her, and pulled her hat lower down over her eyes, and watched the misty ships far out at sea again. He looked at her for a few minutes—at the sweet feminine face, which had grown pale and thin, and at the plaits of fair hair, which was disfigured by none of the inventions of modern days. She felt his eyes upon her, and longed—oh, how she longed—for him to break that silence in which her tears were gathering and her lips beginning to quiver! She turned round at last, with a gesture which was almost supplicating. Then he spoke, putting his arms gently round her.

"Maggie, I want you to take me back again."

"Oh no, no!" and she drew away from him, and put her hands up to her face to hide her tears, but they fell through her fingers.

"Yes you will, dear," he said; but she shook her head, and drew yet a little farther away.

Then he told her how he had only found the letter the day before he was to have left England, and how he had supposed that she was going to be married to Charley, and even seeing her at the Academy had borne out the idea, and how, when at the last moment Herbert had undeceived him, he had thrown up his passage and stayed in England.

"Ah, but you never trusted me," Maggie said; "that spoilt even our happiest days. I was afraid of my most innocent words and actions, lest you should misconstrue them. You would not believe in my honour or my word, though you might have done so—might, indeed, for I never had a thought that was treason to you, and loved you more than words can tell—more than I ever could again, for you have killed or starved out all the feeling that was in me."

"My dear child," he said, in the grave manner that had always been so grateful to her in former days, "I know perfectly now how wrong I was, better than you can tell me; but I did not think it possible you could care so much for me."

"But you must have seen that I did," she said, feeling herself giving way. "How could I help it?" and the tears came back; "and yet you would not believe in me or yourself."

"I was a great fool," he said, speaking to himself rather than to her.

"So was I," she said, quickly turning upon him, for she did not like to hear him accuse himself. Then he laughed the old pleasant laugh, which she had never hoped to hear again.

"Well, now that we have indulged in this mutual confession, don't you think we had better make it up?" he asked, entreatingly.

"No," she said, and looked out at the ships again, and thought they were as dim as bygone sorrows, when time and space have stretched between them and us.

"Turn round, Maggie," he said, beseechingly—he did not like being humble, but then he knew that it was due to her—"and say you care for me still; I believe you do, in spite of what you said just now: you women tell horrible fibs now and then. Turn round, I am so fond of you, Maggie!" He stopped, and followed the direction of her eyes, and put up a corner of her shawl over them. "Never mind those stupid ships," he said, and she, pushing away the shawl, gave one last look at them, and then, with a long long sigh of relief, put her hands in his.

"It was all my fault," she said, loving, as a woman does, to blame herself, or any one or anything, rather than the man she loves. "It was every bit my fault; I should not have concealed anything."

Maggie felt rather conscious, on the whole, when she returned to the house. She thought every one seemed to know about it. Charley looked up quickly, and, seeing the state of things, gave a sigh, for no one, not even Hetty, guessed how much he had cared for Maggie, though he had himself plainly seen the impossibility of all he had once wished, and he was very fond of Hetty—she was a dear little thing. Altogether, things could not well be better.

"It was too bad of you, Charley, not to tell me about Stephen," Hetty said, the next morning.

"Why, whenever did you know he had not left England?"

"Only a fortnight ago. No one knew it for a month; every one thought he'd gone. Then Herbert knew and told me, and I promised not to tell."

"It was very disagreeable of you," she pouted. "But why didn't he turn up before?"

"Why, you see, Maggie was poorly, and he thought it better to let her get over her father's death a little."

"Did you know he was coming last night?"

"Of course."

"Well, it was too bad of you, Charley, not to tell me; and I've half a mind not to tell you something, and to give you a good scolding."

"You may give me the scolding and welcome," he laughed, not in the least afraid of her wrath; "but tell me the secret."

"No, I won't."

"Yes, do, Hetty, there's a little duck, and then I'll give you something."

"What?"

"Tell me the secret first. I know you are dying to do so, and you will like what I'll promise to give you so much."

"Tell me what it is," she pleaded.

"Not till you have told me the secret," he said, firmly and grandly.

"Well, the Captain Gilbertson who bought Maggie's picture, 'Nearly Conquered,' and Stephen Bowden are one and the same person! So Maggie will get back the picture again. She was so sorry to sell it, you know. By the way, I don't think it is a secret."

"That was very well done of Bowden," said Charley.

"And now do tell me what you'll give me," she said, imploringly.

"Well, some day, soon, if you are a very good little girl indeed, I'll give you a wedding-ring, and put it on in a church for you," a remark which effectually subdued that usually irrepressible young lady for the next half-hour.

"Maggie," said Hetty, later in the day, when they were alone together, "do you remember what you said about it being easier to build a new idol than to put a shattered one together?—you don't think so now?"

"Yes I do," she answered, "but mine was never shattered;" and she thought of Stephen's observation the night before, and added, "We women tell dreadful fibs sometimes."

"Oh, I see," said the young chatterbox. "Well, now we are all going to be married. It is just like the end of a story."

"So it is," said Maggie, laughing.

And so it was.

THE END.

A BREAKING-UP SERMON.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"And every man went unto his own house."—JOHN vii. 53.

IF you will cast your eye over the chapter to which these words belong, you will find that the Feast of Tabernacles had just been held in Jerusalem. This feast, I believe, though not the most important, was the most popular, of the festivals appointed by the Mosaic Law. It was to the Jew very much what Christmas is to us. There was a great deal of eating and drinking, and merry-making about it. Many old customs were kept up, and others were added, as time went on. Amongst them was the ceremony of pouring out water in a golden ewer, from the pool of Siloam, and the display of some enormous lights, which were said to cast their glare over nearly the whole of the city. Altogether, the Feast of Tabernacles was a peculiarly joyous time; and, I am afraid I must add, that just as it is with ourselves at Christmas, and Easter, and Whitsuntide—the religious significance of the feast was too often forgotten in the merriment and self-indulgence which were considered to be peculiarly appropriate to the season.

Well, the festival was just over. From all parts of the country—from Hermon in the north, and Beersheba in the south; from the hilly sheep-walks on the other side of the Jordan, and indeed, from foreign lands as well, thousands upon thousands of Jews had crowded for several days within the walls of the sacred city. But now they were about to disperse. For more than a week they had been associated together—bad and good, rich and poor, young and old, thoughtful and thoughtless, religious and irreligious, merchants, artisans, lawyers, labourers, shepherds, hawkers, scholars, fishermen, scribes—men of every kind of character, of every grade of social position, of every shade of religious and ecclesiastical opinion, all had been drawn into contact with each other by this common object. Thus, they had been in Jerusalem, acting and reacting upon each other; some doing good and receiving good, others doing harm and receiving harm. But now the crowd is broken up. Every man has packed up his baggage, and gathered together his family, and is off to the quiet and retirement of his distant home.

Now the thing which I wish my younger hearers to notice—for I address myself especially to them—the thing which I wish you to notice is this:—That this week or ten days which the people had spent together had produced its effect, and left its trace upon each of them. They are going away, as we said, but they are not going away as they came. Each carries away with him to his own home an impression, be it for good or be it for evil, from the scenes he has passed through, and from the companions with whom he has associated, and from the things in which he has shared, and from the influences which he has yielded to or has resisted. The power with which human beings act upon each other, when they meet together in crowds and for a common purpose, is very great. And to this power, the Jews—who are now "breaking up," and going home—have been exposed. I ask you, then, to notice that the attendants at the festival do not return as they came. A stamp has been placed upon their spirit, an impulse has been given to their character, which was not there before.

Now if it be true—and I think it is—of men of maturer years, whose characters may be thought to be already formed, that when they meet in masses they influence each other greatly for good or for evil, much more will the statement be true of us in the earlier stages of our existence, when our minds are naturally more impressible, and when our characters may be said to be in the process of formation. Put boys together, in a large school, and when they emerge from it they will be very different from what they would have been had they been brought up under other and quieter circumstances. In some cases, no doubt—few cases I would fain hope—an injurious effect will be produced. A badly-disposed boy will become worse through his communication with others. He will corrupt, and be corrupted. But for the most part, the result will be good. The sympathy of numbers, the operation of public opinion (which is quite as strong in a school, if not stronger, than it is in outer life), the generous and honourable rivalry, the chivalrous feelings, which are called forth in elder boys for the protection and encouragement of the younger, the sentiment of loyalty to the old foundation, and the retribution with which anything mean, and false, and underhand, and tricky, is pretty sure sooner or later to be overtaken—all these things contribute their share to the formation of a true and manly character, fitted to take its place in the work and the conflict of the world.

Now we wish you, if you will, to think sometimes about this. Pray understand me. We do not wish you to be priggish and unnatural. Christianity does not try "to put old heads upon young shoulders," nor does it expect a boy to look at life in the same solemn, earnest, almost awe-struck way, that it demands of a man. Christianity wishes a boy to be a boy. But at the same time, Christianity expects of even the youngest boy, who can understand anything, that he should have his serious and thoughtful moments; that he should always act under a sense of duty; that he should recognise in a quiet, but real way, that he has a good and loving Father in heaven, and a gracious Saviour, to Whom he is bound to be loyal, devoted, and true. That is all we want. But if we get this, we get a great deal; and I will tell you what will be the result. You will look upon the time you spend here at school as a very important time. Not as a time for lessons, merely; though they will always be thought of conscientiously by a conscientious boy. Not merely as a time for making pleasant acquaintances and friendships, which shall endure through life; and certainly not as a time that you are to huddle and muddle through as best you can, feeling that the sooner you are out of it the better; but as a time in which you are being helped to become God-fearing and God-honouring Christian men, who, in the future, shall be a credit to the country to which they belong, and to the religion which they profess.

There is another thought, which I have to suggest to you, in connection with our subject; If you remember the chapter at all, you will remember that our Lord Jesus Christ put Himself very prominently forward at this feast. He proclaimed Himself as the Light of the World, and as the Dispenser of all spiritual grace and blessing to those who came to Him for it. And you will remember also that, in consequence of His making this announcement, there was a strife among the people, and a distinct separation of them into two parties, some taking one side, and some another; some attaching themselves to Christ, and others reviling and opposing Him. You see thus that these Jews, when they went away from Jerusalem, went away with very different feelings in their hearts, and those different feelings produced by what Jesus Christ had said about Himself. In other words, they did not go the same as they came. Some were the better and some were the worse, for having mingled with the crowd on the occasion of that particular Feast of Tabernacles. Some were the better, and some were the worse, for having heard the preaching of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Now this suggests to me a thought which is very important, and which I am anxious to impress upon you. You must be either the better or the worse for Jesus Christ. In a great variety of ways we are all called upon, and you younger ones as well, to make up your minds about Jesus Christ, and to side with Him, or side against Him. Not only in church, and by the voice of the preacher, though that is worth thinking about. Let the sermon be what it may, there are prayers, and there are lessons, and there is the name of Jesus Christ running like a golden thread through all. Every one in a Christian land knows what Jesus Christ expects of us; that He expects us to give ourselves to Him in a loving and loyal and entire consecration. And if any one, knowing that he has not done this—knowing that he is holding his heart back from Christ—comes into a Christian Church, and is present at an act of Christian worship, he cannot go out of the building the same as he entered in. He goes away home, the better or the worse—the better if he accepts Christ, the worse if he continues in the same state of indifference and unbelief.

But I am not speaking of church and services and sermons, only. In many ways and at many times you and I are called upon to take our side. The question is continually put to us, "Will you be for Christ, or will you be against Him?" The question is put to us in our schoolboy-days. It is put to us as we get older. It is put to us in our business, in our counting-houses, in our offices, in our family circles, in our moments of relaxation and amusement. For Christ? or against Him? And when a decision is thus demanded of us by circumstances, we cannot be as if it had never been asked, we cannot go away to our homes the same as we were before. My younger brethren, unhardened as you are as yet by the influences of the world, let there be no doubt in your mind upon this subject. You are young; but you must take your side. You must be for Christ, or against Him. Which is it to be? Not against Christ, surely! No. You will, all of you, I trust, manfully, but unostentatiously, take your side with Him, the gracious Saviour, Who loved you, and gave Himself for you.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XX. CHRIST DEALING WITH INDIVIDUALS. No. 4—JUDAS.

Scripture to be read—Matt. x., xxvii.; Mark x.; John xii., xiii. (parts of).

INTRODUCTION. Call the children's attention to the fact that almost all the Scripture characters hitherto noticed in these lessons have been good ones, though have seen that good people fall into sin. This lesson upon a man of whom hear nothing but bad.

I. HIS CALL. (Read Matt. x. 1—10.) Ask about the call of some of the other apostles—Nathaniel, the guileless (John i. 47); Peter, the fisherman, at the Sea of Galilee (Matt. iv. 18); Matthew, the publican, at the custom-house. Of Judas, nothing told; was one of the twelve called by name; allowed to follow Christ; called Iscariot from his native place, to distinguish from Jude, our Lord's brother; had all the privileges of the other apostles. What were these? (1) He shared Christ's life. Let children recall incidents when the apostles were all with Christ, e.g., the marriage in Cana (John ii.), the walking through the corn-fields, and numberless others. (2) He was sent out to preach. From the verses read, point out that Judas, like the rest, had to preach repentance, and had power of working miracles. So far seemed all right. As regards his privileges and opportunities was on a par with the other apostles.

II. HIS CHARACTER. (1) He was ambitious. (Read Mark x. 32—34.) This seems the simplest explanation of his joining Christ at all. Ask what Christ's first proclamation was (Matt. iv. 17). Who was the king to be? Judas must have heard of the wise men's search for the king (Matt. ii. 2). If Christ, a king, and could do such miracles, surely His followers would be great also. Judas had joined in the dispute—perhaps had started it—as to who should be the greatest (Mark ix. 34), but seeing a storm in distance, enemies gathering, and in last journey to Jerusalem hearing Christ announce His own death, determines to advance himself by his Master's fall, and betray Christ to His enemies. (2) He was covetous. (Read John xii. 3—8.) Question on the story, showing that Christ and apostles had a common purse—that Judas had managed to be allowed to take charge of it. Remind how Christ often had nowhere to sleep—would not be much money in it, yet enough to tempt Judas. Let the children see what the love of money led him to. (a) Inhumanity. He cared not for the poor, only for himself. (b) Basest treachery. (Read Matt. xxvi. 14—16.) Notice how he went to the chief priests deliberately—no yielding to sudden temptation by their coming to him; asked for money; willingly promised to betray Christ. (c) Hardness of heart. In order to show this clearly read the account of the Last Supper (John xiii. 21—30). (d) Hypocrisy. Question upon the scene of the betrayal in the Garden of Gethsemane (Luke xvii. 47, 48). A dark night; Christ praying under the olive-trees; three disciples a little way off asleep; Judas coming with a band of soldiers; lanterns flashing; swords gleaming; Judas coming up; the kiss; Christ's indignant question; His calm dignity; led away to the palace of high priest.

III. HIS END. (Read Matt. xxvii. 3—10.) Ask how Judas felt after betraying Christ—was this all that was necessary to repentance? What did John tell the people to do besides confessing their sins? Let the children give instances of persons thus changing their conduct, such as David, Peter, and others; then show how Judas felt remorse, but not repentance, or would have sought forgiveness. So Pharaoh was sorry, but did not let Israelites go (Exod. viii. 15). Herod was sorry, but cut off John's head (Matt. xiv. 9). For account of true godly sorrow see Rom. vii. 10. Then show how Judas broke sixth commandment by his suicide, and draw a lesson as to the sacredness of human life, and the awful sin of rushing into presence of Judge unrepentant.

IV. PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Individual responsibility. Show the children how Judas, being daily with Christ, hearing His words, even partaking of the Lord's Supper, was yet lost. Press this home to them to show that privileges, such as godly parents, the means of grace, &c., of themselves, cannot save, unless there is a turning of the soul to God. Each must give account of himself. (2) The danger of not checking sin. Show how the love of money led him on little by little; how it engrossed him, hardened his heart, and at last ruined him. Remind of our Lord's warnings and parables against the sin of covetousness. What is to be first in our thoughts? What did the other apostles give up for Christ, and how were they rewarded (Matt. xix. 29)?

Questions to be answered.

1. What privileges did Judas share with the other apostles?
2. Name his two besetting sins.
3. To what other sins did his covetousness lead him?
4. Contrast his sorrow with that of St. Peter.
5. Describe his miserable end.
6. What practical lessons does his life teach us?

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE death of Lilith Crichton, although long expected, was at the last so extremely sudden, from the rupture of a blood-vessel, that it was a long time before Una could realise that it had actually taken place. Then, stunned and bewildered by the shock, she went into the adjoining room to call the old nurse, who required but one glance at the lady's pale agitated face to understand what had happened. With a cry of dismay the faithful servant hurried away to tell the sad news to the rector and Hervey, while Una, sinking down into a chair, remained for a considerable period in a confused half-conscious state, quite unable to collect her thoughts.

She leant back in her seat, silent and motionless, hearing indistinctly the lamentations of those who came to look on the lifeless form of her they had loved so well, and then the sounds ceased, and she heard only the footsteps of the women who were performing the last offices for the dead. After a time the rector came in to speak to her, his usually stern face softened by emotion, and Una looked up at him deprecatingly as she said, "There was not time to call you indeed; it was so terribly sudden; she had been speaking with quite a strong voice almost the instant before."

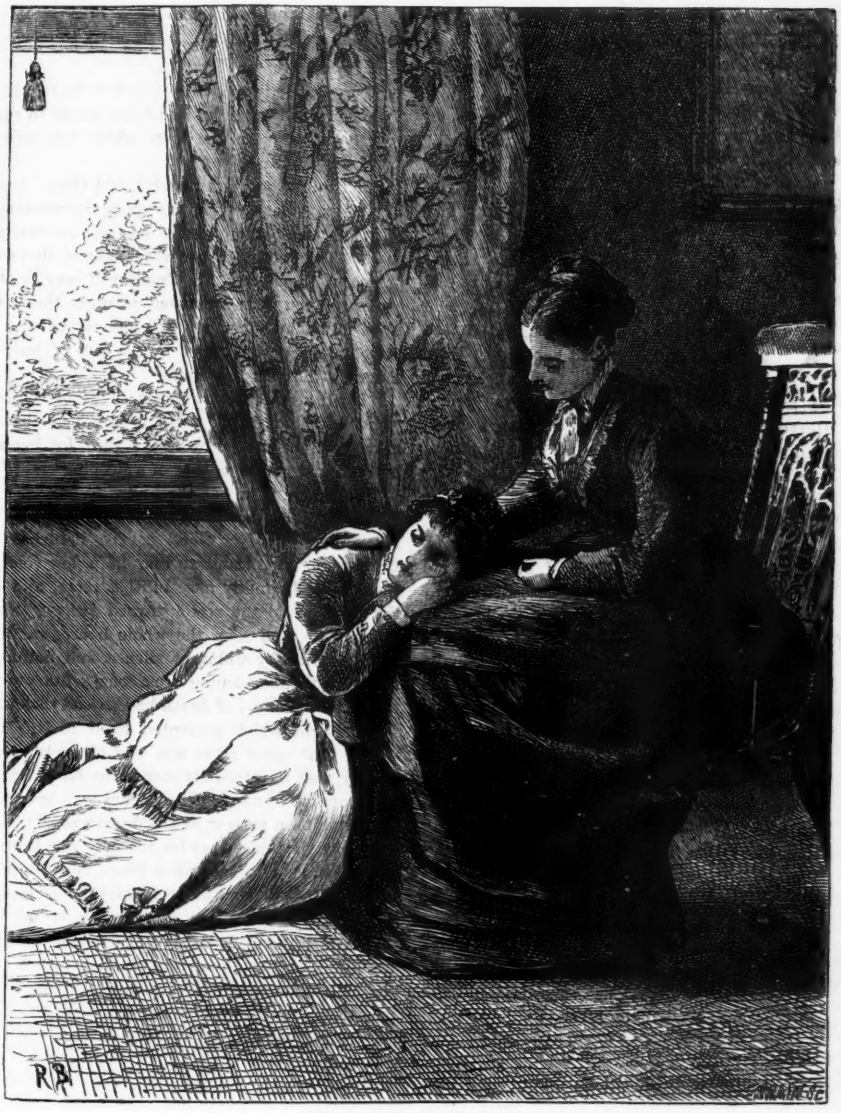
"I know," he said; "the doctors warned us that the end would probably be a sudden attack of this kind, and there were indications to-day that something of the sort was impending, which was my motive for sending to ask you to come at once, and it was well I did, or it would have been too late." A shiver passed through Una's frame as he spoke. She could hardly feel glad that she had been in time, for she knew instinctively that this last meeting with Lilith would have an influence on herself and her destiny which she dreaded even while she could not resist it.

"I am sure that Lilith at least is happy," she said, with a sigh, "she seemed so wonderfully joyous in the very act of dying."

"Yes, I solemnly believe she has gone to her reward, and never did a soul more truly without guile pass to its Maker. She knows now the exquisite bliss of those who have suffered for conscience' sake, and the departing spirit seems to have left the stamp of its ineffable peace on her face: she looks like an angel reposing."

"May I go to her?" said Una, lifting her heavy head from the chair.

"Certainly, if you wish it; but there are still some hours till daylight, and I was going to suggest your lying down in the room which has been prepared for you."



"If I might do what I wish," said Una, "I should like to stay alone in Lilith's room till morning. I want to think over all she has said to me, and I shall feel the power of her words best in that solemn presence. Some day, Mr. Crichton, I may be able to explain to you what a momentous night this is likely to be to me, and then you will understand why I ask leave to usurp your place by the side of your dead sister for the next few hours."

"I will cede it to you willingly," said the rector; "and I do not think there is any fear that your nerves will be shaken by such a vigil, for her aspect is sweet and gentle as that of a sleeping child."

"And there is no one there?"

"No; my brother has gone to his room, and I will give orders that you shall not be disturbed," and Una, rising up, thanked him in a low voice, and then walked quietly into Lilith's room, and closed the door, while the rector turned away to his own apartments, and soon the whole house was hushed into its ordinary midnight silence, and nothing but the veiled light shining from one solitary window told that the angel of death had passed that way.

The sight which presented itself to Una Dysart within that quiet room was one of such unearthly beauty, that she stood for many minutes gazing on it quite unable to move. It is a fact well known to all who have been present at the departure of those who have died in peace, that for the first few hours after the great change has taken place, the countenance becomes invested with an indescribable loveliness, which seems like a sort of reflection of the beauty and light into which the ransomed soul has entered. It does not last long, and human words cannot attempt to portray it, but none ever looked on that unearthly beauty without feeling that it is a gleam from paradise itself, which falls through the opening gates as they close on the new inmate of the blessed sphere. This lovely wondrous look was on the face of Lilith Crichton, as she lay with her blue eyes only half veiled by the white lids, and a little soft smile, almost playful in its meaning sweetness, giving expression to her silent lips. She did not appear to be either asleep or dead, but only resting in the consciousness of some marvellous secret, which shed over her whole being an inexpressible serenity and bliss, while the white lilies with which they had filled the little pleading hands that had so often been raised in prayer, were not more pure and stainless than she seemed in her snowy draperies, with all her fair hair falling round her like a veil. Truly the sight, in its perfection of peace, was one to fill with sorrowful envy the hearts of those yet living in this difficult world, yet struggling with sin and temptation; and as Una drew near the quiet little bed and fell on her knees by Lilith's side, the cry went up out of the very depths of her labouring soul, "Oh, my God, make my life as pure and true as hers was, that my death, when it comes at last, may be as peaceful and as blest!"

(Drawn by ROBERT BARNES)

"Then Lilith died for him!"—p. 731.

Una Dysart was no wilful self-deceiver, and far as she had fallen from her own standard of right, by means of the sophistries with which she had stifled her conscience, she knew in that solemn hour that if the prayer wrung from her lips by the sight of the blessed dead were to be aught but a mockery of Him to whom she made it, she had now to look into her life and see wherein it failed to meet the requirements of His most holy law; and she did so. Kneeling there with her face buried in her hands, she commenced a rigid uncompromising scrutiny into her own past actions and future purposes, with all the motives that had prompted them, tearing off the veil from her inmost heart, and judging herself with unsparing severity. She had asked that her life might be pure and true as Lilith's, who had sacrificed that life and all that made it dear rather than so much as connive at evil, when once it became known to her, and Una saw that her own first departure from that truth and purity had been in the hour when by the dim sea-shore she stretched out her arms towards Atherstone's distant home, and registered the vow in her secret heart that she would devote her one only life to him alone, whatever might be the cost of principle it would involve.

Her trial and temptation at that hour had been precisely the same as Lilith's, with but the immaterial difference that she knew not what was the exact nature of the wrong which she would share with Atherstone if she were united to him. But she did know, from his own words, that there would have been even more of connivance with evil in her marriage to him, than there could have been in Lilith's with Rupert Northcote; yet she had fallen where the timid gentle-natured girl stood upright, and she had returned to England fully determined to become the wife of Atherstone, if, as she had every reason to expect, he still desired it; then, following the downward course of those who once depart from perfect obedience to the laws of righteousness, she saw how she had committed a far more glaring sin against justice in withholding from Atherstone the information contained in Miss Amherst's letter. Therein had she not shown in truth that she loved him better than she loved her God, since to save him from suffering and loss, she had held back the Atherstone estates from their rightful owner, defrauded him and his child of their true name and position, and acted a falsehood towards Humphrey himself, by concealing from him her knowledge of the wrong he was unconsciously doing to his uncle's heir? In the clear light that seemed to shine into her soul in that solemn hour she recognised the utter hollowness of the fallacies wherewith she had deluded herself into the guilty silence that now appeared to her in so dark an aspect. The justice of Edward Atherstone's claim could in no way be affected by his personal unworthiness, and the pain which Humphrey might suffer in giving up his people to so hard a master, could never make it right that he should retain that which was not his, or that she should hide from him the bitter truth of his usurped possession.

The very same lesson which Trafford had taught to Atherstone himself was now being made known to Una by the silent teaching of those death-closed lips. She saw that the principles of righteousness are ours as unerring guides in every difficulty, but that with the results of our obedience to those principles we have absolutely nothing to do, they can in no sense be affected by human action, for they spring from that essential holiness which is the attribute of God alone, and they are incapable of modification and change.

Una knew well, as she looked at Lilith, that the rapturous peace upon her softly smiling face was due entirely to the saintly constancy with which the simple child had held to the highest standard of right, at the expense of happiness and life; and she felt that she must follow in her steps along the straight and narrow path of purest equity, if she too would win that serene blessedness to be her everlasting portion. She did not hesitate for a moment as to what her future course must be; once convicted of her error she was ready to repair it. She was no longer called upon, as Lilith had been, to make the sacrifice of her love for conscience' sake, since already it had been deprived of all hope or joy by Atherstone's mysterious desertion, but she was bound to suffer in the infliction of that pain on him which she believed he would inevitably feel when he received Miss Amherst's letter. She resolved to send it to him at once, and if she still retained his dear remembrance in her heart, as she felt she must, she would at least no longer suffer it to be so fatal an influence upon her life as it had been since he had left her. Her repining, her despondency, her enervating uselessness, should all give place to a loyal devotion to her Master's service, for it was to her as though her eyes, following Lilith's redeemed spirit in its flight to the sinless realms, had caught a glimpse of that pure deathless love which alone can satisfy the immortal soul, and in the light of whose eternal beauty the world and all its joys seem scarcely worth a thought.

There was a foretaste of peace and rest already in Una's heart when at last she rose from her knees and went towards the window, to see if this night, which had been so momentous to herself, as well as to her friend, were near to its close. Lilith's last earthly mission was accomplished, and already it was bearing fruit within her own awakened soul, and as she raised the blind a crimson light from the eastern glow fell full on the marble countenance of the dead, flushing it as with hues of life, and Una felt it did but symbolise the dawn of that eternal day on which she had surely entered, who, simple and unpretending as she was, had been able by her blameless truth and purity to exercise so great an influence for good upon the lives of others. She stooped, and gave one kiss to the cold brow, and then turned away to lose no time in obeying the silent teaching of Lilith's stainless life.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Una Dysart's first act on returning to her home from Torquay was to enclose Miss Amherst's letter to Humphrey Atherstone, and send it to the Abbey, with directions that it was to be immediately forwarded to the absent master.

She wrote inside the envelope the briefest possible sentence from herself, merely saying that it was her painful duty to send him the document she enclosed, for she felt that in the very delicate position in which she was placed towards him it was simply impossible that she could write to him, on this or any other subject. She could not tell him why she had so long delayed conveying to him a communication of such extreme importance, although he would plainly see from the date of the post-mark, that it had been in her possession some months. It was a hard and bitter duty to perform in whatever way she did it; but if she could have dreamt how completely Atherstone would misunderstand her whole conduct in the matter, it would have caused her suffering almost too great to be endured. She had hardly dispatched it, however, when the current of her thoughts was changed by the arrival of Wil. Northcote, who came in, with her bright face sad and anxious, to ask Una to tell her the particulars of Lilith Crichton's last moments.

This was not altogether an easy task for Miss Dysart, as she shrank from letting Wil. have the pain of hearing what had passed respecting her brother Rupert; so she told her friend in few words how blessed and peaceful had been the departure of that gentle spirit, like the calm setting of a bright pure star into the glory of the opening dawn; and when she had finished the account, she looked up, to meet Wil.'s dark eyes fixed on her with a keen and eager gaze.

"Una," she said, "you have not told me all, and you have omitted just that which it most concerns me to hear; for I know that Lilith must have spoken of my brother. I feel but too certain," her voice trembled as she spoke, "that he had quite as much share in her death as he has had in bringing sorrow and gloom on our house. Tell me all she said."

"Dear Wil., I am afraid it would pain you very much if I did; I wish you would not ask me."

Wil. flung herself down on the ground at Una's side, and putting her arms round her waist, she looked up at her with an earnest pleading expression. "Una, listen to me," she said, "I know already all that you can have to tell me of Rupert's error; it has been the bitterest trial I have ever known, and I can well imagine in how dark an aspect it would appear to one so pure and true as Lilith Crichton; but I cannot help hoping that her death may have a powerful influence on him for good, if only you will help me in bringing it home to him."

"It might well do that if he could have seen her die as I did," replied Una. "I know that she has wrought a work in me which will alter my whole life; she has opened my eyes to errors of my own, as great, perhaps, as your poor brother's, and made me long to repair them; but, oh! above all, Wil., she has taught me how little it matters whether we pass through our brief earthly course in sunshine or in gloom, if only we live so as to win at last the love which lights eternity—the love that cannot die."

"Then she has done for you all that Mr. Trafford's teaching has done for me," said Wil.; "you would hardly imagine how differently he has made me look at all things here from what I used to do. I was then only bent on using life for pleasure and excitement, and I had but one ruling motive in all I did, and that was to get my own way at all times, cost what it might; but now—his words have been like flames of fire burning out my frivolity and selfishness, and showing me that I am not my own, but His who bought me with the price once paid on Calvary; and now, dear Una, I want only to be good," and she hid her face on her friend's lap.

"I think you are very good, little Wil.," said Una, fondly, "and I can well understand the influence such a man as Mr. Trafford would have over any one. I have been afraid of him hitherto, just because of his uncompromising goodness; but I mean to ask his help and advice now."

"You will like him so much! but, Una, you will not scruple any more to tell me all that passed between Lilith and yourself."

And Una told her; word for word she detailed their interview, and described the sudden passing of the martyr's spirit to its great reward, and as she finished, Wil. burst into tears, exclaiming, "Then Lilith died for him; and surely not in vain! It cannot be but that the sacrifice has been accepted, and she will save Rupert by her death instead of making him happy by her life. Oh, Una, you must help us in this, you will not fail us I am sure, you will bring him back, my dear and only brother!"

"I would do anything I could for you, dear Wil., but I do not understand. What is it you wish me to attempt?"

"I will explain it all," said Wil., and, rising up, she took a seat quietly by Una's side. "I suppose you do not know what happened to Rupert after he and Lilith parted?"

"No, I know only what she told me, and that she never saw him or heard of him again."

"He left the Manor that same day, without taking leave of any of us, and we never knew where he was till I received a letter from him written at Vienna; but long before that came his great fault became known to us." Wil. flushed crimson as she spoke, and Una pressed her hand in sympathy. "Great as it was," she continued, "I think he tried to appease his conscience by the fact that he knew the money would all be his ultimately, and that it was only his father's name he used unwarrantably."

"I know how one makes false excuses to oneself," said Una, mournfully; "but when one comes to look without flinching on the glory of truth, one sees that it cannot admit of so much as a speck on its purity."

"No, I feel that," said Wil., sighing, "and so does my father. He was perfectly furious when he came to know what Rupert had done, and his anger was increased by hearing that my unhappy brother was squandering his ill-gotten money in the most reckless and even wicked manner at Vienna, and it ended in my father writing him a terrible letter, telling him he would have nothing more to do with him, and that he never wished to see his face again."

"I am sure he does not feel that now," said Una.

"No, indeed; he has bitterly repented of it long ago. But Rupert has never written to any of us since he received it, and my poor father is breaking his heart about him, I know very well," and Wil. burst into tears as she spoke.

"But surely he will come back, dearest Wil.; he can never bear to be an exile for life."

"My whole hope is in you," said Wil., drying her eyes, "and I am sure you will do what you can."

"Indeed I will, if you will tell me how."

"Well, I want you to write to him and tell him the whole history of Lilith's death; he would think it only natural that you should do so, as you alone were there, and, indeed, it seems almost due to Lilith; for I believe if she had lived a few minutes longer she would have given you some message for him."

"Probably she would," said Una, thoughtfully; "I think she would have tried to win him to follow in her steps."

"And that is just what I want you to do yourself, dear Una. If you will describe the whole scene, and the effects her martyrdom in the cause of truth has had upon yourself, I cannot help hoping that the example of her pure saintliness will act on him as powerfully as it did on you; for my poor Rupert has noble qualities, believe me, Una, only he has never cared to think of religion, or of anything beyond this life at all; and I feel sure that the thought of Lilith reaping at her Master's feet the eternal reward of her constancy and suffering, must awaken him to a sense of the tremendous importance of that future state, and its bearing on our existence here. I am sure if only he would so think of it all as to repent and turn to God he would feel that he must have the forgiveness of his earthly father no less than that of his Father in heaven."

"And do you authorise me to tell him that your father would forgive him?"

"Oh yes! if Rupert would but give up his evil habits and come back to us, my father and mother both would welcome him with all their hearts; he was never publicly disgraced, for, of course, our agent was instructed to pay the money he got unlawfully at once, and no questions were asked. I am certain that if he would only express regret in an open manly way to his parents for all the past, and show that he was changed, the whole affair would be entirely condoned and forgotten, and we should be so happy; it would be like new life to us all."

"Well, dearest Wil., since you feel quite certain he would not be offended at my writing to him under the circumstances, I will do so, and you may be sure I shall do my utmost to bring him back to you; it is what Lilith prayed for daily, I am certain, and I earnestly hope I may succeed."

"Oh, I hope you may! and, Una, you will make another person besides us happy if you do. You will not be surprised to hear that I am engaged to Hervey Crichton."

"No, I quite expected to be told so; I am so glad, dear Wil. I suppose you will be married when the mourning for Lilith is over?"

"Only if you succeed in bringing Rupert back to us, for it seems to me impossible that I should leave my father and mother while their only other child is completely lost to them, and they are so unhappy about him; I have not the heart to desert them in their loneliness, much as I love Hervey."

"I can well fancy it would be like taking away their last gleam of sunshine, if you left them, Wil."

"That is what they say, though they would not prevent my going if I wished it; but I cannot bear to leave them alone in their sorrow, and yet you see I have a terrible prospect before me in a few months, if Rupert does not come to take my place, for Hervey's regiment is ordered to India, and how am I ever to endure it, if he has to go away for years and years without me!" Poor Wil. broke down completely as she spoke, and hid her face in her hands, sobbing aloud.

"Darling Wil.," exclaimed Una, "do be comforted, for I will do all I possibly can to bring your brother back; I am sure the thought of you will give me eloquence, and if he comes all will be well, will it not? Your parents will not feel the separation from you nearly so much when he is restored to them."

"Oh no! for Rupert, their only son, has always been a great deal more to them than ever I could be; if he were with them I should go to my Hervey with such a light heart!"

"And so you shall," said Una, "if I can compass it by any means; meantime, you must be brave and hopeful." (To be continued.)

COMFORT IN SORROW.*—II.

THE volume we are considering abounds in practical lessons such as these, regulating sorrow, teaching the continued life and union between those who remain and those who have gone before, and endeavouring constantly to impress on those to whom she writes how God is ever a present help in time of trouble. How strong, well-regulated, and sober was the mind of her, which appears also to be so tender and susceptible, we have remarkable evidence in two or three letters. For instance, in writing to one suffering under mental depression arising from bodily weakness, she writes these words of sound advice, which we commend heartily to all who are under depression:—

"I have just been reading an interesting article on physical pain by Dr. Anstie, in which the whole cause of your present state is given in a few words: 'The brain which has been labouring beyond its strength, has really been consuming its tissue faster than nutrition can repair it, until at last it comes to have an imperfect energy, owing to want of material in itself, and the result is a condition of the nervous system which, as far as its outward symptoms go, clearly resembles the irritative stage of inflammatory disease, with pale, cold, shrunken skin, and a tendency to shiver.' Now, dearest ——, in looking mournfully at your present state (and I know too well by experience how sad it seems to ourself) you have been making the mistake of supposing that the spirit is in fault, and also you have attributed too much to an apparently inadequate cause. The spirit has no more to do with it than if you had none. It comes entirely from physical causes, and the secret is in the lines under-marked above. Had the excitement and fatigue you have been going through come upon you by itself, you would have had some bad headaches, and have got over it. But your lifelong overworked brain had not recovered enough nutrition to enable you to bear any fresh strain, and has therefore collapsed for a time. Do not, I entreat you, struggle against it, as if you were in a bad state of mind. Do not attempt to read the Bible, still less to gather up any meaning out of the words; and as for prayer, your whole state is a prayer. Your 'pitiful' Father is not so straitened in His understanding of your frame, as to need words from you to tell Him how wretched you are. In your state, I would just kneel down for one minute, or even less—not say a word—but the very act of kneeling brings a tenderness, and nearness, and submission over the spirit—a drawing nigh. I would do this several times a day, merely saying, 'Lord, help me;' or, 'Lord, Thou seest and knowest;' or, 'Lord, undertake for me;' or, 'Lord, have mercy.' Not that these words are needed; but the act of using them, even if the mind is not in them, becomes a help. Do not attempt to remain kneeling—it is too exhausting a position for your brain and spine just now. But one moment does good; it puts the heart en rapport where it craves to be, and gives a tender fellowship to the feelings. You should creep out when the sun shines, as often in the day as you can, for a quarter of an hour at a time.

"With regard to reading, I should recommend you to avoid all devotional books, or any that require an attention, either of feeling or intellect, which you cannot now give. By yielding yourself for a short time to reading of a light kind, and foregoing all other until you have a desire for it, you will be giving gentle 'nutrition' to the impaired brain, and enabling it for greater exercises. Again and again, dearest ——, let me entreat you to put away the wretched thought that you are in a bad or sinful state of mind. It is a sore trial to bear patiently the state now upon you (which comes sometimes by heavy sorrow as well as from illness). But it is one you can only remedy by patient submission, using the means for gently restoring the impaired organ; and as it gains strength, the other functions will begin to act, and you will be able to feel and think. Above all, don't force yourself to any act of thinking or feeling. You would only protract the state and produce a worse reaction. Accept your present state from His gracious hands who permits it. 'Even so, Father,' teach me to bear it, to endure it, and to wait Thy time to remove it."

Here, too, are some thoughts in relation to work that are excellent:—

"I have no faith in your work remedy, dear. Work that 'lulls sensation' from its continuity may indeed be useful for a madman; but his is not a normal state, his is not a state reflecting the image of the God of life and order, but one in which all is confusion and dismay. The one pattern, the express image of God, which we are to follow, how different from that! Growth, progressive maturity, the branch putting forth its tender buds, then its leaves, after them the flowers, and so out of the whole comes the fruit which is for the healing of the nations.

"Work, unless done for God, as appointed by Him, can only harden the spirit and encrust the soul; but done in His name, and because He has given it, the most distasteful becomes a means of grace, an opportunity of following Him who 'pleased not Himself;' and, walking in His footsteps, we see a light shining on the path which seemed all dark.

"But even the work of Christ would not have been perfect without the pauses which He took, the breath-takings of His soul in that weary ascent to glory of the three years of public life. And no less in this are we called to follow Him, than in the active labour."

In writing to another friend, the authoress incidentally shows what culture had been bestowed on a mind so fitted to profit by it.

* "Words of Hope and Comfort to those in Sorrow." London: Hurst and Blackett. 1874.

"Let me congratulate you on your Eastern studies, of which I once tasted the delights. I read a portion of the Gospels in Syriac, wishing to get the nearest possible to Hebrew in the New Testament, as it was my greatest delight to read the Old Testament daily in the original. But from the pressure of other duties it was laid aside. My good grammar and lexicon are now all that remain to bear witness to those happy hours, and the heavy tides of sorrow which have swept over me of late have effaced the memory of much, and even of the Hebrew, with which I was once happily so familiar. I remember I found it a help in both languages to write the Hebrew equivalent against the Syriac roots in my lexicon, especially as, being a Latin one (for want of an English one), my imperfect remembrance of the Latin of early years made me need the help of the language I knew best, which then was Hebrew."

But on no subject does she write more tenderly, more pathetically, or more in the spirit of a resigned faithfulness in the support of God, than on that of her own deepest bereavement—that which made her a widow. Here her heart pours itself out to fellow-sufferers with a fulness and a depth of feeling and commiseration that show how she has herself been tried, and how she has been sustained, disciplined into a calmer trust, a more abiding rest upon God, and thus tasting the blessedness of His chastening discipline. One such letter we cannot forbear giving at length.

"Long as you have dreaded this hour, certain as you have been of its approach, you are now feeling as if you were quite unprepared for it, as if it had come only too suddenly. And so would it have been if your beloved one had been continued with you for weeks longer—we are never prepared to part. But, dear friend, He who has called His servant home to Himself, has prepared for you all that you need in this hour of woe. He has been beforehand in laying up for you just the help you require, and He will supply it to you now, hour by hour, as the first bewildering sense of loss becomes more definite realisation of what is gone, and how the whole life is in one sense gone too, and blank desolation seems all that is left. But though the outward presence of the beloved is gone from us, the hidden life which bound us together remains; and since, 'whether we live or die, we are the Lord's,' and we have our Saviour's gracious promise, 'Because I live, ye shall live also,' we have no need to live a separate life from those out of sight. In Him we are still one. For them He has heard our anxious, loving desires, and has full-filled them all by taking them to Himself, freeing them from sin, and imperfection, and suffering, and giving them that completion and satisfaction in His presence for which they longed when they were here. We cannot grudge them their blessedness there, when here we would have died to procure them good. Rather we will thank Him for doing so far better for them than by our poor love; and will beseech Him to hold our lonely goings so near to Himself, that we, too, even in our desolation, may thank Him for His supporting tenderness, and feel sure that we are not alone, 'for the Father is with us.'"

Yet that she felt very keenly "the deep still under-current of a great sorrow which can rarely give outward tokens of its presence, but which has altered the whole course of life," is abundantly manifest throughout this little book. And though the blank in life which such bereavements leave can never be filled up, she yet knew in her own case, as she told to others would be in theirs, that when the first passionate grief had exhausted itself, the relations of those griefs and losses to actual life would become part of oneself, "not hindering a participation in the outward life around, but hallowing all with the sense of a Presence not of earth, but yet more real, and influencing the actions with the highest motives."

This is thoroughly, profoundly true; how thoroughly and profoundly they only can know over whom "all God's waves" have gone, leaving them wounded and bleeding indeed, but yet buoyant upon the ocean of life. We could willingly, did space permit us, quote more largely from this most interesting and instructive volume. Most fittingly will we come to a close, with the closing scenes of a life of great personal holiness, by exhibiting those glimpses of resignation and thankfulness, through weakness and suffering, light in darkness, glory in trial, short utterings of joy, praise, gratitude, in the short broken thoughts penned when writing was a labour, like the short broken gaspings for breath that preceded her death.

"A new meaning has been given to me to that word, 'He giveth life and breath, and all things'—now that I have to ask for breath to get through every movement, and to pause again and again till it comes."

And again, a few months after—

"Such abounding mercies and comforts on every side! I want my heart swelled out bigger, to be able to give thanks."

And again, when strength was failing, and pain increasing, here are her words of cheerful resignation:—

"I can hardly bear the word sufferings, as applied to mine, when I think of what I have seen in the cottages—lingering consumption in close rooms swarming with children, and discomfort, and noise; and then see this 'calm decay,' and the blessed stillness permitted to me!"

On the 15th of February, 1864, she writes:—

"I had some sharp experience of breathless struggles last night, which have left me a poor panting creature to-day; but when 'need is nigh, aid is nigh,' and I only pray for more patience and stillness. The Lord bless and sustain you, beloved friend! Please always ask for me to have ever-increasing stillness of spirit and body, so that I may not yield to restlessness as the suffering gradually increases."

And then the last recorded utterance to a beloved friend is like a triumphant song of light and life as the hour of darkness and death approaches:—

"Thus it is ever—life springs out of death—would that we could better realise that life is the reality, death the shadow cast by time, but to be dispersed by the sight of Him in whom is no darkness at all."

We cannot more appropriately close this notice than in the words which the loving sister who edits this book writes of her:—

"After thus glorifying her God and Saviour by her life and conversation, she was called to glorify Him in acute and protracted suffering, by patience which never failed, and by faith and hope which grew brighter and brighter to the end.

"Those who knew her sweet life, and were blessed by her holy example, will feel how meagre is this faint sketch of one whom to know was as surely to love. Many there are who now bless God for her friendship, and who attribute to her teaching the impulse given them to run their Christian course with zeal and perseverance; whilst others, who were in deep tribulation, speak of the help and comfort she was able to bring them, both from her own abounding sympathy, and from her power of leading them to the God of all consolation."

STORIES OF "THE QUIVER COT."

ONE poor girl of eight was suffering sadly with bad eyes. I went to her, and put my hand on her shoulder. She put up her own, and caressed mine, saying, pitifully, "I aint naughty—I aint naughty, but I am so ill, so bad, I can't get better; I do try to be good!" I said what I could to console her, and on my next visit she recognised me, and beckoned me to her bed, saying, "I'm better to-day; I tried to be good, and now I aint quite so bad in my eyes." One little girl said she liked to be there, but wanted to see her father every day, "because he missed her so." I suggested that she should try to get well as soon as possible, but to my great astonishment she said, "If he forgets me, I don't want to get well;" and on inquiry I found that her nurse had told her that she couldn't go home in less than a month, and that when her baby-brother had been dead a month, "she couldn't remember his face," so she feared that her father would also forget her, and then her life would cease to be of any consequence. We had a chat, and I left her much comforted by my most positive assurance that fathers and mothers never forget their little girls' faces in a much longer time. One child, who had a bad knee, told me she was going home as soon as it was cured, adding, "It may be cured to-morrow." Happily she is very contented, for it will be many "to-morrows" before she leaves her cot.

A little girl of nine, who went with me, made friends with many of the children. After half an hour spent in the ward, matters had advanced sufficiently for me to hear, "Edith, come here; are you going to stop a long time?" "No," said Edie, "we must go now, I think; perhaps I may be brought again to see you." The little patient, with a sunny smile, remarked, "I shall cry when you go." Edith laughed heartily, and the child joined in the merriment, nor do I think she could cry, though she tried hard. Many eyes watched my healthy little lady, stepping about so lightly, and she was much amused by confidential remarks about her clothes; and on our departure I was bidden to "bring her again, please."

When I first went up to the boys' ward, Willie C. was playing with the house-surgeon. At first he did not see me, and I waited till the fun was over—a mock trial of strength over a handkerchief. When Willie was tired, the doctor moved away, and then the little boy saw a visitor standing alone, and looked with shy eyes furtively until he was sure of my identity, and then his dear little face lighted up, and his tiny hand, a little larger than of old, was stretched out, and with his large eyes full of tears, he said, "I thought you was never coming again to see me." Among many other bits of news, he told me he was going to be sent into the country, to Kendley, and he was so glad, though he was happy there, "for there's nothing like the real country." And now, in these pleasant warm days, Willie is in the country, getting stronger, we hope and trust, though we may not say that he will ever be able to earn his own living. He bade me a kind farewell, and asked me to give his love to all the good people who had paid money for his cot, and to thank them. He introduced me to some of his special friends and favourites; one merry, spoilt boy, who was formerly here, and who had been re-admitted, told me that "Willie was a brick," and then asked me to lend him my umbrella, saying, solemnly, "How can I lie here in the rain?" It was raining, and Tom's joke, caused some other little boys to hold up tiny hands, to see whether the ward ceiling was waterproof or not. I told them the story of the lazy Arab, who was asked by his wife to see if it rained, and being too lazy to see, called a dog who was passing, and felt its coat. That story was a success, for I afterwards heard a merry little voice suggest that the cat could go out and find if it rained or not.

Willie's opposite neighbour, a little boy who looked terribly ill, repeated one request in various forms a whole afternoon. The doctor was busy with bottles at the fireplace. "Doctor, I want to go home; you can take me home, doctor." "Indeed, Johnny, I don't think I could find the way," this was said in very tender, soothing tones. "Oh yes," gasped the poor little thing; "you carry me, and I'll show you which way." This was rather keen, so the doctor tried another argument. "Well, you see, your mother brought you for me to make you better, so you must get better first." "I can get better quicker at home with mother," said poor Johnny, who is nervous, and objects to painful remedies, too late applied probably. "Well, Johnny dear," says the doctor, using his last shot, "you see your mother has taken away your clothes." Indefatigable Johnny!

XUM

"Well, take me home in a blanket—I could go home in a blanket." With that idea Johnny lay down again, and the doctor retreated. I endeavoured to reconcile dear Johnny to his surroundings by tales of previous Johnnies. No use. The one sentence was sounded in my ears till I also retreated—"Take me home yourself then in a blanket." Louis lay under the open umbrella, while I talked to Willie, putting in a word now and then, declaring that he could remember the days when I used to live in the hospital and tell them fairy tales. Quite a mistake, as Willie calmly said, so we concluded that Louis had been dreaming. I asked Willie what I should say to THE QUIVER readers about his having been in the cot so long. "Tell them I have tried to be good, and I hadn't anywhere else to go to." I often wonder what will eventually be Willie's fate, should he live to grow up. I wish some rich and good person would "endow" Willie, settle a small sum for life upon the little man, that he may never have to suffer pain and want when his present friends have passed away or can no longer help him. His home affairs are more deplorable than ever, for his mother had to give up the ward scrubbing some time ago, for want of strength to do it well enough. Whether he will return to Great Ormond Street or not I do not know.

The present "Quiver Cot" patient is a dear little boy of eight, Benjamin B. He has had excision of the knee, a very tedious and painful operation, wherein the joint is removed, I believe, to save amputation of the leg. Recovery from this operation is always slow, and great care is needed to keep the patient in health. Little Ben is not a clever or brilliant child, and I have no little speeches of his to record, but he bears his pain well and quietly, and is grateful for his pleasant home. He comes out of the great miserable parish of St. Luke's, and must find the wards comparative paradise. By-and-by he will be less shy, and perhaps we shall get at some of his ideas; at present his days and nights are long and full of pain, poor little man. Dear Willie takes an interest in his successor, and writes that he is a little better.

I must add one little incident that occurred, to my knowledge, connected with the hospital. A little child, who had been an in-patient some time ago, and was quite recovered, went to see the dying mother of a little friend. Some neighbour was making a poultice to relieve the poor suffering woman, and the child stood and watched for a moment; at last the said to the unskilful nurse, "Let me make it, I used to watch nurse make mine in the hospital, and she didn't do it so." The woman gave in, and the little nurse of seven proved very efficient, and for several weeks she waited on the sick neighbour, and ministered, not only to her body, but to her soul, in a way that only a child perhaps could have done, for the woman would see no "minister of the Gospel," so called, but was, as far as we may judge, led by what the little child could teach her into the way of "repentance that worketh salvation." By the teaching of a little child she became as one, and died in the faith of her own childhood. M. S.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

310. Find a parallel phrase in another minor prophet to that in Micah: "We will walk in the name of the Lord our God for ever and ever."

311. The fact that the Lord Jesus on one occasion treated with coldness an individual who came to Him imploring the exercise of His miraculous power on behalf of an afflicted one is recorded by two of the Evangelists. Give the passages.

312. Show that the custom of having a common purse, which was adopted by the early converts at Jerusalem, did not prevent great poverty being felt by some of them.

313. "When thou buildest a new house," said Moses, "then thou shalt make a battlement for thy roof, that thou bring not blood upon thy house, if any man fall from thence" (Deut. xxii. 8). Give the name of a Jewish king who—notwithstanding that precaution—fell from the upper chamber and died.

314. Name a few of the duties which the Jews performed upon the housetops.

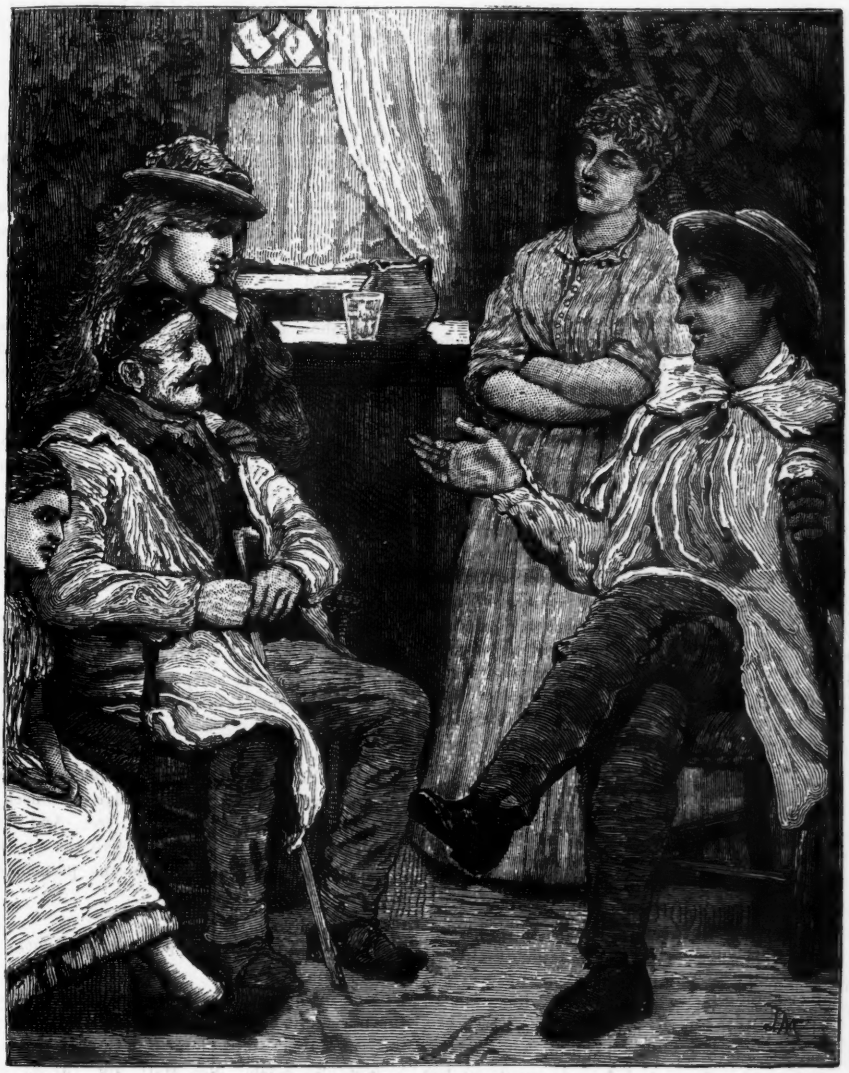
315. "And there came also Nicodemus," we read in John xix. 39, "and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes," for the purpose of preserving Christ's body. Show that this was unnecessary.

316. Where do we first meet with the title of the "anointed," or Messiah, applied to the Mediator?

317. "Ye have heard the blasphemy," said the high priest when the Saviour declared Himself to be the Son of God: "What think ye? And they all condemned Him to death." Give the passage in which Moses decreed death as the punishment of blasphemy.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 704.

299. Ezek. xx. 25.



300. "Ye hypocrites" (Matt. xv. 7).

301. Just after rebuking St. Peter. See Matt. xvi. 26.

302. The whole. See Matt. xiv. 13—33; Mark vi. 34—44; Luke ix. 12—17; John vi. 1—14.

303. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings" &c. (Ps. viii. 2). See Matt xxi. 15, 16.

304. "Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God" (Matt. xvi. 16); "Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God" (John vi. 69).

(Drawn by J. MACBETH.)

EARLY DAYS.

AY, then, as our days began to shine
At Meldon, we gaily looked, in mind,
To years coming on in longsome line,
With few that we yet had left behind.

We planted the walnut-tree, knee-tall,
That now showers nuts in longsome fall;
The cypress we set, to see it rise
House-high as the years went by.

The stream, that from woody slopes onwound,
By willowy meads, or mounds, to wend
Where under some church-bells' Sunday sound
Some house overroof'd an early friend.
The many-miled road, that climbed the hill,
Or fell by the bridge or stream-side mill,
Reached on by the milestone's mossy face,
The way to some friends yet gay.

In spring when the Easter wind blew dry,
Or shed a few drops of glittering rain,
Or under the Whitsuntide's blue sky
Lay flowery field or dusty lane.

Or else at the feast, if all might fay,
We took from our work a holiday,
To go and to see how some old friend
Might fare, and his life might wear.

Of earlier friends we find, about
The land, only two or three in ten,
But children come in, for elders out,
To fill up the losing world again.
And we, at our death losses bewail—
Lost faces, and not lives' lower tale,
And many must be the souls in bliss
Whose day never wears away.

EXTRACTS FROM AN EXPOSITOR'S NOTE-BOOK.—VII.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, NOTTINGHAM, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC. ETC.

FREEDOM BY OBEDIENCE—(concluded.)

BUT the passage suggests another line of thought. Our whole life is under law to God, and to keep the law is to be free. But, as we apprehend our life, there is much in it which does not come under any precise and formulated law. Between the things we ought to do, and the things we ought not to do, there lies a large province of what we call "things indifferent"—things, that is, which one man may rightly do, and another may just as rightly not do; a large province in which, to our apprehension at least, the Divine law does not run, or runs with a wavering and uncertain authority. There are many actions which, as St. Paul reminds us, some good men hold to be sinful, and to these they are sinful; yet to other equally good men these same actions do not seem sinful, and to these they are not sinful. In his time, this debatable province of things, this spiritual no-man's land, this tract which lay beyond the scope of definite law, consisted of questions about Sabbaths and feasts, about meats offered to idols and sold in markets, about marriage and celibacy. In our day, this dubious province of thought and action includes questions of what may and may not be done on Sundays, about dress and conformity to fashion, about what books should or should not be read, about what amusements are lawful and what unlawful. There are still weak brethren, and, oh! how many weak sisters, in the Church to whom these questions are of the gravest moment; and there are still strong brethren and sisters who can hardly discuss them with gravity. But on one point we are all deeply concerned, whether we be weak or strong—viz., that we ascertain what should be our ruling principles, and what our animating spirit, in relation to these doubtful disputations. For we may be very sure that, even in this province, God's law does run, though we cannot always clearly discern it; we may be very sure that it is not indifferent to Him how we handle even things indifferent.

And here the Psalmist helps us with a suggestion. He suggests that, in this dubious and debatable province of things indifferent, as everywhere else, only those can "walk at large" who are seeking God's commandments. There are many persons weakly good, and whom God is trying to make stronger, that He may make them better, who really do not seek His commandments. How should they seek for what they hold, or think they hold, in their hand? They believe in Christ,—at least they believe the little they know about Him; they try to do His will—at least what little they know of His will. But they do not much care to know more; they do not study His Word with intelligent and earnest devotion, seeking to acquaint themselves with the whole counsel of His will. They are much occupied with trifles or with truisms, with the first rudiments of the faith, with the few dogmas with which they are already familiar, or with the forms and observances, the maxims and rules, which they find helpful to their weakness; and they shrink from aught that sounds new or large or strong. They carry a tiny lantern in their hand, often a dark lantern, though the true light burns in it, by whose aid they painfully pick their steps along a path they would fear to walk were they not accustomed to it. Their lantern casts shadows on their companions, or a light which only partly illuminates them, so that they often misjudge even those who walk by their side; and if any of these, with stronger feet and seeing the path more clearly, should take a swifter pace and go before them, they are both offended and dismayed. Their friends are leaving them, and therefore they must be leaving the true path.

Their friends are using a liberty which they never permit themselves, and therefore they must be breaking through the hedge of the commandments. They cannot read profound theological books without being tempted to doubt, and therefore no good man will read them—no, not even those whose duty it is to test or to confute them. They cannot talk cheerfully, or take a pleasant walk, or listen to the tale of another's troubles on Sunday, without losing the devout spirit they brought with them from church; and therefore it is sinful to do all this. They cannot go into a certain kind of society, without being conformed to this present world; and therefore no sincere Christian can go into it or partake its recreations.

Now these weak brethren and sisters are quite right; and yet they are altogether wrong. The rules they would impose on others may be very good rules for them, and probably are good for them. If they cannot seek God and His commandments, that is, if they cannot find God and keep His commandments, in certain societies, occupations, amusements, beyond all question they should abstain from them; and their stronger brethren, so far from despising them, should honour them for their abstinence. But they must not make their weakness a law for strength. If they are humble as well as weak—and who should be humble and self-distrustful if not the infirm?—they will not demand, they will not desire, to give the time and to measure out the stride by which the whole army of the living God is to order its march. They will, rather, smilingly bid the strong go forward and conquer new provinces of thought and action for God, while they bring up the rear, or "tarry with the staff." Their lantern may be both little and dark, yet it may hold the true light; and they do well to walk by the light it sheds; but they must not mistake their lantern for the sun, and fret and fume if the whole Church does not walk by its beams. It may be day for others, while it is still dusk with them. And if the night still linger over us all, there are other and even larger lanterns than theirs, strange and incredible as that may seem to them. There are stars as well as lanterns, and the wise may guide their course by a star when the simple need a lamp.

Those who sincerely seek God's commandments may safely walk at large, though only these. If in things indifferent, as in all things else, they make it their supreme aim to find God and do His will; they will not go astray, He will suffer none of their steps to slip, although they walk in untramelled freedom.

Two men are sent to a distant city. One longs with an undivided heart to be there; the other would like indeed to be there, but would almost as soon go somewhere else. To the second of these men it may be wise to give careful guidance and stringent commands, to bid him take this road and then that, to forbid him to linger in any too pleasant spot by the way. But you need not give such commands to the first of the two, or bind him with rules and prohibitions. You may leave him to find the road for himself, to pause where he will, to gather what flowers and take what refreshment he will by the way; for you are very sure that he will not waste time, nor linger unduly by the way, nor stop short of his destination. He may safely walk at large who seeks, and seeks first, the city and kingdom of God.

Two men start up a mountain. The one has heard of the glorious prospect to be seen from the summit, till an overmastering desire to behold it has drawn him from his common round and daily task. The other would like to see the prospect well enough, but he is fond of flowers and ferns, rocks and streams; he loves valleys as well as hills; loves rest above all. He therefore may need to have rules and orders, to be forbidden to leave an appointed track, or to amuse himself by gathering the sweet mountain grasses and flowers, or to repose save at certain prescribed halting-places and for definite periods of time. But you need lay down no rules for the other. He will not dally with the flowers, though he may pick one now and then, and be refreshed with its odour; nor will he linger by the streams, though he may now and then sip of their pure waters. He will not leave the path, except it be to take a steeper yet shorter way. He will not lie lapped in drowsy slumbers till the day be past, nor let occasion slip. You may trust him to "walk at large," for he seeks the prospect, and his strong desire will carry him on, and up, till he reach the summit of the mountain and looks down on the broad and varied scenes beneath his feet.

And, in like manner, a weak Christian who loves God, but also loves the world; a weak brother who wishes to do God's will, but would like to have his own will too, who cares almost as much for business as for worship; or a weak sister who loves her children or her husband at least as well as she loves the Saviour; or who tries to keep a few commandments, but hardly cares to know more, lest she should have to keep these too—such an one needs rules, needs stringent commands and prohibitions, needs to be forbidden this society or that, needs to have this affection weakened or that. But a strong Christian, who loves God so sincerely and supremely that he has given up much for God's sake and the Gospel's, who earnestly studies God's Word that he may acquaint himself with the whole counsel of God's will, and who holds high above all other aims the ambition to grow like Christ and to serve Him—he may be left to walk in liberty. Because he seek's God's commandments, because he takes God and the love of God wherever he goes, he may go where he will. Because he seeks, in all he does, to do it as to God, he may do what he will. We need not fetter him with the rules which our weakness makes very requisite and serviceable for us. We cannot judge him without condemning ourselves. We cannot check him without injuring ourselves. He is climbing the mountain on which our feet stand, but he is far before us; we cannot see him clearly, nor what he does, nor why he does it. To us he may seem to be indolently standing still, when he is climbing stoutly upward, or is only pausing for a moment to select the best line to take. He may even seem to us to have left the clear and direct line of ascent, but it may be that he has only left it to avoid some peril which we cannot discern, or to help a fallen and wearied brother, to reclaim the erring, or to put his strength at the service of weakness. Let us not judge him any more. We know that he loves and seeks God's commandments; he may have given such proof of that as we cannot give yet: and, knowing that, let us leave him, with our prayers and good wishes, to walk in the freedom wherewith God has made him free.

And thus we arrive once more at the old conclusion of charity. Let the strong consider and help the weak; but let not the weak hinder and judge the strong. Nay, let us all, whether strong or weak, take hands, and walk together as far as we can: and, when we must part, let the strong go forward to make an easier path for the weak, while the weak, in their turn, help the strong with their cordial good wishes and prayers; until, at last, we all come to that happy kingdom in which weakness is unknown, and all walk at large because all both seek and find the commandments of God.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

XII.—WITH LOST LAMBS.

ONLY quite lately I had to write about the old French colony in Spitalfields, and of the changes that have come over entire neighbourhoods which were once associated with what is now a failing industry, or rather with one which, so far as London is concerned, has nearly died out altogether.

Not that the public has ceased to hear sundry reports of those quarters of the metropolis of which the name of Bethnal Green is an indication as suggesting dire poverty, neglected dwellings, poorly-paid callings, and constant distress. Some few years ago it became quite a fashion for newspaper special reporters (following in the wake of one or two writers who had begun to tell the world something of the truth of what they knew of these sad regions) to make sudden amateur excursions beyond Shoreditch, for the purpose of picking up material for "lurid" articles about foul tenements, fever, hunger, want, and crime. Bethnal Green became quite a by-word, even at the West End, and certain spasmodic efforts in the direction of charitable relief were made by well-meaning people, so that for a time there was danger of a new kind of demoralisation of the "low neighbourhood," and the price of lodgings, even in the wretched tenements of its notorious streets, were expected to rise in proportion to the demand made by immigrants from other less favoured localities, to which the special correspondent had not at that time penetrated. One good work was effected by the attention of sanitary authorities being called to the fever dens during a time of terrible epidemic, and a certain provision of medical aid, together with purification of drains, whitewashing of rooms, and clearing of styes and dustheaps, was the result. This was but temporary, however; and those who best know the neighbourhood lying between Shoreditch and Bethnal Green, and disclaimed by the local authorities of both because of its misery and dilapidation, are also aware that in various parts of the whole great district from the Hackney Road to Bishopsgate, and so embracing Spitalfields and part of Whitechapel, far away to Mile End and "Twig Folly," there can be discovered more of want, hunger, and disease, than could exist in any free city under heaven, if men were not such hypocrites as to defy and disregard the laws which yet they claim to have a hand in framing, and a power to enforce.

Only those who are personally acquainted with such a district can conceive what is the condition of the children of its streets, and yet every ordinary wayfarer of the London thoroughfares may note to what a life some of them are committed. About the outskirts of the markets, round the entrances to railway stations, cowering in the shadows of dark arches, or scrambling and begging by the doors of gin-shops and taverns, the boys—and what is even worse, the girls—are to be seen daily and nightly, uncared for, till they have learnt how to claim the attention of a paternal government by an offence against the law. When once the child, who is a mere unnoted fraction of the population, has so far matriculated in crime as to warrant the interposition of the police, he or she becomes an integer of sufficient importance to be dealt with by a magistrate. Let an infancy of neglect and starvation lead to the reckless pilfering of a scrap of food from a counter, or the abstraction of something eatable or saleable from a market-cart or a porter's sack, and the little unclassified wretch is added as another unit to a body recognised, and in some sense cared for, by the State. As a member of the great "criminal class," the juvenile thief becomes of immediate importance. Even though the few juvenile criminal reformatories be full, the gaol doors are open, and the teachings of evil companionship are consummated by the prison brand. The individual war against society gains strength and purpose, for society itself has acknowledged and resented it. The child has entered on a career, and unless some extra legal interposition shall succeed in changing the course of the juvenile offender by assuming a better guardianship, the boy may become the habitual thief, the full-fledged London ruffian; the girl —— ?

It was with a deep sense of the terrible significance of this question, that a small party of earnest gentlemen met, twenty-seven years ago, in that foul neighbourhood to which I have referred, to consider what should be done to rescue the deserted and destitute girls, some of whom had already been induced to attend a ragged school, which was held in a dilapidated building that had once been a stable.

These thoughtful workers included among them two men of practical experience; one of them, Mr. H. R. Williams, the treasurer of the present institution, the other the Rev. William Tyler, whose bright genial presence has long been a power among the poor of that district, where even the little ragged children of the streets follow him, and lisp out his name as the faithful shepherd, who both gives and labours in one of the truest "cures of souls" to be found in all great London. To them soon came the present honorary secretary, Mr. J. H. Lloyd, a gentleman already familiar with teaching the poor in a neighbouring district no less wretched and neglected. They were the right men for the business in hand, and therefore they began by moving sluggish boards and commissions to put in force the sanitary laws—and, in spite of the opposition of landlords with vested interests in vile tenements let out to whole families of lodgers from garret to basement, and with the malignant opposition of owners of hovels where every abomination was rife, and pigs littered in the yards, while costermongers shared the cellars with their donkeys—insisted on the surrounding streets being paved and drained, and some of the houses being whitewashed and made weather-proof.

Nothing less could have been done, for the terrible cholera epidemic was already raging in that tangle of courts and alleys. Application was at once made for a share from the Mansion House Relief Fund, and the committee had to use every available shilling in order to supply food and medicine, blankets and clothing, to the wretched families; to visit whom, a regular relief corps was organised, carrying on its beneficent and self-denying work until the plague began to be stayed. Then, with scarcely any money, but with unabated hope and fervid faith, this little company of men and women began to consider what they should do to found a Refuge for the children (many of them orphans, and quite friendless) who were everywhere to be seen wandering about, or alone and utterly destitute in the bare rooms that had been their homes. There were already certain institutions to which boys could be sent, for then, as now, the provision for boys was far greater than for girls. This is one of the strange, almost inexplicable, conditions of charitable effort, and at that time it was so obvious which was the greater need, that the committee at once determined to commence a building on a waste piece of land which had been purchased close by, and to devote it to the reception of thirty destitute girls, who should be snatched from deadly contamination, and from the association of thieves and depraved companions.

Surely, if slowly, the work went on, the plan of the building being so prepared that it could be extended as the means of meeting the growing need increased. Almost every brick was laid with thoughtful care, and when subscriptions came slowly in, the funds were furnished among the committee themselves rather than that the sound of plane and hammer should cease; till at last, when the King Edward Ragged School and Girls' Refuge was completed, a large edifice of three spacious storeys had superseded the old ruinous stable amidst its fœtid yards and sheds, and, what was more, the building was paid for, and a family of children had been gathered within its sheltering walls. Only fifteen, and at the time of my first visit to the institution no more than twenty had been taken into this Refuge; but every foot of the building was utilised until the money should be forthcoming to add to the dormitories, and enable the committee to fulfil the purpose that it had in view.

In the large square-paved playground forty happy little members of the infant-school were marching to the slow music of a nursery song; and the numbers on the books were 196, in addition to 304 girls who came daily to be instructed in the great school-room, where they were taught to read, and write, and sew. A hundred and twenty boys were also being taught in the Ragged Church opposite, while seventy children over fifteen years of age attended evening classes, forty-two young men and women were in the Bible class, and a penny bank, a library of books, and a benevolent fund for the relief of poor children in the neighbourhood, were branches of the parent institution.

This, however, was five years ago, and since that time, so greatly has the work flourished, that the Ragged and Infant Schools have premises of their own on the other side of the way; and the great building having been completed by the addition of an entire wing, its original purpose is accomplished, and it is "The Girl's Refuge," of the King Edward Certified Industrial and Ragged Schools, Albert Street, Spitalfields.

It is to the receipt of munificent anonymous donations that the committee owe the completion of the building; and in order to extend the usefulness of their Refuge they have certified it under the provisions of the Industrial Schools Act of 1866. That this was in accordance with their ruling principle of making the most of every advantage at their command may be shown by the fact that when the School Board, almost appalled at the need for making immediate use of any existing organisation, began to send cases to existing "Homes," only eight of these institutions could receive the children, and in these eight no more than forty-four vacancies existed for Protestant girls. The consequence of opening the King Edward Refuge under the Act has been that it has received nearly all the cases of the year, and that in the twelve months since it was certified ninety new inmates have found an asylum within its walls.

If you were to go there with me to-day, you would not wonder that the supporters of this institution are anxious to erect another building in some part of London where another hundred lambs straying in this great wilderness could be taken to the fold. Passing through the neat dormitories, with their rows of clean white beds; peeping into the big toy cupboard, where the kindly treasurer has recently placed a whole family of eighty dolls and other attractive inventions to induce children to play, some of whom have never known before what play really meant; looking at the lavatory with its long rows of basins let into slate slabs, and each with its towel and clean bag for brush and comb; noting the quiet "Infirmary," with its two or three beds so seldom needed, and remarking that from topmost floor to the great laundry with its troughs and tubs, a constant supply of hot water provides alike for warmth and cleanliness, I begin to wonder what must be the first sensations of a poor little dazed homeless wanderer on being admitted, washed, fed, and neatly clothed. Why, the two kitchens—that one with the big range, where most of the cooking is done, and the other cosy farmhouse-looking nook, with its air of comfort—must be a revelation to all the senses at once. Then there are the highly-coloured prints on the walls, the singing of the grace before meat; the regular and wholesome food; the discipline (one little rebel is already in bed, whither she has been sent for misconduct, and an elder girl demurely brings up her slice of bread and mug of milk and water on a plate); the provision for recreation; the occasional visits of parents (many of them unworthy of the name) at stated seasons; the outings to the park, the Bethnal Green Museum, and other places; the Christmas treat; the summer presents of great baskets of fruit; the rewards and prizes; even the daily instruction in such domestic work as fits them for becoming useful household servants; what a wonderful change must all these things present to the children of the streets, whose short lives have often been less cared for than those of the beasts that perish! Everywhere there are marks of order, from the neat wire baskets at the foot of each bed in which the girls place their folded clothes before retiring to rest, to the wardrobe closets and the great trays of stale bread and butter just ready for tea. Everywhere there are evidences of care and loving kindness, from the invalid wheel-chair—the gift of the treasurer to the infirmary—to the splendid quality of the "long kidney" potatoes in the bucket, where they are awaiting the arrival of to-morrow's roast mutton, three days being meat dinner days, while one is a bread and cheese, and two are farinaceous pudding days.

As we sit here and sip our tea—for I am invited to tea with the committee—and are waited on by three neat and pretty modest little women—one of them, a girl of eight, so full of child-like grace and simplicity that there would be some danger of her being spoiled if she were not quite used to a little petting—who can help looking at the inmates now assembling quite quietly at the other end of the room, and thinking that in some of those faces "their angels," long invisible because of neglect and wrong, are once more looking through, calm, happy, and with a hope that maketh not ashamed. Do you see that still rather sullen-looking girl of thirteen? She came here an incorrigible young thief—her father, a tanner's labourer, and out at work from five in the morning—her mother bedridden—her home was the streets—her companions a gang of juvenile thieves such as haunt Bermondsey, and make an offshoot of the population of a place till recently called "Little Hell."

That girl, aged ten, was sent out to beg and to sing songs, and was an adept in the art of pretending to have lost money. There is the daughter of a crossing-sweeper, who cut his throat, and yonder a child of nine, driven from home, and charged with stealing as her sister also is, in another Refuge; and close by are two girls, also sisters, who were found fatherless and destitute, wandering about famishing and homeless, except for a wretched room, with nothing in it but two heaps of foul straw. I need not multiply cases; and but for the known power of love and true human interest, in which the very Divine love is incarnated, you would wonder where some of these children obtained their quiet docile manner, their fearless but modest demeanour, their bright, quiet, sweet faces.

One case only let me mention, and we will go quietly away, to think of what may be done in such a place by the discipline of this love and true Christian interest. Do you see that emaciated little creature—the pale, pinched shadow of a child sitting at a table, where some of her companions tend her very gently? She is the daughter of a woman who is an incorrigible beggar. She has never known a home, and for four out of her eight years of life has been dragged about the street an infant mendicant; has slept in common lodging-houses; and in her awful experience could have told of thieves' kitchens, of low taverns, and of the customs of those vile haunts where she had learnt the language of obscenity and depravity. But that has become a hideous, almost forgotten, dream, and she is about to awaken to a reality in a world to which the present tenderness with which she is cared for is but the lowest threshold. It is only a question of a month or two perhaps. One more bright sunny holiday with her schoolmates in the pleasant garden of the treasurer, at Highgate—whither they all go for a whole happy day in the summer—and she will be in the very land of light before the next haytime comes round. She wants for nothing—wine and fruit and delicate fare are sent for her by kind sympathetic hands, but she is wearing away, not with pain, but with the exhaustion of vital power, through the privations of the streets. From the Refuge she will go home—a lost lamb found and carried to the eternal fold.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XXI. CHRIST, A MAN OF SORROW.

Chapters to be read—Luke ii.; Mark xiv. (parts of).

INTRODUCTION. Refer to Is. liii. 3—7 to show what was prophesied about Christ; then ask for different kinds of suffering—viz. (a) of body, caused by pain, accident, illness, &c.; (b) of mind, caused by fear, anxiety, disappointment, &c.; (c) of soul, caused by grief, distress for sin, &c. These may all be drawn from the children, with examples of each. Shall now see what share Christ had in them all.

I. BODILY SUFFERING. (Read Luke ii. 1—7). Ask the children to describe the familiar scene of Christ's birth, to show the poverty, neglect, and suffering attending it. Contrast with the birth of a prince or nobleman's son now, to show how His life must have begun with suffering, caused by want of many comforts. Then refer briefly to Christ's circumcision, to show how he endured all that man did. Ask at what age He began public ministry. Where had He lived all that time? This poverty and obscurity were a training for future life. Ask the children to name some bodily pains and sufferings, and then show what Christ endured. Refer to John iv. 6 for His fatigue. Ask where He often spent the night, and why, not having a lodging. Refer to homeless people in London as the most miserable outcasts, so showing how in these bodily sufferings our Lord endured in His life the lowest degradation. Then read from John xix. 28—37 the tale of the crucifixion. Tell of the Saviour being fastened by cords to the cross; his hands and feet pierced by nails; the cross then lifted up in the air, and dashed into the socket. Describe the slow, painful, lingering death, reserved for slaves and the worst of malefactors. Between whom was He crucified? Remind of the awful thirst (ver. 28). Tell of the soldiers—perhaps out of some slight feeling of pity—offering hyssop to stupefy, and thus lull the pain. Did he drink it? Would not shorten the pain one moment.

Practical. (1) Ask why Christ endured all this suffering? When did suffering enter the world (Gen. iii. 17—19)? Hence show that it is a punishment of sin. But had Christ sinned? Still must endure all the consequences of sin as part of the atonement for sin. Therefore let children see how their sufferings are all part of the curse, and learn the sinfulness of sin. (2) What effect does suffering have? Remind of Jacob obtaining birthright by a fraud; obliged to leave home; disciplined by twenty years' banishment. Why, then, did Christ suffer? To undergo all pain, to be made perfect through suffering (Heb. ii. 10). Bring this home to the children who have many children's trials and sufferings. Show that sickness, disappointment, loss of friends, poverty, &c., are all sent from God to teach us—to draw our hearts away from the world and towards heaven, and remind of sympathy of Christ.

II. MENTAL SUFFERINGS. (Read Mark xiv. 43—50.) The scene in the garden may be pictured out or shown from a picture; the three disciples asleep; Christ praying under the olive-trees; the traitor approaching with the armed band; the treachereus kiss; the Saviour taken prisoner; Peter's hasty defence; the apostle's flight (ver. 50). Then read Luke xxii. 54—62, and describe Peter's denial. The trial going on in the palace of high priest; Peter outside in the court; the fire with crowd of servants round; the thrice-repeated question and denial; then the Lord's look (ver. 61), and Peter's repentance. From these two scenes show how Christ must have suffered disappointment from the treachery of Judas' desertion of all, denial of Peter. Just when wanted friends most, all, even beloved disciple John and bold Peter, forsook Him. Remind how John came back, was present at the cross, and told to take care of His mother; but hear no more of Peter till after the resurrection. What a trial this must have been to Christ—disappointed in His best friends.

Practical. We profess to be Christ's friends; to love Him and serve Him; to be willing to follow Him; to fight under His banner against His enemies. What are they? Is He ever disappointed in us? Do boys at school always take His side against cheating, bad words, impurity, &c. Do girls always confess Him, and live to Him instead of to themselves in the world? Also all, like Christ, meet with disappointment in friends. Who is it that sticks closer than a brother? He can never fail—is the same to-day and for ever (Heb. xiii. 7).

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the different kinds of suffering.
2. Show some of the bodily pains endured by Christ.
3. When did suffering enter the world?
4. Why did Christ suffer?
5. What mental suffering did Christ undergo?
6. Give any practical lessons taught us.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

UNA DYSART lavished the whole ardour of her generous sympathetic nature on the mission which had been imposed upon her by Wilhelmina Northcote. The very fact that she had resigned all hope of happiness for herself, made her the more anxious to promote that of her friend, and she felt deeply also for the poor old squire, who seemed completely broken down by the painful estrangement from his beloved son; the only person to whom he had ever spoken on the subject was Mr. Trafford, whose wonderful power of winning confidence had not been exercised in vain, even on the stout-hearted country gentleman, and Una was therefore aware that the clergyman knew all the circumstances of Rupert's fault. This being the case, she felt very anxious to have his powerful help in the difficult task she had undertaken, and, with Wil.'s complete concurrence, she determined to take her letter to him, and ask him to enclose it to Rupert in one from himself which would add weight to her earnest entreaties that he would return to his home, and gladden the hearts of those to whom he was still unchangeably dear.

Una sat up late into the night after she saw Wil. writing her letter, in which she gave a detailed account of the circumstances of Lilith's death, and of all that the young girl had said to her before she passed away; and the next morning she set out at an early hour, when she knew she would find Mr. Trafford at the parish school, to ask him to forward it to Rupert Northcote.

The cool sweet air refreshed Una's tired eyes, and the sunshine streamed upon her in all its summer radiance as she walked along. But she looked on the bright landscape with very different feelings from those with which, one year before, she would have gazed on such a scene, for the last few weeks had taught her to look beyond this world for the fulfilment of that ardent desire of happiness which she had once so confidingly fixed on the love that seemed to have failed her utterly. She felt, however, as if the fair beauty of the calm clear morning impressed itself upon her mind with that sense of mysterious sympathy in Nature, of which we are all sometimes conscious, when the spirit, the breath of God within us, asserts its power over our lower being. It seemed to offer her a faint reflection and foretaste of the eternal loveliness of the true Home, where the aching regret that lay so heavy on her heart could never enter; and as she lifted her eyes to the blue limpid sky, where the snowy clouds seemed like the white angel wings that had borne Lilith to her blissful rest, Una almost hoped that the happy ransomed soul could look down through those lucid depths, to see with joy the fruit her bright example had already borne.

The school-house was near the church, and the door stood wide open, to admit the fresh air, so that Una's entrance was not perceived as she stood for a moment looking, with a smile, at the scene. Mr. Trafford sat at the end of the room, surrounded by an eager group of the smallest children, who were crowding about him with fearless confidence; a chubby little one sat on his knee, and two or three others clung to his disengaged hand, while the rest listened with upturned animated looks to the low kind voice, that was telling them how the Good Shepherd loved His little lambs, and watched over them day by day. Una could hardly believe that this was the stern preacher who could denounce with such scathing words the pleasant vices of the world, and of whom she had been so much afraid. He detected her presence before she was aware of it, but he made no movement to come to her till he had finished all he wished to tell the children; his keen eye noted, however, the charming picture she made as she stood there framed in by the doorway, with the soft light of her sunny smile brightening the sweet face that had acquired a new spiritual beauty since the pure winds of heaven had blown in suffering upon her soul. Presently he rose; at a gentle sign from his hand the children melted away from around him, and coming forward to Miss Dysart, he asked her in his frank cordial manner if he could be of any use to her. When she answered that she was anxious for a few minutes' conversation with him, he led the way into the garden attached to the school-house, where there was a seat under a shady tree.

(Drawn by R. Barnes.)

"A chubby little one sat on his knee."—p. 746.

"This will be more agreeable than the atmosphere of the school-room," he said, "and no one will disturb us here. Now, what can I do for you?"

Then Una told him all that had passed at Lilith's death-scene, and the conversation that had taken place between herself and Wil. Northcote the previous day; finally she gave him the letter she had written to Rupert, and begged of him to read it, and if he approved of it, to send it with one from himself. Trafford went slowly and carefully over the clearly-written pages, with a joyful light stealing into his eyes, as if he were receiving the assurance of some unexpected good fortune to himself, and when he had finished it, he turned with a bright smile to Una, saying, "I hardly think it possible that so beautiful and pathetic a history can fail of its effect on this young man, especially as the blessed death of this pure-hearted girl touches him in every way so nearly, and I am most thankful that an effort will be made at last to win him back. I never saw him, but his case has lain very heavy on my heart for his father's sake, as well as his own. If I had not feared that he would resent the interference of a stranger, I should have gone to him myself long ago; I am very much inclined now, however, to take your letter as my credentials, and go to him at once, instead of writing, as you propose."

"But he is at Vienna!" said Una, opening her eyes wide; "have you forgotten what a long fatiguing journey it is to go there?"

"Don't you think St. Paul's example teaches us that part of the duty of the messengers of Christ is to be 'in journeyings oft?' I can go to Vienna and return within ten days, and I can easily get a friend to take my work here for that time, or longer if necessary. I think that if I go I may be able to bring him back with me, whereas if we only write, he may lack courage for a return home under such circumstances."

"There can be no question that it would be far the most efficacious means we could employ, and I have no doubt at all of your success; it was only of the fatigue to yourself that I thought as an obstacle to the plan."

"My physical self has nothing whatever to do with it," he answered, smiling; "it is quite plain that it is part of my work as the servant of God, and that settles the question. I shall go to-morrow morning, as I should like to see Mr. Northcote first; I shall ask him to give me a letter himself for his son, and I have no doubt he will."

"I cannot help being very glad you are going, though I would not have ventured to ask it," said Una. "I shall be most anxious to know the result."

"I will come and see you so soon as I return," said Trafford, "and then you shall know all that has happened. You are looking brighter yourself than when I saw you last," he added, bending his eyes searchingly on her face; "is it that Lilith, as she passed into paradise, has left open a little chink of the gate, so that the blessed light shines down upon you even through all the earth shadows?"

"Yes, that is precisely what it is," she answered, smiling; "and, Mr. Trafford, Lilith has shown me, amongst other truths, that however sad one's own life may seem, there is always an unfailing joy to be found in ministering to Christ's own poor as she did. I want you to tell me how I can be of use to the people here."

"That is easily done," he answered; "there is work enough and to spare; here as elsewhere it is the workers that are unhappily so scarce. You might become most useful to me as well as to the poor, if you would undertake various offices among the sick and the children, which are not in my province at all."

"I will do anything you tell me most gladly," said Una; "only you must give me explicit directions, for I am very ignorant in such matters."

"You shall have them written down before I leave home to-night," he answered with his usual energy; "there are one or two cases of sickness I shall be glad to leave under your care till I return."

"Then I will not take up more of your time now," said Una, and she walked home, with her heart lightened of half its load by the hope that she might be able in some small degree to relieve the sufferings of others.

Miss Dysart soon found that Trafford had been as good as his word in leaving her plenty of work, but the delight she took in being a true source of consolation to the poor around her, made the time of his absence pass much more quickly than she could have expected, anxious as she was concerning the result of his mission.

It was about a fortnight after he had left home when he suddenly startled her, one evening, by walking into the drawing-room at Vale House, when she was sitting there alone quietly reading, without the least expectation of seeing him. She started up with an exclamation of surprise and pleasure; and as she went forward to greet him she looked up into his face with an expression of eager inquiry.

"Rupert is safe at home," said Trafford, answering to her speaking eyes; "it is through his impatience that I pay you so late a visit, as we have only just arrived, after travelling night and day, and I remembered my promise to let you know the result of my mission so soon as I returned. He seemed at last as if he could not rest till he held his father's hand in his."

"Oh I am so thankful! How happy they will all be; and what a good work you have done, Mr. Trafford!"

"It has been Lilith's work, not mine, or yours," he answered; "the light of her pure life does indeed seem to shine out from paradise upon us still. It is wonderful what a mighty influence for good that one simple unpretending girl has exercised by the mere blamelessness of her obedience to the law of God; it has been a most striking illustration of the silent eloquence of example."

"What a blessing for the Northcotes that it has so completely conquered Rupert. It must have changed him very much."

"It has indeed; he is, in the deepest sense of the word, 'a new creature;' his undiminished love for Lilith Crichton predisposed him to hear with intense interest the history of her beautiful happy death; it filled him with remorse for having been the cause of it, and drove him to look back into his past life, and to consider what his own position would be when he came to his last hour as she has done."

"Do you think the hope of seeing her again in a happier sphere had any share in the change which has taken place in him?" asked Una.

"Just at first, as a secondary cause, it may have had; but before we left Vienna he had learnt to appreciate the value of far higher hope of happiness than the renewal of mere human love could give. It so happened that on the Sunday we spent together I preached in the chapel of the British Embassy, on the words, 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.' I had Lilith in my mind, no doubt, when I chose them, but that same evening Rupert came to me at the hotel, with his eyes so bright and his whole appearance so radiant, that I thought some great good fortune had befallen him. I asked him what it was, and he told me that one painful thought had continued as it were to pierce his heart, through all the blessed change that had come upon him, and that it had now been suddenly removed, so that he seemed lightened of all his burthen, and full only of thankfulness; and then he explained to me that it had seemed to him so sad and cruel, that Lilith who who had benefited so many others should herself have been cut off in her fairest spring, and punished as it were by death for her very goodness; but when he had heard me speak that day of the glorious blessedness of those who, because of their heart-purity, had attained even to the visible presence of their God, it flashed upon him like a light from heaven, that so far from being punished, Lilith had in truth received the highest reward that could be given her, inasmuch as she, so pure in heart, was rapt away from this sinful world, to see and enjoy the ineffable vision of the Divine Love—of God, who is love for evermore; he said he never again should grieve that she was gone, but would only feel thankful always for her blessedness, and for the mercy which had given her to earth a little while, that she might shed her bright influence on less steadfast souls."

"It is exactly what I felt myself when I saw her lying dead with that rapturous smile upon her face," said Una; "but indeed dear Lilith would have thought it reward enough to have saved Rupert from an evil life, as she seems to have done."

"No doubt she would; and his parents have good cause to bless her memory, for she has given them back their son as one who was dead, and is alive; who was lost, and is found."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Una Dysart lay down to rest that evening with the feeling that whatever the future might have in store for her of pain or of regret, she had it in her power to become possessed of one pure joy at least, which the world could neither give nor take away.

She was tasting it even then—the exquisite enjoyment of knowing that she had been able to relieve the sorrows of some of her fellow-creatures, and that she had brought back hope and brightness to lives that but for her would have struggled on in grief and gloom beneath a load of care. She was too young yet to know, as those do who have travelled longer on the rough paths of this mortal life, that the consolation she was then experiencing is, in truth, the one and only human happiness which can never deceive or fail us. All other earthly joys contain in their very essence the power to destroy as well as to bless, for none are exempt from the chances of death and change, satiety or decay; but the relief of suffering is in the power of all, be their own fate what it may;

and the most desolate heart that beats on earth may know somewhat of the bliss of the tender ministering angels, when its active sympathy has won back smiles to the lips of mourners and shed brightness on forlorn souls. Una thought with delight of the happiness little Wil. must feel in having not only regained her lost brother, but in being relieved from all fear of separation from her future husband; for she suffered herself so keenly in the consciousness that mighty trackless oceans divided her from the presence she most desired on earth, that she could well understand what it must be to Wil. to know that she would go with Hervey now to his Indian home; but it was for the poor old squire chiefly that her gentle heart rejoiced; now would he be able once more to lift up his head, and face the world without the dread that his honest name would ever again be tarnished by him who should most have sought its honour, or his old age bereft of the first-born son in whom had been centred all his hopes and pride. Una felt that it would indeed be sweet to her to see her friends in their restored happiness; but she resolved, with the delicacy which was one of her most charming qualities, that she would not intrude upon them in any way for some days, and that she would avoid as much as possible any allusion to her own share in Rupert's repentance and return.

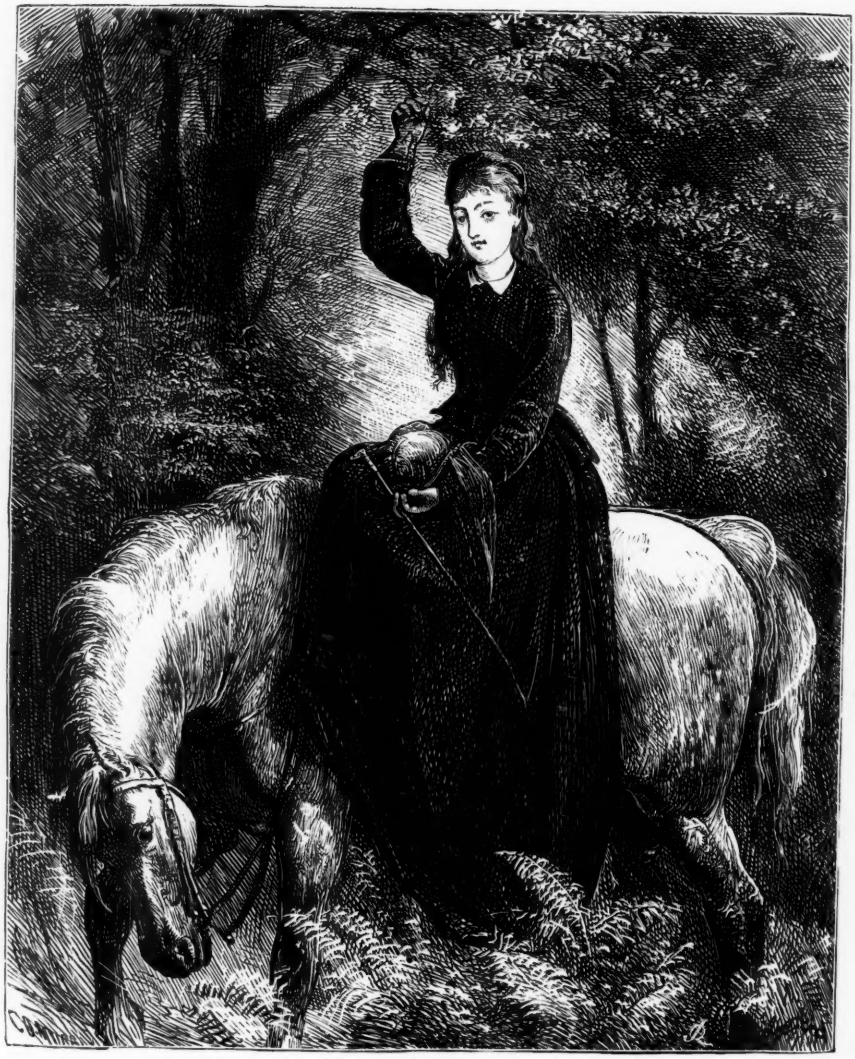
She found, however, on the very next morning that she was to have no choice in the matter. Lady Elizabeth always remained in her room till a late hour of the day, with Miss Grubbe in attendance upon her, and Una had scarcely finished her solitary breakfast, when she was told that Mr. Rupert Northcote had called and wished to know if he could see her.

She felt that she could not refuse, and desired the servant to show him into the drawing-room, but it was with a certain timidity and unwillingness that she joined him there. She had only known him slightly in the days when she used to meet him in society, where he had always been entirely absorbed in Lilith's presence, and she had never been prepossessed in his favour, though her artistic eye could not fail to be struck with his personal beauty. The young man was standing by the window, looking out on a bed of white lilies which had been Una's special care from some association of ideas with Lilith, and as she came in he turned round at once, and came forward to greet her with a frank and manly modesty which put her instantaneously at her ease.

"Miss Dysart," he said, "I have come to thank you with all my heart for your letter, in my own name and in Lilith's." His voice faltered on the last word, and she answered warmly, "I am so glad, so thankful that you have returned home!" They sat down, and then she had time to note the great change that had taken place in his appearance; he was dressed in the deepest mourning, and there were dark lines now under the large eyes that used always to seem so full of joyous light, while the beautiful sunny face she remembered was pale and haggard now, but his once bold and reckless expression had given way to a look of earnest thoughtfulness, and the scornful curve was gone from the calm mournful lips; all the sparkling gaiety, which had been one of his chief fascinations, too, had vanished, and there was a quiet humility in his manner which seemed to her very touching.

"My dear father and Wil. are coming to see you presently," he said; "but, Miss Dysart, I was very anxious to meet you first alone; there was so much I wished to say to you. Your letter has been to me like a message from the paradise of God, and I cannot find words to express how grateful I am to you for having written it."

"You must not think of me in the matter at all," said Una; "that letter really came to you from her who alone had a right to say to you all that in her name I ventured to repeat."



"Yes; and it is for that very reason that I wish to tell you what those words have done for me; it is a foolish fancy doubtless, but I feel as if when it is told to you she too will learn it and rejoice; it almost seems to me as if I might be able to catch some echo of her accents from your voice, since you were the last to hear her tones on earth before she went to add them to the angels' songs, and indeed there may be some word she said that night which you have omitted in your letter."

"I think not, for I wrote down all I could remember the very next morning, and I sent you the record just as it was," said Una; "but you know dear Lilith's departure was startlingly sudden; it almost seemed as if a supernatural strength had been given her till she had completed her task in speaking to me, and the moment she had said all that was needful, she was caught away as swiftly as if the fiery chariot had been waiting for her as it did for Elijah."

"No doubt her Master would not keep her back from heavenly joy a moment more than could be helped, but I shall never cease to thank Him for having sent you to her that you might be her interpreter to me."

"And I too have reason to be deeply grateful that I was allowed to see her," said Una, "for she opened my eyes to the errors of my own life with wonderful power."

"I have often thought of late," said Rupert, "that she was really one of God's own messengers, whom He merely lent a little while to this world that she might work out His purposes of mercy, and then when she had done His bidding He straightway drew her back within the pearly gates, before the dust of earth had time to soil her snow-white garments. You can hardly imagine, Miss Dysart, in how strange a manner she has influenced my life, from the first moment I saw her. It was by no overt act of her own; she never said a word of reproof to me in all

(Drawn by C. O. MURRAY.)

"The reins drop idly from her hands,
And they are musing – he and she."

"OLD HERO'S MISTRESS."—p. 749.

the time I knew her; nor did she ever try to teach me her religion; but it was impossible for me not to see that it was simply her very life; it shone through her transparent nature with a pure and steady light that illumined all the way around her as she went upward with her flying feet on the steep ascent to heaven; I saw it, I felt it, and I rebelled against it with all my power; but it was an everlasting witness for her God to my erring soul, from which I could not escape, for I loved her so intensely that I was literally unable to give her up, though I knew her whole being was animated by the influence I dreaded most. My one hope always was that if only I could make her my wife, I should soon be able to coerce her—tender, loving, and obedient as she was sure to be—into flinging aside the faith which would have ever stood as a barrier between us."

When he said this Una looked up at him with a question on her lips, which she checked before she uttered it; Rupert saw her movement.

"Say what you will, Miss Dysart; no reference to the past can hurt me now, for I feel as totally changed from what I was then as if I had died when Lilith did, and risen again to a new and purer state of existence."

"I only felt the wish to ask," said Una, "whether you had in those days actually adopted sceptical opinions."

"Only in the sense described by our Lord Christ when He said that men would not come to the light because their deeds were evil; I had never examined the subject intellectually, but I was resolved that pleasure and self-gratification should be my only gods, and I tried to persuade myself that the pure faith which warred against them was a delusion. I would not look at the question or think of it as regarded myself, and I chose to believe that the majority of persons professing Christianity were insincere, and the remainder, like Lilith, deceived by so unsubstantial a dream, that it would at once dissolve in their grasp so soon as it came between them and their happiness. It was this hope that made me commit the crime whereby I disgraced myself so deeply," and he reddened painfully as he spoke. "I thought that if I could hurry on our marriage by this fault, and then make her cognisant of it, she would become entangled in the meshes of my error, and would abandon for ever the laws of her immaculate righteousness."

"How little you knew her!" said Una.

"True," he replied, "I only knew her love, which seemed to me strong enough to conquer every other feeling in her heart."

"Love strong as death," said Una, in a low voice; "but a living faith in Christ is stronger still."

"Yes, so my darling has proved," he said; "but when I left her that day by the river-side, it was with the full conviction that if I absented myself for a time, she would so suffer in the separation that as soon as she was of an age to defy her brother's authority, she would fling her religious scruples to the winds, and bid me come back to claim her as my wife. I lived in this hope a reckless ungodly life, and as I never heard from home I knew nothing of her illness whatever, till the news of her death came upon me like a thunderbolt; and then when you sent me the history of her last hours, it was to me an absolute revelation from heaven. My remorse and terror were, however, so great, that I think they would almost have killed me if Trafford had not been with me then, for I felt that I was Lilith's murderer, and it seemed to me impossible that the righteous God could ever pardon me; but that good and wise man showed me how deep answers to deep, and uttermost sin is met by uttermost mercy. He raised me with a strong hand out of my gulf of misery, and now he has set my feet on a new straight path, wherein I hope to walk unswerving to the end."

"I am sure you will," said Una, "and," she continued, smiling, "dear Lilith will be to you what Beatrice was to Dante;" but she could not add more, for at that moment the door-bell rang, and little Wil., rushing impetuously into the room, flung her arms round her friend's neck, sobbing with delight; the squire followed almost as quickly, and clasped Una's hands in both his own, while he prayed God to bless her for ever and ever, since it was to her they owed the happy return of their dear lost Rupert, and the restored peace and comfort of the home his absence had made desolate.

(To be continued.)

OLD HERO'S MISTRESS.

KNEE-DEEP in ferns old Hero stands,
He knows his little lady's tree;
The reins drop idly from her hands,
And they are musing—he and she.

She, of a happy morning-tide,
When down along that selfsame glade
She and another, side by side,
Rode merrily through sun and shade.

How life had never dawned till then,
How earth till then had ne'er been gay,
And how the wonted ways of men
Seemed brighter, nobler, from that day.

And Hero muses of her sire—
His master—how he loved him well;
And how through battle-smoke and fire,
He bore him, fighting till he fell.

He longs to feel him grasp the rein,
To hear his clank and cheery call;
To bear him to the fight again,
And nobly there beneath him fall.

And what of her—his master's child?
She only makes his old days bright,
With pretty ways, so arch, so wild,
With fond caress and laughter light.

Lo! where she sits amid the shade,
The leaves bend down to kiss her face—
A very sunbeam earthward strayed
To light and bless the woodland place.

The winds are glad her sweet hat lies
Soft cradled by her fingers fair,
Because they now may see her eyes,
And move amid her sunny hair.

Oh, bold must he who wins her be,
And gentle, courteous, good, as bold,
For Hero says—good judge is he—
That she is worth her weight in gold.

FREDERICK E. WEATHERLY, M.A.

COMFORTABLE WORDS.—IX.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus."—HEB. xii. 1, 2.

THE Christian disciple has a race to run, and that race is to be run in a particular way—these are the two leading ideas of the passage before us. Let us consider them in the order in which they occur.

"A race!" When the writer penned the word, what he saw in imagination was the crowd of young men standing at the starting-post; then, at the giving of a signal, darting forward at full speed; then the group breaking up into fragments, as superior swiftness or superior training asserted itself; and then the one figure, dusty and breathless, clutching the prize, and hailed victor by the acclamations of the multitude. The image, then, suggests effort, striving, anxiety, perhaps exhaustion; and it is meant to do so. There is a side to the Christian life which is wholly one of calm enjoyment. Its characteristic is peace; its element is communion with God. The human spirit comes into contact with the Divine, and is filled with happiness. But there is also another side. In this world of sin—of sin within us and without us—the energy of the soul must be put forth in watchfulness and endurance, in self-recollection and self-admonition, in earnest taking-up of the cross to follow Christ; and it is this aspect of the Christian life to which the image of the race directs our mind. Something corresponding to the runner's strain of muscle, and something corresponding to his anxiety as to the issue of the effort he is making, must be found in the experience of every one who is truly following the Lord Jesus Christ.

Yes! but for our comfort we are informed that the race is one that has been "set before us." There is, of course, no hint here of a hard fatalism, of an unloving and unthankful submission to the superior power of God. It is possible for us to say in our trouble, "This race of pain and suffering is indeed 'set before me.' I know that I must run the race, and run it to the end. I cannot help myself. God is stronger than I am. For some reason or other, He chooses to put down the iron heel of His power upon me. I may writhe like a crushed worm, but it is of no use complaining. That will not mend matters. I must just bear it as well as I can." How natural this language is we all of us know. But it is not suggested by the passage we are considering. Far different is the feeling which the word of God would encourage. When the sacred writer speaks of "the race that is set before us," he thereby reminds the suffering disciple that not chance or caprice has decided and arranged the circumstances in which he is placed. It may seem to him an accident that has befallen; but it is not so. A father's love and a father's wisdom have been concerned in the matter. The great Master of the Christian life-course has appointed, with unerring skill and tenderness, both the length and the character of the race that is to be run. Some die in infancy, others in youth; others advance to maturity, and others, again, to old age; and sometimes it seems to us strange that the young and the vigorous should be taken, whilst the old and decrepid and apparently useless, are left. But there is no mistake; the life-course is neither too long nor too short. It is exactly right in its dimensions. The old man does not live a moment over the proper time; nor are the young removed a moment too soon. And very different are our lives as to the character of them. What a heavy load of sorrow seems to be bound upon some, whilst others go comparatively free! This man is crippled by narrowness of circumstances; that man is in affluence. Here we see robust healthy frame; and there the pallid look and attenuated limbs and drawn wasted features, that tell of an existence spent in disease and pain. How different is one race, as it seems to us, from another! Yet, whatever our course be, it is "set before us." It is the best, because our Father in heaven has ordered it; and He knoweth our frame, and our needs; and His wisdom is infinite, and His compassions fail not.

Our subject suggests, in the next place, the manner in which the race is to be run. With patience; and with looking unto Jesus. That the two are closely connected together in spiritual experience there can be no manner of doubt. The patience will soon fail if the practice of looking to Jesus be abandoned. But what is "looking unto Jesus?" The runner fixes his eye upon the goal. There is the prize for which he is striving! He does not allow his attention to be diverted for a single instant; for, if he turns his head to the right hand or the left, his pace will slacken, and his rivals spring out before him. Thus the Christian disciple keeps his gaze intently fixed upon the person of the Saviour. Jesus Christ fills the field of his mental vision. Of course, it is not meant that he is always engaged in making Jesus Christ an object of thought. But he does not turn away from the Saviour. His face is set in one direction. The looking implies dependence; for from Christ alone does he expect the help of which he stands in need. It implies imitation; for the spiritual gaze transforms. The devout, loving contemplation of the Saviour makes His people acquire a resemblance to Him. It implies companionship; for the heart of the true disciple reaches out after fellowship with the Divine Master, and the man naturally and instinctively turns to the object of his adoration and his love. Running thus, he runs "with patience." That patience—perhaps endurance is the better word—is very characteristic of the Christian's career. Not the impulsive man, who does things by fits and starts, is the man who succeeds, but the man who sets a great object before him, who steadily pursues it, whatever his difficulties and discouragements may be. The race must be run to the last. The burden must not be thrown off, but borne throughout. The struggle must be maintained until the prize is won. Does this seem a hard saying? Sometimes it does. "Am I never to relax?" says the afflicted soul. "May I never turn aside and get rest? Must I be always pressing on thus, straining and panting, towards the goal?" Ah! when we remember what some people have to suffer, and how long they have to suffer, this saying about patient endurance even unto the end might seem a hard one, almost an unfeeling one, were it not that just to these especially the Man of Sorrows manifests Himself in all the tenderness of His love, and that just to these especially the greatest supplies are ever vouchsafed of consoling and sustaining grace.

THE WILD WOLF'S BARK.

PART I.

"NOW, little Nora, if you wish to gather flowers, there's a fine field of daisies."

"Oh yes, Harry, I should like it very much; but won't you come with me?"

"No; Leonard and I will keep to the road; we don't care for daisies. You needn't be afraid, for there are only a few sheep and lambs in the field. Here, I'll lift you across the drain; now climb the bank, and you're all right. We'll come back for you soon."

Harry waited a few moments, until he saw his little sister seated on the ground and busily engaged gathering flowers, then rejoined his brother, who waited for him rather impatiently.

"Come on, Harry," he said, "we're losing our precious time; I see the boys at play already, and you know we mustn't leave the little one alone too long, we were told to take care of her."

"Oh, there's nothing to happen her here, so make your mind easy! she'll amuse herself very well for half an hour among the daisies and lambs."

The two brothers then hastened to a farm-yard at a little distance, where some rough boys were playing a game of ball. Time passed more rapidly than they supposed, and the half-hour had fully elapsed, when some men rushed into the yard in a state of great excitement. "Did the wolf turn in here?" they asked, "or does any one know which way he took? We missed him at the foot of the hill!" No one being able to give any information, they set off again without delay.

"What can it be all about?" said Harry, "there are surely no wolves in this country!"

"Is it possible you have not heard," answered the farmer, "that one has lately escaped from the Zoological Gardens? Why, it is the talk of the whole country round. He has killed several sheep in this neighbourhood, and the men are out hunting after him all day. He passed though some of my fields not half an hour ago, and I wouldn't be surprised to find that he has devoured one of my best lambs."

Harry and his brother looked at each other in dismay, "Oh, do tell us," they cried, "was he in that field all covered with daisies, at the foot of the hill, for we left our little sister there?"

"He was, indeed, that's where the lambs are. Come on quickly, and let us see if she's safe—for if the wolf caught sight of her, she has a bad chance, poor child."

Not another word passed till they arrived at the place. With a beating heart Harry sprang over the ditch, which he had lifted Nora across so short a time before, and gazed anxiously round, but she was nowhere to be seen. The farmer observed that all his sheep and lambs were huddled together in one corner of the field, looking very much frightened; and Leonard discovered a little heap of gathered flowers on the grass, flung as if in haste from the child's lap. At a short distance further on, a clump of daisies attracted his attention. Ah! they were more than "red tipped," they were covered with yet undried blood, the grass, too, was stained in several spots. And these were all the traces to be found of the wolf's visit. Harry and Leonard searched wildly through the adjoining fields, trying to "hope against hope," whilst the farmer made inquiries at the neighbouring cottages, but no tidings could be obtained of the missing child. Nothing now remained but to go home and communicate the sad tidings to their parents; it was a heavy task, but their father would know what further steps should be taken, and the less delay the better. On reaching the hall door they were met by one of the servants. "Take care not to make any noise, young gentlemen," she said, "for the mistress is very ill."

"Ill!" they repeated, "has she then already heard what has happened?"

"Is it about poor little Miss Nora? oh, yes! she knows all, we couldn't keep it from her. She was bad enough before, and, as you may suppose, that made her ten times worse; but I can't wait to talk now, I'm in a hurry."

"Stop a moment. Where is papa?"

"He's with the mistress, and can't be disturbed. The best thing for you is to take your supper and go quietly to bed."

The boys could not eat, neither could they sleep. Long they sat at the window in their room, sometimes silent, sometimes consulting over the future. "Perhaps mamma will die too," said Leonard, "and it will be all our doing. I don't see the use of speaking to papa in the morning, when he knows everything already, and of course has done his best about poor Nora. Let us go away."

"I was just thinking the same," replied Harry, "none of them will ever be able to bear the sight of us again. But where shall we go?"

"No matter, anywhere out of this."

Silently they descended the stairs. The hall door was locked, but, cautiously opening the shutters of the study window, they raised the sash, and easily dropped down to the grass-plot beneath. As fast as their trembling limbs would permit they crossed the lawn, and soon reached the planted hill beyond. The moon shone brightly, but the shadows looked tall and dark, and as the boys stopped to take breath after their long run, a strange sensation of awe crept over them. There was a weird stillness about the whole scene, and no human dwelling stood in sight; however, they determined to take courage, and get on as far as possible while the light lasted. Just at this moment a sharp bark was heard in the distance. Harry started and looked timidly round, but nothing was to be seen.

"Leonard," he said, in a frightened whisper, "don't wolves bark?"

"Yes, so the adventure books say, but that sounded more like a dog."

"How can you tell? I dare say they're much alike. It might be the wolf, and then what should we do?"

"Get up a tree, of course, that's what they always do in books. Wolves, you know, can't climb, so we should be safe if there were a whole pack round us."

Again there was another bark, and nearer this time. The startled boys cast a hasty glance in the direction of the sound; surely some object moved in and out amongst the tall shadows of the trees. "I can see an animal plainly," whispered Harry, "just crossing that space of moonlight. It is red too. Oh, Leonard, there can be no doubt—it is the wolf! Let us run to the nearest tree; 'tis our only chance."

(To be concluded.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

318. Show from the book of Genesis that the ancient Jewish mode of sepulture by interring in a cave was not the only one in use.

319. Give the first three occasions in which the Saviour rebuked the Jews for their exclusiveness.

320. We read in the Acts of the Apostles that St. Paul was on one occasion the guest of Jason. In which of his Epistles does the apostle incidentally allude to him?

321. Account for the silence of Matthew, Mark, and Luke respecting the raising of Lazarus.

322. "Ye hypocrites," said our Lord to the scribes and Pharisees, "well did Esaias prophesy of you, saying, This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, but their heart is far from me." Give a similar passage from Ezekiel.

323. Who uttered the words: "Why transgress ye the commandments of the Lord, that ye cannot prosper? because ye have forsaken the Lord, He hath also forsaken you?"

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 720.

305. One only. See Lev. xvi. 29; Numb. xxix. 7.

306. Acts ii. 3, 4.

307. (1) The altar of incense; (2) the table of shewbread; and (3) the golden candlestick. See Heb. ix. 2.

308. See Mark ix. 31, 32.

309. (1) The Sabbath (2) circumcision, and (3) the Passover.

(Drawn by M. ELLEN EDWARDS.)

JESSIE.

I.

TO me all beauty of the race
Was in the beauty of her face;
And brightest gold would ill compare
With brightness of her golden hair!

Sweet as the blue of summer skies,
The rare blue of her roguish eyes;
Sweet as a rosebud from the south,
The marvel of her perfect mouth!

And words of wonderment were weak,
Of all her winning ways to speak,
Whose graciousness had fairer grace
Than all the fairness of her face!

Alas! that I shall hear no more
Her footstep light upon the floor,
And that my lips must sadly miss
The touch of her caressing kiss!

II.

Dead ashes dropping from the fire,
And dead leaves dropping in the lane;
And in my heart the dead desire
For summer days to shine again—
Since bitter loss brings bitter pain!

The fire dies in the dismal grate;
The short day ends in longer night;
My heart aches with its leaden weight;
Long grief succeeds my short delight;
And her sweet face is cold and white!

The faded flowers are lying low;
The sweet flower of my life is shed;
Through days of weariness and woe,
My heart will sorrow for the dead—
Refusing to be comforted!

III.

In dreams, in dreams, I see again
A sweet face seen in former years,
But with no pang of sudden pain
Or flow of unavailing tears!

In dreams, in dreams, she runs to me,
With laughing lips and eager eyes,
Whose little grave I often see,
Grown green with many summer skies!

In dreams, in dreams, I hear her fleet
Familiar step upon the floor,
Who paces now, with infant feet,
The golden pavement evermore!

In dreams, in dreams, with rapid flight,
I rise above each fading star,
And see her in those halls of light,
Where many little children are!

J. R. EASTWOOD.

THE DEATH OF MOSES.—I.

BY THE REV. C. J. ELLIOTT, M.A., VICAR OF WINKFIELD, BERKS; HON. CANON OF CHRIST CHURCH, OXFORD.

THE most remarkable events which have occurred in the world's history are associated with some of its "high places." It was from the heights of Sinai that the law of the Ten Commandments was proclaimed, amidst thunders, and lightnings, and tempest. It was from one of the mountains of Galilee that the new law of love went forth from the lips of the Incarnate Redeemer. It was upon one of the mountains in the land of Canaan that the typical Isaac was laid upon the altar which Abraham had built. It was upon one of the mountains of the same land (as some think upon the same spot) that the lamb which God had Himself provided was offered as a propitiation for the sins of the world.

Again, as it was on "the mountain of God," i.e., on Mount Sinai, that the voice was heard by Moses proceeding from the burning bush, and as it was on the heights of Carmel that the fire was seen to descend on the altar which Elijah reared, so was it on the Mount of Transfiguration that those two great representatives of the older dispensations again appeared, when the fulness of the times had come, and when He of whom—the one in the discharge of his mediatorial office on earth, and the other by his miraculous departure from it—were conspicuous types, was attested by the voice from heaven.

The third and last of the three eventful periods of forty years into which the life of Moses was divided seems to have expired whilst the children of Israel were yet encamped in the valley over against Beth-peor, ready to take possession of the land which God had promised that He would give to their fathers. Many and strange were the vicissitudes which the great lawgiver had experienced, from the day when he was rescued by Pharaoh's daughter from the waters of the Nile, up to the day on which, having completed his 120th year, he announced to the Israelites his own exclusion from the land of promise, and he encouraged Joshua and the people committed to his leadership to enter into it and to possess it.

In a very marvellous manner had Moses been prepared, first in the court of Egypt, and afterwards in the solitudes of Sinai, for the work to which he was called. By a long course of trial the natural impatience of his temper was subdued, and he was taught the lesson—so needful to be attained, and yet so hard to be learned—that God's servants must not only be willing to do God's work, but that they must be willing to do it in the manner which God approves, and in the way which God's providence points out. Again and again, as we follow the eventful annals of the wanderings in the wilderness, we pause to admire the patience, the resolution, and the self-renunciation of Moses. As at the first he had been willing to resign the grandeur of a court for a share in the reproach of God's people, so, throughout the whole of his after course, we are struck by the spirit of self-surrender which he breathed in all his words and actions. At Sinai he prayed that his own name might be blotted out of the Lord's book (it may be of the book of those who should enter the land of promise), if only the sin of his people might be pardoned. In the desert, when Joshua would have had the voices of Eldad and Medad silenced, Moses would have had all the Lord's people prophets.

But just as Abraham, the father of the faithful, and Job, whose patience has been left on perpetual record, failed in the exercise of those very graces for which they were most conspicuous, so Moses, who was otherwise so remarkable for his meekness, his endurance, and his self-control, was at length provoked to speak unadvisedly with his lips; and on the second occasion of the miraculous supply of water, viz., that at Kadesh, he was not only betrayed, as regards his tongue, into the sins of impatience and of arroganoe, but he smote the rock twice, when he had been commanded only to speak to it, and the heavy sentence went forth from the Lord, both against himself and also against Aaron, who seems to have been a partaker of his sin, "Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them" (Num. xx. 12).

This sentence of exclusion from the land of promise, thus denounced against the two leaders of the people, who appear to have been equally implicated in the transgression of the Divine command, was speedily executed. Shortly after the departure from Kadesh, at the expiration of the forty years' wanderings in the desert, the children of Israel came unto Mount Hor. On the top of that mountain Aaron was divested, in obedience to a Divine command, of his sacerdotal robes, with which Eleazar, the eldest of his surviving sons, was invested; and, in the very same chapter which contains the record of the transgression, we read that "Aaron died there in the top of the mount" (Num. xx. 28).

The circumstances attending the last hours of the great captain and lawgiver of the hosts of Israel, are yet more remarkable; and the record of his departure from earth is fraught with many lessons of deepest interest and instruction. In obedience to God's command, Moses ascended the heights of one of that chain of mountains which overhang the eastern bank of the Jordan, on which Balaam, the unrighteous prophet, had recently stood, and from which his unwilling lips had pronounced blessings on the people whom he had been summoned to curse. How earnestly the heart of Moses was set upon the full accomplishment of the work to which his life had been consecrated, appears from the prayer contained in Deuteronomy iii. 25: "I pray thee, let me go over, and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain (i.e., as it should seem, the mountainous district of Canaan on the western side of the Jordan), and Lebanon." But, as he himself records the answer returned to his petition, "the Lord was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me: and the Lord said unto me, Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter. Get thee up into the top of Pisgah, and lift up thine eyes westward, and northward, and southward, and eastward, and behold it with thine eyes: for thou shalt not go over this Jordan" (vv. 26—28).

But ere the sentence was executed—a sentence, it should be observed, which the double sin both of their leaders and also of the people had provoked—it remained that Moses should utter in the ears of the Israelites, and leave on perpetual record for those who should come after, the solemn words of warning, of instruction, and of encouragement, which are contained in the Book of Deuteronomy. And, throughout the whole of this eventful history of the great prophet and lawgiver, there is nothing more striking than the evidence which this book furnishes of the single-hearted and unshaken devotion of Moses to the great work confided to him, as to a servant "faithful in all his house"—"for a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after."

About forty days seem to have elapsed previously to the death of Moses from the time that the first command was given to him, as recorded in the Book of Numbers (xxvii. 12), and again in the Book of Deuteronomy (iii. 27), to go up to the summit of Mount Abarim, and to behold the land of promise, coupled with the announcement that he should not go over the Jordan, but that having only beheld the land into which he had so ardently desired to lead his people, he should die upon the mountain. Let us endeavour, for a moment, to realise to ourselves the imposing scene, so briefly but so graphically brought before us in the narrative recorded in the Book of Deuteronomy.

Although on the day on which the words recorded in Deut. xxxi. were spoken, the aged lawgiver had completed the last of the three great and eventful periods of his life, "his eye," we read, "was not dim," neither was his "natural force abated" (Deut. xxxiv. 7). Moreover, as we have already seen, the great work of his life—the one all-absorbing object of his hopes and his aspirations—was not yet accomplished. He had already endured for forty years the repinings and the rebellions of his people. He had suffered with them the toils and privations of the wilderness life, and with them he had encountered its new and unseen dangers. He was already, as it seemed, on the very eve of the accomplishment of that on which his whole heart was so intently fixed. The prize was already in view. But a few more days of hope and expectation, and the great and terrible wilderness, "wherein were fiery serpents, and scorpions, and drought, where there was no water," was to be exchanged for the land flowing with milk and honey—a land wherein his people were to eat bread without scarceness—"a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills they were to dig brass."

Nor was this the only consideration which might well have made the immediate prospect of death at such a moment an object of dismay and of terror to the great leader of Israel. For, notwithstanding the marvellous communication made to Moses on the mountain of God—wherein, as our Saviour Himself declared, the doctrine of the Resurrection was contained—it is impossible to overlook the fact that the revelation of a future state, made to the most highly favoured of God's servants under the older dispensation, was immeasurably inferior to that which is now made to us, insomuch, indeed, that the general record of their experience is briefly summed up by the Apostle in the very expressive words, "through fear of death they were all their lifetime subject to bondage."

If both of these considerations be permitted to exercise their due influence on our minds, we can scarcely fail to arrive at the conclusion that there are few portions of the inspired volume which are more calculated, not only to excite our astonishment, but also to suggest to our minds matter of deep and profitable meditation, than that which records the manner in which the last forty days of the life of Moses were spent, and which ends with the brief recital of his ascent into the mountain, his death, and his burial.

There are comparatively but few, even under the higher and brighter dispensation of the Gospel, who, if suddenly surprised by the summons to "set their house in order," accompanied by the warning, "Thou shalt die and not live," would not be so absorbed by their own personal hopes and fears that they would have little time or disposition to warn and to admonish others.

Now, it was not thus with the great leader of Israel. Having once received the assurance that the sentence of exclusion from the earthly Canaan was one which was irreversible—like St. Peter in after times, when warned, by the same voice, of his approaching end—he not only meekly bowed beneath the rod, but he addressed himself, with resolute and unabated energy, to the same great work to which he had consecrated so large a portion of his life; and he endeavoured, during the last forty days, as he had done during the last forty years of his life, so to impress the minds of his hearers with the solemn truths which he was commissioned to announce to them from heaven, that they might be able, "after his decease," to have the same things "always in remembrance."

On the day on which Moses had fully set before his people the blessing and the curse, as set forth in that memorable song of mercy and of vengeance which is recorded in the thirty-second chapter of Deuteronomy, "the self-same day," we read, he received the command, "Get thee up into this mountain Abarim, unto Mount Nebo, which is in the land of Moab, over against Jericho; and behold the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel for a possession: and die in the mount whither thou goest up, and be gathered unto thy people; as Aaron thy brother died in Mount Hor, and was gathered unto his people" (vv. 49, 50). Having pronounced his final words of blessing on the people who have the eternal God as their refuge and underneath the everlasting arms, his sight appears to have been so supernaturally strengthened that he was enabled to survey the whole extent of the country of Canaan, from Dan in the north even to Zoar in the south (Deut. xxxiv. 1—3).

His appointed work was now done. In mercy, as well as in judgment—for in the case of God's people mercy is ever mingled with judgment—this faithful servant of the Lord was summoned to cease from his labours and to enter into his rest. No human eye seems to have witnessed the final scene. No earthly friend on whom he could lean was present to close the eyes of a prophet like unto whom no other afterwards arose in Israel, until the advent of that Greater Prophet, to whom Moses, by type and by prophecy, had borne such conspicuous witness.

But his death was precious in the eyes of Him whom he had served so faithfully in life; and though no man knew of the place of his sepulchre, never was there beheld upon earth so grand a funeral. "And he buried him," we read, "in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor; but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day."

Inasmuch as God has Himself, in infinite wisdom, concealed from human eyes the history of Moses from the day of his sepulture in the lonely valley over against Beth-peor until the day on which, together with Elijah, he stood on the Mount of Transfiguration, and there held converse with his Incarnate Lord, it would ill behove the humble student of Scripture to endeavour, with rude hand, to rend the mysterious veil.

But surely, there is a flood of light thrown in upon the condition of the faithful after death, when we read, in the few but expressive words of the inspired Evangelist, "And, behold, there talked with Him (i.e., with Christ) two men, which were Moses and Elias: who appeared in glory, and spake of His decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem" (St. Luke ix. 30, 31). We know not, indeed, what bright anticipations of the new Jerusalem may have been given to Moses, as God Himself disclosed to him the beauties of the earthly Canaan. It may be that in that eventful day on which he stood alone with his Maker on the heights of Pisgah, there was unfolded before his eyes so glorious a view of "the city which has the foundations," that, like Abraham, he was content to relinquish his desire of entering into the land flowing with milk and honey, and to transfer his ardent aspirations to the "rest which remains for the people of God." Be this as it may, when next the leader of Israel is brought before our view, it is no longer as one who was disappointed of his desire, seeing that it was on one of those goodly mountains which he had so earnestly longed to behold before death, that we find him standing and holding converse with the Lord of the whole earth after it.

The earthly Canaan, as we are so frequently reminded in Scripture, was God's own type and representation of the heavenly rest. Into that rest it is not the law, but Christ, not Moses, but Joshua, i.e., Jesus, who alone can bring His people. The law, with its awful doom for impenitent sinners, must still be proclaimed in all its terrors, and we must not shrink from the enunciation of God's wrath, as "revealed from heaven, against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." But the blessings promised from Mount Gerizim must ever be mingled with the curses denounced from Mount Ebal. The sinner, whose conscience is awakened to a sense of the sinfulness of sin, must be pointed at once, and without any intercepting medium, to the cross of Christ. No earthly priests or mediators must come between the sinner and the Saviour. As Christ's ambassadors to the souls of those for whom Christ died, it is the privilege of Christ's ministers to declare, even to those whose sins are "red like crimson," "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and He is the propitiation for our sins;" and again—"If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." If we look to the directions given to the Israelites in Deut. xxvii., we shall find that it was on Ebal, not on Gerizim—i.e., on the mount of cursing, not on that of blessing—that an altar was to be erected to God, and that it was there that not only burnt offerings, but also peace-offerings, were to be offered, and that the people were to rejoice (vv. 5, 6, 7). And what other inference can we draw from this remarkable injunction but the one central truth of the gospel of Christ, viz., this—that the curse of the law is removed from the penitent believer in Jesus? in other words, that "Christ hath delivered us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." But the direction for the erection of an altar on Mount Ebal seems to imply even more than this. It teaches that it is only through the curse, if we may so speak, that we can attain the blessing; i.e., that Christ's atonement for sin is the one and only ground of the acceptance of the sinner; and further, that it is not until sinners have been brought to feel in their inmost souls the weight of the curse, that they will be stirred up, as men who are in earnest, to seek and to obtain the blessing.

One more lesson seems to be fairly drawn from the record of the death of Moses. As the outward circumstances of time and of place which distinguish the history of God's true servants during life—whilst varying greatly in each particular instance—are subject to the control of the same guiding and over-ruling Providence, which makes all things to work together for their good, so, and perhaps in a yet more marked manner, are the circumstances—however apparently dark and incomprehensible—which characterise the departure of each out of this world. To the eye of the superficial beholder the good and faithful servant is often summoned to cease from his labours at a time when his work is still incomplete, and when his services seem to be most required. A Tindale devotes the whole energies of his mind and body to the noble end of translating God's Word into his native tongue; and just as his life-long efforts were about to be crowned with success, a cruel death snatches him away from a yet unfinished work. A Henry Martyn, intent on the accomplishment of a similar task, is permitted to breathe out, in solitude and in suffering, his last earthly aspirations for the dawn of the new heavens and the new earth wherein shall dwell righteousness. A Patteson, endowed in a marvellous manner with the highest qualifications for the same work, is severed from it by a violent death, inflicted by the hands of those to the benefit of whose souls and bodies he had so cheerfully and ungrudgingly devoted his life. But in each and in all of these cases, precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints. It matters little for such whether their death-bed be surrounded by living friends and relatives and their resting-place be the peaceful churchyard of their native parishes, or whether amidst the solitude of the desert they breathe their souls into the hands of their Redeemer, or in the depths of the ocean their bodies await the day when the sea shall give up its dead. Alike, as in the case of Israel's prophet and leader, their souls are secure in the guardianship of their Lord, and their bodies are the objects of solicitude to Him who is the Resurrection and the Life.

CREDULITY AND FAITH.

WE must protest at the outset against a confusion between credulity and faith, which is intentionally made by those who wish to disparage faith. It has been said that credulity and faith are only different names for the same thing; that credulity is only faith carried to a foolish extreme; that it is too much of a good thing, or a bad thing, as we may please to call it; but in any case the two are only varieties of one and the same thing. Now if credulity and faith are children of one common parent—superstition—and are suckled on the same spirit of fear and ignorant wonder, it is easy to see that we have no test to enable us to distinguish between true and false miracles. It is the interest of those who would reject the supernatural in toto, of those to whom Revelation and Redemption are alike irrational and absurd, to efface this distinction between credulity and faith. Göthe accordingly, in a well-known line in his "Faust," treats the two as identical. It is not the miracles which produce faith, but faith which produces miracles. It is in this inverted order that credulity lies to superstition; we can easily then discover the motive of those who thus confound faith with credulity.

> "Who wants more wine must press more juice;
> Who wants more miracles must faith produce."

Now we are anxious to show at the outset of this paper, that faith and credulity are really plants of a different growth. They have neither the same root, nor bear a similar fruit. True, they are sometimes found growing together, but it is only as the wheat and the tares, or rather (for that is an apter illustration) as the oak and its parasites. So far from credulity springing from the same stock as faith, it is generally found that credulity begins to flourish only in cases where faith is dead. As the mushroom thrives on the roots of the decaying oak, so credulity is a kind of fungous growth, a sign not so much of a living faith as of the decay of all true faith in the unseen and eternal.

There are these three marks of a living faith, all of which are wanting in its counterfeit, credulity: 1, Faith springs from a principle; 2, is nourished by a promise; and, 3, clings to a gracious and living Person. These three signs meet in the children of faith. Credulity, on the other hand, is wanting in all three. To begin with:—Faith springs from a principle. That principle is trust. Our English proverb well expresses it—"Truth breeds trust." Where there is no truth there is no room for faith. However weak in its beginnings, however limited its early experience, living faith always presupposes a sense of trust in the truthfulness of another. Hence it is that, when truth—which has been called the seed-plot of all the other virtues—has been denuded and swept away, and the subsoil of the human heart is left bare, there is no longer any ground in which faith can take root and grow. A thoroughly cynical nature, one lost to all sense of goodness, is one which is, and must be, hopelessly sceptical. This is why we speak of the faith of childhood. Not that the immature mind of a child is more disposed to faith than when the reason is ripe, and the will has become vigorous with age—this is quite a mistake—but only because children are seldom cynical, and therefore not sceptical. Their faith in human goodness has not been crushed by sad experience, and therefore it is that they can trust in the Divine goodness.

The next mark of faith, as distinguished from credulity, is that it depends on a promise. This is the positive element in faith. It asks for a sign, and it is given it. There is an unbelief which apes reverence, as there is a pride which apes humility. Ahaz's unbelief was of that kind. When offered a sign from Jehovah, either in the height or in the depth, he would not thus tempt the Lord. Therefore the Lord Himself gave him a sign; but the very last which he was looking for, and one which to him was only a sign and a wonder. Credulity, since it has no real promise to rest upon, has to seek signs for itself, and to invent them in passing prodigies and mock portents. When the Jews had lost all faith in the promises, they were then on the look-out for lying wonders and signs. They are rebuked for this by the prophet. "Should not a people look unto Jehovah, and not unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep and mutter?" (Isa. viii. 19.) In later times the Jews became of all people the most credulous. As the class of true prophets ceased, false prophets increased. Their credulity became a proverb and a by-word among the nations, so that the Roman satirist could select the Jew Apella as the type of one who would believe anything, however absurd.

The third criterion of faith is that, as it springs from a principle, and depends on a promise, so it grows up into love and confidence in a living Person. Faith in doctrine or dogma is important in its place, but, if this is all, it wants the real criterion to distinguish it from credulity. It is the personality of God which is, in fact, the great determinant of faith. According as we think of God, so will be our faith in Him. If we only know Him as the Almighty, the great El-Shaddai, then we may reverence and trust in Him for ourselves; but it will not go much beyond this. Ours will be at best the religion of fear; but if we know Him as our Covenant God, as the Jehovah or Eternal One who has come nigh to us in a mysterious way, then fear will ripen into love and confidence. Personality and nighness are in religion almost convertible terms. A God who is very far off, and only seen and known in His works, may be a living Person, but the works themselves, though they declare His eternal power and Godhead, do not carry us further than this. To know persons, we must draw near to them. Hence it is that, with a certain fitness, we address even an earthly sovereign in the third person, "the King's most excellent Majesty." The sovereign is so far off from the subject, that the sense of his person is lost in his dignity and office. It is the same with God. In nature He is far off from us, hidden behind His works, through which we only catch a reflection of His person. But in grace it is otherwise. Here we draw nigh to Him, and He to us.

In all these three respects, then, faith differs from credulity. Faith has its roots in the ground of an honest and good heart; faith rests on the distinct and articulate promise of God's revealed Word; and lastly faith ripens into a sense of living communion with an unseen Father and Friend. Credulity wants all these marks. It has no root of principle, no vital sap of promise, no fruit of ripened intercourse with a living Person. In this again the two dispositions are opposed—that faith is the death of credulity, and conversely credulity only springs out of the soil where a dead faith is corrupting. It is a great mistake to say, as many do, that credulity is a special mark of an early and unreasoning age. On the contrary, the two most credulous ages of the world's history were during the decline of the Roman Empire and on the eve of the French Revolution. These were eminently ages of reason, but so far from reason checking this mushroom growth of credulity, it actually sprang up and flourished in spite of philosophers and sceptics. The cause of this rank growth was the same in both cases. It was the soil of a decaying faith that became the hot-bed out of which all this superstition sprang. The Roman had lost all faith in his national deities; two augurs could not meet, as it has been remarked, without looking in each other's faces and laughing at the delusion which the vulgar believed in. Hence, there came an irruption of foreign superstitions into Rome. The whole Orontes, to use Juvenal's phrase, poured into the Tiber. Noble Roman matrons borrowed the ceremonies of the Syrians and Egyptians. Strange rites of magic were practised. Sorcerers were never so common; and itinerant Goetoe or pretended miracle-workers went about deceiving, not the simple only, but also the wise and learned. Apollonius of Tyana, Philistratus, and others, were instances of these religious quacks. It was the same with the Jews. In the Acts of the Apostles we have Simon Magus and the false prophet Bar-Jesus, and the seven sons of one Sceva a Jew, as instances of this tendency. The rank soil of a dead faith brought forth a prolific crop of lying miracles and wonders. So common were false miracles, that as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so these practisers of magic and curious arts encountered the apostles, and sought to turn men from the faith. Truth and falsehood thus entered the lists together, believers were attracted by the true, the merely credulous were drawn away by the other.

The eve of the French Revolution was also another remarkable time for this outburst of credulity. The same cause produced the same effect as at the decline of the Roman Empire. The age of reason, as it was called, was the age of a decaying faith. Christianity in France, at least (for our observations are chiefly confined to that country), was nearly if not quite defunct. The age of the Dragonnades had been succeeded by an age of frivolity and vice. Scepticism was nearly universal, and the result was everywhere apparent. The interval between 1740 and 1795 will always be regarded in history as the period when impostures and impostors of all kinds reigned most triumphantly throughout Europe. It was a time of moral and religious decay, and consequently of social putrefaction, such as was never witnessed since the break-up of the old Roman Empire. Chesterfield, an acute observer, and no bad judge of social symptoms, visited France in 1753, and wrote these words, which were prophetic of a revolution which was to break in a tempest over France exactly forty years after the prediction was uttered. "In short," he wrote, "all the symptoms which I have ever met with in history previous to great changes and revolutions in government, now exist and daily increase in France."

Among the impostors who showed that the age of reason was also the age of credulity, was one Cagliostro. A sketch may interest the reader. In the retinue of Marie Antoinette, travelling to France as the future Dauphiness in 1770, were Prince Louis de Rohan, Bishop of Strasbourg, and the so-called Count Cagliostro. De Rohan, who figures in history as the dupe of the diamond necklace, was the cardinal whose intrigues had woven a web around the fair fame of Marie Antoinette, from which her pure memory only emerges at last in our day like a star from behind a dark cloud of suspicions and malignant court gossip. Cagliostro, on the other hand, was a quack, and nothing else. Starting in life as a city Arab, his real name was Joseph Balsamo. He was born at Palermo, and having lost his father at an early age, he was placed under the protection of the friars of the Misericordia, whose order he entered as a novice. Here he acquired the elements of chemistry and physic; but he speedily made his escape, and committed so many frauds in Palermo, that he was obliged to abscond. If one man in his time plays many parts, how shall we describe Cagliostro, who was "not one, but all mankind's epitome?" An apothecary's bottle-washer, an artist, an alchemist, an astrologer, a necromancer, a house-painter, a Freemason, a revolutionist, a prince, a mesmerist, a clairvoyant, a quack-doctor, an author—he traded on the credulity of all classes in Italy, Spain, Portugal, England, and France. It is difficult to follow his career, he wore so many disguises, assumed so many aliases, and changed his sphere and mode of operation so frequently, that one becomes confused in trying to separate the truth from the falsehood. All writers have agreed that he was the most unscrupulous, the most ingenious, and the most impudent impostor the world has ever known.

The eve of the French Revolution was the very age for an impostor like Cagliostro. Fate appeared to throw in his way the exact means best suited to accomplish the end and aim of his existence. It was an age when men had parted with their old faith, and were on the look-out for some fresh object of worship. Cagliostro, whose travels in the East had given him some smattering of Eastern manners, pretended that he had discovered the true religion, which he described as an Egyptian order of Freemasonry, of which he gave himself out to be the Grand Copt or Chief, and which was alleged by him to have been founded by the prophets Enoch and Elijah. He made his dupes believe that the true principles and tenets of religion had been handed down pure and undefiled through a succession of Grand Copts, of whom he was the regularly appointed successor.

The "elixir of life," and the "canthartic tincture" were the nostrums which he vended to his dupes at his own price: £800 a drop was the estimate which he put upon the elixir. Even in England, which he visited three times, he found people credulous enough to part with their money on promises like those by which modern imitators have undertaken to make old women "beautiful for ever." As an instance of his cunning, he contrived to defraud a certain Quaker out of a fée of a hundred guineas, on the pretence of restoring to him the beauty and vigour of youth. Convicted at last of swindling, he had to leave England, and resumed his life of vagabondage on the Continent. As the Marquis de Pelligrini he now visited Germany and the Netherlands, and even had the impudence to return to Palermo, where he was recognised, thrown into prison, and would have ended his career there, but for the dexterity of his wife, who ingratiated herself with a certain marquis, who contrived to obtain Cagliostro's release by thrashing the prosecutor's lawyer, and intimidating the president of the court. On his release from prison he set out for Spain, under the name of Dr. Tischio, where he made a living by selling a water of beauty, converting hemp into silk, making gold of mercury, melting small diamonds to produce larger ones, and predicting lucky numbers in the lottery, a trick which he had picked up from the friars in Italy, whose books of dreams are a well-known source of revenue almost to this day. After leaving Spain, he again paid a visit to London, where he moved in the very highest circles, and managed to obtain an extraordinary influence over rich and credulous people. His portrait, and that of Lorenza his wife, were worn on rings, fans, and medallions, and busts were sold of him bearing the inscription, "Divo Cagliostro," which was the only name he thenceforth acknowledged.

It was in Paris, however, and on the very eve of the great Revolution, that he rose to the highest point of renown. Here he appears to have divided his time between presiding at revolutionary meetings of the so-called Egyptian Masons, holding mesmeric seances, and attracting attention by the wonderful feats of a clairvoyante, who appeared in the form of a draped and veiled priestess, and whose oracular sayings the seer interpreted.

Now, what is the real remedy for this evil? A trained judgment is an excellent safeguard against credulity, but the real antidote is faith. It is faith in the moral and spiritual order of the universe which is the only antidote to credulity in the magical and abnormal. We have no space here to lay down the place of miracles in a supernatural revelation; enough that there are true and false miracles, and the test between them is this: that the true are connected with a moral and spiritual order which the conscience attests to, the false are not. This was the criterion which Christ laid down when He claimed that His miracles were signs from heaven. Those who could not, or rather would not, see this, sinned against the light which lighteth every man, and to such no more sign was given. In such cases it is said He could do no miracles there because of their unbelief. We conclude, then, that credulity and faith are not to be confounded together, but contrasted. Faith and superstition, the glaube and aber-glaube, or belief and extra-belief, of the German, are to each other as the oak and the mushroom which springs out of its decaying roots, and that to kill superstition we must plant the young acorns of a living faith in a living Person, the gracious and loving Father of men, who has revealed Himself in the Son of His love, whose light is life, whose service is love, and communion with whom is the effectual antidote to those foolish fears on which superstition battens.

(Drawn by R. Barnes.)

"It is too late for him and for me!"—p. 765.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

A FEW months later, while the winter snows were falling thick and fast round Atherstone Abbey, the master of that proud old home sat in a lonely lodging in Sydney, with the sunshine of the Australian summer streaming through his open window, and all the glory of that strange climate at its fairest season, shining on earth and sky.

Yet despite of the brightness which surrounded him, the life of Humphrey Atherstone had never known a deeper desolation than that which chilled his being to the very centre now. Flung on the table beside him was Miss Amherst's letter to Una Dysart; but it was not on that day he had received it, for it had already been in his possession some weeks. The arrival of that letter, sent by the hand of her whom he loved with unchanged intensity, had been a crushing blow to him; of course, the substance of the information it contained was nothing new to him, though it gave him many details of the circumstances of his uncle's marriage which he had not known before; but it was the fact that it had come to him from Una which made him receive it as the death-warrant of all his hopes concerning her; he knew from the date that it must have been in her possession at the time when he was so peremptorily denied admittance to her house, and he now did not for a moment doubt that on receipt of that letter Una had at once determined to give him up finally, that she herself, and not her friends, had refused him permission to see her, and that she had sent him the letter without a word from herself, for the very purpose of showing him that, in consequence of the history it contained, all acquaintance between them must be distinctly at an end. It was not that Atherstone supposed Una to have been alienated from him by the loss of his estate and fortune, he knew that she was too noble and pure-hearted to be influenced by so unworthy a motive; but he believed that, precisely because of her high sense of honour and her refinement of feeling, she could no longer retain even friendship, much less love, for a man who had been guilty of fraud. It never occurred to him to doubt, in the smallest degree, that on reading that letter, quick-witted Una had divined the secret of his whole conduct from the time of his uncle's death, and had thus become aware that for five years he had held possession of an estate which was not lawfully his, and that he had finally driven the rightful owner into exile in order that, without fear of discovery, he might bring her home as his wife to the house where he dwelt as a dishonest usurper. No wonder she had cast him off for ever, he thought, it was but what he deserved, and might surely have expected; only, like Cain, he was ready to cry out that his punishment was greater than he could bear. Nor was the loss of Una all that he had to weigh down his spirit with deep despondency. As yet he had failed to discover Edward Atherstone, and the hope of being able, at least, to make reparation for his error, and set himself right with God and man, seemed as far distant as it had been on the first day when he landed at Sydney. He had worn himself out since then, in ceaseless journeys to every quarter where he had the faintest reason to think his cousin might possibly be, and this search had been conducted on a rigorous system of personal privation; for he had abstained from appropriating a single penny from the revenues of the Atherstone estates, after that night when, in Trafford's presence, he determined to make restitution of all his unlawful possessions; he had lived from that time entirely on a very slender income which he had inherited from his father, and every part of it which he could spare from the actual necessaries of life was given to the agents whom he employed in assisting him to discover his cousin. He had placed himself in communication with the police; but the person who had chiefly assisted him in his endeavours was Wilson, the agent to whom he had telegraphed from England in the first instance. He was an honest intelligent man, of high character, and Atherstone had told him the whole truth with a frankness which had won his esteem and his hearty co-operation in the search. He had ascertained that when Edward landed at Sydney both he and his son were suffering more or less from the fever which had prevailed on board the ship, and from which Ashtaroth had died; also that during the short time he had remained in the town he had lived with the most reckless extravagance, and had finally joined a party of unprincipled adventurers, with whom he had gone into the interior of the country, taking his child with him, and there he had disappeared, leaving not a trace behind him. So the matter had rested ever since Humphrey's arrival; and his great dread now was that possibly Edward and his boy had succumbed to the hardships of life in the bush, when both were in an enfeebled state of health. Wilson had learnt that the child especially seemed little likely to survive, even when it left Sydney, and there was no one amongst the rough bush-rangers with whom they were travelling who would be at all capable of giving poor little Maurice the care which alone, perhaps, could have saved his life. But if Edward himself had perished in some unknown part of that trackless continent, there was small chance that any proof of his death could ever be obtained, and the position in which this uncertainty would leave Humphrey Atherstone was indeed terrible; for he had vowed most solemnly, as an immediate act of reparation for his own wrongdoing, that he would under no circumstances again take possession of his uncle's estate, excepting in the event of his cousin's death without leaving an heir.

Well might his thoughts be sad and hopeless as he sat there, leaning his head on his hand, and gazing out listlessly on the hot dazzling sunshine of the street. Una and Atherstone Abbey were lost to him already, and now it seemed as if even the hope of repairing the past in any way were taken from him also.

Suddenly, as his eyes wandered up and down the burning street, he caught sight of Wilson, the agent, hurrying along towards his lodgings at a pace which he would hardly have adopted in such weather without an urgent reason. Atherstone started to his feet, while the glad thought flashed into his mind, that perhaps he was the bearer of some tidings respecting Edward or his child; it was nearly a week since he had seen Wilson last, and news from the interior of the country might have reached him in the interval.

There was a hurried step on the stair, and Wilson came dashing into the room exclaiming, "Found! found!—your cousin is found!"

"Thank God!" was all Humphrey could say in the strong revulsion of feeling, while Wilson, who was a large heavy man, sank into a chair, breathless with the haste he had made to bring his friend and employer these welcome tidings. It was some minutes before he could answer the anxious questions with which Atherstone soon assailed him, and when he did speak the tale he had to tell was sad enough.

Edward was found indeed, but only as a dying man, and the little child had long since lain in a nameless grave, dug by rude hands in the pathless forest; Maurice had not lived many days after they had left Sydney, nor had the father ever regained his strength; and now he had for many weeks been suffering from a malignant species of fever and ague, caught in a pestilential swamp to which he had strayed in his wanderings, and where he would certainly have perished but for the charity of the driver of a bullock-wagon, who found him in a pitiable state, under no better shelter than a cattle-shed, and brought him back to Sydney; there he drifted into a miserable underground room in a low lodging-house, where, half-starved and wholly neglected, he was rapidly sinking into his grave.

Humphrey uttered an exclamation of bitter pain at this account, and asked how it was possible that Edward could have been reduced to such abject poverty when, on his arival in Sydney a little more than a year before, he had in his possession the large sum of money with which he had been bribed to leave England.

"Easily enough," replied Wilson, grimly; "it seems he began, even before he left Sydney, plunging into all sorts of reckless speculations, which swallowed up the greater part of his money, and nearly as much again has been lost in gambling; finally, he has been wandering about no one knows where, with some of the most undesirable companions any man could have, and they have very effectually helped him to make away with all he possessed."

"How did you discover him?" asked Atherstone.

"By a casual circumstance, quite unconnected with the efforts we have been making for so long a time to find him. Ill and starving as he was, some remnant of pride or shame has prevented him from taking advantage of any of our charitable institutions, and he would certainly have died undiscovered in the wretched place where he now lies, if it had not been for a philanthropic doctor, who stumbled upon him when visiting some other poor person in the same house. Dr. Townsend happens to be a friend of mine, and knowing what a search I have made for your cousin, it occurred to him, when he gave his name as Edwards, that he was probably the man we wished to find. I went to see him myself before I came to you, and there can be no doubt of his identity; in fact I had a detailed account of his proceedings since he left Sydney from another broken-down adventurer, who lodges in the next room, and has accompanied him in part of his wanderings. It was from him I heard how Edward's money has been squandered."

"I must go to him at once," exclaimed Atherstone.

"You will see a sorry sight, if you do; he is frightfully emaciated, and almost at the last gasp."

"What does the doctor say of his case?" asked Humphrey; "is there no hope of saving his life?"

"None whatever; his constitution is completely worn out."

"If it be in any way possible to restore him, even yet, by care and skill, he shall not die; if he could be moved, I should like to bring him here; anyhow, I will hasten to him, and I should be greatly obliged, Wilson, if you would bring the doctor to meet me there, and then we could judge what would be best for him."

"You will not be able to move him, that is very certain; he looked as if every breath would be his last; but I will do your bidding, and bring my medical friend to give you any help I can. Shall I send a cab for you, and tell the driver where to go; you will never be able to find the place on foot."

"Pray do, I can have no rest till I have seen him." And in a few minutes Humphrey Atherstone was on his way to the death-bed of the man he had so deeply wronged.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

HUMPHREY ATHERSTONE stood in a dark underground room, more like a cellar than a human habitation, gazing, sick at heart, on the scene before him. At last the victim of his fraud was found; the hour of reparation, which, in his deep repentance he had so ardently desired, was come; but what atonement could he now ever make to him who lay stretched out at his feet, visibly dying, as every laboured breath shook his wasted frame, and all that remained to him of life seemed gathered into the eyes burning from fever, that gleamed with lurid light in their hollow sockets! His bed was a little more than a heap of straw, covered with some coarse material like a horse-cloth; a broken table stood near it, on which were some restoratives brought by the charitable doctor, and one or two chairs completed the furniture which the room contained; no sunshine could reach it from the narrow window that was level with the pavement of the street outside; but Atherstone felt instinctively that the gloom and chill which pervaded the whole place were those of death itself, and as he sadly estimated the extent of the misery demonstrated in these details, it seemed to him as if the truth, that evil once wrought can never wholly be undone, were branded on his heart for ever in burning pain. Some minutes passed while he stood there in helpless silence, then Humphrey became aware that the eyes of the dying man were fixed on his face with a look of undoubted recognition, and, going forward, he sank on his knees by the bed-side of his unhappy cousin. An expression of exceeding bitterness passed over Edward's ghastly countenance, as if life were too far spent within him to call up the fiery passion of hate that would fain have possessed him, and slowly his livid lips framed the words, "My enemy! even in this last hour!"

"No, no!" exclaimed Humphrey, "not your enemy, Edward Atherstone, your friend, your cousin; I have been seeking for you these many months to give you back all that is due to you as my uncle's son." A gleam of excitement lit up the wan face of the dying man at those words.

"He was my father then! I was his true heir! I always felt it—knew it, though I could not prove it. Did you find his will in the ebony cabinet?"

"No! he never made a will; but it contained documents establishing your birthright. I have the proofs, and all is clear. Atherstone Abbey is yours, as your father meant it should be."

"He acknowledged me then before he died! I felt sure he had, and you stole my inheritance, you—villain!"

Humphrey started violently at the opprobrious term; but the next moment he showed the depth of his repentance by bowing his head as if to acknowledge its justice.

"You are right, Edward, I have wronged you deeply; but I bitterly regret it, and I have come from England on purpose to find you, and yield up to you all that is your own. I desire most ardently to make atonement to you for the past."

The dying eyes turned on him with a look of withering contempt. "Your words are a wretched mockery, Cousin Humphrey; you know it is too late!"

Too late! The voice of the man he defrauded had but echoed the words that were seething in Atherstone's own heart, as he looked on the wreck before him. He could not lie in the face of death by any attempt to refute the sentence; but he seized the emaciated hand of his cousin, and exclaimed, in a voice hoarse with emotion, "Edward, I can but entreat of you to forgive me. I would make restitution to you if I could; since I cannot, say at least that you forgive me!"

"Forgive you!" repeated Edward, slowly; "you can tell me to forgive you, although by your means I am dying in a hovel, when I should have been lord of Atherstone! It is too much to bear. Even your wife would plead for you in vain, though she stood between you and my vengeance once."

"My wife!" said Humphrey, amazed. "Edward, what can you mean? I am not married!"

"Not to Una Dysart?" asked the sick man, turning round feebly, with a look of surprise. The question caused Humphrey a thrill of exquisite pain.

"No, indeed," he said mournfully, "nor am I ever likely to know such happiness!"

"But you loved her?"

"I did, more than life itself, and I do so still unchangeably."

"And she loves you?"

"I fear not, Edward; why should you suppose it?"

"Because Ashtaroth, my dead wife, who had power from her race to read the secrets of others, told me that it was so; she said if I struck a blow at you it would pierce the heart of the fair-faced woman who saved the life of our little child at the risk of her own, and she persuaded me, for Una Dysart's sake, to forego a well-planned scheme of revenge I had prepared for you; it seems then that I was fooled in that as in all else."

"No, Edward," said Atherstone, "I do not doubt your wife was right at the time, and that in sparing me you spared Una too real pain and sorrow. I think she did love me then, and if she has ceased to do so now—if I have lost all hope of happiness with her, for that very reason you should forgive me; it is for your sake that she now stabs me to the heart, even as for her sake you saved me: because of my sin to you she has abandoned me." A faint smile of triumph stole over Edward's pale lips; but the effort he had made to speak had exhausted him, and he lay back in silence, while Humphrey tried to make him swallow a little of the wine which stood on the table beside him. Fortunately at that moment

Wilson came in, accompanied by Dr. Townsend, who proceeded to administer various restoratives, which seemed slightly to revive him. While the doctor was doing what he could for his patient, Atherstone, feeling completely overcome, went out into the street, that he might escape for a few minutes from the sickening atmosphere of the death-chamber. "My Una!" he murmured, as a rush of tender recollections almost unmanned him, "my Una! who saved me unconsciously, and now will never love me more! Oh! that I could have gone to her then with clean hands and a pure heart, and won her for my own in face of day. Too late! Edward said well—it is too late for him and for me."

Slowly he paced up and down beneath the soft evening sky, watching a glorious sunset, whose long beams of light, streaming down out of the liquid glory, seemed like golden paths leading from earth to heaven; and he had grown calmer and more patient, even in the prospect of expiating his error all his life long in solitude and unavailing regrets, when the doctor came out of Edward's room to speak to him.

"Is there a possibility of saving him?" asked Humphrey, eagerly.

"Not the slightest! the poor fellow's case is perfectly hopeless; no human skill can avail him now; he will not pass the night."

"I had wished so much to move him to my own rooms, that at least he might not die in that wretched place. Is it quite impracticable?"

"My dear sir, he would expire in your hands if you attempted to lift him off that bed.

"In that case I would rather remain alone with my cousin. I shall not leave him till the end."

"Well, send to my house if you want assistance of any kind. I fear I must leave you now, as I am due elsewhere;" and then, as Atherstone declined Wilson's offer to remain with him, the two men took leave of him, and he was left alone.

He went back into the room, and found Edward lying with his face to the wall; he bent over him and spoke very gently, asking if he would allow him to lift his head into an easier position, but the dying man was either unconscious of his presence, or wilfully ignored it; and he desisted at last from any attempt to attract his attention, and sat down in silence by the side of the miserable couch. Truly Humphrey Atherstone's reflections were bitter enough as he remained there, leaning his head on his hand, and wearily counting the passing moments by the laboured breathing with which the blighted life was slowly sighing itself away. How utterly worthless seemed all earthly possessions in that hour! Justice—mercy—humility! where had they been in his life who had brought his uncle's lawful heir to such a pass? More than an hour had elapsed, when Edward became very restless, and seemed endeavouring to turn round from the wall, without having strength to do so. Humphrey tenderly placed his arm round him, and moved the light wasted frame into the position he appeard to desire. Edward was now lying facing the window, with his fast-glazing eyes fixed on his cousin; a dim awful shadow was stealing over his face, and it was plain that death was very near. He seemed conscious, however, and Humphrey thought he might make one more effort to win that pardon from him, without which he felt as if his whole life yet to come must be unhallowed and unblest. He fell on his knees beside his cousin, and stretched out his pleading hands to him, exclaiming, "Edward, you are passing to the tribunal of the Most High God, where, one and all, we shall have to answer for the deeds done in the flesh; you will yourself have need of mercy and forgiveness there, and I pray that for Christ's sake you may obtain it; but in His name I ask you to forgive me too, even as you hope to be forgiven!" The dying man heard him, his lips moved, but he could not articulate; then he made a feeble effort to hold out his hand. Humphrey grasped it eagerly, saying, "You do forgive me, Edward; I may believe that you do, may I not?"

The chill fingers gave a faint pressure—so faint that Atherstone could scarcely feel it, but it was all he was ever to receive as a token that his attempted reparation was accepted by the man he had so greatly injured. A few minutes later death had locked the cold lips of his cousin in impenetrable silence for evermore in this world, and Edward Atherstone had gone to meet the righteous Judge.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XXII. CHRIST A MAN OF SORROWS, PART II.

Chapters to be read—Various.

INTRODUCTION. Ask the children the two kinds of sorrow already spoken of; which is the worse? Can any sorrow be greater than that of the mind? Why is that of the soul greater? Because the soul is highest part of man's nature, all that affects it, therefore of greatest importance. To explain the sorrow of the soul, remind the children of some time when were in disgrace; had committed some fault; been punished; parents' or teacher's face turned away; would not look on child with smile of pleasure as so often before; would not for the time receive as a child. Then had punishment to bear; kept in from play; lessons to learn; &c. What was it caused so much pain and suffering? Was it the punishment? No, could bear that, but the look of displeasure, the absence of smile, the feeling of being cast out from love and approval, caused deep pain to highest and best part of nature, viz., soul, and how much more trying when undeserved, wrongfully accused, &c. Now apply this to Christ. Remind of His sufferings of body and mind; all as nothing compared to that of His soul. See this foretold in Is. liii. 3—5, &c. Will now speak of our Lord's two trials as a prisoner, to show how He was an innocent victim.

I. THE TRIAL BEFORE THE HIGH PRIEST. (Read Matt. xxvi. 57—68.) From last lesson remind of His betrayal by Judas and capture in the Garden of Gethsemane. What became of the apostles? From John xviii. 15, 16, show how two of them—Peter the bold, and John the loving—afterwards followed, and were present during the trial. Describe the officers of the high priest, with torches and lanterns, led by Judas; leading the prisoner along; a large rabble following. Does he resist? To what had Isaiah compared Him? (Is. liii. 7.) Is indeed like a lamb in innocence and patience. Now the city is entered, the palace of high priest reached, and the crowd, with the prisoner, pours through the narrow entrance into the court-yard of the palace; the council (or Sanhedrim) of seventy elders quickly summoned; high priest puts on his robe of office; elders sit round; prisoner produced. What witness is there? What is the charge? Make children understand that this was a spiritual court to inquire into blasphemy and such-like offences against God. Could they find anything He had said against God? No, but had said something against the Temple—house of God. Produce the witnesses. What did the prisoner say? (ver. 61.) What answer did Christ make? Why none? Because it was true He had said so; but what had He meant? (See John ii. 19—21.) At last high priest solemnly adjures, or puts oath to, prisoner as to whether He is the Son of God (ver. 63). With what effect? Now is time to speak, and He does so (ver. 64). The judge puts it to the vote, and all the members of council declare He is guilty of death. Let children see that He was condemned on true charge of making Himself God, but was this blasphemy? How had His Divinity been shown? By miracles attending His birth; the angels' songs; &c.; by the miracles He had done; the Father's testimony at His birth and transfiguration; &c. Yet all in vain; the chief priest, clergy of the time, would not believe, and His life-work all seems in vain. God is dishonoured, and His Son disbelieved!

II. THE TRIAL BEFORE PILATE. (Read Luke xxiii. 1—24.) If guilty of blasphemy, what was the punishment (Lev. xxiv. 16)? Why did the high priest not put Him to death? Under whose dominion were the Jews at this time? So must take Him to the Roman governor. Would he care about blasphemy? See what Festus said (Acts xxv. 19). So must change the charge. What can they accuse Him of? He has been going about a great deal, collecting crowds, teaching the people—of course trying to collect a party to Himself, and then make Himself king. If He king, then would be sure to want taxes; must be paid to Him, and not to Roman emperor Cæsar; hence two distinct charges. (1) Makes Himself king; (2) forbids tribute (or taxes) to Cæsar. As regards 1, ask the children about our Lord's conduct. Did the people ever want to make Him king? What did He always do? and what did He say about His kingdom? As regards 2, read Mark xii. 13—17 for the story of the tribute-money. So that both these charges were utterly false. What did Pilate ask Him? Read John xviii. 33—37. Observe how the judge declared he could find no fault, yet what did he do? (John xix. 1, 4, 6.) Show how Pilate wanted to release Him, partly influenced by his wife's dream (Matt. xxvii. 19). Why, then, did he not? Of whom was he afraid? Why did chief priests desire Christ's death? Of what were they envious? What did His miracles and teaching prove Christ to be? Yet this the very charge they make against Him! They, full of envy, led on to malice, falsely accuse Christ; stir up the people; lately cried "Hosanna!" but now "Crucify!" Pilate, afraid of being denounced as not Cæsar's friend, gives Him up contrary to own convictions. So all allied against Christ. How did He bear it all? Think of the disgrace of being led as prisoner through the streets, mocked, scourged, insulted, yet answered not a word; bore it all patiently, not answering again, not complaining, and willingly, not caring to shorten His sufferings.

Practical. Let children see how Christ was an example. All have sometimes to bear undeserved rebuke—children at school, servants from mistress. (Read 1 Pet. ii. 19—25.) How much more be patient under suffering we feel we have deserved? Suffering a kind of discipline—e.g., sickness, trials, &c.—all intended to teach patience, so that may say as David (Ps. cxix. 67), "have now kept Thy Word."

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe sufferings of the soul. Why are they most severe?
2. Describe our Lord's trial before the high priest.
3. Of what was Christ accused to the high priest?
4. Of what was He accused to Pilate?
5. Describe Pilate's conduct.
6. What lessons do we learn from it all?

THE WILD WOLF'S BARK.

PART II.

TERROR lending wings to their speed, the children soon arrived at the foot of a large elm. Harry mounted first, and, giving his hand to his brother, in a few moments they were both safe amongst the thick branches; but hardly were they seated, when the animal Harry had seen at a distance, actually came bounding towards the tree, and, peering up into the spreading boughs, soon discovered their place of refuge. Howling furiously, he rushed round the great trunk, scratching at the bark, and making many unavailing efforts to ascend, until at length, tired of his hopeless exertions, he lay quietly down to rest and keep guard at the foot of the tree.

During all this time the boys had remained perfectly still, fearing almost to breathe. Now Harry ventured to whisper, "Oh, Leonard, he will never go away, and we shall be starved up here!"

"You forget," replied his brother, "that he will grow hungry too. Let us take courage; we may escape yet."

"Ah, things always turn out badly when we do wrong!"

Hours passed on, the moonlight had gradually disappeared, everything around was very still, and in spite of the anxiety which the boys felt, a weight of drowsiness fell upon their eyes. The darkness had increased so much, that they were unable to distinguish the form of the sleeping animal beneath, still they knew he was there, and clung to the overhanging branches lest they should fall into his hungry jaws. These hours of darkness seemed interminable, and never were the first streaks of dawn welcomed with a greater feeling of thankfulness.

As the light increased, the brothers perceived to their great relief that the dreaded wolf had disappeared from his post. He had probably gone to seek food. When would he return? was now the important question. Perhaps he only lurked in some neighbouring thicket, ready to spring upon them as soon as they should leave their refuge. At all events it seemed prudent to wait for full daylight before attempting an escape. Another long interval followed, when, just as they had made up their minds to descend, a loud bark caused them to pause, and presently an animal about the size and colour of a wolf came bounding towards the tree.

"Surely, Harry, that is no wolf!" exclaimed Leonard; "I do believe it is our own poor old Rover who has found out our hiding-place, and come to look for us."

"But you don't think it was only Rover who watched us here the whole night?"

"How can I tell? Moonlight is very deceptive, and our minds were so full of the wolf, we may have made a mistake. But, look! who is that following him?"

By this time the dog had reached the foot of the tree, and was jumping about and howling just as the supposed wolf had done during the night; and the figure which Leonard had pointed out they recognised as their father, who, observing Rover's excitement, soon discovered his sons crouching amongst the thick branches of the elm.

"Boys, what are you doing there? we have been searching for you all the morning!"

They dropped quickly to the ground.

"Oh, papa," said Harry, "we thought you would never wish to see us again after what has happened, so we ran away!"

"You have been very careless and disobedient, indeed, but your absence has only given us additional anxiety."

"Papa, how did you hear about Nora?"

"We knew nothing until she was carried home, and then your mamma was so frightened she has been dangerously ill ever since."

"Carried home!"

"Yes, did you not hear that her arm is broken. She fell down a steep bank, and had a narrow escape of the wolf, poor child. I am told he crossed the field while she was there."

"Then she is still alive!" exclaimed the boys. "Oh, papa, we were sure she had been devoured, and that the shock would have killed mamma!" then, with relieved hearts they related their own adventures during the night.

"You must, indeed, have suffered much," replied their father, "from the belief that you had been the cause of so dreadful a fate to your little sister. Thank God it is not so bad as that; He took care of her though you did not."

"Did she see the wolf, papa?"

"Yes, Harry, she says a lean red dog ran across the field. You know she is afraid of all strange dogs, so, dropping her flowers, she ran to the gap over which you lifted her, and while climbing the bank saw the supposed dog catch and kill one of the lambs just near the place where she had been sitting a few moments before, then, in her haste she missed her footing and fell into the deep drain at the other side, where she lay in great pain, till one of the men engaged in pursuit of the wolf came up, and immediately carried her home. She still suffers much pain, but we hope the consequences will not be serious. Your mother, too, is better this morning. Now come in and see your sister; it will amuse her to hear of your wonderful adventures last night, and how you mistook poor old Rover—who came to take care of you—for a wild wolf."

S. T. A. R.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

324. In what part of the Old Testament do we read of the interment of a Jewish king in his own garden?

325. We read in the New Testament that "the graves were opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves after Christ's resurrection, and appeared unto many." Which of the prophets foretold this?

326. Show that although the Saviour was crucified outside the city walls (Heb. xiii. 12), "the place of a skull" was not far from the city.

327. The cities of Hebron and Debir, which were taken from the Canaanites, bore different names before they were captured by the children of Israel. Give them.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 736.

310. Zech. x. 12; Micah. iv. 5.

311. Matt. xv. 21—28; Mark vii. 24–30.

312. Compare Acts ii. 42—47 with Rom. xv. 25, 26.

313. Ahaziah (2 Kings i. 2, 17).

314. (1) Flax was dried there (Josh. ii. 6); (2) the roof was used as a place in which to hold converse (1 Sam ix. 25), and (3) for offering up devotions (Zeph. i. 5).

315. "Neither," said the Psalmist, in reference to the Lord, "wilt Thou suffer Thine Holy One to see corruption" (Ps. xvi. 10).

316. 1 Sam. ii. 10.

317. Lev. xxiv. 15, 16.

"THE QUIVER" FUND FOR THE RELIEF OF THE FAMINE IN BENGAL.

SIXTH LIST.

In presenting the sixth List of Subscriptions to the readers of THE QUIVER, the Editor cannot but again express his gratification at the ready response which has been made to his appeal. Further amounts received will be acknowledged and a complete balance sheet will be submitted to the subscribers with the next and concluding list.

	£ s. d.
Amount previously acknowledged in first, second, third, fourth, and fifth lists 2047	2 6
Jenny Jones, Chancery Lane	1 0 0
Daisy Fuller, Rectory Place, Woolwich	0 5 0
A. W. C., Islington	0 4 0
J. S. H., Llandudno, North Wales	0 11 6
J. F. and A. L. B., Blackburn	1 2 0
Ethe land Edith Penny, Eggleney, St. Mary Bourne	1 0 3
G. Bolsover Mitchell, Bakewell, Derbyshire	0 4 6
Isabel Dyer, Shipton Alliffe, Gloucestershire (2nd subscription)	1 10 5
A. J. H. D., Beaufort	0 3 6
G. Loutham	0 1 0
Annie Selless, 14, Queen Street, Lambeth	0 2 0
F. B. Upton, Victoria, Essex	0 12 6
A. Triffe, Newport, Monmouth	0 1 0
Emma Willmot, 18, Kirkby Street, Hull	0 3 0
Alpha, Stone	0 3 0
Frederick Franklin, 98, Great Lister Street, Birmingham	0 8 3
C. B.	0 5 0
Venn and Co., Ceylon, per Charles Greatrex and Son, Walsall	1 10 0
K. Salter, 45, St. Aldate's Street, Oxford	0 8 0
J. H.	0 2 6
A Friend to the distressed Bengalese, Truro	0 17 6
E. L., Bridgnorth	0 2 6
Wilhelm Elip, Littlehampton	0 2 6
J. T., Ratho, Edinburgh	1 0 0
Alfred J. Shickle, St. Stephen's School, Hulme, Manchester	0 2 0
A few of the Pupils of Miss Battam's School, 42, Brookland Road, Stonycroft, near Liverpool	1 2 3
Isabella Davison, Mrs. Nairn's, Wetheral, near Carlisle	0 12 0
W. J. Jones, Wigmill Capel, Dorking, Surrey	0 10 6
Edward Corfe, Kimberley Diamond Fields, South Africa	4 0 0
Miss Ashley, Athlone, Ireland	0 7 6
R. A H., Wash Road, Newbury	1 0 0
Kate, Holloway	1 0 0
E. Penson, Eastleach Turville, Lechlade, Gloucestershire	1 13 6
Rhyna Ryle, Over Wallop	0 16 0
W. T. H., Peckham	1 8 0
Agnes M. Parsonson, High Street, Doncaster	0 12 0
Robert Hiles, Littlehampton	0 10 6
En, Annie, Liverpool	0 2 6
Carried forward £2072	19 2

	£ s. d.
Brought forward	2072 19 2
J. C. Robertson, Dereham, Boyndlie	0 8 6
H. M. S., Ware	0 9 4
George Ferguson, Milton of Campsie, Scotland	0 5 0
Lot, Bradford	0 2 0
Rev. A. O. & Mrs. James, Stanton House, Stoney Stanton, Hinckley	1 0 0
Annie S. Lowfields, Kirkby Lonsdale	0 5 0
William B. Cressey, Skidley, near Hull	0 17 0
T. Haworth, Blackburn	0 2 0
Fred ——, Newport Pagnell	0 7 6
Lilian C. Hancock, 2, Alexandra Villas, Eltham Road, Lee, S.E.	0 5 0
Winifred Alice Crichton, The Retreat, Queenstown	0 6 0
G. H. Geels, Midland Railway Station, Newark, Notts	0 3 6
Annie Edmunds, Sunnyside, Parkstone, near Poole, Dorset	0 4 11
A. B. C., 13, Fleet Street, Torquay	0 5 0
S. M., H. Square	0 10 0
Ann Baldwin, Elsham, Brigg, Lincolnshire	0 7 0
Thomas E. Thorns, Otley, Yorkshire	0 14 0
Master Makepeace, 11, Liverpool Road, Islington	0 4 6
Ruth and Lizzie West, 36, Windsor Road, Ealing	2 11 3
A. Newton, Water Bleau, Millone, Cumberland	0 6 0
National School, Washington, County of Durham	2 1 2
Willie Ackland, Pennsylvania, Exeter	0 3 0
John Brooks, Peckham (2nd subscription)	0 7 6
A Family Box	1 0 0
F. R.	0 2 6
Marié Helené Rivers, Briton Ferry	0 1 6
W. X. Y. Z., Stoke-on-Trent	0 3 1
E. N. Price, Cutsdean	0 5 0
John Wood, Barry Villa, Barry Road, Peckham Rye	0 5 0
Ada C. Lance, 117, Bedford Street, Liverpool	0 5 0
Little Lilla, Peckham	0 4 7
H. K., Folkestone	0 5 0
Mary, Yorkshire	0 1 6
John O'Connor, Carrick-on-Shannon, Co. Leitrim	0 4 0
E. Martin, Pershore	0 10 0
Jenny	0 1 3
F. H. Lemhkühl, 15, Cawley Road, E.C.	1 10 0
Miss Cliff and Friends, Leeds	0 1 9
E. S., Askam	0 1 0
Ida H——, Moreton-in-Marsh	0 5 0
Carried forward £2090	10 6

	£ s. d.
Brought forward	2090 10 6
A. Shorter, Waterloo Road, Burslem	0 10 0
Annie C. Dunlop, 12, Thorneycroft Road, Liverpool	0 10 6
Annie Bath, Miss Wills's, St. Columb, Cornwall	0 2 10
George Arthur Playford, Brunswick Terrace, Brunswick Road, Norwich	0 5 0
Charley Brandon, St. Cleves	0 5 0
Mr. and Mrs. Knight, Rochdale	0 10 0
G. Horton, 18, Talbot Street, near Lodge Road, Birmingham	0 3 9
From a Friend in British Guiana	1 0 0
Charles Slocombe, Market Place, Tetbury	0 12 6
A Friend, St. Leonard's	0 5 0
J. Reville and S. O. Lones, Spon Lane, West Bromwich	0 12 8
M. A. Johnstone, 59, Marine Parade, Worthing	0 16 6
Wilkinson Battinson, Castleside, Blackhill, Durham	0 12 0
From a Little One, Jersey	0 4 6
Alice Goodwin, 14, Hereford Square, W.	0 10 0
Jane Hocking, The Lizard, Cornwall	0 7 0
Nemo, Walsingham	0 5 6
J. M., Old Ford Road, Bow	0 2 6
A Friend, Cornwall	0 4 6
C. B., an "Orphan," Burton-on-Trent	0 3 1
Alfred F. Minty, Ringwood, Hants	1 5 0
R. M., Edinburgh	0 5 0
T. Jackson, Senior Place, New Wortley, near Leeds	0 3 0
William Selbie, P. C., Newmain's, Lanarkshire	0 2 0
Martha Brough, Nantwich	0 2 6
N. F. Hicks, Witham, Essex	0 8 8
Miss Hall, Worlaby, near Brigg, Lincolnshire	1 13 0
J. L., Dundee	0 3 0
Friends from Devonport	0 4 0
William Gaskell, Livesey, Blackburn, Lancs.	0 5 0
Psalms xli. 1 verse	0 0 10
Misses Kingstone and Howes, Mrs. Bennell's, Moreton House, Dunstable, Beds	0 5 9
A Subscriber, Sandbach	0 2 6
James Brewitt and Friends, Belvoir, Grantham	0 5 0
H. Bond, 24, Longley Street, Bermondsey, S.E.	0 8 6
Mabel Carver, Row Hay	0 12 6
George Andrew Jessen, 7, Southey Street, Cardiff	0 13 5
A Reader of the "Quiver," Lancashire	0 2 6
Carried forward £2105	15 6

	£ s. d.
Brought forward	2105 15 6
L. Reynolds, Pembroke Place, Oswestry, Salop	0 9 0
Lillie Pringle, 126, Gloucester Road, Newcastle-on-Tyne	0 8 8
A Wellwisher, Wakefield	0 0 5
M. A. Selwood, 1, Harley Place, Clifton, Bristol	0 19 0
M. C. E. G., Bristol House, Putney Heath	1 2 0
T. S., Darlaston	0 10 6
Sydney F. Giller, 8, Wills Terrace, City Road, Bristol	0 13 6
A. M. G., Holborn, London, E.C.	0 1 0
Willie and Arthur Huddlestone, 14, Finsbury Park Villas	0 13 10
Henry Voss, "Gibraltar" Training Ship, Belfast	0 10 0
Mary Griffiths, Caergwrle, Wrexham	0 4 6
Joseph Griffiths, Caergwrle	0 7 0
R. S., Marine Villa, Gorleston	0 5 11
Lucie and Allie Lean, Bassett Place, Falmouth, Cornwall	1 6 0
Arthur Standen Cox, Hill Street, Richmond	0 3 1
Emily Knutton, The Rookery, Sandbach	7 0 0
Susan Densen, Winwich, Newton-le-Wittens	0 7 0
J. W., Banbury	0 5 0
Sunday School Teacher, Nottingham	0 5 0
Ethel B. Sketch, Woodside, Llwn Brun	1 8 0
F. Swaffer, Kingsnorth, Kent	0 14 0
A. E. B., Rathfriland, Newry	0 7 6
Nellie H., Bridgend	0 4 6
Miss E. Rows, 11, Newton Street, New North Road	0 4 0
L. J. Collins, Stationer, Croydon	0 5 0
Mary Ellen Buswell, Red Lion Hill, Clipstone, Northampton	0 5 0
F. Matthew	0 0 6
Richard Wagner and Co., per Miss McTear, Belfast	2 10 0
Fred. Arthur Waller, Chewstoke	0 3 9
R. Lomas, Parkhouse, Dalton-in-Furness	0 5 0
Richard Rundle, Kestle, St. Columb Minor, Cornwall	0 5 6
T. H. Wingate, Leeds	0 1 0
P. R. Jones and Friends, 163, Marlborough Road, Brompton	1 1 0
Geoffrey Frendergust, and G. P. A. (Tipperary)	0 5 0
M. R. Harrison, Deeping	0 2 0
J. Oliver, 76, Borough	1 12 11
E. Hardy, Clapham Park Road	0 4 2
	£2131 5 8

Being amounts received up to and on 21st July, 1874.

(Drawn by A. JOHNSON)

"ECHOES."

I.

THEY say that echoes heard at even
Are the voices of the dead,
That come to join us down from heaven,
Lingering o'er our head;
Answering to the words we've spoken,
In soft cadence wild and broken;
That give us back from wood and wave
The love we laid within their grave.

II.

It may be that the dead who love us
  Break the silence of the tomb,
In those weird tones that strangely move us
  Through the evening's gloom.
I gainsay not the fond belief,
Because it gives my heart relief:
I fain would feel some mystic chain
'Twixt dead and living might remain.

III.

Ye dear and dead! oh, still be near me
  In the solemn lonely night!
Still let your ghostly voices cheer me,
  Make my darkness light.
Let the day be for the living,
While I cherish the believing,
That when the light of day is fled
The night will give me back my dead.

JOHN FRANCIS WALLER.

BLINDNESS.

BY THE REV. GEORGE A. CHADWICK, M.A., RECTOR OF ARMAGH.

"Bring forth the blind people that have eyes."

ISRAEL is here impeached with wilful blindness; and prophecy is throughout this book appealed to as the proof which they fail to see—the proof which would establish their faith, if only they had any will to consider what a fulfilled prediction must imply. Who else than Jehovah could show former things? Who else had witnesses to bring forward? Therefore, if His people forsook Him, and turned to idols, which had mouths, but could not speak good or evil, they showed themselves infatuated and blind. But they deserved none of the sympathy which loss of sight involved. Theirs was the darkness of a perverse will: they were blind people who had eyes. And the evidence of prophecy has been strengthened manyfold since Isaiah sang. We have Isaiah's own predictions; we have the manifestation of Him whose testimony was the spirit of all prophecy. One may assert that, if some great catastrophe were to overwhelm all other evidences of the Christian religion, still the twenty-second Psalm and the fifty-third of Isaiah would float like buoys over the deluge, to mark for every careful eye the place where the treasure of the faith lay, submerged but not destroyed.

If, then, we are insensible to the claims of Christ, we are blind by our own default; in the dark because our eyes are shut, not because they are put out. And yet it is hard to deny that blindness in part has happened to many who profess the name of Christ. Let us, for example, think of the congregations which worship in the churches of Christendom every week. Do they perceive the vastness of the work which engages them? Even the carnal mind may well be impressed by the fact that countless multitudes of both sexes and every age are gathered week after week to listen to a familiar message, to utter identical confessions and entreaties, to approach the same God. No political interest on earth could keep up for one year such assemblies as Christianity has maintained for eighteen centuries. It is an astounding fact; nothing in social life approaches it in graphic and startling strangeness. And there are some who feel the grandeur of their occupation, and would not resign their place in the audience-chamber of the King of kings for admission to any palace upon earth. But not all. How many enter listlessly, and listen dreamily, and depart carelessly. Christ, who has brought even them there unawares, has wrought before their eyes this marvel of modern civilisation, has renewed the testimony borne to Himself by the organic Church. But they have seen none of it; they are blind. No wonder they observe nothing of deeper and more spiritual import.

What does such blindness lose?

1. A blind man does not see his dangers. He may indeed sometimes feel himself to be helpless and in peril; and careless men cannot help feeling their peril also. No heart is so seared but it sometimes feels a fearful looking for of judgment. No man is so foolhardy as not to think, "Oh that I were safe! oh that I had not to face death and eternity!" The eye may be sealed, but a vague tremor shakes the soul; and the man stops short, and wonders where he is. But his sense of danger fails to guide his feet. His shapeless fear is a different thing from the clear perception of one who sees how the path clings to the rock-side above dizzy precipices, where the sharp teeth of the granite wait to rend him who falls, and marks that yonder the foaming torrent has torn away a bridge, and turns from the shaking quagmire which would engulf a careless foot. The blind soul fears to be lost, but does not understand that loss means the indulgence of to-day's appetite, and the perpetration of to-morrow's crime. And even if the wanderer, groping his way, falls into no gulf nor chasm, defiles himself with no open sin, yet when his road runs along the flat plain, how shall he escape the danger of finding himself at night far from the celestial city, having turned insensibly away to worldliness, and now the damp mists are closing in, and the chill wind pipes over the frozen plain, and the dawn of the eternal day will find him cold and stiff and breathless. Blindness is peril.

2. But what if this wilful darkness be forsaken just before it shall be too late? What if men keep their strange and presumptuous vow, and repent upon their death-bed? They shall be accepted if they do; for none are excluded—"whosoever will may come." But surely no time can be less hopeful; the very sorrow for one's own peril must then be so absorbing as well-nigh to exclude all sorrow for grieving God. But at the best, the blind man who opens his eyes at last will have lost all the enjoyment and all the treasure he might have gathered upon the road. If we are being trained while here—if we cannot give to a disciple because he is Christ's scholar one cup of cold water unrequited—if they that be wise shall shine like the sun—then every moment of neglect lets slip some precious opportunity; and if it is possible to enter life halt and maimed, and in that kingdom are some called least and others greatest, what is the infatuation which conceives itself wise in refusing to serve God now? Our labour is not in vain in the Lord.

3. Blindness means isolation. Give your tenderest and most watchful affection to one whose eyes are darkened, yet you cannot show him half what there is to see. He does not suspect the vigilance which anticipates his wants and removes inconveniences from his path, nor the moisture which obscures your eye when you hear him sigh, nor the quivering lip which expresses your emotion when words are none. The subtlest and fairest part of human sympathies to him is an unknown book; a veil has been drawn between him and those whose hearts break to rend it.

Well, but these pangs of defective sympathy are only such as, in lesser measure, we all must suffer. There are things we may not speak to the truest friendship nor the tenderest love; thoughts which sigh, but never find words; pictures of the brain which mortal pigment never represented; songs of the heart which never found music since the world began. "All words, though culled with choicest art, fail to give the bitter in the sweet." When words and images have flowed fastest, and the voice been best attuned to passion and hope and melancholy, ah! yet there is a word worth all the rest which haunts and mocks us. That word never will come to lips which ache for it. The want of it is God's attestation of man's isolation without Christ. He is the true remedy for our heart-sickness. The wildest and most tumultuous passion, the airiest and most subtle emotion, need only address itself to Him, and find its unutterable meaning clearly divined, and feel the reach of sympathy penetrating to its deepest hiding-place. The throbbing heart of the Christian beats under the sensitive hand of his Lord. Our isolation is at an end when His tender wisdom addresses itself to our perplexed needs. Amid our perplexities we often know not what to ask: our groanings cannot be uttered. But there is help, there is an Interpreter, a Spirit who Himself maketh intercession for us.

4. Blindness is something worse than danger, loss, and isolation. It is inherent defect, a mutilated nature, an imperfection which humiliates, baffles, cripples, and diminishes the man. Put him in perfect safety, load him with treasure, fill him with love until his spirit overflows, and you will only have averted some accessories of his unhappiness—the calamity itself remains. He will say, "I complain no longer of what I have not, but of what I am not; my surroundings are admirable, but my misery is in myself."

And there is many a man whose open eyes need some strange eye-salve to help him really to see. The tourist who praises only the inn where beds were soft and wines rich, has been blind to the tender light and shade which dream over lake and lawn and woodland; blind to the sublime deep skies, where stars are larger and clearer than at home; blind to the awful majesty of mountains, which lift aloft their mantle of perpetual snow, as if to cry to the heavens that earth had still something as imperishable and as pure as they. He is a blind person who has eyes.

And verily he is blind also who passes through life like such a tourist, counting one year good because it yielded him profit in trade, or quiet in his family, and another evil because his rest was broken, but all unconscious of the higher meaning with which life is laden—the discipline, the warning, the vocation—whose soul never stirs with divine desires, never melts into inspired contritions, never rises into ardours and resolves which are breathed into him by the Holy Ghost.

Is a general blind who leads his army by pleasant and smiling passages into a defile where all is lost? Then assuredly so is he who chooses the pleasures which give him over to the power of Satan, and declines the rougher road which leads to the city of the saints.

Blind, and yet not so as to take responsibility away. If he were helplessly darkened, there might be calamity, but there could not be blame; we should sympathise, and not reproach. But what of the wilfully blind; of those who see what it pleases them to mark, and are clearly conscious that they might see all? "If ye were blind, ye had not had sin: but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth." Such is the epitaph which will be graven upon the sepulchre of the blind people who have eyes.

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC. ETC.

II.—"EVERY LITTLE MAKES A MICKLE."

HERE is no more common proverb than this; no truth exercising a greater influence upon our daily life, upon the destines of the world, upon each man's great future, and yet there is no proverb less practically remembered—less acted on in daily life. This is, indeed, a two-sided, a double-edged proverb, having respect to this world and to the next, to all which man is now, and which he shall be hereafter.

First of all, good reader, look at the great world in which we live; it is so entirely made up of littles that if only there were any place where to blow them to, and some one long-lived enough to do it, the whole of it could be blown away in atoms not a thousandth part the size of the point of the pen I am writing with, and that is not a broad-nibbed one either. Vast as the world is, it is nothing but an amazing number of atoms stuck together, or rather pressed together so tightly that they form one great mass.

This, then, is our world, made up of littles. And now allow me to state further, that the great power which rules the world is the power of littles. Just as of old the Lord was manifested, not in the great strong wind which rent the mountains and brake in pieces the rocks, nor in the earthquake, nor in the fire, but in the still small voice, so now the power which He permits to have most influence in human affairs of all kinds, is not the thunder and fire of great, but the small voice of little things.

So then, when we say, "Every little makes a mickle," we may be about to speak of matters of very serious moment.

Most people apply this proverb to making a fortune; and, in truth, looked at with reference to money-making, it is quite true. Many of the great fortunes in this country have been built up of pence and halfpence—I might almost say of farthings. The odd halfpenny and three-farthings that you see (if you look close) upon the ticketed article in the shop-window, forms one of the littles; and a profit of hundreds of pounds, or often thousands, at the end of the year, forms the mickle. You need go no farther than Mr. Selvige, of Selvige Court, to see an instance of this. Selvige Court has three storeys, twenty-four bedrooms, one hundred feet of greenhouses, and fifteen acres of ornamental grounds, besides the park; and all that, with the Selvige horses and carriages and dinner-parties, and the lodge, and the fat man who sits in front of it to open the gate, is a mickle of ever so many farthings, conglomerated and stuck fast together by Mr. Selvige, he having gathered them together during many years' careful work—farthings dropping off yards of ribbon here, and buttons and tapes there, and a little profit everywhere.

I am not going to say a word against Mr. Selvige's fortune; he has earned it by honest industry, and he has a right to enjoy it, especially as I never see him down for a shabby guinea, because that is what every one else gives. He knows he can afford his five and ten, and he gives it like a man. I respect Mr. Selvige as a good big honourable worthy mickle, made up of many littles, but not one whit the less to be thought of on that account.

I can prove that Lord Hillandale is made up of grass-blades and wheat-grains if I like; that he, though a much greater mickle, is made up in the very same way as Mr. Selvige, only with atoms of another kind; and that being the case, I shall go on to what I have to say, only premising this—that the fortunes which men make by littles are generally more enduring than those "mickles" which come easily, and equally easily go away.

Nothing ever impressed me with the value of littles more than a visit to one of the Australian gold-mines. When the fortnight's yield of gold was turned out, it formed a cake about half the size of an ordinary family apple-dumpling. The value was, of course, very large. But whence came this cake? From minute particles of gold so fine that they could not be seen even with a microscope in the quartz in which they were spread. No human hand could have gathered them together; no human eye could have even seen them; but quicksilver, which has a great affinity for gold, lay lurking in wait for them in a box, in which they were pounded, and stuck them and itself all together; and when the cunning metal evaporated in the retort, and took itself off into a bucket of water, to gather itself up so as to be able to play the like trick again, it left behind millions of particles far smaller than the point of a cambric needle—a very valuable mickle from millions of littles, not one of which was worth anything in itself.

So well do those engaged in the crushing-mill know the power of littles, that they will even burn the wood of the cradle in which the gravel has been rocked, and then throw the ashes in water to catch any particle of gold which may have adhered to it, and which must sink when treated thus. Even in the rooms of banks where the gold is weighed, the dust is burned, and a curious lump is the result, with gold, however, in it—something to add to the mickle from which shareholders look for their dividends.

Now, then, I say, that this proverb has to do with more than money or fortunes made by the little gatherings of many a long year.

"Every little makes a mickle" is the history of the progress of many if not of every mind and character and soul.

It is, first of all, the history of all human acquirement. The most beautiful music is but a mickle of many little notes, and the result of many little moments of practice, many little efforts, many runnings up and down scales, and so forth; the going over little bits of perhaps half a dozen notes over and over and over again. The hearers of the perfect piece enjoy a "mickle"—a great result; but without many littles they could have had a lame performance at the best. All the great scientific and mechanical accomplishments of which we make so much are but the results of many little moments spent in thought, many little circumstances observed, many little hints acted upon; the great scientific mickle, whether it be the great steam-hammer on land, or the Great Eastern at sea, or the Atlantic cable under the sea, are all conglomerations of many littles.

Or once more: take the eloquent speech in Parliament, or the eloquent sermon from the pulpit; to find the beginning of these you must go back to the nursery; and there, in hundreds of thousands of half-formed words, and then half-formed sentences, you have the first littles of that mickle which has just now made such an impression. Littles represent the price at which mickles are purchased, as well as the component parts of which they are made.

Littles have an immense deal to do with the formation of character also. No doubt people are born with certain predispositions, which have much to do with their after character; but character in the main depends upon training. An untrained predisposition to liberality will end in a man's becoming a spendthrift; its opposite of prudence and carefulness to a man's becoming a miser. Men and women become what they are made, and they are made by littles; not by the sledge-hammer strokes of great events, but by the influences which surround them, and the teachings which they receive from day to day, and even from hour to hour. The littles of the mother, of the nurse, of the servant, or even of other children, make up the final mickle of many a character.

Self-restraint is all-important in life. No man can get on well in the world without it; no man can be a great or noble man if he fail here. And how is this to be attained to but by exercise in little things? and every little that we conquer in is a help towards the mickle of a noble character. It may seem a small thing to train a child to be able to restrain himself in eating or drinking, or to forbear a cry, or an angry look or word, or to be willing to part with a toy, or to obey the moment he is spoken to; but that small thing is a "little" belonging to the "mickle" which you would like to see him hereafter; and which would make him a blessing to others, and blessed himself.

Everything in this world has an effect. We might be said to live under a law of accumulation. The littles of money roll together to make a fortune, the littles of effort to make a character. There is nothing lost. What we do to-day will roll to other things of like kind to help to form us either for good or evil.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XXIII. CHRIST A MAN OF SORROWS, PART III.

Scripture to be read—Matt. xxvii. 39—54.

INTRODUCTION. An attempt has been made in the two last lessons to bring before the children some idea of the physical and mental sufferings of Christ. In this lesson the thought running through all is intended to be the sufferings of His soul during His dying agony. The subject however, being a difficult one, the scenes must be read and described, and the lessons brought in as far as may be compatible with the age of the children taught.

I. CHRIST MOCKED. (Read Matt. xxvii. 39—44.) Question the children upon the different classes present at the cross. (a) The thieves. Explain that crucifixion was punishment for slaves, thieves, and lowest malefactors. What would expect from those suffering together? Did Christ receive sympathy from the thieves? What did they cast in His teeth? (from Luke xxiii. 39—42.) Show the feeling animating them; hoped He would save them as well as Himself; did both continue in this spirit? What changed the "dying thief?" Remind how they hung on the cross for six hours; saw our Lord's patience all that time; heard Him pray for his murderers; at last one believed on Him and was saved. (b) The passers by. What words did they recall? (v. 40.) Where had they heard Christ declare Himself the Son of God? Could He have come down from the cross? Why did He not? They would not believe that the true Christ should suffer; would only think of Him as a great king leading an army against the Romans their oppressors. (c) The chief priests. What did they promise to do if He came down from the cross? Would they have believed? No; for though Christ did not come down from the cross, He did what was more wonderful, rose again from the dead. Might have descended from cross, and convinced them out of their own mouths; no, must keep silence and suffer all.

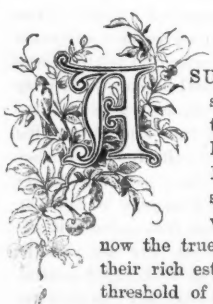
II. CHRIST FORSAKEN. (Read Matt. xxvii. 46—49.) Now the last and worst pain of all; what has He suffered hitherto? pain in head, hands, and feet; scourging of back, &c.; more than that—desertion of friends, mocking of fellow-prisoners, insults from chief priests, &c.; could bear all that without a word; now at last a cry is wrung from Him; what is it? (v. 46.) Where had this been prophesied as one of His utterances? (Ps. xxii. 1.) Show what it meant. (Read Is. vi. 3; Rev. iv. 8.) Show the holy nature of God; cannot look upon sin (Hab. i. 15); remind of the punishment of sin as being death. (Rom. vi. 23.) What was Christ doing in His death? (See 2 Cor. v. 21.) But was Christ sinful? were our sins infused into His nature? No; but our sins were reckoned as if His. Ask what attaches to sin—shame, disgrace, punishment, death. Illustrate this by the shame attaching to a son discovered in robbing his father; how would the father look? Could his face be just the same as before? Just so must God's face be hidden from Christ when bearing our sins; all the shame for sins of whole world laid on Him (Is. liii. 6); no wonder He exclaimed, "My God!" &c. What did they think he called for? misunderstood the Syriac language. What did one of them do? Explain that this vinegar was meant kindly; to relieve some of the suffering; immediately after which Christ died.

III. CHRIST DYING. (Read Matt. xxvii. 50—54.) Question the children upon some of the scenes which took place. From Luke xxiii. 46, His last words can be found. Had God forsaken Him? What do these words show? Whence came this peace? So will perfect confidence always produce peace. Now describe the veil of the Temple rent. See Ex. xxvi. 33, for a description. What did it separate? Then refer to the bodies of the saints arising for a time and entering the city. What did all this show? (1) That Christ had accomplished His work; all Nature disturbed at His death—sun darkened, earth quakes, dead arise. (2) That He had fulfilled the types—no longer need for separation between holy place and holy of holies. He, the great high-priest, had finished work of man's redemption, and would present His own blood before the mercy seat of Heaven. (See Heb. ix. 7, 12 ch.)

IV. Practical Lessons. (1) The sinfulness of sin. The more fully the teacher can bring home the awful nature of Christ's sufferings, the more will the children realise the sin which caused them. Make the children see that "our" sins, "my" sins, were there adding to His sorrow; (2) The love of Christ. Why did Christ suffer all this? Had He deserved it? Was He obliged to undergo it? Had we done anything to deserve His mediation? (Read Rom. v. 6—9.) What then prompted Him? Surely then our hearts must go out in love to Him. (1 John iv. 19). How will this love be shown? How did Mary show it? by devotion. Paul? by counting not his life dear to him. So with all. Will keep His commandments, serve Him, please Him, and so be fitted for His presence.



Questions to be answered.

1. Name the three classes of people at crucifixion.
2. Describe the mocking of the chief priests.
3. Name a prophecy uttered by Christ when dying.
4. Show why God's face was hidden for a time.
5. What remarkable things happened at Christ's death?
6. Name typical significance of rending of veil.
7. What are the practical lessons to be learned?

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XL.

SUMMER evening, fair and sweet as that which, beneath the strange Australian stars, had witnessed the death of Maurice Atherstone's ill-fated son, saw Humphrey, last survivor of that lordly race, and now the true undoubted possessor of all their rich estates, crossing once more the threshold of his ancient home. He had been welcomed with enthusiastic delight by his servants and his tenantry; for although none of them had known the real reason of his absence from England, there had been many sinister rumours afloat, and mysterious hints were dropped among the people, to the effect that it was very doubtful whether their beloved master would ever set foot on the broad lands of Atherstone again; but all this was at an end, and he felt like a man in a dream, as he sat in his accustomed place in the old library that same evening, with Thorpe lingering lovingly near him, arranging and re-arranging the books on the table, that he might have an excuse for remaining in presence of him to whom his allegiance had been given for so many years of faithful service.

Yes, Humphrey Atherstone was installed again in the home of his ancestors, and none would dispute its possession with him evermore. The incubus that had weighed upon him from the hour of his uncle's death was finally lifted off—his doubts and perplexities, his trouble of conscience, his attempted compromise by the sacrifice of personal happiness, his struggle with the love that mastered him—all these had rolled away from him like fetters from a liberated slave, and even their very memory seemed buried in the graves that lay so far beyond the ocean, in the distant land from whence he came. But how was it to be with him in the future of the free new life on which he was entering that day? was he to dwell for ever alone in the home for which he had suffered so much? No scruple need hinder him now from brightening his fair inheritance with the sunshine of happy love, but he felt, with a mournful intensity of conviction, that except he could win Una Dysart back to his heart, he could never set any other woman in the place he had destined for her. If she had indeed given him up because the discovery of his error had turned her esteem and love to scorn, he well knew that his restoration to his true position as lord of Atherstone would make not a shadow of difference in her determination; but it was only two years since that night when her father had died beneath his roof, and as Humphrey remembered how the sweet eyes turned to him in her sorrow, with the dumb appealing look which told that all her heart and hopes were henceforth fixed on him alone, he could not quite despair, although no communication of any sort had passed between them since the day when Miss Amherst's letter had reached him from her hand. He felt a longing desire to hear at least the sound of her name, to know if she were still at Vale House, and if any particulars concerning her were known in the neighbourhood, and little as he was accustomed generally to ask news from his servants, he could not resist trying if his faithful old butler could give him any information.

"You must tell me what has been doing at Valehead and Atherstone since I left home, Thorpe; have there been any changes?"

"Well, there have been, sir," said the old man, eagerly, as if he had only been waiting an opportunity, "but none as yet that you would care to hear; what troubles me is the changes as is to be."

"And what are they?" asked Humphrey, with a tremor at his heart for which he could scarce account.

"First and foremost, sir, Mr. Trafford is going away, and he'll be a bitter loss to all the country round."

"Ah! that he will indeed; no one will miss him more than I shall; but after all it is only what we had to expect. I believe Mr. Crichton always intended to return after a year or two's absence."

"No doubt, sir; and it's not justly Mr. Trafford's going away as upsets me. I should not worrit myself if he were going away alone, as he came."

"And is he not? who is going with him?" asked Atherstone.

The old man moved uneasily from side to side of the table where he stood, seeming greatly occupied in placing the cover straight, and with a look of pain and anxiety upon his face, till Humphrey repeated his question with great impatience, and then he answered slowly, "Well, sir, they do say as he is going to be married to Miss Dysart, and that he'll take her away with him."

"Una!" the word dropped from Atherstone's lips unconsciously, and his head fell back upon the chair as if he had received a physical blow. Thorpe carefully avoided looking at him, and went on hurriedly, "It's a terrible trouble to me, for she was the sweetest lady ever I set eyes on, and I built such hopes on her! Sir, excuse me, I have known you since you was a four-year-old boy, and I set you on your pony the first ride you ever took, and I did want to see you happy now. I thought she was the one would have made the Abbey like it was of old, when your lady mother ruled in Squire Maurice's time. And the people in our village worship Miss Dysart; she has been about among the sick and poor, early and late, doing all she could for them with a kind word and a pretty smile for every one; but there has just been the mischief of it. Mr. Trafford was always out in the parish as much as she was, and they helped each other in all they did, he could not choose but see that she was just the one to suit him in his work, and it's no great wonder if he grew to love her, and she him, too, for that matter, good kind man."

"Yes, Thorpe, I understand it all," said Humphrey, faintly, "but I think you must leave me now."

"I hope no offence, sir, you'll excuse my making so free; I have had you in my arms many a time."

"I know, I know, I could not be offended with you; only I must be alone—you can come again later;" and the old man went out at his bidding. Atherstone had need in truth to be alone, that he might master the agony which was curdling at his heart. He had lost her then! It seemed no more than probable that the old servant's tale was true. Doubtless Trafford had learnt to love her; how could he help it? and she—in the bitter revulsion of feeling which she must have experienced as regarded himself, it was natural that the love of a good and noble man should come to her with unusual attraction. They were well fitted to each other—they would be happy; but he had lost her! his first, his last, his only love! and in the anguish of his desolation Humphrey first learnt how much hope had remained with him till that hour; he could not rest; he rose and paced the room with hurried steps; then he went to the window, drew aside the curtain, and looked out. It was a bright moonlight night, not yet very late, and the sudden impulse seized him to go to Trafford himself, and try to ascertain if in very certainty this man was blessed with Una's love, and his own heart and home left desolate for ever. He knew the clergyman was accessible to any who might come to him night or day; and soon Nightshade, so long neglected, was bounding gleefully along under the well-known touch of his master's hand, and the good horse bore him with fleet steps to the rectory door.

Trafford welcomed Atherstone with unmistakable pleasure, and congratulated him heartily on his return to his home, and on the freedom of mind and conscience with which he could now enjoy it. "Yes," said Humphrey, somewhat bitterly, "but I cannot forget that my stepping-stones to this inheritance have been the graves of those I wronged; I have learnt how far easier it is to commit an error than to repair it."

"True, it is one of the sternest lessons this life can teach us; but you have the comfort of knowing that in will and intention your reparation was perfect; doubt not that it has been accepted; and now cast it all behind you, Atherstone; life is too short for any part of it to be wasted in unavailing regrets for the past; the future is all before you; go on with courage and hopefulness; make it holy and blessed."

"You are wise not to bid me make it happy," said Humphrey, with a sad smile. Trafford looked keenly at him; he had not the least idea who it was that Atherstone had loved so deeply. but he remembered how he had spoken of her, and he could not doubt that he was now referring in some way to her loss; he had, however, far too much delicacy to say a word on any subject which had not been fully confided to him, and he turned the conversation to other matters, giving some account of the manner in which he had fulfilled the trust Humphrey had reposed in him, in the care of his estates. Atherstone listened abstractedly, scarcely answering, and at last rose to go; he had not yet found courage to frame the question he wished to ask. Trafford came with him to the outer door, and as they stood on the doorstep in the moonlight Humphrey forced himself at last to speak.

"Trafford, I hear a sad rumour that you are going away; is it true?"

"Quite true; there is going to be a great change in my position; but I am afraid you must not ask me any questions on the subject, as I have been bound over to keep the matter secret for the present."

"A secret shared by others, however," Humphrey said, with slight sarcasm in his tone.

"By one person only—at least in this neighbourhood—and she is not likely to divulge it."

"You mean Miss Dysart," said Humphrey, the blood rushing to his forehead.

Trafford looked surprised. "You are quite right, though I cannot imagine how you learnt it; however, it will soon be known to every one; it is not my doing that there is any concealment, I dislike mysteries excessively."

"Doubtless, others find it convenient to keep the secret for the present," said Atherstone, bitterly. "Well, I need not seek to penetrate it further. Goodnight, Trafford; I must not keep you up any longer." He mounted his horse, and without another word dashed down the road at its swiftest pace, while Trafford looked after him thoughtfully. Humphrey doubted no longer; Una would soon be the wife of a better man than he was; only this much of consideration she had for him, he thought, that she meant to keep the proposed marriage secret as long as she could, in order to save herself and him from the gossip of the neighbourhood where their former attachment had been so well known. Of course, he thought, she was not aware that the truth had oozed out already; but she need not fear his molesting her in any way; he would neither see her nor write to her; she must be content without his congratulations; only this he must do—he would cause her at least to know the truth of his past history, and how he had tried, by the surrender of herself and Atherstone Abbey and all he held most dear, to make reparation for the wrong whereby she had been led to abandon him; he would go next day to Mr. and Mrs. Northcote, make a full statement to them of the whole circumstances, and formally request them to clear his character in the county from the dark suspicions which had blackened it so long, and especially to remove any unfavourable impressions which they might themselves have conveyed to those who had been his friends. They would know that Una Dysart and her aunt Lady Elizabeth stood first in the list. Such were some of the reflections that passed through Humphrey's mind during the sleepless night that followed his return to the Abbey; but, truth to tell, his thoughts were bitter enough, for he had been stung to the quick by the news of Una's faithlessness to himself.

He felt for his own part that happen what might, he could love no other woman, even to his life's end, and though his eyes might never rest upon her face again, they still would long for that sweet vision, dear as ever, when they were closing in the night of death; and thus to know that he must bear the burthen of a hopeless constancy, while she, in cruel contrast, had so speedily transferred her allegiance to another man, was sharp as the very death-pang to his heart. When he believed that she had given up him simply because she would not take part with him in error, he had suffered deeply, certainly, but there had been no sting in his anguish; he had thought of her only with a mournful approving tenderness, and he had retained, as we have seen, more hope than he had been aware of. It was very different now; all seemed hard, cruel, and intolerable; perhaps indeed it was her dawning love for Trafford which made her send him Miss Amherst's letter as an excuse to be rid of him; why else had she kept it so long before she forwarded it to him? So

"Looking up with her soft hazel eyes into the clergyman's face."—p. 778.

Atherstone tortured himself all night long, but his strong spirit was yet unsubdued, and when he rose next morning, such sorry comfort as pride could give him came to his aid.

He rode out on his coal-black horse, to go to Northcote Manor, with as calm and haughty a bearing as ever man wore; and when, in presence of the old friends of his family, the squire and his wife, he told his tale from first to last, there was a noble courage and an unsparing yet unexaggerated self-condemnation which called out their highest admiration, and fairly won their affection. The hearts of both had been softened by the defection of their own beloved son, and now that his repentance had brought him back to them, changed into all they had ever hoped to see him, they were only too thankful to condone the far lighter error of which Atherstone had been guilty, and to acknowledge that they had done him serious injustice by their suspicions, at the time when they were ignorant of the truth. Even Mrs. Northcote, cold and hard as she had been in former days, was melted to tears as she took Humphrey's hand and told him how very greatly she respected him for his upright conduct, in having endeavoured to give up his estates to such an unworthy possessor as his cousin, and how deeply she regretted the harshness with which she had spread her own uncharitable surmises far and near in the neighbourhood.

"Most especially I regret having spoken to Lady Elizabeth Molyneux as I did," she said; "I fear I may have done irreparable mischief; but, anyhow, all in that house shall know the truth at once. I will go to them this very day."

"Yes, it is the least you can do," said the squire; "but I fear—I fear it is too late," and he shook his head sadly. Atherstone perfectly understood that they were both alluding to their belief that Una was engaged to Trafford, and he turned his face away for a moment, to hide the pang it gave him to receive this further confirmation of his misery.

Then, with an effort, he mastered his pain, and, changing the subject of conversation, he asked after their daughter. They told him that she was to be married to Hervey Crichton the following week, and would then start on her way to India with her husband.

"We shall miss her less than we should otherwise have done," said Mrs. Northcote, "because of our dear Rupert's kindness to us: he lives with us entirely, and helps his father in his affairs, and is the very treasure of our lives."

"I am indeed delighted to hear it!" said Atherstone, as he rose to take leave; "and I wish your charming daughter every happiness."

Then, as Mr. Northcote shook hands with him he said, "Of this be certain, Atherstone, the whole neighbourhood shall know forthwith that you stand with unstained honour now before God and man."

CHAPTER XLI.

A FEW days had passed since Humphrey's visit to the Northcotes, and during that interval he had seen nothing of Una Dysart. He had not called at Vale House, although he knew she must have been perfectly aware of his return to the Abbey. Even if Mrs. Northcote's explanation to Lady Elizabeth Molyneux had removed the interdict which had been placed on his entrance to that house, he did not feel that he had sufficient power of endurance to meet his lost love as the future wife of Stephen Trafford; he believed that she could not fail to understand his motive in avoiding her, and that she would probably be very grateful to him for sparing her the pain of seeing him; nevertheless, his longing to look once more on her beloved face was almost more than he could bear; and he tried to stifle the hunger of his heart by going about among his people and doing all he could to benefit them; unhappily, however, it was always of Miss Dysart that they spoke to him—far and near he heard how good she had been to the poor during the past winter, which had been exceptionally severe, and how, late and early, her little feet had carried her from door to door, where her bright winning ways, as well as her more substantial benefits, never failed to bring sunshine and comfort. If anything could intensify the regret he felt at having lost her, it was the assurance given him by these statements, of the blessing she would have been to his people no less than to himself.

One afternoon, when he was feeling this very deeply, his courage failed him to continue listening to her praises, and he turned away from the cottages he had been visiting, and strolled along the road to Valehead. He was not very far from the village when, as he turned round a corner, he suddenly saw two persons at a few paces distant from him in earnest conversation. The one nearest to him was Trafford, but there was no mistaking the light graceful figure of the lady to whom he was talking. It was Una Dysart who stood there, looking up with her soft hazel eyes into the clergyman's face, while he, with a smile half playful, half tender, bent down his head from his stately height to hear and answer her.

The sight was simply maddening to Atherstone; it roused all the fire of his passionate nature; but the pride of his race and his own stern will enabled him to curb at least any outward manifestation of his feelings; without altering his pace or turning from the direction in which he was going, he walked steadily on towards them. As he did so, he saw that Una gave a violent start when she perceived him, and she blushed so vividly that the crimson glow mounted to her very temples.

"She may well blush when the man she once loved sees her with the man she is about to marry," thought Atherstone, bitterly; but not a muscle of his face moved as he quietly passed them, lifting his hat gravely to Una, but with so rigid and unbending an aspect that even Trafford made no attempt to speak to him; a few steps more carried him out of their sight, and then he walked on rapidly till he got clear of the village, and left both Vale House and the rectory far behind him. When he was certain that there was no chance of his meeting them again, he slackened his pace and gave himself time to think over what had happened.

He could not help feeling that it would cause a great deal of misery and pain both to himself and Una, if they were to be exposed to the risk of many such meetings before her marriage, and deeply as she had wounded him, the unquenchable tenderness he felt for her prompted him to spare her any annoyance he possibly could; as to himself, he felt it would be utterly intolerable to have his heart lacerated by the sight of her, as day after day brought her nearer to the time when she was to give herself to Trafford "till death should them part," and he made up his mind that he would leave Atherstone Abbey at once, and remain absent till their wedding was over, and Una gone out of the neighbourhood altogether with her husband; moreover, he determined that he would relieve her mind from all dread of further encounters, by taking measures to let his intended absence be made known to her as speedily as possible. He had not far to go in order to find the means of accomplishing this without any personal communication from himself; he knew that Dr. Burton visited Lady Elizabeth Molyneux every day, in order to supply the fanciful invalid with the small amount of excitement she was able to find in detailing the imaginary symptoms of every four-and-twenty hours, and the good old doctor never failed to make his visits as agreeable as he could, by collecting all the news of the neighbourhood wherewith to amuse his patient. He would be certain to retail such a piece of information as Atherstone's intended absence, if he heard of it, and as his house was within a stone's throw, and he was likely to be at home at that hour, Humphrey, with his usual energy, went thither at once to put his plan into execution.

The doctor was delighted to see him, and welcomed him back to the neighbourhood very cordially, and Atherstone was soon able to introduce the subject of his intention of going immediately to London for a few weeks. The doctor was surprised.

"What! going away again when you have just arrived, and to London too, at this unfashionable season? why, you will find it quite a desert!"

"All the better for me," said Atherstone, grimly.

"Ah, you have business to transact, no doubt; and when do you go, my dear sir?"

"Next Monday I think."

"And when may we expect to see you amongst us again?"

"Not for some weeks certainly, but the time of my return is uncertain at present;" and after a little more conversation on other subjects, Atherstone took his leave, satisfied that he had effected his purpose. Nor was he mistaken. That same evening, Dr. Burton paid his usual visit at Vale House, and when he had assured her ladyship that her pulse was not at all weaker than it had been the day before, and told her that she should endeavour to keep her mind amused, he proceeded to carry out his own prescription by retailing all that Atherstone had said to him that day. The Abbey was to lose its master again, the doctor said; he would only be there another day at present, as he was to start for London on Monday, and this was Saturday, and then Dr. Burton feared it would be some time before he returned. He regretted it very much; the county required all its resident landlords to keep up its society, and Mr. Atherstone was one of the best men they had. The doctor thought he was a good deal out of health; he seemed thin and careworn, though he was very much bronzed by the Australian sun.

To all this Una listened, sitting white and silent behind her aunt's sofa; and Lady Elizabeth heard it also with a good deal of uneasiness.

(To be continued.)

EXTRACTS FROM AN EXPOSITOR'S NOTE-BOOK.—IX.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, NOTTINGHAM, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC. ETC.

BARTIMÆUS.—I.

Mark x. 46–52.

BARTIMÆUS sits by the wayside, begging, hard by one of the gates of Jericho, having for sole companion, as we learn from St. Matthew, a beggar as poor and blind as himself. The gate of the city was, in the East, the favourite resort of the mendicant class; for there, not only must all travellers, and caravans, and peasants bringing their wares to market, pass them by, but the broad side-arches of the gate, with their cool recesses and divans, were the justice-halls in which suits and quarrels were adjusted, and the lounging-place in which, when the labours of the day were over, the citizens gathered to discuss their local politics or to enjoy their neighbourly gossip. The very reason, therefore, which draws the beggars of Italy to the fountains, or the steps of churches, and the beggars of Ireland to the doors of hotels, or to the spots haunted by tourists, and the beggars of England to the crowded thoroughfares and market-places, drew the beggars of the East, and still draws them, to the gates of the cities. There men most congregate, and there they are most likely to meet some response to their appeals for pity and help.

Bartimæus sits, then, by the wayside, at the gate of Jericho. He has taken small alms on the day we meet him, for as yet only a few persons have gone by; but from within the walls he hears the stir of an unwonted excitement and joy. At last the whole city pours through the gate—a great multitude, in the midst of which walks the Rabbi of Nazareth, whose name had of late been in all men's mouths. The multitude greet Him with "hosannas;" and with a sure instinct Bartimæus feels that a happy chance has come to him at last, that the Rabbi who has healed so many will heal him, if only he can draw attention to his misery. But the blind man cannot adventure himself into the surging crowd, lest, jostled and trampled on, he become lame and crippled as well as blind. He can only sit by the wayside, crying for mercy, conscious that his voice is drowned in the shouts of the throng. Nay, his fellow-townsmen, who might have shown him some little sympathy and goodwill, take his cry as a discord in the harmony of their joy, and bid him hold his peace. The rebuke of those who go before Christ is taken up by those who come after Him; in all the crowd there is not one who feels for him. Yes, there is one, though only one. Jesus stands still, and commands that Bartimæus come to Him. Casting aside his garment, the blind beggar hastens forward, asks for sight, receives his sight, and uses his sight to "follow Jesus in the way" He went.

Let us consider this story, and mark, at least in a few points, what light it throws—first, on the character and mission of our Lord, and, secondly, on the character and faith of Bartimæus.

1. We take first those points which speak to us of our Lord.

And at the very outset we are struck by the obvious fact that, though attended by a wondering joyful crowd, He has an ear, and grace, and gifts for the one. A great multitude went before and came after Him. The whole city was moved by His presence, and streamed out of the gate to escort Him. The air is thick with shouts of joy and admiration. The breath of popular applause for once floats round that sacred Head, which found no pillow till it was laid in the grave. A happy excited throng fills the highway; and by the wayside, wrapt in darkness, there sits a beggar who is blind, and whose blindness is more intolerable than ever now that so great a sight is passing by. Has the long-promised "Son of David" come at last, then, and is he not so much as to look upon His face? Is he—he alone—not to "see the salvation of God?" The sense of his misery grows so keen, so intolerable, that, though he can hardly hope to be heard, he cries, "Son of David, have mercy on me! Son of David, have mercy on me!" "Be quiet! cease thy cry!" growls the crowd. "What mean you by marring our festivity by your pitiful outcry? Do you suppose that He will pause in His triumph to hear what you have to say?" And still the blind man, disheartened but not silenced, cries on, "Son of David, have mercy on me!"

And Christ, does He pass on, unconscious of the prayer, or serenely indifferent to the misery of the one, because so many are happy? Not He; He were not Christ if He did. He halts; the crowd hushes to learn why He lingers; He commands that the blind man be brought to Him. And now the officious crowd, now that the Hero of the hour condescends to notice Bartimæus, are forward with their sympathy: "Be of good comfort; rise, He calleth thee."

Are we to take this ready sympathy as a natural human kindness breaking out so soon as their attention is really fixed on the beggar's misery, and they see that there is some hope of helping him, or are we to take it only as the fussy officiousness of those who wait on the wishes of the great, and seek to push themselves into notice even when they help a neighbour? Probably it was both. But because we ourselves are men, and are no whit better than our fellows, let us at least hope that the better motive was the stronger; and that the thoughtless crowd, when once compelled to think of him, felt a genuine pity for the unhappy mendicant.

Nor let us fail to mark that as Jesus, followed by many, has grace for one, so also it is to the one miserable man that He turns from the happy crowd. For we are very apt to fear that, as the Lord of all, who has so many dependent on His care, our distress may well be overlooked by Him. As we remember that the cries of all creatures in all worlds rise into His ear, that a voluminous sea of complex sounds is for ever breaking round His seat, it seems well-nigh incredible that He should have any special care for us, or that our weak appeal should penetrate that vast complexity of sighs, shrieks, groans, prayers, thanksgivings, songs. And this fear is commonly strongest when we are weakest. In our times of trouble, we find it very hard to persuade ourselves that He cares for us, and listens to every word we say. We look out from our darkened life, and the whole world seems to give the lie to any such hope. All things go on as of old. The sun shines; the flowers bloom; the sweet summer wind is heavy with fragrance; the birds are merry in their choirs; men and women are absorbed in their several avocations—too absorbed to waste a thought on us. Our darkness has not darkened the world; our loss is no loss to our neighbours. Heaven and earth smile a serene, a cruel, indifference to our grief. Can it be that God, who rules earth and heaven, and who seems so remote, so inaccessible, can it be that He has any sympathy with us? It can hardly be. We are alone, uncomforted, in our misery.

That is a heart-ache which we have most of us felt, and yet a heart-ache which, thank God, we never need feel. For see, here, in the flesh, is the very God of whom we have often had such hard and bitter thoughts. The day is bright and fair. "Jericho town is full of joy." With Christ in their midst, the happy multitude stream along the highway, leaping, and shouting, and praising God. As yet they have no sympathy with the darkness in which Bartimæus sits vaguely crying for pity. But that one sorrowful cry pierces the very heart of Christ. He cannot pass on till it be hushed. He leaves the many happy for the one solitary and miserable soul. The happiness is no happiness to Him, unless all may share it. He pities the blind beggar; nay, he makes the gay thoughtless crowd pity him too. Let us take that comfort to our hearts so often as we are lonely and sorrowful and hopeless.

You have seen a mother laughing and making merry with happy friends. Suddenly she pauses, listens, and leaves the noisy room. She has heard a tiny wail of distress which you could not hear, and she cannot be content till the cry of her babe be hushed, its want satisfied. And shall God, who made the mother's heart, be less tender, less pitiful, than the creature He has made? I tell you, Nay; but "as one whom his mother comforteth," so will God comfort all the distressed who cry to Him.

No sooner did blind Bartimæus hear that the Son of David had called him, than, "casting aside his garment," that there may be no tardiness on his part, he rose and came to Jesus. A faith so prompt and vigorous pleases Jesus well; and, to reward it, He virtually places Himself and His whole power at the beggar's disposal. He asks, "What wilt thou that I should do for thee?" really meaning, "You have called on me. Here I stand, wholly at your service. Take what you will, what you can." The best thing the blind man can ask for is eyes. And so Bartimæus answers, "Lord, that I may receive my sight." Mark the Lord's reply, how it is a mere echo of the prayer. "Lord, that I may receive my sight," asks Bartimæus; "Receive thy sight," responds Christ, granting the very boon asked of Him in the very words in which it had been asked.

And, as we all know, there is one of the secrets of the spiritual life here. Christ gives us just as much as we can take—as much even as we really ask for. For no good man really desires to have more than he can use aright, use for the best ends in the best way. Whatever form our prayers may assume, whatever words we may utter, this is the upshot of all our prayers: "Lord, give us as much as we can use, as much as we can enjoy, as much as we can turn to good account." To have more than that would not be well for us; nor, in our best moods, do we desire more. And there is no conceivable reason why God should not give us so much as that. All things are in His hand, for the good of all. And if we can use any gift for the benefit of the rest, why should He not bestow it upon us? If we cry, "Lord, give us sight, knowledge, wisdom," not intending our neighbour's good, but only our own aggrandisement, He may say, "Children, you had better sit in the dark till you can use the light for nobler ends." But if, like Bartimæus, we ask for sight that we may behold the glory of God in the face of Jesus, and find our way to follow when He leads, then to our "Lord, that we may receive our sight" the echo will come, prompt and clear, "Receive thy sight; and come, follow me in the paths of service and charity."

The Lord is with us still. He hears every cry which rises from our hearts. He looks round on us with the tender self-granting grace with which He looked on Bartimæus, saying to us as to him, "What will ye that I should do for you?" Ask, and ye shall have. If you are blind, and cannot see Him, if you are deaf, and cannot hear Him, nay, if you doubt His presence, and can only cry in hope that by some dubious happy chance He may be near, He will open your eyes, and unstop your ears, and grant you the very desire of your hearts.

Blind Bartimæus got what he asked, then; but he also got more than he asked. To the cure he sought Jesus added an interpreting word, "Go thy way, thy faith hath saved thee." Thy faith hath saved thee! Was that quite true? Was it not the healing power of Christ that saved him? No doubt it was the "virtue," the "saving health," that went out of the Son of Man, which wrought the cure. But He who did not clutch at His equality with the Father was not forward to claim the merit of His works. He advances no such claim here. So to speak, He throws the whole credit of the miracle on the faith which cried for mercy. And it was quite true that it was the faith of Bartimæus which saved him, though it was not the whole truth. For when Christ is present, the only condition of healing is that men believe in Him. He is full of health, full of virtue; and it is our faith which makes His virtue, His health, ours. And surely it was wise and gracious of the Lord Jesus to lay this stress on faith; to call the thoughts of the blind man from the mere marvel to its meaning, from that which was outward and temporal to that which was spiritual and within. Bartimæus would be in danger of thinking too much of his recovered sight, of dwelling too exclusively on the mere physical wonder; and therefore Christ recalls his thoughts to the spiritual condition of healing, and virtually says to him, "It is faith that made you whole. Think of that, of the mighty power it is, and of how much more than mere sight you may gain by it."

This, then, is the Christ whom God has set forth to teach us what He Himself is like, and to save us from our sins—this great Teacher and Healer, who leaves the many for the one, the happy for the sorrowful, who waits to give us all of good that we can take, and who cares more for our welfare and happiness than to get the glory which is His due.

"WHAT CAN IT MATTER?"

BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

PART I.

"MARY, Mary! listen, I have a piece of news for you!" cried Willie Leonard, as he entered the cottage door, and looked round for his sister. "Ah, there you are at that everlasting washing-tub! I suppose you'll say now that you can't come with me?"

"What's your news, and where do you want me to go with you?" asked Mary, raising a pleasant smiling face from the tub over which she was stooping. "If you can wait until I wring these couple of dresses out, and hang them on the wall to dry, I'll go with you wherever you like."

"Why not leave them where they are, and come out at once?" urged Willie. "What can it matter whether you do them now or when you come home? A fellow can't have a morning to himself every day in the year; and, only think, I'm almost certain I've spotted a wren's nest in the glen this morning, besides a goldfinch's and a linnet's; so I want you to look sharp and have a good egg-hunt with me. I would have stopped to bag a few of them on my way to Farmer Stack's with the dairy cart, only I was late already."

"I am quite sure you were late; you need not tell me that as news," replied Mary, laughing, as she drew a long lilac skirt out of the tub, and began twisting it round and round in serpent-like coils, allowing the soapy water to stream into the wooden vessel beneath. "I'd go with you now, and welcome, only I promised mother I would not stir out of the place until I had these two skirts hung up to dry. Suppose you go and hunt for the egg-basket, Willie, while you are doing nothing, for there is no other way one can carry them safely home."

"Not I; I'm far too tired to go hunting over the place for it, or anything else. And what can it matter whether we have the basket or not? I can carry the eggs in my hat, which is just as good a place, if not better."

"That's all very well; but you know they fell out of your cap the other day when Sprat jumped suddenly up at your arm, and, only it was in the field, they would have been all smashed and ruined. And if I were you," added Mary, shaking her head at the little rough-haired terrier who followed at her brother's heels, "I would not have you bring Master Sprat with you egg-hunting; he frightens the birds off their nests, and does no good."

"What a Solomon you are, to be sure!" sneered Willie, sitting down, and rocking himself to and fro in the low kitchen chair, while he watched with feverish impatience for the tub to be set aside, and his sister at liberty to join him. "Here, let me squeeze out those rags, Mary; you go up, and put on your hat. I am sure I could do it as well as you." And Willie, standing up again, took off his coat, and began to roll up his shirt-sleeves preparatory to the attempt.

"Indeed you could do nothing of the kind. If you have only patience to wait for five minutes more, I'll have everything finished, and be ready to go with you. There now, don't go off in a rage, that's a good fellow!"

Willie put on his coat again, and strode out of the cottage, followed by Sprat; but he was too fond of his own pleasure to set off really without his sister, for Mary was far too pleasant a companion and too clever a seeker to be left behind. She had small hands, which could find their way through thorns and briars to the coveted nest; and besides, she had never been deceived yet as to the eggs themselves. She knew by the touch and the weight whether the tiny bird was nearly hatched, or even partially so, in which case the egg was always replaced in the nest; for Mary and Willie were not nest robbers in the true sense of the word—they did not rifle the fledglings, or deprive the mother of her expectant brood—they were only egg-collectors, taking one here, another there, whose hollow shell contained no promise of a bird, and adding each new-found treasure of pale-blue spotted with maroon, or emerald-green dotted with brown specks, to those already in their possession, and never returning to any nest the second time, lest the timid mother might be frightened from her charge, and desert it altogether.

So Willie sauntered out into the lane, switching at the dandelions, and shying pebbles at the ducks, who, terrified by Sprat, waddled to and fro across the road, till at length Mary appeared in the doorway, with her large sun-hat on her head, and the linen dresses in her arms which she had been so industriously washing for her mother.

"That will do now," cried Willie, turning at the sound of her step; "can't you throw those wretched things on the hedge, and not wait to climb up to the top of the wall? If there is a short way and a long of doing things, you always choose the long one. I declare you are the most perverse creature that ever lived! What can it matter whether a thing is dried on a hedge or on a wall?"

"It matters a great deal," replied Mary, good-humouredly. "A nice row you made the other morning because your shirt was torn on a thorn, which was sticking somewhere out of sight in the hedge! And, besides, the fowl fly up on the hedge, and ruin the clean things with their dirty feet."

"Oh, of course, you'd have an excuse ready for walking on your head, if you chose to do it; you girls always will have your way in everything."

Mary made no reply, but, running along the side of the lane, soon reached the bleaching wall; she threw the dresses over her shoulder while she climbed the stile, and then, standing on the uppermost step, she shook them out and laid them along the top, the bricks being specially rounded for the purpose, so that no angles or rough corners might tear the linen.

"Hand me up a couple or so of good heavy stones, that's a dear boy," she cried to her brother beneath, "or they may slip off when they dry, and tumble into the field."

"Now Mary, what can it matter whether you put stones on them or not? I believe you are worrying me on purpose."

"No indeed, Willie, I am not! But if you would only let me do as I ought to do at first, I should be ready in half the time; if you don't hand me up the stones, I shall have to go down and get them for myself."

Willie, seeing that Mary was resolute, and that nothing save the stones intervened between him and his promised pleasure, handed them up—somewhat sullenly, it must be confessed—and the dresses being securely fixed on the wall, he followed his sister over the stile into the field beyond.

The way to the glen for which they were bound ran through a series of pasture grounds, deliciously green, soft to the feet, and pleasant to the eye, so Willie's temper soon recovered itself; and, leaning on his sister's arm, he discussed with her the merits of various eggs, their size, colour, &c., while both ardently looked forward to the chance of finding the wren's nest—a golden-crested wren too, as Willie described it—whose eggs were, to say the least, uncommon.

The first few fields were trudged through almost unconsciously, so interested were they in their speculations, and no stiles or gates having so far obstructed their way, each pasture being only separated from the other by a row of trees, and never used for any other purpose but sheep-grazing; but now, as they came to the middle field, a large stretch of pasture ground surrounded on all sides by a stone wall, they beheld to their dismay that the gap which had been open all the winter was filled up with stones, and no way of entrance left save by climbing the gate, which was an unusually high one and devoid of cross-bars, while the spikes at the top made it difficult for a man to cross, and almost impossible for a girl.

"Here's a pretty go!" cried Willie, angrily, as he gazed alternately at the newly-built gap and the high iron gate. "I'd like to know what they have done this for! Filling up a fence that's useful to everybody, and sticking a gate in one's field that no one can climb over—such tom-foolery. But it 's just like Farmer Stack, throwing stumbling-blocks in every one's way."

"He must have had some good reason for doing it, I suppose," observed Mary, quietly; though the bright glow of expectancy faded from her face, as she looked hopelessly at the high granite wall before her.

"Some good reason for fiddlesticks!" replied Willie, contemptuously. "But that's just the image of you, Mary—when a fellow is vexed, always trying to prove that there 's nothing on earth to make him angry. We may just as well turn round and go home now, for you could as soon think of climbing that gate, Mary, as I could climb over the moon."

"Suppose we walk round by the road," suggested Mary, in a very humble voice; for when Willie was angry he generally found something to carp at in her remarks.

"Go round by the road! why, I think you are just a simpleton, Mary, and nothing else; it's a good hour's walk round by the road, as you call it, to the place we are aiming for; and as I've walked that way once already this morning with the dairy cart, and shall have to go over every step of the ground again this evening, I've no mind to give my legs all that additional work. No, let's go home." And Willie whistled to his dog, who, having slipped through the offending bars, was standing on the opposite side, barking energetically at them, to show the thing could be done, if they only chose to follow his good example.

"Did you try the gate to see whether it was locked?" asked Mary, who did not like the idea of giving up the expedition; besides, she knew Willie had only proposed it because he was angry.

"What's the use of a gate, you stupid, unless it is locked!" But though Willie said this, he walked over and examined it with both eyes and hands.

"I don't believe it is locked," he said, presently; "it seems to open and shut with some kind of spring, for there is no padlock or keyhole of any kind; some new dodge, I suppose, of old Stack's. I never met such a fellow for dodges in all my life."

Willie worked, and fiddled, and pressed at the spring with all his force, but it gave no promise of yielding; he was obliged presently to call Mary to his aid, who had—for all he pretended to look down upon her—clever hands and clever brains, and very often Willie had found them of service to him before now.

"Come on here, you silly!" he cried, testily; "why do you stand gaping there, as if you expected the gate to walk open at word of command? one can't force a spring open all by oneself that would take a Goliath to move it. Here, do you press against this tongue of iron, while I try to push it up out of the place it has got hitched in."

Mary pressed with all her force against the spring, while her brother shoved, and kicked, and shook the gate in his vexation; but it was all in vain, till at last one kick, more vicious than the rest, freed the latch from the bar in which it was caught, and the gate immediately flying wide open, sent Mary sprawling on her face upon the ground.

She was not much hurt, however, and the relief of having conquered the great difficulty which lay in their path prevented her from thinking of the few scratches she had received; she soon scrambled to her feet, and once more the bright smile of anticipated joy beamed over her face.

"Come on now!" cried Willie, taking her by the arm. "I'm glad I conquered the brute, though I'm trembling all over from the force it took to open it. I thought I should never have done it, and that last kick I gave was more in a rage than anything else."

"But you'll shut it again, won't you?" asked Mary, anxiously, for her brother had already begun to drag her forward.

"I shut it! Don't you wish you may catch me doing it! I've just about as much notion of bothering myself to fasten Farmer Stack's gates as I have of doing anything else to please him."

"Indeed, Willie, you must go back and close it; they would not have taken so much pains to fasten it unless there was some reason for it."

"There you go again with your 'reason;' but I tell you there is neither right nor reason in the matter; it's simply one of old Stack's whims, like his lawn-mowers, and steam-ploughs, and all the rest of his new inventions, robbing people of their right of way. Come on, Mary, I say, and don't drag away from me so, for I won't shut the gate, and there's the end of it."

"Then I will try myself and see if I can't do it," replied Mary, firmly; "for I am certain we ought to fasten it; they may be going to put the black bull into the field for all you know; they kept him here all last summer; and, whether or not, I'm certain, as we found it shut, we ought to fasten it."

"Very good; do as you like," replied Willie, turning on his heel, and whistling. "You know you are simply shutting it out of obstinacy, for what on earth can it matter whether the gate is fastened or not?" and Willie, not deigning to look behind him, walked straight on across the field.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

328. "Strive," said the Saviour, "to enter in at the strait gate: for many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able." Quote a verse from the Proverbs which gives the reason of their failure.

329. Where is the blood of Christ called the blood of God, and the life of Christ the life of God?

330. The rainbow is referred to in the first and last books of Holy Scripture, and by Ezekiel. Give the passages.

331. Prove from Scripture (1) that the Bible must be referred to; (2) that it should be searched; and (3) that it must be obeyed on all points.

332. In whose reign, and for what reason, was the brazen serpent "that Moses had made" destroyed?

333. Nicodemus is referred to only by one of the Evangelists, and by him only on three occasions. Give chapter and verse of each.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 752.

318. See Gen. xxiii. 9; xxxv. 8.

319. Matt. ix. 11—13; Luke vii. 39—47; xv. 1—32.

320. Rom. xvi. 21.

321. The hostility of the Jews towards Lazarus (John. xii. 10). St. John's Gospel did not appear till after Lazarus was dead.

322. Ezek. xxxiii. 31.

323. Zechariah the son of Jehoiada the priest (2 Chron. xxiv. 20).

ESHCOL.

O H, bring love's glorious cluster from the rill
That parteth strife and strife!
And change the heats and wanderings of our will
For everlasting life.

O Vine of Life! Thy precious blood shall be
Our stay in war and peace;
Our balm for wounds, our pledge of victory,
Our sign that wars shall cease.

No craven words, no carnal weapons now
Are those our souls would wield!
Up to the Golden City guide us Thou,
Behind our true faith's shield!

ALESSIE BOND.

(Drawn by H. JOHNSON.)

AUTUMN FLOWERS.

AUTUMN flowers, autumn flowers,
Weary thoughts to me ye bring;
Lo! come back the vanished hours,
And the glory of the spring.

Life I see with golden wings,
All its promise sweet and fair;
And I hear the songs it sings
As it cleaves the morning air.

Summer with its cloudless skies,
  And its bud-like hopes of bliss;
Love that looks from loving eyes—
  All salute me with a kiss.
And a beauty lights the hills—
  Lights the upward path I tread;
Not a sign of coming ills
  Shows the clear blue overhead.

Autumn flowers, I know ye well,
  Spring and summer both are gone,
And to me ye softly tell
  Winter will be here anon;
But ye whisper to my heart,
  There is balm for earthly pains,
Where we meet no more to part,
  And eternal summer reigns.

G. O.

"THE BUILDER'S PSALM."

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH, AUTHOR OF "THE MYSTERY OF THE BURNING BUSH," ETC.

"Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain. It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows: for so He giveth His beloved sleep." —Ps. cxxvii. 1, 2.

THE theme of this brief but beautiful psalm may be thus stated: "That everything depends upon the blessing of the Lord." We have here the true secret of success and safety. In our working and watching we should equally depend upon the Lord. Throughout the psalm we can distinguish a note of warning, which seems intended especially for those who, in their prosperity, are tempted to forget who is the author of it, and to attribute the success and safety of life to their own work and wakefulness, rather than to the care and goodness of God.

"The superscription attributes the psalm to Solomon, and internal reasons go to confirm the correctness of this. It is characteristically distinguished from the nameless psalms of degrees, and so as to mark its connection with an earlier time; it exhibits no trace of the mournful depression by which they are pervaded; the language is more vigorous; and while they throughout refer to the whole of the community, the individual is here directed to the true source of blessing. The theme of the psalm suits Solomon, who chiefly occupied the domestic-civic territory. . . . The striving after the worldly good expressed in the conclusion, vers. 4 and 5, is not less suitable for Solomon as the author, than for its destination as a popular and pilgrim song. It is also a confirmation of Solomon's being the author, the coincidence which the idea of the psalm presents with the Proverbs. Compare especially the strikingly parallel passage, Prov. x. 22—'The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and labour adds nothing thereto.' Finally we recognise in ver. 2 an allusion to the personal relations of Solomon in the words: 'So gives He to His beloved in sleep.' According to 2 Sam. xii. 25, Solomon received the name of Jedidiah, 'the beloved of the Lord;' and the promise made to him of the Divine blessing was, according to 1 Kings iii. 5—14, given when he was asleep." (Hengstenberg, Com., in loc.)

Many have supposed that this psalm was written by David and dedicated to his son Solomon, that he might remember amid all the pomp and splendour of his state and kingdom, that no good thing is attainable without God's blessing. Solomon was, in a very remarkable degree, endowed with wisdom, and with wealth; but upon these he must not depend. He was called to the doing of a great work—the building of the Temple; he must, in doing this, remember that, unless the Lord build the house, the builders labour in vain. It was for Him to guard the city and kingdom against invasion, to preserve it, as far as possible, in peace and tranquillity; but while using the means of precaution and defence, he must know that except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain. By whomsoever this psalm may have been composed, we are reminded in it, that with all his diligence, with all his endeavours, man cannot build the house, or keep the city, by himself. It is in vain to rise up early, and to sit up late, just to eat the bread of sorrows. Let a man do what he will, do all he can, he cannot make himself independent of God; whereas, if a man use appointed means in a dependent trustful spirit, he will be reckoned among the Lord's beloved, and the blessing of God will come to him even while he sleeps.

It is true, and a very precious truth, that the Lord giveth sleep to his beloved; but the idea which here seems to be expressed is this—that while men who seek to work independently of God, to build for themselves, to watch for themselves, to provide for themselves, fail to secure a blessing which will really satisfy, and have, after all, to eat what will be to them the bread of sorrows; to the Lord's beloved, to those who work and watch, confiding in Him, God's blessings come, even while they sleep. God prospers their work, even when their hands, in weariness, are withdrawn from it; He watches over their interests when, in unconsciousness, they have no care for themselves. There is to be no neglect of appropriate means—the builders are to build, the watchmen are to wake, those who have to earn a livelihood are to labour, but they are to do this remembering that all will be in vain without the Lord's blessing.

Thus, then, we come back to what is the theme of the psalm, that everything depends on the blessing of the Lord; that no really good thing comes to us but from Him.

If we limit our attention to the two verses quoted at the head of this paper, we are taught that we are altogether dependent upon God for success in work, for safety in life, for provision for returning and, perhaps, increasing need, for necessary repose, and a blessing even while we rest.

We are taught here very plainly that we are altogether dependent upon the Lord for success in work. Any measure of success of prosperity unto which we may attain is of Him, and from Him. Except the Lord build the house, the builders labour in vain; except the Lord prosper the undertaking, no successful, no satisfying result can be reached. The special allusion here is, not improbably, to the building of the Temple. David gathered much material for the work; Solomon used his large power and world-wide influence in carrying out this great design; the work prospered in his hands. At last the Temple was completed, and shone forth in all its finished beauty, as the glory of Jerusalem, and one of the wonders of the world. We are here reminded that the labours of those who engaged so successfully in this great work would have been in vain, unless the Lord Himself had prospered them therein.

So it is with any work that we engage in, expressly for the Lord; in it we are to display all zeal and diligence, to put forth our best endeavours, and use all suitable means, to carry on the work as though all depended upon ourselves, and yet influenced by the spirit which breathes throughout this psalm, and ready ever to acknowledge that success can only be reached as the Lord shall prosper us in our doings. But what is true of any public work in which we may engage for the glory of God, is equally true of any work, of every work, to which we may set our hands; we can only do it, we can only succeed in it, so far as the Lord permits and enables us. In the words, "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it," we have the statement of a principle which admits of universal application.

These words imply that, there are some who work independently of God—not of course absolutely so, but they work without any reference to Him; without any practical recognition of His permission, support, control; without any inquiry as to His will, without any desire to conform the work to His plans, without any thought, even, of promoting His glory. With, perhaps, a formal acknowledgment of God, the whole work is done just as though there were no God in heaven at all. God permits men thus to work; as a matter of fact a very large proportion of men are thus working; they achieve, sometimes, what the world calls success, they attain to what is known as prosperity. Such are admired and envied by their fellow-men as those who have done well for themselves. They become rich, influential, and distinguished; but the impress of vanity is upon all their work; there is in it nothing which can really please God, nothing which can really satisfy themselves. For some time Solomon tried what he could do without God; his endeavour was to extract from the world all that it can afford; he tried the experiment under unusually favourable circumstances, but he has only one word to describe the result: wearied with his fruitless endeavours, this is the legend which he inscribes upon all the great objects of human ambition and pursuit—"Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

Though we may acknowledge God, and desire to do so more habitually and uniformly; though we may feel that He has to do with whatever work we engage in, and is interested in all that concerneth us; yet are we all of us tempted to lose sight of the fact, in some degree, that any success we may attain to is altogether of the Lord. And we are so constituted that the larger our success, the more continued and unvaried our prosperity, the stronger our temptation in this respect. It was against this temptation that the children of Israel were warned (Deut. viii.) ere entering upon the possession of the land of promise. They are reminded that the Lord has been trying them, proving them by the sharp discipline of the desert; they are reminded that they will be subjected to a yet severer test when enjoying the prosperity and abundance of Canaan. Their danger was, that when they had eaten and were full, and had built goodly houses and dwelt therein, and their herds and flocks had multiplied, and their silver and gold had multiplied, and all that they had had multiplied, they should account for their enlarged prosperity by reference to themselves, and say, "Our power and the might of our hand hath gotten us this wealth"—they forgetting that it was the Lord who had given them power to get wealth. Let this thought, then, possess our minds: that except the Lord build the house, the builders labour in vain; and whether our success be great or small, let us trace it all to its true source, and be ready to acknowledge that every good gift, and every perfect gift, is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.

We are taught here that we are indebted to God for continual safety in life. "Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." Here again we may not unreasonably suppose that there is an allusion to the kingly responsibilities of Solomon. Upon him, as the head of the State, devolved the duty of securing, as far as possible, the peace and tranquillity of the city and kingdom; all appropriate means were to be employed; all befitting prudence and diligence used. But using all this, he was to remember that all would be in vain without the Lord's blessing. "Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

It is so still. It is to the Lord we owe it that we have, for so many years, been preserved from foreign invasion and intestine strife. We need not close our eyes to secondary causes; we need not ignore or undervalue the precautionary and defensive means which have been employed; but we would have our thoughts fix themselves especially upon the Lord, as the author of all our national mercies. "When He giveth quietness, who then can make trouble; and when He hideth His face, who then can behold Him, whether it be done against a nation, or against a man only." It would be well did we oftener recognise the connection which exists between God's providential rule and arrangements, and national prosperity or adversity, as the case may be. We cannot read God's Word without noticing that He claims to have the control of nations as well as of individuals. It is He who giveth quietness unto Israel, and it is the Lord who keepeth the city and kingdom in which we dwell.

But this truth admits also of an individual application. Limiting our attention to our families, our secular interests, our own personal welfare: who is it that has kept guard over us and ours —kept us in peace and safety—unless it has been the Lord? We have our material safe-guards, we keep watch and ward ourselves, we use precautionary means; but we have been kept because the Lord has watched over us. For years, perhaps, we have had unbroken health, we have had nothing seriously to trouble us; we can easily imagine all to have been different with us, and worse. Well! to whose care do we owe this—to the Lord's, or to our own?

And though ours may not have been a perfectly smooth and untroubled way, yet, have we not been reminded that the Lord can keep us in peace in the very midst of tribulation? If a man have peace with God, and peace of conscience, he will be but little disquieted by outward trouble and conflict; that which is troublesome in itself, and seems troublesome to others, will but little trouble him. We, to use a common expression, make a trouble of anything, more because of the state of mind we are in, than because of the circumstances in which we are placed; and so we see that what is a trouble to one is no trouble to another, and what we make a trouble of to-day we make light of to-morrow. The Scriptures teach us this great and glorious truth—that the child of God, the believer, occupies such a position, that he need make a trouble of nothing. In the world we shall have tribulation, but in Christ we have peace. He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, and abideth under the shadow of the Almighty, may dwell there in safety until every evil day be over-past. If God be for us, it matters not who are against us; He is mightier than all our foes. Powerless to defend ourselves, we may rejoice in the protection of God, and trusting in Him, we need not fear, though the earth be removed and the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea.

We are taught here, that we are indebted to God for provision for returning and increasing need. "It is in vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows." Many rise early and delay to sit down—engage in exhausting and protracted labour—in order to provide for themselves and those dependent upon them; and after all, the bread which they win, with the sweat of brow and of brain, is to them the bread of sorrows. There is nothing said here in disparagement of honest persevering labour; that is an ordinance of heaven. We are to earn our bread by the sweat of our brow—our eating is made to depend upon our labour; and it is a wise and merciful arrangement that provision for our need, and our general well-being in this world, should be made to depend very largely upon our diligent endeavour.

What we are warned against is not working too hard; there are not many people who stand in need of such a caution; we are warned against working in a godless spirit. While we labour to earn our bread, we should do so in such a way, and in such a spirit, that we feel that we are uttering no mere form of words when we say, "Give us this day our daily bread." Now, whether we earn for ourselves and our families a bare subsistence, or a plentiful supply, our bread will have for us a sweeter taste, if we but feel that it is the Lord Himself who is spreading our table, and providing for our wants. And the poor of this world, if godly—those who live from hand to mouth, who scarcely know to-day where to-morrow's food is to come from—have often been those most ready to acknowledge that it has been of the Lord's goodness that their bread has not failed them, and that their water has been sure. Often nearly at the end of their narrow store, there has been room still to praise the Lord, for there has always been the handful of meal in the barrel, and a few remaining drops of oil in the cruse.

Those who toil hardest, whose labour is most wearing and exhaustive, whose minds are most careful and anxious, are not those who with moistened brow and hardened hands are toiling for a bare subsistence, or even a modest competency, but those who are seeking more than God has promised, more than they need; who are seeking what will not, even if they gain it, be of any advantage to them or theirs. To many such may we say: It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, for with all your getting you have not gotten the principal thing, and with all your endeavours, you will eat only what will be to you the bread of sorrows?

We are taught here, moreover, that we are indebted to God for necessary repose, and a blessing even while we rest. The idea expressed in our version is a very beautiful one, and a very precious one—"for so he giveth His beloved sleep." But the idea really present to the mind of the Psalmist seems to be this: That, while those who work independently of God—build and watch for themselves—will fail after all to secure a satisfying blessing, and will eat, whether in greater or less abundance, what will be to them but the bread of sorrows, to God's beloved—to those who use appropriate means in a trustful dependent spirit—a blessing will come even while they sleep. The Lord will prosper their work, even when their hands are withdrawn from it. He will keep them in safety when they have no care for themselves. He will be providing for the wants of the morrow while they are sleeping through the night. He who keepeth and provideth for Israel doth Himself neither slumber nor sleep.

"He giveth His beloved sleep." All the rest to which we attain is God's gift. Sleep, in the natural, the ordinary sense of the word, is one of God's most precious gifts. It is one of those gifts, the worth of which we do not know till we are deprived of it. Nothing is more terrible—more destructive, than continued sleeplessness; nothing is more pleasant and refreshing than unbroken sleep.

May we not gather from this passage that there is no sleep so sound, so refreshing, as the sleep of God's beloved? What is it which disturbs sleep, which renders sleep difficult, and, when it comes, makes the sleeper restless? Is it not the care, the worry, the anxiety of life? It is a wonder that those can sleep soundly—can sleep at all, indeed—who feel that the building of the house, the keeping of the city, and the winning of the bread, all depends upon them. How sweet and calm is the sleep of the little child! And why? To a great extent because it has no care, no fear. And so, I believe, were we able to trust God with a more simple, unquestioning, childlike faith, physical causes not operating to hinder, we should all of us have sounder and more refreshing sleep. Let us not forget then that sleep is of the Lord, and the blessing which comes to us even while we are asleep. And may it be our endeavour so to spend the day of life, that when the shadows of its evening fall upon us, to die will be but to fall asleep in Jesus. What can we wish for more or better than that He who has helped us to build, and watch, and work, should, all our labours and watchings being over, give us sleep at last?

EXTRACTS FROM AN EXPOSITOR'S NOTE-BOOK.—X.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, NOTTINGHAM, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC. ETC.

BARTIMÆUS.—II.

Mark x. 46–52.

LET us now glance at Bartimæus and his faith. It is to his "faith" that our Lord attributes his healing; it is to his faith therefore that our attention is specially called. And surely it was a faith surprisingly great. As he sits, wrapt in darkness, by the wayside, he hears the approach of a noisy joyful crowd. Unable to see, he asks what it all meant. He is told that "Jesus the Nazarene passeth by." Had he heard nothing of Jesus before, he would have concluded Him to be some traveller of note whom the city delighted to honour, and would at most, if he asked anything, have asked an alms of Him. That he asks first "mercy," and then "sight," proves, I think, that he must have heard of the Nazarene, at least as a prophet who wrought signs and wonders. As he sat by the gate, travellers may have brought him the good news from Galilee or Jerusalem; or he may have heard the citizens in their evening gatherings narrate some of those stories of healing which are recorded in our Gospels, and even discuss the question—which was then being discussed throughout Judea—whether this Rabbi of Nazareth were or were not the promised Messiah. Bartimæus has arrived at a conclusion of his own. To the blind man, He that can give sight to the blind needs no other credential. He must be of God: and if he claims to be "the Son of David," i.e., the Messiah, He is the Messiah. This seems to have been the secret logic of Bartimæus, and if he can only put the Nazarene to the test, and finds that He can open blind eyes, he for one will be well content to receive Him as Son of David and Son of God. Hence he sits by the wayside, crying, "O Son of David, have mercy on me!" for if the Nazarene claims that title of honour, it will be better, thinks Bartimæus, to give it Him even before the cure is wrought, and so perhaps incline Him to perform the cure.

Had Jesus passed on, showing no sign of grace, Bartimæus might have changed his thought of Him—might, though it is by no means certain that he would; for there was a singular vitality and pertinacity in his faith. It was not to be easily suppressed. The crowd about Christ, who were surely most likely to know the mind of Christ, bid the beggar hold his peace; they "rebuke" him for intruding his misery on the general joy; they "charge" him to leave Jesus untroubled by his vain pitiful outcries. If the poor wretch had given up all hope, if he had said within himself, "These men who see the Nazarene, and have been long with Him, must know what He is like, and what He is likely to do, better than I can, I may as well spare my breath," could we have been much surprised? We should have had little reason for surprise. What is really surprising is that, undeterred by the unanimous opinion and rebuke of the crowd—undeterred, but not, I dare say, without some sinking of heart, some abatement of hope—he should cry "so much the more a great deal, O Son of David, have mercy on me!"

It is all of a piece with this vital pertinacious faith that, so soon as Christ bids him "come," he flings aside His long flowing garment in order that he may come the more quickly; that when Christ places His Divine power absolutely at the blind man's disposal, he should at once endeavour to apply it to that in himself which was weakest and most defective; and that, so soon as he had received his sight, he should use it to follow Jesus in the way, thus "glorifying God" for the wonder He had wrought. It was faith, and faith of an admirable strength and constancy, that saved him.

Now, if we use the story of Bartimæus, or the part he plays in this story, as a glass in which we may see both ourselves and him, we shall surely find that face answers to face and heart to heart.

For instance, if the blind man of Judea saw further and more clearly into the character and work of Jesus than the seeing multitude, there are surely many blind men among us—men, i.e., whose eyes are absolutely closed on that knowledge of Life and Nature which springs from culture, who nevertheless have a very clear and deep insight into the mysteries of truth and godliness. I think we must all have known "babes and sucklings" who were familiar with spiritual truths which are often hidden from the eyes of the wise and prudent, and out of whose mouths God perfected a sweeter praise than even the noble hymn which Science sings. Knowledge is good; but it is not the highest good. The faith which inspires charity is better than even the knowledge which leads to wisdom; though best of all is the charity which, born of faith, puts on wisdom. However high the esteem in which we hold the discoveries of Science, though we rank them only below the disclosures of Inspiration, we must still admit that there is no direct connection between a scientific acquaintance with the mysteries of Nature, and an apprehension of those spiritual mysteries of which Nature is the open and manifold parable. Blind men—i.e., men blind to the wonders and charms of Science—may nevertheless have eyes for the truths which centre in the person of Christ Jesus our Lord; while men with eyes for all that Science discovers may be blind to His claims, and see no beauty in Him that they should desire Him.

Now, as of old, the Divine Healer and Saviour is too often surrounded by a rebuking crowd, who, even when they feign or try to help us to His presence, still keep us at a distance from Him. There is the more need, therefore, that we should take pattern by Bartimæus. The more the crowd rebuked him, so much the more a great deal he cried for mercy. Whatever they said, he would not hold his peace. They might leave him sitting by the wayside, solitary and forlorn; they might gather closer round the Master, and with their loud hymns of praise drown his imploring cries. Still he would cry; and if there were in very deed a Saviour in the crowd, He at least would listen and be gracious. And so, when the blessing for which he longed seemed slipping past him, the danger of losing it only redoubled the fervour and passion of his prayer. Let us learn a lesson from him. When men rebuke us and our cry for Divine help, when the very Church rebukes us because we do not speak her language, let us cry so much the more. In dogma, in knowledge, in ecclesiastical form and privilege, they may stand near to Christ and yet be far from Him. They may "go before" Him, yet not to prepare His way. They may "follow after" Him, yet have little of His Spirit. What have we to do with them? They cannot heal us, nor can they withhold us from the healing grace of Christ, if we will not let them. He stands among them, seeking to draw all men unto Himself, willing that all men should be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth. Above all the clamour of their rebukes His gracious voice is heard, saying, "Come unto me, all ye that are sinful, penitent, sorrowful; I will heal you, and save you, and give you rest." Let us but make our appeal to Him, and we need not doubt that, through all the hosannas of the Church and all the hallelujahs of Heaven, our cry for mercy will reach His ear, and He will answer, and save and bless us.

Nor let us think too hardly even of those who rebuke us, for they also serve a useful purpose in the Divine economy. Bartimæus would not have cried so long and loud if the multitude about Christ had not charged him to hold his peace. It was the fear that he might not be heard, that the happy chance of healing might escape him, which moved him to impassioned and importunate supplication. And the same fear moves us to the same fervour. If we were likely to lose our Bible, how earnestly and constantly we should read it, though now perchance it often lies unopened on the shelf. If all our chapels and churches were about to be closed, how eagerly we should flock to them, though now perhaps a very slight hindrance will suffice to keep us away. Because we do not use and value our blessings as we should, God often alarms us with the fear of loss, and sometimes takes them from us for a time. Then we feel their worth, and cry out so much the more to have them restored. And so, in like manner, even the crowd about Christ stimulates our desire to see Him for ourselves; and their rebukes deepen our desire; and the very difficulties they put in our way rouse the spirit by which we overget them. The one good use to which we can put these hindrances and rebukes is all the more resolutely to push forward. The only lawful and happy revenge we can take on those who would fain keep us from Christ, is to press the more earnestly into His presence, and, when once we have seen Him for ourselves, smooth the way for their approach.

HARVEST HYMN.

THE earth, O Jehovah, is Thine,
And its fulness is all of Thy giving;
It teems with all fruits for our health,
And its grain becomes life for our living.

The rain became drink to the plant,
And the sun sped its growth to the spearing,
The days brought the stem to the ear,
And the weeks the full grain from its earing.

Oh, why are we sleepless with care?
Why so restless, though still in Thy keeping?
Why hold we to work without rest,
While Thou workest for us through our sleeping?*

The life is far higher than meat,
And the body than robes of its wearing;
And, Lord, if the low is Thy care,
The high will not want for Thy caring.†

And, oh, may Thy word, that is sown
In our minds by Thy sowers' outflinging
Be not like to seed by the road
That is taken by birds ere its springing;‡

Nor seed that was cast on a rock,
And that opened its blades at upshooting,
But soon withered off in the heat
For the want of good soil for its rooting;

Nor yet like the seed that was choked
Among thorns, where the sower had thrown it,
Betokening Thy care-stifled word,
Where the thoughts of the world have o'ergrown it:

But be like the seed in good ground,
That may grow through our sleeping and waking,
And yield a full increase of grain,
So yielding good fruits for Thy taking.

* Ps. xxvii. 2. † Matt. vi. 25. ‡ Matt. xiii. 4.

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XLII.

MRS. NORTHCOTE had not delayed an hour after Atherstone's visit in hastening to Vale House, there to clear him most effectually from the suspicions which she herself had raised against him in the mind of her friend; and from that moment Lady Elizabeth regretted exceedingly the summary manner in which she had driven him from the house the year before; with the instinct of her woman's heart she felt that it had been the death-blow to Una's happiness, for she knew nothing of the rumours in the neighbourhood respecting her marriage with Trafford; on the contrary, she had seen her repelling every person who showed signs of too warm an admiration, with a gentle firmness, which could only be the result of a deep-seated resolution to listen to no whisper of love from any new acquaintance. Despite her selfishness, Lady Elizabeth was not an unfeeling woman, and even her personal comfort had been a good deal marred for the past year by the sight of Una's sweet sad face, and its look of patient suffering. She had therefore welcomed gladly the information brought her by Mrs. Northcote, which put an end to the necessity of further separation between Atherstone and Una; and Miss Grubbe had been obliged to own that it was useless for her to attempt to interfere with Miss Dysart's prospects of happiness, if Mr. Atherstone came to seek her again at the hands of her aunt.

But now it seemed to Lady Elizabeth that his departure for an indefinite length of time, so immediately after his return home, could admit of no other interpretation but a deliberate intention of avoiding Una, and putting an end to any idea that he wished to resume his former relations with her, and Una herself drew the same conclusion. The aunt and niece had never spoken on the subject together, however, and they did not now; only for the next few days the invalid's mental discomfort showed itself in greater irritability than that which was already habitual to her, and Una went about calm and gentle as ever, but strangely silent, and with a dim shadowy look in her eyes when she came down from what was supposed to be a night's rest, which might have told the most indifferent observer of the secret suffering which was so keenly trying her once joyous spirit.

Meantime, when Atherstone returned home from his visit to Dr. Burton, he found, as it so often happens in this world, that circumstances were working at a distance from him in such a fashion as to render it simply impossible that he should carry out his intention of leaving home without again seeing Una Dysart. He had been aware that Wilhelmina Northcote was to be married on the following day to Hervey Crichton, and he had received a warm invitation from her parents to be present at the ceremony, but he had felt from the first that he really had not sufficient moral courage to witness such a scene in the very presence of his lost Una.

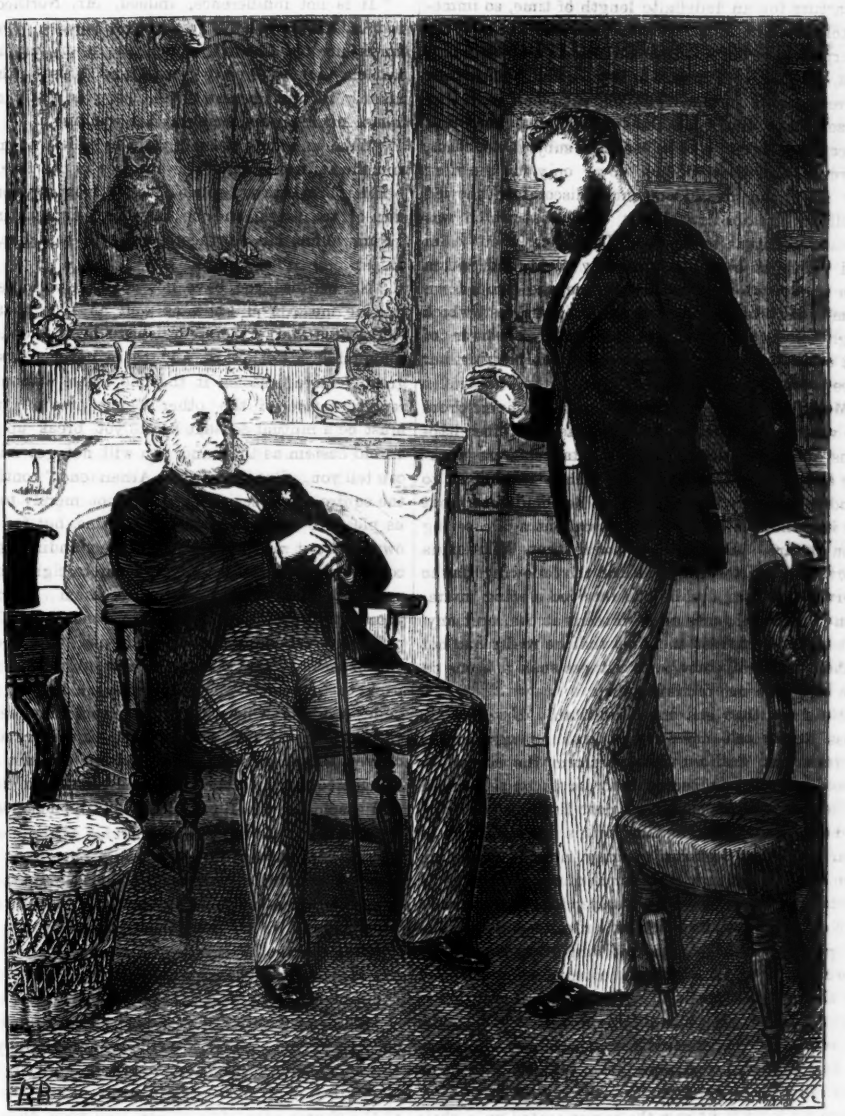
He knew that she must inevitably be there, as Miss Northcote's chief friend, and he was equally certain that Trafford would perform the rite which would so soon be repeated in order to unite himself to her who should have been poor Humphrey's bride, and still was the very darling of his heart. Could he bear to see that good man's happy triumph, and watch him meeting the tender glance of those sweet eyes that once had looked with such deep love into his own?

No; to go through such an ordeal seemed beyond his power; and he had that morning sent a cautiously-worded answer to Mrs. Northcote, in which he tried hard to conceal the true reason of his refusal to attend the wedding of her daughter. No sooner did he arrive at home on this afternoon, however, than he was greeted with the information that Mr. Northcote was waiting for him in the library, and when he opened the door, he saw the squire seated on a chair in the centre of the room, with his hands firmly clasped on the top of his gold-headed stick. He looked up with a merry twinkle in his eye as Atherstone came in, but did not move.

"Here I sit, friend Humphrey," he said, in his hearty genial voice, "and from this chair I do not move till I have brought you to repentance of your cold-hearted indifference to what concerns us so nearly, and won your promise to do honour to our pretty Wil. to-morrow by your presence. I could not have believed you would be so unfriendly as to refuse us."

"It is not indifference, indeed, Mr. Northcote," said Atherstone, his lips quivering with pain; "no one can rejoice more heartily than I do in any happiness that may come to you or yours, and Miss Northcote has my fervent good wishes; but you really must excuse me from appearing at her wedding."

"What is your reason? can you tell it to me?" said the squire, looking him straight in the face.



Humphrey's proud spirit revolted from any confession of the truth, and he answered, deprecatingly, "Forgive me, Mr. Northcote, but even that I cannot do."

"No, because you have not a single valid reason to give me. You know as well as I do that the Northcotes and Atherstones have been friends for some hundreds of years, and there never yet was a great festive occasion in the one house without the representative of the other being present; there must be a mutual consent before you break up such an old custom as that, and you will not get mine, I can tell you. But the truth is, Atherstone," continued the squire, more seriously, "it is not merely to give us pleasure that I urge you to do this, but for your own sake; it may affect your future standing in the county very injuriously if you seem to fight shy of your neighbours on this especial occasion; it will be your first appearance after your absence, and all the painful circumstances connected with it, and every one expects to see you there, and to welcome you back to your own place once more; if you avoid being present—which at any time would have seemed very strange conduct on your part—it will inevitably convey the impression that matters are not after all cleared up, and there will be a renewal of doubts and suspicions which may not be easily dispelled."

Humphrey was too sorely wounded at the heart to feel all the bitterness which would once have been aroused within him by such remarks, and he answered, despondingly, "I do not seem to care much what any one in the world thinks of me now."

"But you should care, my dear fellow; we have to avoid even the appearance of evil, and you are bound to make yourself worthy—in the eyes of others as well as in reality—of the position in which God has placed you. Come, my friend, be advised by me; you must come to us; I will take no refusal; and, after all, it is no such very dreadful affair; we meet at the church soon after eleven, and when they have converted my little 'Will o' the wisp' into Mrs. Hervey Crichton, we shall come back to the Manor House for luncheon—breakfast I believe it is to be called—and the whole business will be at an end before three o'clock. I do not care about your staying to the evening party unless you like to do so; but I do beg you to be present at the wedding itself."

Then Humphrey resigned himself. What, after all,

"He looked up with a merry twinkle in his eye as Atherstone came in, but did not move."—p. 792.

was a little additional pain, more or less, when all was so dark and hopeless around him? "You are very kind to care what I do, Mr. Northcote," he said; "and, since you wish it, I will come to the church at all events."

"And to the breakfast. Good! Now I am satisfied; and you will not regret it yourself, Humphrey, I am very sure."

Atherstone only smiled rather sadly; and the squire took his leave, declaring he had more to do than he then knew how to manage.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Wilhelmina Northcote's wedding-day dawned as sunny and cloudless in all the perfection of summer beauty as if this world were but the fairyland of hope and brightness, which it often seems to us to be in the days of our untried youth; none could have dreamt those azure skies were ever darkened by snow-laden clouds and angry storms, or that the fair green valleys of the flower-decked earth but hid the ashes of the countless dead. All was serene and gay; and the morning smiled like a radiant bride, jewelled with the sparkling dewdrops, and heralded with songs of triumph from a thousand carolling birds.

We are often aware of a strange sympathy existing between Nature and the human race—a sympathy which links itself with our immortal being rather than with that personality which is known and seen to our fellow-creatures. It has been well said that to God and to Nature we never grow old; there we are known to be ever the same, even as we know ourselves; the same in our child-like need of a Father's love, in our self-pity for our unseen pangs, in the imperishable desire for happiness, which sets our heart bounding in its earliest years, and still burns within it fierce and strong as ever, when, worn and wounded, it is feebly beating out its last remains of life. If the world presses hard upon us, and we are hurt to the quick by cruel wrongs from trusted friends, or by the sting of slanderous tongues, there is a subtle consolation in passing out to the solitude of woods and fields, where the unseen presence of the only true and deathless Love impresses itself upon us through the outward aspect of Nature in some mysterious manner, felt though not understood; but there are times when this mysterious mission seems to be repudiated by our mother Earth, and she turns upon us with glittering smiles and garish brightness, when we long for the soft shadows and the tender gloom of sun-veiled skies to speak responsive to our darkened souls.

What a cruel mockery that brilliant sparkling morning seemed to Humphrey Atherstone, as he stood on the steps of his own door waiting for Nightshade to be brought round that he might ride to the church in time for the wedding ceremony, according to his promise. Never through all the troublous years since his uncle's death had he felt so dispirited and hopeless as he did that day; his conscience was clear, his position assured, his future all before him free and independent, only Una was lost to him, and she had so twined herself about the very fibres of his life, that, since it must be spent without her, he longed to be rid of it as an intolerable burden, and would have been well content if the friends assembling that day had been called together in order to lay him down in peace beneath the churchyard sod.

He let the bridle lie loose on Nightshade's arched and glossy neck as he rode along; perhaps he almost hoped the instincts of his favourite horse would guide the animal to bear him away in reckless flight far in the opposite direction; but the stately black horse paced onwards steady and sure, and soon it had borne him to the lich-gate, where the villagers were assembled in happy groups, looking out eagerly for the coming of the bride. Atherstone's groom rode up as he dismounted, took the bridle which his master flung to him listlessly, and led Nightshade away; so that Humphrey seemed to have no alternative but to pass on to the scene he dreaded, yet never perhaps had his splendid beauty and noble dignified bearing been so striking as on that day, when he uncovered his dark head in the sunshine in answer to the salutations of the crowd, and passed on calm and grave into the shade of the churchyard trees.

Here were assembled well-nigh all the wedding guests, who preferred to wait outside in the pleasant air rather than within the church; and to Humphrey Atherstone the whole scene appeared strangely out of harmony with that quiet resting-place of the dead: light laughter filled the air, gay dresses swept over the graves, and merry groups leant on the marble monuments which recorded how much beloved had been the lost and how full of anguish were the living. Atherstone was met very cordially by his neighbours, to all of whom the peculiar circumstances of his history were now known, and he patiently went through the congratulations on his return, and answered courteously, to the hopes expressed by many, that he would mix again with his friends, as in the days of his earlier youth; but as soon as he could he withdrew himself from among them, and escaped into a side alley shaded by branching trees, which seemed to him to be quite deserted. It was lined on either side with the green mounds which sheltered the very poor, whose surviving friends had been unable to mark each cherished spot, except by a few wild flowers laid on the turf from day to day; but there was one solitary grave placed at a distance from all the others under a fine old elm-tree which was distinguished by a white marble cross at the head, while at the foot there stood the figure of a young man, motionless as if he sought to be a living monument to the dead who slept beneath. Atherstone did not know whose resting-place it was, for that quiet grave had opened to receive its tenant—brought many miles to rest in Valehead churchyard—since last he had passed within its gates two years before.

But in a moment he guessed the truth, for it was Rupert Northcote who stood there; and as Humphrey drew nearer he saw that a broken lily was sculptured on the cross, with the inscription below it, recording no name but only the words, "They shall walk with me in white," while a row of the same pure stately flowers marked out the narrow space where Rupert's darling slept. Atherstone had already seen him since his return, and they had renewed their early friendship; so now he went up to him quietly, and laid his arm on his shoulder with a sympathetic pressure which the young man easily understood.

"You have made it a lovely spot," said Humphrey; "those beautiful lilies are most appropriate."

"It was Una Dysart who suggested to me to plant them there," said Rupert; "she said they always reminded her of saints in their white garments, and my Lilith is a saint—the angels have gained what I have lost. Generally speaking I can school myself against daring to regret her; but on this her brother's wedding-day, it wrings my heart to feel that only her senseless form lies there cold and unheeding while all she loved best are gathered round her, and while I above all would give my best years of life to gain one look from her again."

For a moment Atherstone did not speak, and then he said, in a voice of deep emotion, "Rupert, do not think that I fail to appreciate your trial, for I do with all my heart; but, believe me, there are worse enemies for human love than even death."

"Not, surely, for the love that survives? how is it possible? for her it is best, I know, but for me—could any separation be more complete?"

"Yes, a thousand times! though both were still breathing the self-same air. You have not lost her, Rupert; she is yours as entirely, as faithfully, as when you still could clasp her dear hand in your own. She died loving you, she loves you still, and she will never change to you through all the eternal ages. You have her memory in your heart, embalmed there fresh and pure as in her days of life, your own for ever. Who dare dispute that grave with you? or who but yourself can claim to be the dearest earthly memory of her blessed spirit in the realms of paradise? And you think there can be no worse fate than yours? I tell you, Rupert, you little know what men may have to bear, or with how much reason they might envy your gentle sorrow!"

Atherstone had spoken with so much vehemence that Rupert looked round at him surprised; but at that moment a burst of joyful shouting from the crowd at the gate announced that the bride had arrived, and it was needful that her brother should be there to greet her. The young man silently linked his arm in that of his friend, and they walked together out from the sombre alley where they had been standing, to the broad sunny path leading to the church door, where already the wedding procession was being marshalled. The little children of the village school lined the road on either side, holding baskets of flowers from which they flung sweet blossoms beneath the feet of the veiled bride as she passed along, leaning on her father's arm; and close behind Wilhelmina—the chief actor in the scene on which the dazzling sunshine was streaming down—there came another fair and graceful figure, walking with her beautiful eyes fixed on the ground, her little hands clasped tightly together, and her gentle feet seeking to avoid stepping on the pretty flowers which strewed the path, that her light tread might not crush them.

He stood there and watched her; his lost Una, in all her gracious loveliness, with her flowing white robes, only distinguished from those of the bride by the rose-pink flowers which looped them up, and her soft brown hair catching flakes of light upon its waving masses. She was very pale, but her sweet face was rigidly calm, and she passed on with quiet noiseless movement, never lifting her eyes to look to the right hand or the left, yet Humphrey had an instinctive consciousness that she knew he was present, and that she was aware how the sweeping folds of her dress had touched him as she moved along.

Mr. Trafford and Richard Crichton were at the west door of the church with the choristers to meet the bride, and as the squire led her in, his bright and happy little daughter, the choir and clergy turned and preceded her up the nave, singing the well-known bridal hymn, "The gale that breathed o'er Eden," till they reached the altar, where Hervey stood waiting with his friends.

Atherstone saw Una's figure, all white and dazzling in the sunshine, disappear under the shadow of the doorway, while the gay crowd swept in after her, and the impulse was strong upon him to dash back to the gate, and mount his horse, that it might bear him far away at its swiftest pace; but Rupert still held his arm and drew him on, and, yielding in the recklessness of despair, he too entered the church.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XXIII. CHRIST TRIUMPHANT, No. I.

Chapters to be read—Matt. xxviii.; Mark xvi.; John xx., parts of.

INTRODUCTION. Have now gone through some of the principal events in our Lord's life—have seen Him teaching by parables and miracles, dealing with individuals, suffering patiently. Now, His suffering over, His triumph begins.

I. THE RESURRECTION. (Read Matt. xxviii. 1—10.) Ask who took our Lord from the cross, and who helped him. Where have we heard of Nicodemus before? Picture the two good men on Good Friday evening taking the sacred body carefully from the cross, girding it in linen, and laying it in the new tomb. How did they spend the next day? (See Luke xxiii. 56.) Ask the names of the holy women from Galilee, and what they did. When had offerings of frankincense been made, typical of Christ's burial? (Matt. ii. 11; Mark xiv. 8.) So now the women prepare sweet spices, and watch the tomb. What would they see there? Why did Pilate allow soldiers to be placed near the tomb, and a stone placed on it? Did it have the effect he intended? Now picture out the scene in the early morn of Easter Day: describe the sepulchre, a large hole cut out of the side of a rock, with a vast stone rolled before it; four soldiers keeping guard; Pilate's official seal placed on the tomb; very early in the morning, in dim twilight, a great earthquake; when had the last happened, and with what results? perhaps the same soldiers had seen some of the dead arise then; would be still more frightened now; became paralysed with terror, as dead men; whom did they see, and on what errand did he come? From Luke xxiv. 4, may see that there were two angels, though in St. Matthew's account the more prominent alone is spoken of. Then picture the angels rolling away the stone; Christ rising, leaving the linen cloths neatly folded (Luke xxiv. 12), and passing out, while the angels remained to speak to those who came.

II. THE VISIT OF FRIENDS. The children may be told that it is difficult exactly to make the different accounts fit in. Those who care to do so may read Barnes' Notes. It is better to take the three groups of friends who visited the tomb. (1) The women. (Read Mark xvi. 1—8.) Ask about them, and who they were. Mary Magdalene, who loved so much, because much forgiven; the other Mary mother of James the Less, the brother, i.e., cousin, of the Lord, and Salome otherwise Joanna, wife of Herod's steward (Luke viii. 3), accustomed to minister to Christ, had followed Him from Galilee, and now about to do the last they could for Him. What was their anxious question? Now they enter the empty tomb; see the two angels; in their fright only notice the one who speaks. What does he say? (ver. 6) on what errand does he send them? Why is Peter mentioned specially? Where were they to go to meet Him? How did the women feel, and why? These and similar questions may be put, and the women's devotion pointed out, which was rewarded by their being the first to hear the good news of the Resurrection. (2) The two disciples. (Read John xx. 1—10.) Picture the holy women trembling with fear and amazement, running to Simon Peter and John, to whose house the Virgin had been taken, and telling the wonderful news. What did the apostles immediately do? Which ran the quickest, and why? What did John the younger do? (ver. 5) What did the bold Peter do? (ver. 6) Did they see the angel? No! lost the direct testimony given to those first at the tomb: still they did believe the fact, and went away and told it to the rest.

III. PRACTICAL LESSONS. Ask for prophecies as to the Resurrection (Ps. xvi. 8), and remind of types of the same—viz., the Israelites crossing the Red Sea in safety, and Jonah emerging after three days in the fish's belly. Then show the object of the Resurrection. (Read 1 Cor. xv. 20—22.) Ask what is man's greatest enemy: death takes all sooner or later, holds them in his grasp; how can death be conquered? Only by destroying his power—i.e., by resurrection. Therefore, Christ by His rising (1) overcame death; how many days was He under its power? Was death's triumph complete? No! because Christ's body did not see corruption, and by rising He broke its power, and led captivity captive (Ps. lxviii. 18). Also, Christ rising (2) a pledge of our rising. (See 1 Cor. xv. 57.) Because He lives we live. Did any one else rise? What became of Lazarus and others? did one ever rise and not die again? Hence Christ is first fruits of the dead, and all will rise at last day. What other rising is there? (See Col. iii. 1, 3, 5.) What dead things can we put away? So rise to new, holy, spiritual, life, commencement of endless life in glory.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the events between Christ's death and resurrection.
2. Name the holy women from Galilee, and say what you can about them.
3. Describe the scene of the Resurrection.
4. What three visits were paid to the tomb, and what was the object of each set of visitors?
5. Which apostle was to be told separately, and why?
6. What two great lessons are we taught by the Resurrection?

"WHAT CAN IT MATTER?"

BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

PART II.

MARY had a fair share of bodily strength, and a great deal of determination where anything of principle or duty was involved, and rather than leave the gate of Farmer Stack's pasture ground open, she was determined to exert both these attributes to the utmost. But it was all of no avail; the gate swung back every time she thought she had fastened it, and Willie was already nearly half the field in advance of her. She bruised all her shoulder trying to press it into the holdfast, and worried and heated herself to a pitch that was most unusual for so placid a mind; and at length, sorely against her will, she was obliged to give it up, and follow Willie's footsteps across the meadow.

"Well, you shut it, didn't you?" asked Willie, not deigning to look back as he heard Mary panting up behind him. "You ought to be Farmer Stack's own daughter, so you ought; you're so particular about trifles."

Mary did not answer him. She felt her temper was troubled, and she had no wish to quarrel, or to spoil all the pleasure of their expedition by wrangling; so she walked on beside her brother in silence, trying to grow calm again, and to recover from the great exertions which had made the muscles of her arms and back ache again.

Sprat had the happiest knack of diverting people's attention to himself, by tricks and exploits of all kinds; and now, as if sensible of the silence existing between his young master and mistress, he seemed bent on attracting their notice.

The grass, which had neither been grazed nor cut since the autumn of the previous year, was now a good height—so high, that the blades came up to Master Sprat's shoulder; but instead of walking through it like a sensible dog, he suddenly began leaping and bounding in front of them, raising his whole body from the ground, and seeming to fly over the intervening spaces, while the ripe dandelion-heads sent off clouds of feathery dust, as he knocked them hither and thither.

But presently Master Sprat came to a standstill, and, pointing with his nose towards the ground, seemed all at once as if turned to stone. Not a muscle did he move, nor even wag his little stubbly tail; but waited, with his eye fixed on one spot low down in the grass, till his master should arrive.

"What is it, Sprat? Good Sprat! hie, seek it out!" cried Willie, fancying it was a field-rat or a hedgehog, or some such animal.

But Sprat made no movement in advance, and as Willie drew nearer, to examine the spot for himself, a bird rose up from the ground with a harsh frightened scream, and, mounting into the air above Willie's head with a whirring sound, continued, with shrill notes of terror, to express her sense of alarm.

"It is a partridge, Mary! just come here; we have actually lighted on a partridge's nest in the grass. I know the eggs well. I say, what a rare piece of luck; and aint they beauties, just?" And Mary having joined her brother, they both stood for some minutes, thoroughly enjoying the excitement of the new discovery.

From this moment out all remembrance of the gate or their temporary quarrel passed from the children's minds. They took one egg, only one, from the nest, and, full of new-born zest for the expedition, pressed forward, and crossing the gate at the far end of the field—which was not so high or so impracticable a one as the other—they were soon on the borders of the glen.

It was now about the hottest part of the day, and the shade of the trees, when they reached the proposed end of their journey, was most refreshing. Willie revelled in it even more than Mary, for her large straw hat kept her head cool, and sheltered her eyes from the sun, while Willie had been obliged long ago to remove his, in order to place the partridge's egg in safety; nor could he grumble over this deficiency, as Mary had implored him, on setting out, to take the basket with him for this very purpose.

The cool green atmosphere under the trees looked so inviting, Willie and Mary rested themselves a while before prosecuting their egg-hunt, and both being in high good humour, Willie rallied his sister on her obstinacy about the gate, while she snubbed him for his carelessness and general want of method and order.

"It is always the same cry with you, Willie," she said, as she tickled her brother's ear with a long blade of grass; "'what does it matter?' or, 'what can it matter?' or, 'why should it matter?' and then, in the end, it generally does matter a great deal, and some one or some thing comes to grief."

"I never say anything of the kind," replied Willie, laughing. "Besides, even if I do, I'm quite right to say it; for what can it matter whether one puts the kettle on the right hob or the left, or puts their spoon into the right-hand corner of their mouth, or the left? and yet, if you saw me doing either the one or the other, you'd shout at me, just as if I was making the most awful mull in the world. No, no, you'll find out in the long run, Mary, that my plan is the best, and the less one worries and fidgets themselves over such trifles, the longer one will live."

"Unless you live for a hundred years longer than I do you will never convince me of it," cried Mary, laughing.

"And pray, supposing I were to outlive you by so many years, how am I to convince you of the fact when you will have been dead and gone for a century? But that's the image of your reasoning, Mary—a compound of old women's saws and girls' logic!" and Willie, yawning, lay back upon the mossy turf, while Mary still pursued her occupation of tracing lines upon his brow, nose, and ears with the feathery tip of a ripe blade of grass.

But by-and-by the workmen's bell in Farmer Stack's yard could be heard booming across the fields, announcing to the labourers that it was one o'clock, and time for dinner, and bidding the wives in their cottages look sharp and see that everything was ready for the good man, when he came home for his mid-day meal.

When Willie and Mary heard it, they sprang to the ground, and looked into each other's faces with dismay; so much time had been lost in crossing the fields, and looking after the partridges' nests, the morning had slipped by without their knowing it, and now they would only have time to make a hurried search for the treasures which lay concealed in the thickets of "old Stack's glen," as Willie irreverently called it.

He had "spotted," as he had told Mary already in the cottage, several of these prizes beforehand, and consequently, they were not long in finding and taking possession of some really rare and pretty specimens of the genus "egg," all of which were now placed in Willie's hat, both for security and convenience, and in addition to these, many other new nests were found; for the glen was not a common resort for egg-hunters, and the birds had, until now, built their nests and reared their young in comparative safety and seclusion.

It seemed to the children as if ten minutes had scarcely gone by, when the bell from the farm swung out its summons again, and Willie knew he had now barely time to cross the fields and get home, so as to go with his father to the dairy fields, where forty or fifty cows had to be milked, and the cans full of the white frothing fluid to be driven home to Farmer Stack's dairy.

"What a bother to have to stop now, just when I was in the very thick of nests of all kinds!" cried Willy, testily, as he climbed over the arm of a branch, and let himself swing down to the ground. "If you had not lost so much time over that confounded gate, we'd have had another half-hour to spend here. It's too bad! I wish you'd be satisfied to do as I tell you, and not always fight up for your own opinion."

Mary did not answer. She had sense enough to know that in Willie's present humour anything she said would only add fuel to his wrath, so she busied herself wrapping the eggs round in soft dry moss, and placing them again in the deep crown of her brother's hat.

Still, they had not done a bad morning's work. They had secured the much-coveted egg of the golden-crested wren, besides many other good and valuable specimens. And as Willie counted them over, and found they had a total of fifteen, his brow somewhat relaxed, and, whistling for Sprat, who had been chasing rabbits in a neighbouring furrow, to follow him, they went out of the glen, and crossed over the gate which led them back into the pasture-field.

"Well, Mary, where is the bull?" asked Willie, as, having helped his sister over the bars, he turned to survey the field. "Like all your other sage predictions, it has ended in smoke, and a nice chouse it would be now if we had to force open that gate a second time; why, father would have started for the dairy field without me, and I should catch it pretty hot for my pains. Come now, Mary, confess you were wrong: what could it matter?"

Mary shook her head, but still sought safety in silence; for, though Willie's arguments sounded plausible, she knew they were unsound and hollow, and that she had right on her side, though she could not at the moment make it appear so.

And yet the moment was near at hand which was to prove its truth to a demonstration, and give to her "girls' logic," as Willie had so contemptuously called it, a weight which even Willie himself would be forced to recognise.

Meanwhile, Willie pressed forward towards the open gateway, carrying the precious hat in his hand which contained the spoils of the day; his face was flushed with excitement, and his whole carriage exultant and triumphant. Mary followed closely at his heels, a little less triumphant, but still well pleased with the day's success, till they both reached the gate, which still remained open as they had left it, and through which they passed again, Mary making one more ineffectual effort to close it as she went through.

The pasture from this out was free of check or hindrance, nothing save rows of stately beeches marked one field from another; across whose stems, when necessary, an iron railing could be temporarily fixed to separate the grazing grounds. It was a picturesque pasture also, for the sward was undulating and close, and dips and hollows gave shady nooks, where the sheep could huddle together on sunny days, or in stormy and uncertain weather.

Willie began to lag a little in his pace as he drew nearer home, for the sun was beating down on his uncovered head, and making him feel faint and giddy.

"Run on, that's a good girl," he cried to his sister, "and fetch me out the basket from the house, for I cannot stand this heat longer; it is making me as sick as a dog; and for goodness sake call in Sprat, for his barking would drive a saint mad!"

Mary turned, as her brother spoke, and looked into his face, for she was afraid he might be feeling more ill than he said, at the same time calling to the dog to come.

"What can he be barking at! he is down somewhere in the hollow, and does not hear me. Sprat! Sprat!" she cried, pausing, and looking across the field.

At this moment there was a strange sound like the muttering of distant thunder, and Willie paused too, and looked round, while his face grew whiter than before.

"It could not be the bull?" he said, quickly; for the sound was not unfamiliar to his ear, and the suggestion of his heart found vent in sudden words of terror.

"Oh no, Willie! how could it!" cried Mary, running a few steps forward, and trying if it were possible to catch a glimpse over the brow of the meadow.

"Come back! come back! are you a mad-woman?" cried Willie, almost fiercely, as again the muttering sound rose distinctly on the sultry afternoon air, followed almost immediately by a loud and brazen roar of anger.

"Good heavens! if it is the bull we must cut and run for our lives," said Willie, in a tone which sounded to Mary so strange and unlike himself, that she looked at him for a moment in unbelief and terror-struck surprise.

But in another instant all doubt on the subject was removed, as the huge black bull belonging to Farmer Stack came round the corner of the hillock, tearing up the gravel with his feet, and bellowing forth his anger and defiance.

"Sprat, Sprat, you brute! come here, sir!" roared Willie, furiously; for the dog was leaping up at the animal's nose, and evidently driving it to desperation. But it was no use to shout or whistle; Sprat was far too excited to hear or see any one; besides, there was the danger of attracting the bull's fury to themselves. So Willie, turning, measured with his eye the distance between his home and the spot where they stood.

"If the bull takes it into his head to give us chase we are lost," he said, turning, with white lips, to his sister; "we must only make for home as fast as ever we can, and trust to our legs to save us."

But even while he spoke there was a loud yell of pain from the unfortunate dog, and, looking to the corner of the field, they saw poor Sprat tossed high in the air above the horns of the furious animal.

The cry of horror uttered spontaneously by both Willie and Mary, as they heard their favourite's yell of pain was perhaps the worst and most unfortunate occurrence that could have happened, for the bull seemed instantly to become aware of their presence, and, in this discovery, to lose sight of all other surroundings, and to concentrate all his fury on the human occupants of the field.

"Run, Mary! run for your life! he has seen us!" cried Willie, catching his sister by the tippet, and dragging her forward. "If we could only reach the stile we should be safe!"

Not another word was said by either of them, but, distracted with fear, both children fled for their very lives. Mary was fleet of limb, and, unencumbered by the precious capful of eggs, she soon distanced her brother, and was making good speed towards the haven of safety.

But Willie, already sickened by the intense heat of the sun, and still unwilling to part with his much-prized treasures, strove vainly to keep up with his sister. His legs trembled and bent beneath him, and the sky and fields and the flying figure of Mary, all sped round and round before his eyes. At last he ventured to look over his shoulder, and saw, to his horror, that the bull was close upon him; it was coming up at a furious gallop, at every step tearing up the grass and mould, and snorting threateningly.

Away went the capful of eggs—the oval and spotted trophies of the day—flying and hopping over the field in reckless disorder. For one brief moment this action was of service to the boy, for the animal, blind with rage, seemed for a time to imagine that in Willie's broad-brimmed straw hat his enemy lay at his feet.

He rushed at it head downward, impaling it with fearful accuracy on his horn, but the next minute he was again on the boy's track, bellowing furiously with disappointment, and intent on an immediate revenge.

Willie, who at every step stumbled and fell in the giddiness and terrible anxiety of his flight, heard Mary's voice call to him from the stile. She had reached it, while he—he, her elder brother, and superior in strength and courage—was panting hopelessly to overtake her. Why did she not come to his help? Why did she not call some one to save him from this dreadful death?

"Willie, Willie, make haste, make haste!" she cried; "a few steps more, and you will be safe. Father is running up the road, and will be in the field in a moment!"

But all the fathers in the world could not save Willie now, for the bull was actually at his heels, and the scattered mould and clay were rattling sharply about his ears; he looked up, and saw Mary standing on the top of the stile, her arms stretched out to save him, but in the next moment he was driven forward with a terrific impetus, and dashed headlong against the high laundry wall.

Mary gave a yell as she saw her brother thrown forward, almost at her very feet, impaled, as it seemed certain to her, against the stone-facing of the wall; but happily this was not the case.

He had been dashed against it, it was true, but the horns of the bull had missed their aim, and instead of plunging into poor Willie's body, they had struck the wall above, and Mary saw that before her brother could receive the necessary coup de grâce, the bull would have to recoil a step or two into the pasture behind. She never stopped to reason; indeed she never knew exactly why she did it, but in this crucial moment of extremity, Mary seized the lilac dress, which was hanging on the wall beside her, and flung it hastily down upon the head of the infuriated bull.

The aim was a good one, for the curved horns caught the linen fabric as it fell, while the stones which had held the dress in safety above rattled down upon the animal's neck and shoulders. In his rage he leaped aside, tossing his head aloft to rid himself of the unlooked-for encumbrance, but by this movement he only succeeded in entangling himself worse, for the dress still clinging tightly to the point of his horns, now fell over his eyes, and dangled down in front of his legs to the very ground.

Again he recoiled, moving backwards step by step, to shake himself free from the blinding hindrance which now covered his whole head, while muttering with an awful but suppressed anger.

"Willie, Willie, make haste! if you can only get up here and cross the stile, you are safe. Here, here, I will pull you across," cried Mary, wringing her hands hopelessly, as she saw her brother lying stunned and motionless at the foot of the wall beneath. What was she to do now? Another moment, and the golden opportunity might be lost. She gathered up her skirt in her hand, and, brave girl as she was, made ready to leap into the field again, and face the danger she had so happily escaped, when all at once a strong hand pushed her aside, and some one jumped heavily from the top of the stile into the field beneath.

It was her father, and in another moment Willie was lifted up, and partially helped partially dragged over the wall into a place of safety on the other side.

The bull, who at every fresh moment became more entangled in its linen noose, was soon secured, and a chain having been fastened into the ring in his nose, he was led away across the meadow to his own pasture field.

Meantime, Willie was slowly becoming aware that he was safe, and that his safety was not owing to his own prowess, or his own skill, but to Mary's ready wit and dauntless bravery. He said little then; indeed, he scarcely spoke all that long evening, but lay on the settle in the kitchen, staring into the fire, and sighing heavily to himself.

But that night, when Mary crept into his room in the dark, to bring him a cooling drink and to wish him a comfortable and restful night, he stretched out his hand, now hot with fever from the shock of the past danger, and drawing her down close to him, said into her ear, "Mary, you are the bravest and truest little brick in all the world; if it was not for you and your 'girls' logic,' I should be dead and gone now. I'm sorry I have nothing to give you in return, though know you don't mind that; but this much I'll promise you, old girlie, that with God's help I'll never worry you again with that most foolish of all my foolish sayings, 'What can it matter?'"

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

334. To which portion of Isaiah's prophecy does the Lord seem to refer in His answer to John the Baptist's inquiry, "Art Thou He that should come? or look we for another?" (Luke vii. 10.)

335. The ordinary meaning of the word "simple," in the Psalms, &c., is guileless, sincere. Give an instance from the writings of Solomon in which the word "simple" is synonymous with the word credulous.

336. What is the total number of miracles recorded in the four Gospels?

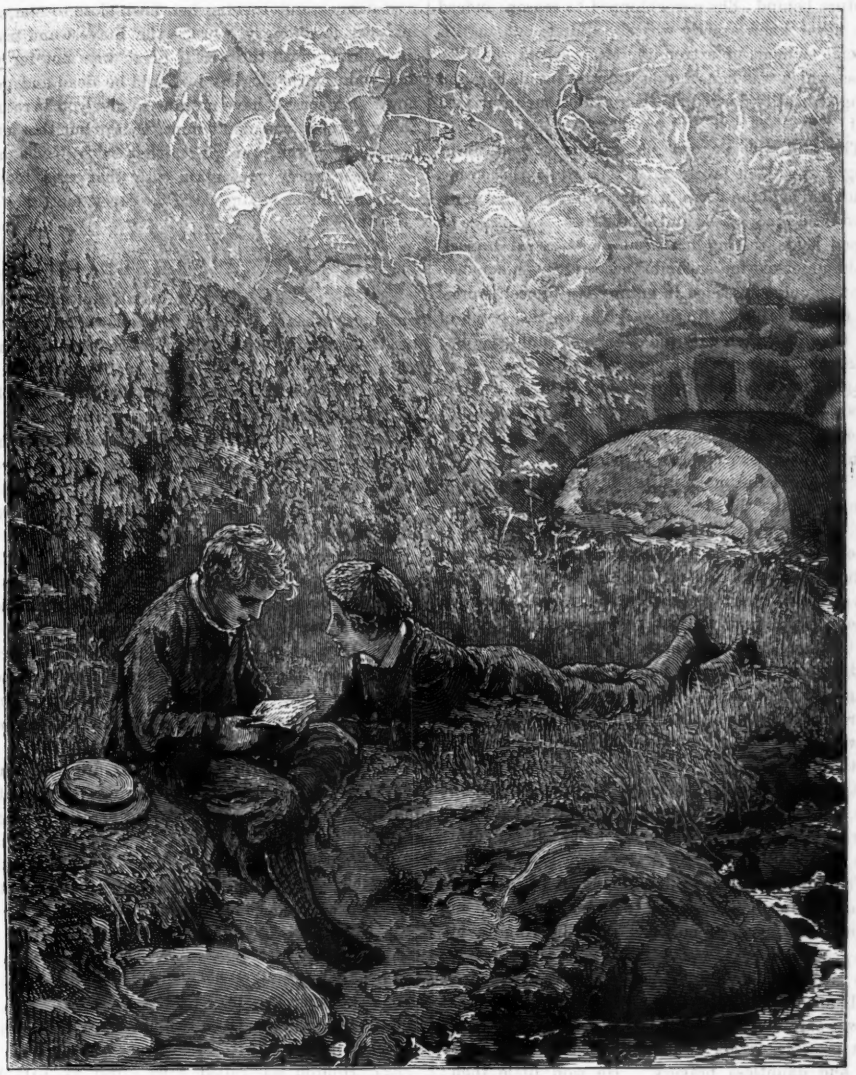
337. Among those who sold their land and laid its price at the apostles' feet was a Levite. Give his name and show that it was contrary to the Mosaic Law for a Levite to possess land.

338. Quote the precise words the Saviour uttered when for the first time He was smitten on the face.

339. On what occasion did the disciples first apply the words "Thou art the Son of God" to the Lord Jesus?

340. What was the origin of the fire with which the Jews offered their burnt offerings? Name two individuals who lost their lives for using "strange" fire.

341. "The word," said Moses, "is very nigh thee," &c. Where does St. Paul quote these words, and with whom does he identify the "word?"



ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 768.

324. 2 Kings xxi. 18.

325. Isaiah (xxvi. 19). See Matt. xxvii. 52, 53.

326. John xix. 20.

327. Hebron was called Arba (Josh. xv. 13); and Debir, Kirjath-sepher (ver. 15).

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

THE DAYS GONE BY.

THIS is no vision from the land
Where mortals wander when they dream,
For on the self-same bridge I stand,
And gaze upon the self-same stream,
Sparkling beneath a summer sky,
As bright as in the days gone by!

O throbbing heart! be still and think
  Of that sweet vanished time of joy;
Still bend the grasses on the brink,
  To kiss the wave as, when a boy
I stood with my lost friend beside
The flowing of this sunlit tide.

Still on the banks the willows grow,
  Beneath whose leafy shade we read
"The Talisman" and "Ivanhoe,"
  Till passing horse-hoofs seemed the tread
Of knightly riders as they went
To join some Norman tournament.

And half afraid were we to look,
  Lest haply we might not behold
Their snowy plumes, which proudly shook
  On helmets shining bright with gold;
The branches rustled in the trees
Like banners blowing in the breeze.

But all its former charm has gone
  From this sweet spot where willows wave;
The river, ever rippling on,
  Brings but to mind his distant grave;
And my sad eyes shall look in vain
To see that long-lost friend again.

J. R. Eastwood.

THE LIBERTY OF OBEDIENCE.

"I will walk at liberty: for I seek Thy precepts."—Ps. cxix. 45.

OBLIGATION and liberty, precept and freedom, obedience and enjoyment, are things which in the esteem of many are quite incompatible. Men for the most part, especially in their youth, are accustomed to suppose that precept somehow is bondage, and that law is necessarily opposed to liberty. The Psalmist, you perceive, takes here quite an opposite view. And he was right; while the common idea is utterly wrong. Even Seneca, the heathen moralist, declared that "to serve God is to reign;" and the servant of God is said by St. John to be made a king unto God.

1. It is well to remember that the Almighty Father has given us precepts—has avowed His relation to us, asserted His claims, and made known His will. Man was made at first a law unto himself, or with the rule of holy action in his nature; but he rebelled, Divine precept was disobeyed, and the Divine image lost; "all flesh corrupted his way" before God, and men became lawless and disobedient.

In mercy, the revelation of law was renewed in another form, and at Sinai external precept was given to point out our duties to God and our fellow-men. The Divine commandments are perfect and paramount, and come home to every man. All are under obligation to God as the Great Father to whom they owe their being and their powers, and to whom they are accountable for the right use of every gift and energy. God's all-perfect and comprehensive law singles every one out, and addresses him in the personal language, "Thou art the man," to which his conscience in some form, and with more or less distinct utterance, responds assent.

2. It is our business to seek these precepts—to seek to know them and obey them. Nothing can be of greater importance for us than this employment and pursuit; yet the commandments of God are the very last things which men naturally seek. "Hide not Thy commandments from me," cried David; but how few, comparatively, sympathise with him in his prayer. What is it thus to seek the precepts of the Lord? The word rendered seek literally means "to stamp or tread with the feet;" to tread a spot is to frequent it, from which it signifies "to search for." One who has lost a piece of money in the street will go backwards and forwards looking for it. The man who wishes a favour from another will often go to his house and tread his threshold, until he gets it. The individual who has any place or object especially dear to him will often be found repairing to it. So David sought the precepts of the Lord that he might find them; and finding them, he sought them as objects of satisfaction and enjoyment, so that he could say, "Thy law is my delight." It was the feeling and course of one who often went where he liked to be, who often sought the Friend in whose fellowship he especially delighted, who often pondered the claims, obligations, and ties which he loved to cherish. Nothing should be so full of attraction to us as the will of our heavenly Father, when discovered either in Revelation or in Providence; and nothing should be so full of enjoyment to us as the humble and earnest doing of His precepts. Unspeakable is the advantage and blessing to ourselves of such a course.

3. In thus seeking the precepts of God man reaches his truest liberty. The margin reads, "I will walk at large: for I seek Thy precepts"—"I will walk in the broad, open, extended place." Few things men prize more highly or seek more ardently than liberty; but many do not see that liberty in its highest sense is secured by seeking the Divine precepts. Instead of thinking they can walk at large in the path of obedience to God, multitudes consider it must be a very narrow walk indeed—a forbidding and undue limitation of their powers and propensities. David did not think so when he penned these words; nor did St. Paul find it so when he said, "The love of Christ constraineth us." The constraints of the Divine law and love form, in truth, the highest freedom.

What is liberty? Is it not the freedom of our whole being, the emancipation of all our powers, their ability to act according to their proper nature and design without being under any subordinate and inferior restraint? You can easily see how a man may consider that he is free in pleasing himself and doing as he likes, while in this very thing he may be a beggarly bondman and a cowardly slave—

"Lord of himself, that heritage of woe."

His servant he is whom he obeys. To serve the devil is bondage, while to serve God is to reign. Where is liberty, then, to be found for man? Is it in obeying himself, in giving the rein to the passions and propensities of his own nature? Many so suppose, but it is a gross mistake. That is to limit man's powers within a base and very narrow boundary, like the caging of the lark, which with untiring wing should be carolling aloft in the clear blue sky. Is it in obeying the world with its maxims, fashions, pleasures, and pursuits? No, that is only another name or form of slavery which limits the range of human powers to the boundaries of time and sense. True liberty can only be found in the happy consciousness of our relation to God and obedience to Him. He alone, as the Infinite Father, can prescribe fitting exercise and duty for His child—the exercise and duty for which his powers are both adapted and intended. It is the man that lives in obedience to God, having the Divine law within him as the rule of his life and the source of his delight, who is truly free.

The arrangements of society supply illustration of this truth. Who is the man that walks at liberty in our streets and enjoys himself as a free citizen? Surely he who "seeks" the precepts of his country, and whose life is a willing and habitual response to the majesty and honour of law. The law is enthroned in his heart, and he walks at large. No spy tracks his footsteps, no detective haunts his places of resort, no officer of the state interferes with his engagements. But if a man should say, "Why should I be hampered by law? why should I be restrained by the precepts of society? why should I not share in my rich neighbour's property? why should I not carry out my own will, irrespective of the rights or convenience of others?" and begin to act on such thoughts, he would soon find his liberty curtailed, and himself imprisoned as a madman or a criminal. The same principle holds good in the grand realities of the Divine government. Our liberty lies in our obedience. To serve God and live for Him is most truly to be free. How so?

The man who seeks the Divine precepts is in harmony with God, and harmony with God is liberty. Man never seeks a precept which condemns himself; he will rather hate it and shun it. To the transgressor, when the commandment comes, sin revives. Hence, to seek the precepts of God is in truth to walk with God; and "how can two walk together except they are agreed?" God is in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself; he that walks with God is reconciled to God, and in the enjoyment of the Divine favours and friendship. The sinner, conscious of his transgression, helplessness, and bondage under sin, finds peace through the blood of the cross, and in reconciliation to God is introduced into the glorious liberty of His children. He is not free who is under condemnation, but harmony with God is freedom; and nothing can harm the freeman of God, nor can any power prevail against him. He walks at large, and finds all things working together for his good.

To seek the Divine precepts is to be devoted, consecrated to God, and devotion to God is liberty. God is the highest object which the human soul can seek, or to which it can aspire. Devotion to Him and living to His glory involve the highest range of man's being, so that in it alone he can really walk at large. "For me to live is Christ," said St. Paul, and in so living he reached the highest purpose of his nature. For multitudes to live is—business, or wealth, or pleasure, or social power; but these are low aims, which limit the faculties of man, and confine the range of life within the narrow boundaries of the seen. It is supreme devotion to God which lifts man in desire and thought to the Infinite and Eternal, and which alone gives the widest and freest scope to the exercise of all his powers. In this only can he rise through the universe in quest of goodness, wisdom, and beauty, without fear or hindrance, and walk worthy of God.

Nor less clearly does it appear that this seeking of the Divine precepts brings likeness to God, and likeness to God is liberty. It is thus that man becomes a holy law unto himself, and the precept is placed within his heart, and becomes a part of his moral and spiritual being. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ sets the sinner free from the law of sin and death. The more spiritually-minded men become the less do they require external regulations to guide their conduct. Outward law is for the lawless and disobedient. Those who obey the Gospel of God are made partakers of the Divine nature, and reach in themselves the highest purpose of God's revelation. The Spirit dwells in them, and "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." In doing the will of God, then, man finds the highest freedom. "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent," His only begotten Son, the Saviour and Lord of all. Thus Christ proclaims liberty to the captive, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound.

You have seen a kite aloft in the air, moving gracefully against the breeze like a thing of life and beauty: the slender string which binds it to the hand of the boy who holds it is its safety; let that string be snapt and broken by a sudden gust of wind, and the vain liberty of the kite will forthwith issue in its downfall and destruction. So men, in acknowledging their allegiance to God and walking in His precepts, find their true life, liberty, and only safety. Yet how many, alas! in rejecting the tie that binds them to their Maker, have found their fancied freedom to be the very bondage of darkness and misery! JAS. SPENCE, D.D.

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC. ETC.

II.—"EVERY LITTLE MAKES A MICKLE"—(concluded).

THIS common proverb leads us, however, still higher. If we mount into the region of spiritual things, we find it even there. The "mickle" or the "much" of a developed Christian is the result of many littles in the disciplinings and experiences of the divine life.

It is not any of his littles that can save his soul, that great mickle—that vast "much," at which angels wonder—is the sole prodigious work of Christ; but our spiritual life is exercised and fed and strengthened by littles.

This life here is led in littles. The martyr's stake is not kindled now; the life of the man of God is not a struggle with outward foes, or a fleeing from open persecutors; that life is to be led in shops and factories and fields and quiet homes, and amid what perhaps many would call very inglorious scenes. But it is here, nevertheless, that we are to set forth Christ, and here that we are to be trained for heaven. It is by "littles" that the man of God is made perfect.

Faith is educated by littles. It becomes stronger every effort it makes. Just as the muscles become stronger every time we move our limbs, so faith becomes more powerful every time it acts.

Self-denial is exercised by littles. Every small thing we forego, every time we are willing to retreat into the background, and see another preferred, forms and fashions the character for heaven, moulds the soul's life which is to be.

The saints in their eternal and glorious home shall be "mickles"—"muches" made up of many past littles. And this will be equally true of the other sad side of the picture. The spiritual being of the lost shall be the aggregate of many littles, bad littles having gathered and consolidated themselves into a bad "much."

What lessons do we learn from this? There is another common proverb which says "Every little helps." And what are our littles helping us to—whither are they helping us to go?

One lesson that we learn is to put that question to ourselves—not to allow ourselves to be drifted on to ruin on the bosom of a current made up, after all, of only very little drops.

What kind of "mickle" are the "littles" of our life making? We ought to know whither we are going; what kind of place we are becoming fitted for.

What has been said about this proverb should teach us not to despise littles, no matter what form they come to us in. He that despises little things, by little and little shall he perish. It was a little more sleep, and a little more slumber, and a little more folding of the hands to sleep, that brought poverty upon the sluggard as one that travelleth, and want as an armed man (Prov. vi. 9, 10). It was the "little" foxes which were doing the mischief in Cant. II., and they found something suited to them—the tender grapes; and these little foxes were not to be let have it all their own way, but were to be caught, and their mischief put an end to; for though they were small themselves, their power of doing harm was great. "Take us the foxes—the little foxes that spoil the vines—for our vines have tender grapes."

Neither on the good nor on the bad side may we despise the little things—in each a great mickle lies before us.

Remember, as regards the bad, that what you pooh-pooh as small, nevertheless goes on its way, to live, and work itself out, and join itself to other like things, to overwhelm you by-and-by, as the avalanche made up of single snow-flakes overwhelms the traveller in the Alps.

You cannot do little mean things, without getting the mickle of a miserable character; you cannot indulge in little lazinesses, without becoming slothful; you cannot decline little duties, without becoming untrue in your spiritual life.

Take care how you look at littles by themselves, not bearing in mind that they are parts of a great whole. If you do this, you may find yourself ruined before you know anything about it. Seldom any man takes a gigantic step in evil all at once; he comes to it by little and little. The littles familiarise us with the mickle.

Many a man who has been going into debt for little things, a shilling or a sovereign now, and a few shillings then, is amazed and displeased when a bill comes in to him for perhaps £100. And yet he cannot reasonably or justly object to it in any way. He ordered and had the goods; each article seemed nothing, or next to nothing, at the time; the big account is the mickle of them all.

But we must take a bright side of this proverb also. It will never do to stop at the dark side of truth; we should be miserably depressed if we did, and should never get on.

There are many small things in good, as in evil; and here, too, "every little will make a mickle."

As people seldom fall into great wickedness all at once, so they seldom attain to much good.

There is indeed one great mickle—the soul's mighty "much"—which is done not by little and little, but all at once; and that is its salvation. He that believeth shall be saved; that work is once and for ever. But there is the sanctification of the heart; the purifying of the life, the attainment of personal holiness; and all this seldom, indeed never, comes at once. It is here a little, and there a little; the growing in grace, the making small advances day by day.

Do not despise the day of small things; do not undervalue, either in yourself or others, small improvements; they are all steps in the ladder which you must climb, and, when all put together, will lead you very high. Trust this as their issue. You might be very much discouraged if you were to look only at the end; it might seem so high, so far off, so unattainable. But you shall be led to it by imperceptible steps: the littles will bring you there.

Thank God for every small improvement. Even though it were but very small compared with what you would have had it be, thank Him heartily for it; let it be added to what went before; and add something more in the way of improvement to it, be it never so small, and you shall find that you are advancing towards the mickle, the "much" of being perfected.

Do not be altogether discouraged about others either. Christ is not discouraged. We are told that the bruised reed does He not break, and smoking flax does He not quench. He recognised Peter's little faith, though it was but "little," when he was about to sink. Our Lord noted also the "little strength of the Philadelphian Church" (Rev. iii. 7), and there was a blessing in that, though it was but small.

Encourage every one to little efforts. Generously recognise these littles. Rejoice in your own littles, and thank God that you have been able to make them. Look forward with hope and trust to that day when He who said, "Well, thou good servant, because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities," will recognise your honest littles, and show you, to your great astonishment and delight, how much they come to in the aggregate. Then you shall see the spiritual side of this proverb, and wonder at the wide circumference of the common saying, "Every little makes a mickle."

"I."

THE "Vishnu Parana," one of the sacred books of India, relates the following incident:—Ribhu, a learned Hindu, called once upon his disciple Nidagha. The pupil having humbly set a meal before him, asked him where he was then living, whence he had come, and whither he was going. The reply was remarkable: "Man, the soul of man, goes everywhere, and penetrates everywhere, like the ether; and is it rational to inquire where it is, or whence or whither thou goest? I neither am going, nor coming; nor is my dwelling in any one place; nor art thou thou; nor are others others; nor am I I."

Another thousand years passed, and Ribhu again visited his disciple. He found him watching the king entering the town. "Tell me," said Ribhu, who saw that he was not recognised, "which is the king, and which is any other man?" "The king is seated on the elephant," said Nidagha, "and the others are his attendants." "But which is the king, and which is the elephant?" rejoined the irrepressible philosopher. "The elephant is underneath: the king is above him," replied the disciple. Ribhu, however, was not to be so easily disposed of. "What is meant by the word 'underneath,' and what is it that is termed 'above?'" The disciple, supposing, perhaps, that a little practical illustration might be useful, leaped on Ribhu's back, and said, "I am 'above,' like the rajah, and you are 'underneath,' like the elephant." But the resources of philosophy are infinite: there was a question deeper still; and the sage could raise the question, if he could not solve

it. "Come, now," said he, "do you tell me which of us two is you, and which is I?" Nidagha was overpowered with this unexpected explosion of wisdom, and at once recognised his ancient teacher. "He went away," says the sacred volume, "profoundly impressed with the belief in unity. He henceforth beheld all things as the same with himself; and being thus made perfect in knowledge, obtained final liberation."

What is "I," and what is "you?"

The question is interesting. The Budhist believes that all things are but one, and that they return to one: the idea of individuality is lost. This, however, is clearly not the true solution. Philosophy may confuse us, but there is a voice within which says that I am I and you are you. However closely united by interest and affection, we are conscious that there is a sense in which we are totally distinct. We cannot actually feel with a suffering neighbour, though we may feel for him. I am glad I am not you"; or, "I wish I were you," express an actual truth, the profound philophising of Ribhu notwithstanding.

But if it is easy to determine that "you" is not "I," it is more difficult to say what is meant by "I."

Each feels that he consists of a body, with its faculties and sensibilities, and a power of thinking and feeling, both together forming the individual.

And yet it is evident that the body is not "I."

It is continually changing; since our childhood we have added to it many pounds weight of chemical substances, which have been incorporated from without, and yet this makes no essential difference in ourself. Again, we lose parts of our body without any sensible alteration of self. Our hair and our finger-nails are so little a part of us, that we remove them periodically without sense of loss or inconvenience, and even though the loss of a limb would be a serious mutilation, and leave a painful sense of bodily incompleteness, yet the "self" remains the same, as complete as ever. The phrases, "when I was a child," or "before I lost my arm," and the like, show that we feel ourselves to be the same in all periods, and through all changes of life; and though we are so altered that our friends may not recognise us, and though we might have difficulty, after a length of years, and a long absence from home, in proving our identity, yet nothing could deprive us of the knowledge that we were "ourself," nor persuade us that we were any one "else." It would be impossible, till we had "obtained final liberation" from our senses, to perplex us with the question, "which of us is you, and which is I."

The body, then, however intimately connected with ourself, is not "I."

What, then, is "I?" Whatever philosophical perplexities may arise when we come to express our knowledge in words, we are conscious that we possess a kind of existence which suffers no break of continuity from any changes of our bodily frame, or from the events of our life. We may alter greatly in our ideas, and our early ideas may seem to us so different from our present ones as to make our childhood appear to be some one else's childhood, but we know that it is our own; there is no more break of continuity in our consciousness than in our body. Our mental powers may be vastly increased, but we are sure that they are the powers of our childhood, enlarged.

And how vividly we feel our sameness, when anything reminds us of some event in our childhood which greatly agitated or interested us. An injury, or an act of tenderness shown to us—a fright or a pleasure; how it comes back to us! There are many things which can never be blotted out from our memory; they have become part of us, and remain like a scar on the body which is visible through all changes. There are things which can never be forgotten; and it was felt to be a fair argument against the claimant in the Tichborne case that he had no recollection of certain events which were known to have happened in the early life of the real Sir Roger.

But the continuity of our moral character is an important element of the question.

We are all aware that some things are right and others wrong; and we feel uneasy, when we have done what we believe to be wrong; and happy, when we have done what we believe to be right. Now, apart from revelation, it is difficult for the mind to get rid of the uneasiness caused by doing wrong, and in any case it is impossible to get rid of the consciousness that we are still the same individual who did the wrong. We may, perhaps, forget many transgressions, and of many of our youthful ones we may contrive to take a very indulgent view; but it is impossible to destroy the feeling of identity. Indeed, it may be questioned whether any error can be quite obliterated from the memory. A writer in the Times a short time ago tells us that in the moment before he lost his senses under the water, he was startled to find a boyish sin come back to his memory—he had once ungenerously eaten some grapes left at the bedside of a sister suffering from fever; he had contrived to forget it, but years afterwards it presented itself to his mind as fresh as ever. Perhaps we may all have something to learn on this wonderful subject.

Habits, too, are often found to re-assert their power under strange circumstances. A policeman, suspecting that a baker carrying a tray on his head, was a criminal who was just then "wanted," went behind him, and suddenly uttered the word "attention!" in military style—the man of whom he was in search was known to have been in the army, and the officer correctly reasoned that the soldier's habits would outlive all changes—the man instantly drew himself up, placed his hands by his side, like a soldier at drill, and let the tray fall from his head. A similar anecdote was told in the Tichborne case.

What a mistake it is to suppose that a mere change of circumstances, at the passing of time, will alter us! Our evil tendencies may, indeed, be subdued, and virtuous habits may ultimately prevail, but it is by other and severer processes. We shall not escape evil, even by laying down the body. To the virtuous there is a splendid hope; he may yet escape all evil, and be as though evil had never been known to him, but his "final liberation" will not be such as Ribhu taught his disciple to seek; he will never be in doubt as to "which of us two is I and which is you."

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIV.

UPERT NORTHCOTE left his friend, as they drew near the altar, and went to join his mother, who was standing a little apart, visibly agitated, now that the period of final parting with her daughter had arrived; while Atherstone took up his position where, half hidden by a pillar, he could fix his eyes undisturbed on Una's face. Just at that moment the deep melodious voice of Mr. Trafford was sounding out the solemn charge to those who were about to be joined in life-long bonds, that they should declare whether they knew of aught against their union, as they would have to answer for it at the dreadful day of judgment, when the secrets of all hearts should be made known.

"Now," thought Atherstone, "Una knows that those words will soon be addressed to her and Trafford, and unless she has made herself hard and cold as ice against me, she must betray her consciousness that if the deepest secret of her heart were revealed it would tell of a love between her and me, which well might hold her back from taking vows to any other man."

He watched her intently, as the awful adjuration rolled through the echoing aisles, and was followed by a pause of intense silence, when no answer came from the true young hearts that had long been open to each other in loyal affection. But Una never moved, and her beautiful face remained white and still, as if chiselled in monumental marble. Humphrey continued to gaze upon her earnestly, while the sacred rite went on and the pledges of undying love were given and taken; and only once he marked a change. Like a sudden breeze rippling the surface of a quiet lake there came a tremor of agitation over Una's pure pale countenance, which made her lips tremble, and her eyes grow dim with tears, when she saw the young bride rise from her knees, her hand clasped in that of her husband's, while the clear voices of the choristers rang out the words, "Oh, well is thee, and happy shalt thou be!" Atherstone knew not what chord was touched at that moment in Una's heart, but in truth she felt as if it were ready to break within her, for it was crying out in passionate longing for the bliss which she believed her own young life was never to know. Ah! well it was with the bride so deeply loved, and happy would she be; but she had given all her life and all her heart to him who stood there in his living beauty as utterly dead and lost to her as if the grave had hid him away for ever from her sight. The thought of the long years of loneliness that seemed to lie before her was more than she could bear, and as she swayed like a reed under the tempest of anguish that shook her very soul, her glance fell for a moment on Atherstone's countenance, looking dark and stern from his inward pain and resentment, and at once her maidenly pride enabled her to master the emotion which might betray to the man whom she believed had deserted her how unchangeably she loved him still. With a strong effort she drove back the tears that well-nigh choked her; raised her fair head in dignified calm; and from that moment never showed by look or movement the least sign of feeling through all the subsequent scene.

The service was over, and the newly-made husband and wife passed out of the church, and walked down the graveyard path in the sunshine, with their friends following close behind them.

"Caught at last, my Will-o'-the-wisp!" whispered Hervey to the little bride whom he was bearing away in triumph.

"Fairly caught," she answered. "I hope it is not proper for me to cry, because I can't, I am so happy;" but there were bright drops on her dark eyelashes as she spoke, for her eyes turned lovingly on the kind old father, whose house was to be her home no more.

At the gate the village people clustered round the squire's daughter and her husband, all eager to touch her hand or win a last look from her smiling eyes, and in the confusion Atherstone found himself close behind Una, but she still maintained her statuesque calm, till suddenly Trafford, hurrying from the church-door with his swift vigorous tread, came straight up to her, and bending down from his stately height, whispered a few words in her ear; they were, in truth, only prompted by a kind wish to remove the sadness which the quick-eyed clergyman had noted on her face, by reminding her that all the happiness that day around them was due to her own success in bringing Rupert Northcote back to his home. But Atherstone did not hear what was said, he only saw that Trafford's voice brought light to her eye and colour to her cheek, and that she looked into his face with a sweet bright smile, and answered low and softly to his secret whisper. And the sight was too much for Humphrey's powers of endurance; with a determined effort he made his way through the crowd to the place where his horse was waiting him, and hastily pencilling a note to Mr. Northcote, begging him to excuse him from being at the luncheon, he gave it to his groom, and told him to ride to the Manor House with it, and then mounting Nightshade, Humphrey himself darted away in the opposite direction, and was soon galloping at full speed along the most lonely road he could find.

Poor Una could not so easily escape from what had been to her an almost unendurable ordeal. She was obliged, as the bride's favoured friend, to accompany her back to the house, to sit in patience at the table while the wedding feast went on, and finally she had to take her place with all the other guests on the outer steps, and join her good wishes with theirs as the daughter of the house was borne away by her husband, to begin together the new life that seemed so full of promise. Then only would she hope for a few minutes' relaxation from the strain of the determined calm beneath which she had hidden her anguish through these long trying hours.

The Northcotes had insisted that Una should remain with them till the following day, in order that she might be present at the evening party with which the festivities were to terminate, and bitterly distasteful as all such gaieties were to her at present, she knew that she must not avoid them if she would conceal the reason which made them so; but now that Wil. was gone, for the next few hours at least she was free, and hastily throwing a dark mantle over her white dress, she ran with fleet steps through the shrubberies till she reached a side gate which led to an outlying hamlet on the Northcote estate. Una had a definite purpose in taking this direction, but when she found herself in the perfect solitude which was so great a relief, she relaxed the rigid self-control with which she had maintained her composure, and gave way to irrepressible sobs. Like the king of old, who hastened away, weeping as he went, when he heard that the son was dead, whom to have retained in life he would have been well content that all others should have died that day, she passed on through the quiet woods in all their summer brightness, with her fair face bathed in tears and her lips wailing out the bitter cry, "Would that I had died before I lost him! Oh, my love—my love!" for Atherstone's conduct at the wedding had utterly killed the last hope within her, and the whole long life that she might have to live stretched out before her one dark and dreary blank, where the lights of earth had all gone out, and the far-off stars of heaven would alone have power to shed radiance on her path.

This complete abandonment of herself to her grief for a few minutes brought a sense of relief, and when she reached the little old-fashioned farm-house which was her destination she was able to wipe the tears from her eyes and regain her composure, at least in outward appearance.

CHAPTER XLV.

In the farm-house where Una Dysart now entered there had lived from the day of her birth, sixty years before, a poor old woman who had always been a hopelessly misshapen cripple. She had never known what it was to walk or stand, and had spent her whole life between her bed and the wooden seat, fixed in the deep old-fashioned window, where she lay curled up in a strange distorted attitude. Her hands were as useless as her feet, and the only occupation of which she was capable was that of reading, which she had happily been taught in her early youth by a charitable lady of the Northcote family. Her mother had died when she was born, and her father had supported and cared for her somewhat grudgingly till his death, and then the farm became the possession of her half-brother, a man very much younger than herself, who was married and had a large family. He had just sufficient pride, and respect for the good opinion of his neighbours, to prevent him sending poor helpless Lizzie to the workhouse, but neither he nor his wife made the smallest attempt to conceal from her that they considered her a most undesirable burden, which they would be heartily glad to be rid of, whenever death might remove her from their hands. In a word, the life of this hapless being had been, from first to last, as utterly devoid of hope or love or happiness of any kind as it is possible to conceive that an existence on this earth could be, yet Lizzie was without exception the most invariably cheerful contented person Una Dysart had ever known, and the secret of her joy and peace in the midst of pain and contumely and neglect was simply this, that from her Bible, the only book she possessed, she had won the knowledge of her Lord and Saviour, and, giving herself into His pitying care, she had found in His love all that her heart could desire for time or for eternity. "My beloved is mine, and I am His," these were the words that absorbed her whole being, and filled her with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"You have comforted me very much."—p. 810.

Therefore it was that Una Dysart had come to her, on this the saddest day of her young life, that she might steep her soul in the faith and heavenly fortitude of this poor cripple, and learn from her that the absence of all earthly hope may yet leave brightest radiance on the life that is hid with Christ in God.

Lizzie greeted her visitor with delight, recognising her step, though her distorted shape prevented her from turning her head; and Una knelt down by the chair in order to bring her face on a level with hers, throwing aside, at the same time, the heavy mantle which hid her dress; Lizzie gave a pleased exclamation of surprise when she saw her in her snowy flower-decked robes, for though Una often visited her, she had never of course seen her thus attired. "My pretty lady," she said, "how sweet you look to be sure! you are like the angels I see in my dreams, which are all in white with flowers in their hands, the flowers that never fade!"

"But I am not good or happy like the angels, Lizzie, and I have come to you to make me better."

"My dearie, what can a poor old creature such as I am do for one like you?"

"You can tell me about yourself, Lizzie. You are quite happy, are you not?"

"My sweet one, yes! how should I not be, when I have the dear Lord with me always?"

"But did you never want any happiness in this world? I know you never had any, but did you never wish for it?"

"Never, since I knew what it was to have the Lord for my portion, and my everlasting great reward; though I merit nothing at His hands."

"Lizzie, forgive me for asking you, but did you never wish to be loved—to be the dearest of all to one of your own fellow-creatures?"

"I might have wished it," she answered, simply, "if I had never known the tender pity and the sweetness of my crucified Redeemer; but oh, my dear young lady, who can love us as He does who died for us? 'Greater love hath no man than this, that he should lay down his life for his friends,' and I give Him back my poor love truly—well, He knows it. Every day that passes is a joy to me, because it brings me nearer to the time when I shall see Him who is chief among ten thousand and altogether lovely."

"But, Lizzie, if you could go back to be young again, with all those years that you have lived before you still, would you not gladly begin your life once more, if you could have the chance of being happy and beloved?"

"No, my dear; not if it was to keep me back a single day from going to my Saviour. I'd rather be the poor cripple I am, on the brink of the grave, with the hope of seeing Him beyond it, than be young and beautiful like you, if it put me sixty years further off from Him."

Una sighed. "I will tell you how it is with me. I have had a great grief, and it has taken away all hope of my ever having any more love or happiness in my life than you have had—at least I shall not have the only love I care for—and the future does look so sad and dreary, I don't know how I am to go through it to the end, even though there is the hope of heaven after it is past and gone. Do you think I shall be able to bear it?" added the poor child, looking wistfully into the old woman's withered face.

"Oh, my dear lamb, you do not know what the dear Lord can do to comfort those who love Him. He has made my life, long as it has been, seem like one day because of the joy I have had in His hidden presence, which is always with me, and if you come to long for Him as I do, the years you may have to live will be to you but as rushing wings bearing you onward to His feet."

"Thank you, dear Lizzie," said Una, stroking the old woman's cheek with her gentle hand; "you have comforted me very much, for I know that what you say is true. I will ask our Lord to make me brave and good like you, and then I shall be able to take courage and go forward patiently as you have done."*

She remained a little longer, singing hymns in her low sweet voice, which she knew gave the poor cripple special pleasure, and then she went away, braced and strengthened by her visit, though still the thought lay heavy at her heart, that in one day more Humphrey Atherstone would have left the neighbourhood again, and that it was very likely he might not return till after she had once more gone abroad with her aunt.

It was the Tuesday evening after the wedding, and from Dr. Burton's statement Una knew that Monday had been fixed for Atherstone's departure, she therefore felt sure that there was no risk of her encountering him if she took her solitary walk, after her aunt had retired, in the direction of the Eagles' Nest. She had a great desire to go to that spot once again, where first she had learnt that Atherstone loved her, and it was much more accessible now than it had been then; for in the happy days when Humphrey believed that Una would have her home at the Abbey, he had taken a pleasure in having a safe and easy path excavated in the steep side of the cliff, in order that she might go without fatigue or difficulty to the ruin which had so pleased her fancy. Broad and smooth as the path was now, however, Una ascended it that evening with slow and weary feet, as if the effort to toil up to the summit of the cliff were almost too much for her strength; but it was the weight of memory on her heart, not physical weakness, that retarded her lingering steps, and bowed her young head as with a load of years.

There was not a greater contrast between the

* It may perhaps interest our readers to know that "Lizzie" represents a real character.

fresh sunny morning on which she had first ascended to the Eagles' Nest, and the shades of the grey still evening that lay around her at this hour, than there was between the bright hopefulness of her spirit at that time, and the deep immovable sadness which enveloped it now; and she felt the change with all that unappeasable longing for the happy vanished past, which is one of the sorest trials of those who know too surely that they must walk through gloom and shadows to their final rest.

At length Una reached the ruin; she glanced into the dark chamber where the penitent's grave lay at the foot of the cross, and where once she had seen the tall form of his descendant emerging slowly from the gloom, and then she turned, and resting her arms on the rough stone parapet outside the building, she looked down with a long earnest gaze on the wide-spreading landscape below, of which Atherstone Abbey, with its fine woods and its massive keep, was the most prominent. As she stood there, a breath from the fresh evening breeze passing across her face touched some link in the chain of association, and carried her back with a vivid remembrance to the day when, on her homeward voyage, she leant over the side of the vessel, and heard her father's voice arousing her from the thoughts that were engrossing her, to bid her tell him what they were; she recollected how she told him of the warning she had received, that she had one life only given her, and how in the proud self-confidence of her untried youth she had written out a record of what she meant that life to be, wherewith she might test the constancy of her resolution when the term of her existence drew to its close.

She was very young still, but she felt as if the hour at which she had now arrived, might have been a fitting one wherein to read the record of her "vaulting ambition," as her father had called it, and compare it with her real actions in the years that had elapsed since then; for it seemed to her that life, as she had understood it in those early days, was over for her in actual fact—the life of hope and enjoyment and proud aspiration—and all that remained to her while still she breathed, was a patient schooling of her soul to make it fit for entrance to a happier world.

"Blameless and noble," that was the stamp she had affirmed she would give to her career on earth; but she could see now, as she looked back to that time of arrogance and inexperience, that her ambition had not been to live for the glory of God, but to glorify herself, and that, trusting in her own strength only, she had started on the course she had meant to be so bright and fair. Therefore had she failed; at the first touch of an earthly love, which had lured her with the hope of nothing higher than mere personal happiness, she had cast her great aspirations to the winds, and had forgotten all but the impulse to obey her heart's overweening affection, till she had not feared to sacrifice to it even honour and truth; that love and the hopes it inspired had indeed been taken from her, but she had made no voluntary surrender of it for conscience' sake, and if of late she had striven to walk with purer aims and heaven-directed eyes, it was not her own merit, but because of the afterglow shed on her path by the light of a pure life that had set in glory.

She bent her head down over her clasped hands, as she acknowledged to herself, in all humility, the total failure of her high ambition, and breathed an earnest prayer that she might be able, for the time, that still remained to her on earth, to serve her God in meekness and self-distrust, striving with tender charity to bring to her fellow-creatures some of the happiness she no longer hoped to win for herself. And even as Una Dysart thus resigned herself to look no more for enjoyment or even hope in her mortal life, there came the sound of a footfall on her startled ear.

(To be concluded.)

JANE CARTER.

CHAPTER I.

THE little room behind the shop. What had it not seen, and what stories might it not have told?

Just now in it sat Jane Carter, all alone, having her breakfast. She had only bread-and-butter, and coffee without milk or sugar, but it was not that which troubled her.

It was summer time. The small town in which she lived was a bright, busy, bustling place, but none of its business or bustle seemed to fall in her way. She was cheerful enough in general, and hopeful enough, but this morning her courage failed her, and tears of quiet despair fell into the cup of coffee, as she lifted it to her lips.

She remembered the days gone by, when she had looked upon it as a light and easy thing to make a good business out of a bad one; and when, nothing doubting—lone friendless orphan though she was—she had taken the small badly-situated draper's shop upon her own hands. How high her hopes had been! How low they had fallen!

She was persevering, but her perseverance seemed now to have altogether forsaken her.

"I have a good mind to give it up," mused she, "and be a servant, or anything so that I might only be able to get my own living honestly."

She washed the one cup and saucer, and replaced it in the little corner cupboard, and presently went up to her room.

She felt quite inclined to sit down and cry (small fear of any customer coming in to disturb her, she knew), but what good would it have done?

"It is one of my dark days, I suppose," she thought, "when, try as I will, nothing goes right... But then God sends the dark days, as well as the bright ones, and they are all good, if we could but think so. Perhaps they are meant to make us more patient. The Bible says, 'tribulation worketh patience.' And perhaps this one might even be sent to help me in my business. When I am miserable, I can always think; but when I am happy, no thoughts come into my head. Why should I not think my way through all the things that worry me, big and little. There is always a way out of every difficulty, if one could only see it. But that is it. The secret of starting a really good business in this very shop might be at this moment before my eyes, and I be blind to it."

Tap, tap, tap! on the counter in the little shop below. She ran down.

"Ha'penny post card, please," said a ragged little urchin, holding out his halfpenny.

"Don't keep them, my dear," answered Jane, gently; "you can get them at Garrett's, three doors from this."

She went up-stairs again. Such a "customer, and no customer," was no novelty.

She stood for a long time at her window, without word or movement. Her heart was rising in silent reverent prayer to the kind God and Father, who knows all His children's difficulties and perplexities before they tell Him, but who, nevertheless, likes to have them tell Him. He could and would help her, she knew, and at the right time, and in the right way; and, till then, she prayed for patience and submission.

Tap, tap, tap! again on the counter below. Once more she went down.

Another small child, for a pennyworth of elastic and a reel of cotton—articles soon served—and in a minute the shop was empty again.

Thus the slow day passed.

The sun was setting. She stood sadly at her shop-window. Presently—absently, and with a sigh—she began to re-arrange it a little. Time often hung heavily on her hands, and sometimes she scarcely knew how to employ herself.

Collars, and cuffs, and ties, plenty of them; and neat enough, and pretty enough, she thought; but nobody else appeared to think so, or at any rate nobody bought them.

Then there were some tolerably fresh-looking pieces of cotton print—blue, pink, and lilac—besides plenty of gloves, handkerchiefs, and stockings, and common laces, and cheap artificial flowers. And with all these things she made the window look as well as she knew how; but still folks as they passed only gave a cursory glance, and never came in to buy.

By-and-by she turned away from the window, and began taking stock of the rest of the articles in the shop, not with her hands, but with her eyes and mind. Not getting low, exactly, but old-fashioned and faded. And she had no money to buy more.

Plenty of small drawers, stocked with needles, cottons, hooks, tapes, buttons, &c. Plenty of cardboard boxes, most of them filled with one thing or another. Plenty of shelves, on which lay dowdy dress-pieces, rolls of flannel, more cotton prints, calicoes, linings, &c. &c. Two drawers of bright ribbons, too, she had, which seldom enough saw the light.

"It is odd," thought Jane, as she ended her survey. "It isn't as if I had got a lot of things that nobody would be likely to want; and yet I take—sometimes not a shilling a day. It strikes me that I can't have the knack of showing things to the best advantage; and appearances have so much to do with a business. If I had blue stuffs, and red stuffs, and ribbons, and laces, littered and strewn all over the shop from floor to ceiling, I dare say people would begin to come in. But then I am afraid of getting the things spoilt for nothing. Still, 'Nothing venture, nothing have.' I almost think——"

She paused, and began pulling down from one of the shelves some cheap pieces of pink and brown delaine.

She had unfolded one piece, and was looking at the faded stripes across it, when in came another customer—this time a woman, with a baby in her arms.

"I want a sun-hat for baby, if you please," said she.

"Yes, ma'am," returned Jane, going to an odd corner, and rummaging out half a dozen or more. The woman chose one, paid two shillings for it, and departed. Jane felt pleased and thankful, and she turned once more to the delaine. But had some fairy touched it while she had been looking away? A plan for turning it to account seemed absolutely written all over it, on every tiny pink flower and ragged brown leaf. "Make it all up into babies' frocks," something seemed to whisper, "and sell them for what the material would cost, charging nothing for the work."

Jane was ever quick and sanguine and enthusiastic. She saw a mine of wealth before her in a moment that only wanted working. Her cheeks glowed, and her eyes sparkled, and she looked quite another being from the dull spiritless girl of a moment before.

"It is only threepence-halfpenny a yard," thought she; "and I shall be able to make perhaps a dozen little frocks out of it, and I'll sell them at sixpence-halfpenny each."

Planning and acting went hand-in-hand with Jane.

With eager fingers she took her scissors, there and then, and in a few minutes had cut out a little frock. She intended to make one, before cutting out more; and, getting needle and cotton, and a scrap of calico for body-lining, she began at once.

"It will draw custom," said she to herself, as she fitted and stitched away cleverly and industriously; "and I shall be selling out all my old-fashioned stock, and getting money to buy new. I'll make up everything in the shop, if that is all! and I'll hang up frocks and petticoats, and pinafores and aprons, of all sizes, everywhere!"

Faster and faster went her needle; and before bedtime that night she had made two small frocks, and, with great exultation, and not a little pride, she pinned to each a monster ticket, which said:—

ONLY 6½d.

"I'll have some more tickets," she said. "They catch the eye. I'll ticket everything. I wonder I never thought of that before!"

CHAPTER II.

ANOTHER day dawned. Jane was up with the first faint streak of light, to work with all her might, while the spur of her beautiful new idea was fresh upon her.

The little room behind the shop again, and breakfast-time once more! But what a different Jane Carter sat at the table now! No tears were in her eyes this morning. She had found her work; and how happy and bright she looked as her busy fingers flew over it so industriously, that she scarcely gave herself time to eat her breakfast!

By eight o'clock two more little frocks were made, and then she went to open the shop. The four new articles for sale were displayed very near the door, and Jane paid them particular attention, so far as watching went, all day long; but though a few looked at them, nobody bought one. But Jane was by no means discouraged. "I don't much mind," said she to herself, "if they don't begin to go till I have got the shop full."

And for the rest of that day, and all the next, needle and scissors went to work with a marvellous quickness and dexterity and perseverance. And then the frocks were finished, and Jane made a pause.

It was evening. She shut her shop, and went out for a quiet walk, and thought over what was next to be done. At length she decided that she would use up a good-sized roll of not very saleable plaided flannel, which she knew lay ignominiously at the bottom of one of her lowest shelves. Rather a pretty plaid, nevertheless, Jane thought it was, of blue and pink and grey.

"It would look very well made up into boys' shirts," mused she; "but for some reason or other it has never gone off in the piece, and I dare say it never would." She turned to go home again; and that very night she cut up all the flannel, and found that it would make fifteen shirts.

She was seated in her shop, busily stitching away at them, the next morning, when a customer entered—a woman—and two children followed her.

"Look at the babies' frocks!" exclaimed one of the children. "But they're six shillings each; that is a lot of money!"

"Six pence," corrected the mother. "Sixpence-halfpenny, child! Why, I can't think how you can make them for the money!" and she turned to Jane, who was holding up a pair of thread gloves for her inspection.

"I didn't make them for money," and there was a twinkle in Jane Carter's eyes; "I made them to sell the stuff, and perhaps to get a little more custom than I have had."

"Oh, well, come, I've got a baby at home; I'll buy one. They are cheap enough, at any rate." And so the first frock was sold.

Sixpence-halfpenny! Jane took the money, and put it by in her work-box. She had been working very hard, and had just finished the second shirt, and was pinning the ticket to it, when, another customer coming in, she laid it down on the counter, and——

"What can I do for you, ma'am?" she asked, pleasantly, of the new comer.

"I want some calico. But are those flannel shirts for sale?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Fifteenpence each, are they? How cheap! I think I'll take both."

With great alacrity Jane rolled them up in paper, and, directly her customer was gone, sat down to make more.

"A half-a-crown," said she, "to put with the sixpence-halfpenny; that will make three shillings and a halfpenny."

The next day she sold another frock; and the shirts went off as fast as she could make them; and when they were all gone she had in her work-box £1 18s. 7d.

"Getting on!" she commented, exultingly. "And directly I have got five pounds I shall go to London, and lay every penny out upon new things. And then how much better I shall be able to make the shop look!"

As the shirts had sold so well, she determined to make some more, and took down a large roll of rather dingy-looking grey flannel for the purpose. It came on to rain—a soft steady summer rain—and not another customer entered the shop that day. Yet there sat Jane, with the door wide open, as busy as possible; and, looking at her happy face, one might have supposed that she had the best business in the town.

And all that afternoon and evening the gentle patter of the rain and the snip snip of her own scissors were the only sounds she heard. But she had no time to feel lonely; and before she left her work that night she had cut up all the flannel into sixteen shirts, and had made two.

They did not go off quite so quickly as the first; they were not so pretty. But Jane seemed scarcely to trouble herself about them. As soon as she had finished them she began a set of small pinafores. Next she made a dozen cheap fancy aprons; and then half a dozen tiny frocks, out of a remnant of light blue merino. And meanwhile her business did not stand still. She sold as well as worked; and her books told that just lately she had sold a very little more.

"Courage and perseverance!" thought she.

And when a customer entered, she put down her work, and got whatever was wanted in such a quick cheerful way, as could not fail to please. But her manner never even so much as hinted—"I want to make haste, and get to my work again." No: Jane had more tact than that, and genuine good-nature besides: and she waited upon each one in turn, with as much attention and patience as if she had had nothing else in the world to do.

And then her work! There it was, always in her hands, or on the counter beside her. Could any one help seeing that she was industrious? Could any one help looking at the work which seemed to interest her so much, and employ her so constantly? And after looking, would one not sometimes buy? And so she gained more than one new customer.

Summer passed away, and by that time Jane had got a little over five pounds in her work-box. And then she contrived to find a friend to "mind her shop;" and, light-footed and sanguine-hearted, she made the long-thought-of journey to London.

And, young and simple-minded as she was, what pleasure she found in the choice of so many pretty new things! And, when safe at home again, and all her treasures round her, what a pleasant employment it was to store them away, or arrange them in her window, or on her counter, to the very best advantage!

And how delighted was she, next day, with every passer-by who paused to look and admire, though ever so carelessly!

But while she watched her window she did not forget to work, and her work was still making up the old stock into articles of clothing. And then, little by little, these were sold; and, little by little, newer, and gayer, and more tasteful things made their appearance in Jane's shop. And by-and-by, too, hats and bonnets were to be seen in the little window. And millinery Jane found to be a much lighter and easier as well as a more lucrative employment than shirt or frock-making, yet she would not give up her first idea. And she began, too, to love her business as she had never done before; and then to make her shop as attractive as possible was no longer a task but a pleasure.

And the next thing was that Jane was obliged to take an apprentice. And after a while she bought a sewing-machine. And then, the amount of work which she contrived to get through astonished everybody. And soon her shop was literally full. The very sight of it was enough to draw custom. And it did draw custom. And whereas she had once often taken as little as a shilling a day, she now took on an average five pounds.

But let no one suppose that Jane worked on from morning till night and from week to week without rest or change. No: she was too sensible for that. She knew that to do her work well and with pleasure she needed recreation just as much as she needed food; and she took it. And many and many a pleasant evening she spent with the friends she made, and almost forgot that she had a shop at all. And then she went back to her little quiet home, and worked next day with equal zest and enjoyment.

* * * * * *

A third and last peep at the room behind the shop.

There sits Jane, five years older than when we first made her acquaintance. She has no lack of business now, but, on the contrary, just as much as ever she can manage. And the "dark day" with which we began was the turning-point in her fortunes.

She is thinking it all over now, as she pauses in her work for a moment, and sits, thoughtfully tapping with her thimble upon the table.

"How good God has been to me!" she murmured. "He saw me that day, and He sees me now. It was He who showed me a way out of my difficulties, just as He showed Hagar the well. How near it was to me all the time, and I could not see it!"

And then she looked up at her favourite text, as it hung over the mantelpiece, and in loving trust and thankfulness she repeated it over and over—

"Fear not, I will help thee!" C. R.

"ONE OF THE LUCKIEST FELLOWS IN THE WORLD."

A STORY FOR BOYS. IN TWO PARTS.

PART I.

"I DECLARE I never saw anything like it! he's first again!" exclaimed Bob Firmin, laughingly, as he met some school-mates, who were, like himself, going in the direction of the grammar-school.

"Who, Fisher?" asked George Belford, anxiously.

"Yes. Just like his luck! took all before him," said Bob, pushing back his cap from his forehead with an impetuous movement, as if it were too small for him, and looking at George Belford with an amused expression about the corners of his mouth, as he watched the effect of his communication upon his companion. A shade seemed to cross young Belford's face, but it passed away before he turned to Bob, and said, "Well, it's like his luck, as you say; it seems as if there was no chance for any one else as long as he remains in the school."

"He's one of the luckiest fellows in the world!" exclaimed another schoolfellow, joining in the conversation; and this seemed to be the opinion of every one of them, as they listened to this further proof of Fisher's good fortune.

"I don't know how he does it," exclaimed Bob; "he seems to take things so easy. I don't believe he worked a bit harder than any of us the whole of this term."

"Not harder than George, I'll be bound!" said another, looking at Belford with an approving glance; "all the fellows say you worked like a slave this half, and I know somebody who thought you were sure of the first place."

George Belford smiled, and grew crimson, as he thought of his sister Kate, who had helped him with her sympathy in his honest efforts to obtain the highest prize the school offered. Yes, Kate would feel this even more than he should, for somehow, she had made up her mind that such a resolute purpose as his could not fail to win its object, and she had set her heart upon seeing him the possessor of the scholarship that was to ease the burden of his education in such a pleasant way. Every boy in the school knew George Belford's history, and understood the peculiar sympathy which bound his sister to him. They all knew that George and Kate were orphans, and that they had been adopted by an uncle whose narrow income as curate of the parish church did not admit of very much charity or benevolence. Mr. Bevington, who was a bachelor, regarded them now as his own children, and every ambition of his future life began and ended in the happiness of these two young people. He considered it his duty to give George the best education the town afforded, and he was fortunate enough to get him into the old grammar-school, where in course of time he hoped to see him take a scholarship which would entitle him to be sent to one of the universities. This preliminary scholarship, about which the boys had been speaking, was of the value of twenty pounds, for two years, and it was generally understood that the boy who gained it would also gain the higher university one.

Ned Fisher, having gained the lesser prize, would therefore be sure to win the more valuable one, as he had won all the best prizes the school offered for nearly five years. "Fisher's luck" had become a proverb in the school; and the lad himself had, in course of years, come to believe that there was really something strange in his uniform good fortune. True, he had worked hard for every honour that he gained; but other boys had done likewise without an equal reward; and, to say the least of it, there was something pleasant in the thought of being able thus easily to distance every competitor. Some who knew Edward Fisher, had expressed a hope that he would not allow his success to spoil him, and such a hope was not without warrant, for Ned liked people to think that his victories were gained without effort; by some natural genius upon his part, which the other poor plodding scholars did not possess.

When the boys reached the door of the old grammar-school they found several others waiting there, glad to discuss the results of the examination with all comers; and whilst they were talking together, Ned Fisher himself came strolling up to them in a leisurely manner, as if victory sat lightly upon him.

Seeing George Belford, he came over and put out his hand. "Belford, I'm sorry you didn't win this time; although of course I couldn't help it, you know."

George's face betrayed his deep emotion. "Ned, you mustn't say that; you earned the scholarship like a man, and you deserve it. You are one of the luckiest fellows in the world!"

"I begin to think so myself," answered Ned, with a look of pleasure on his face.

"I may tell you, now it's all over, Ned, that I worked night and day to beat you," said George, with good-humoured candour.

"They told me you were working hard, and I quite believed it," replied Ned, laughing. And then a chorus of voices plied the victor with questions as to when he studied, and how, and what the secret of his success really was; but he put the questions aside with easy indifference, suggesting that he had not made any special exertion to win the scholarship, but that it had come to him in the ordinary course of events, as all his triumphs had.

XUM

Ned was undoubtedly possessed of great aptitude for learning; and the head-master of the school prophesied for him a brilliant career at college if he exhibited the same application there as he had always shown at school. He was a bright pleasant-looking lad, with curling brown hair, which was constantly falling over his eyes, and as constantly had to be flung back again. Somewhat headstrong and self-willed Ned was, and particularly fond of praise, which was not an uncommon enjoyment of late, because of his many victories.

It would be impossible to avoid noticing in his demeanour a conscious sense of his own superiority and good looks—a consciousness which had been more marked than ever of late, and which might mar his frank intelligent countenance if it were allowed to become pride. Even now, as he speaks to his companions, it is evident that his voice has a tone of authority in it, and that unconsciously he is looking down upon them from a point of vantage. Presently the boys turned towards the school-room, talking earnestly together as they walked in to their work; and no one could discover from George Belford's quiet manner that the loss of the prize for which he had worked so hard was any disappointment to him. Every boy in the school knew how hard he had worked, and perhaps some of them drew from it the conclusion that he was dull and stupid at his books—which was far from being the case. He had a weak point though, which caused him frequently to fail, even when he felt himself entitled to succeed. His was an exceedingly nervous temperament, which was not satisfied with doing the best that could be done, but was always fearful lest even the best efforts should prove failures at last. Poor George was in such a hurry to repay the unwearied kindness of his uncle, and so anxious to fulfil his sister's ambition, that at examination time his heart was in a flutter of excitement, and his nervousness caused him to forget much that in calmer moments he would have answered without a moment's consideration. The boys all felt for him.

"Fisher really doesn't want the scholarship," said Firmin; "it is'nt like Belford, who has'nt a father at his back to give him a college education, and who, I expect, must go without if he doesn't get it through the school."

(To be concluded.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

342. Show that the Saviour's revelations to His followers concerning His sufferings, death, and resurrection, gradually became clearer as he approached the end of His earthly life.

343. There are many promises in Scripture to private prayer. Quote two from one of the Gospels in reference to united prayer.

344. Both the prophet Isaiah and the Evangelist St. Luke used the word "key" metaphorically. Give chapter and verse.

345. Name the Evangelist in whose Gospel the words "the kingdom of heaven" are found, and state whether the expression is met with elsewhere in Scripture.

346. Both the prophet Jeremiah and the author of the Epistle of the Hebrews speak of the new covenant. Give the passages.

347. The word "church," which occurs twice in one verse of St. Matthew's eighteenth chapter, is found only in one other place throughout the Gospels. Where?

348. The Temple-tax, according to Exod. xxx. 13, was half a shekel. What was its amount after the Captivity?

349. What advice was given by Gamaliel respecting the apostles? Was his counsel followed?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 784.

328. "For they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord." (Prov. i. 29).

329. Acts xx. 28; 1 John iii. 16.

330. Gen. ix. 13, 14, 16; Ezek. i. 28; Rev. iv. 3; x. 1.

331. (1) Isa. viii. 20; (2) John v. 39; Acts xv. 11; (3) 1 Thess. ii. 13; Heb. iv. 12.

332. "The children of Israel did burn incense to it" (2 Kings xviii. 4), therefore Hezekiah "broke it in pieces."

333. John iii. 1—21; vii. 50; xix. 39.

A POET.

GOD filled the poet's brain with singing birds,
Fevered his soul with yearnings after fame,
Rained on his tongue the manna of sweet words,
The honey drops of song. The poet's name,
Deathless, he lived for: like king eagle, he Would heaven-ward soar with eye fixed on the sun,
And see the crown of immortality.

Halo his brow ere scarce life's morn was done.
The wild bird sun-ward soared—the critics' dart
Stayed the proud flight, and rent his mighty heart!
Or, like caged lark that on first morn of thrall,
Starts singing from its sleep to mount the skies,
Strikes 'gainst the prison bars, and in its fall,
Thrills its last note from broken heart—and dies!

M. RYAN.

(Drawn by C. GREEN)

ILLUSION.

A WHITE star burned and sparkled on high,
And fair was the light where it shone;
I turned to the spot where it hung in the sky—
The white star was gone!

A bright bird quivering sang on a tree,
Its ecstasy rang through the glade;
I paused, then drew nearer to listen and see—
The bright bird had fled!

A red rose bloomed in the light of the morn,
And sweet was the fragrance it spread;
I bent down to pluck it, and found but the thorn—
The red rose was shed!

I questioned in wonder and pain what it meant;
A phantasy born of the prime?
From the darkness a whispering answer was sent—
"These are only of Time." J. HUIE.

"UNTO YOU FIRST."

BY THE REV. ROBERT MAGUIRE, M.A., VICAR OF CLERKENWELL.

"Unto you first God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities."—Acts iii. 26.

THIS is part of one of the earliest utterances of the Gospel after the descent of the Spirit at Pentecost—the first crush of the grape of the new wine, gushing forth in all its earnestness and power. It is the second recorded essay of the apostles to fulfil their Lord's command to "preach the Gospel to every creature," with this limit to begin with—"To the Jew first"—"beginning at Jerusalem." The apostle of the circumcision here speaks to Jews; and his words, as above, suggest to us these two things—1, The priority of the offer of the Gospel to the Jews; and 2, The blessings and advantages thus offered to their acceptance.

I. The priority of the offer of the Gospel to the Jews.—Everything must have its beginning, and must commence somewhere. The Gospel Message, in the hands of the apostles, was to begin at Jerusalem. But why there? For this there were several reasons:—

1. The Gospel had already begun there. The land of Israel was the local focus of the ministry of the Messiah. We have only to recall the familiar names of Bethlehem, Nazareth, Galilee, Jerusalem, and Samaria, in order to recognise the association of all these places with the Life of Jesus. It was the dwellers in these places that had seen His mighty works, and heard His edifying words; and they were not to be left to the responsibility thus incurred, without some effort to save them. The measure of privilege is the measure of responsibility—"For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required" (Luke xii. 48). It was of their stock, too, that Christ came; and this circumstance, no doubt, largely "advantaged" the Jew. And in this Christ was an example to us, showing that our first great solicitude ought to be for our own kith and kindred. In a word, Canaan thus became the native home of Christianity; it was the cradle of the race, the appointed place of its first beginnings. In this, too, there was much of the genuineness and honesty of the Christian faith, that its first starting-point was in the place or places in which all these things had happened. It was no "cunningly devised fable," to be palmed off on distant lands; but where the witnesses lived, and the evidences and testimonies were everywhere to be found, there were the first promoters of the Gospel to inaugurate their work. And Jewish men were selected, and from Jewish places, to preach the first tidings to the Jewish people. Where else could such a message better or more appropriately begin?

2. And yet this only tends to suggest another question, the answer to which supplies our next reason. And why did all these things pertaining to Christ happen in that particular land? Why not in Arabia, or in India, or (as in the earlier days of Israel's history) in Egypt? Because in the land of Israel was the recognised Church of God of those days. The "two or three" were there; and there, accordingly, Christ was found (Matt. xviii. 10.) Nowhere else was God's name honoured; and in few other places was it even known. Thus it has ever been, and still is, that the Spirit of Christ is attracted to the place where His people are. In the divinely revealed religion of the Jew was the basis of the enlarged Christian faith; beginning there was but to build on a foundation already laid, and out of which the new revelation came. The constituted Church of Israel in those days, though sadly degenerated, was yet to "have the refusal" of the offer of the Gospel; or, what an old writer calls "the morning market of the Gospel."* And this in itself was a privilege; for surely, it is better to have the refusal of the morning market, than the refuse of the evening shambles. The purpose of God was, that if they refused, or after they had accepted, the Gospel, the next offer was to be made to the Gentiles—"To the Jew first, and also to the Greek;" or as in the ministerial labours of the Apostle Paul: in all the Gentile cities and towns, he first sought out his own countrymen, or resorted to their synagogue (if there was one), and then, after them, he resorted to the Gentiles—"It was necessary that the Word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye have put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (Acts xiii. 46).

* Manton.

3. A further reason for this priority of offer, "Unto you first," is found in the context. The Apostle had just been addressing his Jewish countrymen, as "the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers," &c. What more natural, then, than that the children should first be fed? The prophets of the Lord had foretold all these things; and, surely, the "children" of those prophets would naturally first have the offer of the blessings of fulfilment. They were also "the children of the covenant;" and God has been ever mindful of His covenant. And that covenant was, "And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed." And would it not be strange that other nations, yea, that "all nations," should be blessed in the promised "seed," and they themselves remain unblessed? Would the fountain refresh all lands, and yet its own immediate circle and surroundings be unrefreshed? Then, before that wide-spread and world-wide blessing had penetrated to distant lands, "To the Jew first," was to be the order of precedence. Be comforted, then, all ye covenant children of God—the offers of mercy are to you and to your children, and "unto you first." It is where Christ is, and where Christ is preached and worshipped, that the message of salvation is offered first, and longest, and most freely. It is the "two or three" faithful ones that bring Christ there, and keep Him there; and not merely for themselves, but for others also. Christ is there to bless, and that good purpose He is ever fulfilling. Day by day, and week by week, are some souls thus refreshed in the communion of saints, and in the congregation of His people. It is a grand and terrible mistake, when men keep outside the circle of this communion. Within, they are in the appointed place, where God has promised His Presence; they are in the midst of the full supply, and within reach of the offer of the first gifts of grace.

II. The blessings and advantages thus offered for acceptance.—These are expressed in the great purposes of the mission of Christ—"hath sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." And this is associated with the fact of Christ's resurrection—"God, having raised up His son Jesus, sent Him," &c. This expression (ἀναστήσας) does not, indeed, necessarily mean the Resurrection; for the very same word occurs in a preceding verse (22) of this chapter, and with a more general meaning—"A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up (ἀναστήσει) unto you of your brethren," &c.; and here the word means merely to provide a Saviour. Yet this would seem to be too general a meaning for the word as used by the Apostle in our text above—"having raised up His Son Jesus." He would most likely mean the Resurrection of the Lord. This was the great theme of the apostolic preaching; it was that freshly-developed fact which imparted the boldness, the triumphant boldness, to the apostolic body, and rallied them from the cowardice of other days. It was the chief testimony of their preaching, with all the unspeakable value that attached to that great event—"And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" (1 Cor. xv. 14). And in this more definite meaning, the same word is again used in the preceding chapter (Acts ii. 32)—"This Jesus hath God raised up (ἀνέστησεν), whereof we all are witnesses;" where allusion is evidently made to the Resurrection, and the personal testimony of the Apostles to the same.

At all events, the great purpose of Christ's mission was to be a Saviour, a full and complete Saviour; not merely a Helper, but a Saviour—"turning away every one of you from his iniquities." It was this great purpose that gave to Him the name of Jesus—"He shall save His people from their sins." It is this that makes that Name to be "above every name;" and causes it to have "in all things the pre-eminence."

But this must have fallen far below the wishes and the expectations of the Jews. They thought, and fondly hoped, that the Messiah would be a temporal king; they coveted to sit on His right hand or on His left; they hoped it was He that would "restore the kingdom to Israel," and make them princes in all lands. Their hope of the promise was that the Jew should become the dominant race, and take the place of the ancient monarchies of Babylon and Greece, and supplant the then hated sway of Imperial Rome. And yet, instead of all these fondled hopes, the Apostle makes the offer of simply spiritual blessings—the last thing the Jew was at all disposed to contemplate or care for—that the Messiah was to be sent to convert souls, to turn them from one thing to another thing, from one nature to another nature, from one service to another service.

And is there not room for such a change? Is there not essential need for such a Saviour? Man is fallen, and Christ is to lift him up; man is dead (spiritually), and Christ is to give him life; man is enslaved, and Christ is to deliver him. Accordingly, the Apostle says again, and in this very sermon, "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out" (ver. 19). And, answering to this, "having raised up His Son Jesus," is that other Scripture—"Him hath God exalted with His right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins" (Acts v. 31). The lifting up of Jesus lifts us up; His exaltation exalts us; the vantage ground of His glory is the rock of our strength; the leverage of His mighty arm, thus strong to save, draws us up out of the horrible pit, and delivers us from destruction.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

XIII.—WITH THE SICK.

THE memory of the pleasant summer holiday remains with many of us now that we have come back again to the duties of the work-a-day world, and it will be good for us all if the gentle thoughts which that time of enjoyment brought with it remain in our hearts, to brighten our daily lives by the influences that suggest a merciful and forbearing temper.

It is perhaps remarkable that few of the charitable institutions at places to which holiday-makers resort are to any commensurate extent benefited by the contributions of those visitors who, while they are engaged in pursuing their own pleasures, seldom give themselves time to think that as they have freely received so they should freely give. Considering that while we are engaged in the absorbing business of money-making, or in the exacting engagements of our daily calling, we can afford little time for the investigation of those claims which are made upon us to help the poor and the needy, it might not altogether detract from the higher enjoyment of a period of leisure if we devoted a few spare hours to inquiring what is being effected for the relief of suffering in any place wherein we take up our temporary abode.

With some such reflection as this I stand to-day on the spot which to ordinary Londoners is most thoroughly representative of the summer "outing" without which no true Cockney can feel that he is content—a spot, too, which has become for a large number of English men and women, and notably for a whole host of English children, the synonym for renewed health and strength—the head of Margate jetty.

It is a strange contrast, this moving crowd of people, with their bright dresses and gay ribbons fluttering in the breeze; the smiling faces of girls and women amidst a toss and tangle of sea-blown tresses; the green sparkle of the sea beneath the shining sky; the voices of sailors, the shrill laughter of boys and girls, coming from the sands below; the gleam of white sails; the flitting wings of fisher-birds; the gay tumult of the High Street; the traffic of the hucksters of shells and toys—a strange contrast to the scene which may be witnessed in and around that large building which we passed only yesterday as the Margate boat stood off from Birchington, and passengers began to collect coats and bags and umbrellas as they saw friends awaiting them on the landing-stage of this very jetty.

It seems a week ago; and just as these few hours seem to have separated us far from yesterday's work, and the routine of daily life, does the short distance along the High Street and past the railway station seem to separate us by an indefinite distance from the sickness and pain that is yet in reality so near. Even as we think of it in this way, the division is less marked, the contrast not so strange, for in that building Faith, Hope, and Charity find expression, and bring a cheerful radiance to those who need the care of skilful hands and the sympathy of loving hearts.

The name of the place is known all over England, for within its walls are assembled patients who are brought from the great towns of different shires, as well as from mighty London itself, that they may be healed of that dread malady, the most potent cure for which is to take them from the close and impure atmosphere of their crowded homes, and exchange the stifled breath of courts and alleys for the boundless æther of the sea.

For the building to visit which I am here to-day is the "Royal Sea-Bathing Infirmary, or National Hospital for the Scrofulous Poor, at Westbrook, near Margate," and there are at this moment 220 men, women, and children within its sheltering wards. Stay—let me be accurate. I said within its wards; but here, as I pass the gates and the unpretentious house of the resident surgeon to the broad sea front of the building, I note that under the protecting screen of the wall that bounds the wide space of grass-plot and gravel-paths a row of beds are placed, and in each of them a patient lies basking in the warm sunlit air; while a little band of convalescents saunter gently, some of them with the aid of crutch or stick, with the enjoyment of a sense of returning strength. If I mistake not, there are two or three "Bath chairs" crunching the gravel paths a little further on, and down below upon the space marked out and separated from the outer world upon the beach, the two bathing machines of the establishment are occupied by those for whom convalescence is growing into health.*

The full meaning of such a change can only be realised by those who know how terrible a disease scrofula becomes, not only in the deadly insidious form of consumption, but in the various deformities and distortions of the limbs of which it is the cause; and in those cases where, to the pain and depression of the disorder itself is added some terrible affection of the skin, which the sensitive patient knows can scarcely fail to be repulsive to those who witness it, unless, indeed, they have learnt to regard it only as a reason for deeper compassion and for more earnest consolation.

* This was written in the latter part of July of the present year.

Almost every form of the disorder is to be seen out here in the wide northern area of this inclusive building, which has long ago been bought and paid for, along with the three acres of freehold ground on which it stands. Of the deep sympathy with which it has been supported by those who early learned to take an interest in its beneficent work, the fountain which has been erected in the centre of the green to the memory of the late Rev. John Hodgson, one of its trustees, is a mute witness. Mr. Hodgson laboured earnestly to secure those casual interests which might be obtained from the vast number of persons who visit Margate every year. In order to make the most of small regular contributions, he appealed for "five shillings a year," and since his death in 1870 this fund has increased, so that last year nearly 6,000 subscribers had contributed £1,405 7s. 4d. Never was holiday charity more appropriately applied, as anybody who will visit the institution itself may witness in those long wards beyond the open passage, to which the card of Dr. Rowe, one of the three visiting surgeons, has directed me.

Since the first establishment of the institution, seventy-six years ago, when sixteen cases were treated as a beginning, nearly 29,000 patients, from London and all parts of the country, have received relief; and to-day the number in the institution (taking no account of a contingent of "out-patients") includes 42 men, 50 women, and 120 children, none of whom are local cases, but all from other parts of England, whence they come frequently from a long distance.

In each of the six wards, of which four are on the ground floor, there is a head-nurse and an assistant, with six helpers for the children's, and four for the adult department, beside the night nurses, who sit up in case of any emergency. There is accommodation for 250 sufferers and for the 40 nurses, attendants, and domestics required for the service of the hospital; so the 220 patients there now represent the approaching period when a new wing will have to be added, even if only the urgent cases are to be admitted.

Last year's list of occupants of the 250 beds shows a total of 721 patients, of whom 614 had been discharged in January of the present year, 399 being either cured or very greatly benefited, 171 decidedly benefited, and only 44 obviously uncured; a very large amount of actual gain to humanity, when we reflect on the conditions of the disease to remedy which the institution is devoted. If out of 721 cases 399 are either cured or have received such marked benefit as to render their ultimate cure highly probable, it is an achievement worthy of the earnest work of which it is the result, a contribution to beneficent efforts well worth the £7,966 which has necessarily been expended in the provision, not only of the appliances which give comfort and rest, but of the generous food and drink which, with the glorious air from the sea, is the medicine necessary to build up the feeble frames and renew the impoverished blood of those to whom meal-times come to be welcome events in the day instead of merely languid observances.

Down in the kitchen, with its great cooking range and its capacious boilers, there are evidences of that "full diet" which is characteristic of the place; and it is difficult to decide which are the most suggestive, the long row of covered japanned jugs which hang conveniently to the dresser-shelf and are used for the conveyance of "gravy," or the mighty milk-cans standing in a corner, ready to be taken away when the evening supply comes in from the Kentish dairies. Half a pound of cooked meat for dinner is the daily allowance for each man and for every boy over fourteen years of age, while women and girls receive six ounces, and children four ounces. Breakfast consists of coffee and bread-and-butter, varied in the afternoon by tea, and supper of bread and cheese for adults, and bread-and-butter for children. Roast and boiled meat is served on alternate days, with accompanying vegetables, and there are three "pudding days" for those who can manage this addition to the fare; while every man and woman may have a pint of porter, and each child a pint of table ale, at the discretion of the doctors. This, of course, represents the ordinary diet, in which specific differences are made for special cases where other or daintier food is required. Perhaps I should have said that this is the scale adopted in the refectory, a large airy room, to the long table in which the patients who are able to "get about" are now advancing with a cheerful premonition of dinner. There is no space to spare, and there are at present no funds to spend in additional building, so that this great airy refectory is used as chapel and assembly room. The Bread of Life, as well as the temporal bread, is distributed here; and those who would object to the necessity may either contribute to build another room, or may come and learn how every meal in such a place, and for such a cause as this, should become a sacrament. Many varieties of the forms taken by scrofulous disease may be seen here; and yet the hopeful looks, the cheerful influence of the bright summer weather, the green glimpses of the sea through doors and windows, and the fresh bracing air, impart to these sufferers an expressive lively briskness, which somehow removes the more painful impressions with which we might expect to witness such an assembly.

It is so perhaps in a still greater measure in these large airy wards, where children sit or lie upon the beds, some of them wholly or partially dressed, where the disease has produced only deformities under surgical treatment, or such forms of skin disease as affect the face. Of the latter there are some very severe and obstinate cases, and from these the unaccustomed visitor can scarcely help turning away, but often only to re-turn, and mark how cheerfully and with what a vivid alacrity the little patients move and play, and look with eager interest on all that is going on. For here—in the boys' ward—there is no repression of youthful spirits, so that they be kept within the bounds of moderate decorum, nor do the patients themselves seem to feel that they are objects of melancholy commiseration. To speak plainly, even the worst cases are not reminded that there are people who may be revolted at their affliction. Indeed I, who am tolerably accustomed to many experiences that might be strange to others, am rather taken aback by one little "case," whose face and limbs, though apparently healed, have been so deeply seamed and grooved by the disorder, which must have claimed him from babyhood, that he has evidently learned to regard himself as an important surgical specimen, and, on my approach to his bed, begins with deliberate satisfaction to divest himself of his stockings, in order to exhibit his legs. Hip and spinal disease are among the most frequent and often the most fatal forms of scrofula. One boy, with delicate and regular features, his fragile hand only just able to clasp in the fingers the small present I am permitted to offer him, shows the shadow of death upon his face. In his case the disorder has shown itself to be beyond medical, as it has already been beyond surgical aid, and his short hurried breathing denotes that before the summer days have been shortened by the autumn nights, and the leaves are lying brown and sere, he will be in a better and a surer home, and healed for evermore.

It will be a peaceful end, no doubt, and he will yet have strength enough to be taken home to die, where other than strangers' hands will minister to him at the last, but not more tenderly, it may be, than those that smooth his pillow to-day.

As we leave the boys' wards—clean, and bright, and fresh as they are—we encounter a cosy little party of juvenile convalescents, who are comfortably seated on the door-mat, engaged in a stupendous game of draughts.

There is more of beauty than deformity, more of life than of death, more perhaps of living eager interest than of sadness and sorrow to be seen here, after all; and this is particularly remarkable in the large-windowed spacious ward where the girls can look fairly out upon the gleaming sea. Properly enough, the room occupied by these young ladies has been made more ornamental than that of the boys. The walls are gay with coloured prints, and there are flowers, and a remarkably cheerful three-sided stove, which gives the place an air of comfort, though, of course, it has no fire in it. Then some of the girls (with those thoughtful delicate faces and large wistful inquiring eyes which are so often to be observed among lame people) are engaged in fancy needlework as they lie dressed upon the beds to which they are at present mostly confined, because of deformities of the feet or legs requiring surgical treatment. There is a library (which needs replenishing), from which patients are allowed to take books; and those children who are able to leave the wards, and are not suffering from illness, are taught daily by a schoolmaster and a schoolmistress, while a visiting chaplain is of course attached to the hospital.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART XXIV. CHRIST TRIUMPHANT, No. 2.

Chapters to be read—Luke xxiv.; John xx.; 1 Cor. xv. (parts of.)

INTRODUCTION. It may be interesting to the children to trace the different recorded appearances of Christ after His resurrection, from the Gospels, and 1 Cor. xv. One has already been noticed. To whom was that? From 1 Cor. xv. 5, and Luke xxiv. 34, it will be seen that the second appearance was to Peter. Why to him alone? The third (ver. 15), to the two disciples going to Emmaus; the fourth, to the disciples (without Thomas) on the same evening (John xx. 24); the fifth, to all the disciples, when Thomas was convinced (xx. 26); the sixth, to the five hundred brethren at once (1 Cor. xv. 6); the seventh, to James; the eighth, to some of the disciples at the Sea of Galilee, when Peter was restored to his apostolic office (John xxi.); the ninth, at His ascension from the Mount of Olives (Acts i. 11, 12); the tenth, and last, to St. Paul (Acts ix. 5; 1 Cor. xv. 8). Show from the above appearances how Christ was teaching the apostles previous to His departure. Peter was restored to his former position; James, commonly called "the Less," by special revelation prepared for his future work as Bishop of Jerusalem (Acts xv. 13, 19), the doubting Thomas convinced, and the apostles generally comforted and strengthened.

I. THE DISCIPLES AT EMMAUS. (Read Luke xxiv.

13—34). The story may be questioned out of the children. Picture the two friends starting on their walk from Jerusalem on the afternoon of Easter-day to their home at Emmaus, about seven miles distant. What was the name of one? (ver. 18); what have heard of his wife the same day early? (John xiv. 25). What would they naturally talk about? Picture the stranger joining them; remind how many at the time at first knew Him not. So these through all the walk. Probably some mysterious change passed over His countenance. How is His face described by Isaiah? (lii. 14). Would the look of pain and suffering be there still? Perhaps have seen a suffering child after death—calm and peaceful, hardly looks the same. So, apparently, with Christ in His resurrection-body. Notice how they referred to the third day (ver. 21). What had Christ said would happen on the third day? Still show how they had a kind of half idea that it might be true, from their account of the visits to the tomb. How did Christ answer them? What prophecies especially would He quote? Let the children name some in the books of Moses and the Prophets—e.g., of His sufferings (Gen. iii. 15; Ps. xxii. 1; Isa. liii. 6). His death (Num. xxi. 9; Isa. liii. 5, 9); His resurrection (Ps. xvi. 10). Show how the disciples, like other Jews, always expecting a deliverer from Romans (ver. 21). So Christ had to show Himself as deliverer from greater enemies. Who are they? Therefore He must suffer (ver. 26). Now describe the arrival at the country village. How would they feel after the long walk? Therefore they would have sympathy for a stranger going on further. What did they do? Picture out the scene at the house—the water for the strangers' feet, the simple meal, the two friends and Jesus reclining at the table. What feast was He renewing? What happened then? Why did the disciples return late at night to Jerusalem? Could not keep good news to themselves. Had left the apostles sad and despairing, must go back and cheer them.

II. Practical Lessons. (1) Christ known by the Scriptures. How did He convince the two disciples? Had they never heard the Scriptures read at least every Sabbath-day in the synagogue (Acts xiii. 27), still, had not realised the full meaning? So, too, the eunuch afterwards (Acts viii. 32). Show the importance of studying the Scriptures, to know more of God, of holiness, of heaven. (2) Christ known in His feast. Remind of the institution of the Lord's Supper. On what solemn night was it? Why was it ordained? In remembrance of what? Though these two were not apostles, still must have heard of the new feast. This only the second time. At once see who it is. So this feast always to lead to Him. (3) Christ made known to others. When hear good news, what do all like to do? The Gospel best of all news. What should we do? How can children tell others? What did Andrew do? (John i. 40, 41). So may bring children to school or church. Will then rejoice together in great day, when Christ meets us. When will that be?

Questions to be answered.

1. Name the different recorded appearances of Christ after His resurrection.
2. Show how His appearances were all with a purpose.
3. Give quotations from Moses and the prophets, as to Christ's sufferings and death.
4. How was Christ known to these two disciples?
5. Give three practical lessons from the story.
6. How can children make Christ known?

ONE LIFE ONLY.

BY F. M. P. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," ETC.

CHAPTER XLVI.

HUMPHREY ATHERSTONE had been obliged to postpone his journey for two days, on account of some business which affected the interests of one of his tenants; but he had now arranged to leave home the next morning for a considerable time; and on that same Tuesday evening he was pacing moodily to and fro on the terrace at the back of the Abbey, when he happened accidentally to cast a glance towards the path that led to the Eagles' Nest. Although at some distance, it was easy from the point where he stood to trace the zig-zag line the whole way to the ruin; and midway up the steep ascent he caught sight of the form that was ever before his eyes, in visions of the night and thoughts by day. His Una! his no more, but Una, to whom, faithless as she was, his heart clung with the passionate love that death alone could quench! And she was alone—not, as he had dreaded again to meet her, by the side of the man who was to be her husband, but alone as she had been that blissful morning in the irrevocable past, when he had met her by his ancestor's grave, and had not scrupled to let her see how she had won the love he then never meant to give to any upon earth.

The very next day he was to leave home for the purpose of avoiding her; but, with the inconsistency of human nature, he became possessed by an uncontrollable impulse to seize this unexpected opportunity of looking on her face once more, and hearing again the soft low voice whose tones had echoed in his heart unceasingly since last they fell upon his ear. The thought of that morning, when he had seen her at the Eagles' Nest with her sympathetic eyes, and tremulous lips faltering out their words of sweet compassion, brought back to him a flood of tender memories, which seemed to quench all the bitterness of spirit her desertion had caused him; and the wish rose up strong within him that they might part—since part they must—at least in peace and amity, and that she might know there would be none amongst those who might wish her happiness who would so intensely desire it as he from whom she had taken away all hope of it for himself so long as his life should last.

XUM

Atherstone could not have resisted the power of the impulse which goaded him to seek her now, even if he had wished it; but he did not so much as attempt it, for his mind was at once made up that he would see her then and there, where none could witness his anguish of farewell; and when he had told her how he should bless her to the end for the joys, sweet as they were brief, she once had given him, then he would turn away, peaceful and forgiving, to see her no more for ever.

Scarce was the decision made before Atherstone had leapt from the terrace where he stood, and was bounding over the fields that intervened between him and the cliff, at a pace which soon set his feet on the rocky path leading upwards to the ruin. The ascent that seemed so toilsome to Una's feebler frame was swiftly scaled by his quick firm steps, and in a very short space of time he was standing within a few paces of her, behind a tree. She did not see him; she was bending down on the rough parapet, her pretty head laid on her hands, and her soft brown hair escaping from beneath her hat and waving in the evening breeze. His heart seemed to leap out to her with passionate emotion; how could he ever bear to part with her? how was he to give her up to another man? He advanced a few steps. She heard him, started, lifted her head, and then her sweet face was turned towards him, with the brown eyes wild and startled as those of a frightened deer, and the parted lips, scarce consciously, uttering his name in accents of dismay. Sensitive and high-bred maiden as she was, the first thought that rose in Una's mind was the fear that he might think she had come there to seek him—she whom he had discarded; and the idea forced from her the words, ungracious indeed, after their long separation, with which she greeted him instantly.

"Mr. Atherstone! I thought you were gone to London."

"And wished it, no doubt," he answered, with a sad smile. "Do not be afraid, Miss Dysart, I shall be gone to-morrow, and then I shall vex the sight of your eyes no more; only, for the sake of that which has been between us, do not grudge me these last few minutes—the last for ever; I shall not misuse them, you may trust me so far."

She could not speak; it almost broke her heart to look upon that face, so beloved and so familiar, and to know she must meet him as a stranger, and that they were parted, she knew not wherefore, for she had never swerved one moment from her faithfulness to him. She stood before him trembling and bewildered, and he thought it was the consciousness of her inconstancy that made her droop like a culprit beneath his eyes.

His voice was very gentle when he spoke. "Miss Dysart, do not think I have come to make any complaint. I have no right to do so; I never was worthy of you, that I well know, even though you now understand all the difficulties of my former position, and the temptation to which I succumbed. Still, towards you I think I have not erred, for I loved you with all the strength of my being—so much so that for your sake I compromised my honour; and when you let me see that your heart had turned against me, justly perhaps, I only thought that I might try by all fair means to regain it. It was in that one hope I came home, and the first tidings that reached me on my own hearth-stone, were those which told me you had given your love and sought your happiness elsewhere. You were free to do so; I could claim no spoken promise from you, and now I do not come in bitterness, only to solace my agony by one last look—only to wish that you may have, with him whom you have preferred to me, all the joy, the peace, the brightness of existence I would have striven so hard to give you."

She had listened to all that he had said with a growing look of amazement, and almost of horror, on her face; and when at last he ceased and turned his head aside to conceal his agitation, she clasped her hands, half in entreaty, half in pain, and said in broken accents, "Mr. Atherstone, what do you mean? I do not understand. Of whom do you speak? What is it you believe me to have done?"

"You cannot misunderstand me, Miss Dysart," he said, almost haughtily; "you may not have announced your engagement to the world in general, perhaps, but I think it is due to me at least, that you should openly avow yourself to be Mr. Trafford's future wife."

"I Mr. Trafford's wife!" she exclaimed, with such a look of innocent surprise and bewilderment that Atherstone could not for a moment doubt its reality; "what can ever have made you imagine anything so impossible as that?"

"Is it conceivable then that it is not true, Una?" he could hardly articulate in his agitation.

"True! no, certainly not! neither he nor I ever thought of such a thing for a moment! he has been more like a father to me than anything else."

"But I was assured of it on all sides, and he himself as good as told me it was so."

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"Yours only and always."—p. 826.

"Impossible!" exclaimed Una, "you must have misunderstood him."

"He told me he was going to change his position, and that one person only shared the secret of his plans, and when I guessed your name he owned that it was you."

A smile broke over Una's face like the dawn of a new day of life, for the clouds were dispersing now from her horizon, that had so long been veiled in gloom.

"I can see how that mistake arose," she said, "and it's scarce a secret now. I am sure that I may tell you the truth. Mr. Trafford has accepted a colonial bishopric, and I knew that the offer of it had been made to him from Mr. Cuncliffe, whose large property lies in his future diocese, and who had reasons for not wishing the matter known for a time, and so he begged me not to mention it, and wished Mr. Trafford also to keep it secret."

"And you are not going with him as his wife?" said Atherstone, almost unable still to realise the truth.

"Oh no, he never dreamt of it, I am sure, and if he had, I could not——" she paused and faltered, but Atherstone's eyes implored her to go on, and in a scarce audible whisper she added, "I could not have given him my love."

"Oh, Una, was it—is it because your love was mine? Let there be no more concealments; no more mistakes between us; my whole life hangs upon your words; this is no moment for half truths or timid hesitations—speak—answer me plainly! Is your love mine?"

Then, clearly but very softly, the sweet voice answered, "Yours only and always," and she let her hands fall into his clinging grasp, while it seemed to them both as if in that moment the gates of some earthly Eden had opened wide to welcome them, and they had entered in.

After a little time of happiness, too great for words, Atherstone looked down on the face which was as bright now as it was sweet, with a loving smile.

"My Una, I know now that you are mine, and that might well be enough for me without seeking to disturb the ashes of a miserable dead past, but I want to understand my happiness, I cannot endure that even the shadow of a former doubt should linger with me. Tell me, when you sent me Miss Amherst's letter so coldly, without a word, was it not because you understood from its contents that I had wilfully wronged my cousin, and you felt constrained in consequence to separate your life from mine?"

"Oh no!" exclaimed Una, clinging closer to his hand; "so far from that, I had for your sake wronged your cousin no less than you did, for I kept back that letter many months, when I knew I ought to send it to you, because I could not bear that you should have the pain of learning the secret it contained, which I believed you did not know. It was only when Lilith Crichton's blessed death taught me that for a child of Christ it is happier far to die than to connive at evil or wrong of any kind, that I gathered courage to pierce my own heart by sending you such bitter tidings."

"But why did you do it in such cruel fashion, darling, without one word of sympathy or kindness?"

"Because you had left me without a word," she answered, softly, "and I thought perhaps you had left off loving me."

"As if that were possible!" he answered, fondly stroking her pretty hair.

"And I thought it still more," she whispered, "when you came back from Australia with all the perplexities and mysteries cleared up, having done justice to your uncle's son and won the world's esteem for your self-sacrifice, and still you never set foot within my home, and passed me like a stranger that miserable day when I saw you near the village, nor even so much as spoke to me when we met at the wedding."

"Because I believed you to be Trafford's future wife," he said, "and I was cruelly wounded, Una, wounded to the very soul, for I had retained a lingering hope that I might regain you, although when I left England I did not feel that it would be honourable to ask any promise from you in my uncertain position. I meant partially to have explained this to you, but you know how I was repelled from your house."

"Oh yes; I shall never forget the misery of those days!" said Una, shivering at the recollection.

"Well, it is all at an end now, thank Heaven!" said Atherstone; "and if we have both somewhat to repent of, my Una, we must try to make our future as fair and pure as I hope it will be bright."

"Just when you came up," she said, pressing closer to him, "I was remembering how poor Miss Amherst told me to take warning by her fate, and ever to remember I had only one life to make either a blessing or a bane, and that I must take care I did not mar or waste it. At the time when she spoke to me thus, I was so self-confident, that I was resolved to make my whole existence blameless and useful, but I have failed, and fallen far even from my own undoubted standard of duty. Will you help me now, dear Humphrey, to spend the rest of my life in following steadily, so far as I can, in our Master's steps—the shining steps which the Light of the World left in their brightness to guide us still? for I have proved myself so weak that I must trust to you to lead me on aright."

"We will help each other, darling," he answered, drawing her closer to him; "for I must tell you that I too have resolved to make my future existence very different from the past. As I stood by my cousin's death-bed I determined that the rule of my own life henceforward should be only to 'do justice, and love mercy, and walk humbly with my God,' and I think that we have both of us learnt this great lesson, which we shall remember all our lives, that no combination of circumstances, however plausible, can justify for a single moment the smallest deviation from rectitude or from truth."

THE END.

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. B. P. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC.

III.—"THE LONGEST WAY ROUND IS THE SHORTEST WAY HOME."

PROVERBS have pre-eminently to do with every-day life, with its experiences and maxims and rules; indeed, they have for the most part taken their rise from such experiences. But they are often grounded upon abstract truth, and would be equally valuable as statements of truth, even though they had no experiences to adduce as proof of their correctness. And so it comes to pass that in many cases they stretch away far beyond mere human things, into those which are Divine.

The common proverb that "The longest way round is the shortest way home" has to do with the things of this world and the next. It is a daily life truth. And first of all let us inquire what the proverb means, and its place in common daily life.

It means that what appears at first sight to be the best way to do a thing, oftentimes is not. There is something very desirable to be done—getting home—and we are in a hurry to do it, as almost every man is to get home, and in our hurry we don't stop to think, but go ahead.

It means, too, that the visible and apparent must be corrected, and oftentimes must be sacrificed to be corrected. What we see impresses us much more than what we can only reason about, and it is a great triumph of reason when we can forego under its power what is under our very eyes.

It says, moreover, that many of the ends we have in view are not to be jumped at, and accomplished all in a moment, but that we must go through certain processes to attain to them, patiently, perseveringly, ploddingly, and human nature does not like that.

Indeed, this particular proverb is one that is not generally believed—at least, not so practically believed as to be acted on.

Certain phases of character take it in—cautious and perhaps somewhat phlegmatic people; but most people are too eager, too much on the surface, too impatient, to turn it to practical account.

Now, how does this truth meet us in daily life? Here are two school-boys, who are being educated at the same school, who are intended for the same business, in the same mercantile house, and they are now engaged on the self-same task. Their present object is to get a sum done—until that sum is done they cannot go to play; and the worst of it is, it is a new rule, and the sun is shining provokingly, and altogether it would be delightful if only they could see their way to the end of it.

"Now, Joe," cries one to the other, "I'll not stop at this all day!" And with a handful of marbles he bribes a boy in a higher form to do the sum; it is shown up, it is all right, and away in the sunshine runs Tom Jenkins, laughing at slow Joe as he plods along, determined, however, to work the matter out for himself. It is an hour after Tom's release that Joe finds himself honestly able to go out; but when he does get away it is with a light heart; he knows he has done his duty; he has ten times more enjoyment than his companion; he has the consciousness of duty fulfilled, of having been honest, of having a right to his play. Pass on four or five years. Many a trouble has Tom Jenkins had from that short cut he took with the sum. He has always to go bungling along from not perfectly understanding that rule; more than once he was kept in an hour for his arithmetic; and where will it end? Pass on ten years more, and at eight o'clock in the evening you see a poor clerk drudging away at a whole wilderness of figures; that is Tom, tried and found wanting, and doomed to remain a clerk to the end of his days; and at the very same hour you may see Mr. Joseph Burgon sitting at a meat-tea with his young wife, and telling her that his share of the profits this year as junior partner in the house of Burkit, Johnson, and Burgon, will be £900. It was a long way round that beautiful summer afternoon with that tough sum, but Joseph Burgon plodded all through it, and has come out well at the end.

The road certainly does make a long round of it from Farmer Thompson's homestead to the market-town of Astonhope, and it is very provoking to have to cart produce some five miles, when by going across country the place can be reached by a lane only two miles long. But there are weighty reasons for that road, and weighty ones against that lane. The ground about Farmer Thompson's, though splendid for grazing, is rather boggy and marshy, and very undependable as to soundness of bottom, especially in the winter time. The engineer who made that road had no less than twenty men with him, poking and raking, to find the firmest bottom. No one knows all this better than Farmer Thompson's son William. He has been to Astonhope with a wagon-load of wheat, and, having gone round the regular road, has sped well. The wheat is sold, and Will has to bring back in the wagon the week's groceries, and a cask of beer, and a barrel of oil, and a sack of flour, and a new suit of clothes for his father; there is, moreover, a band-box containing a new bonnet for one Jenny Ray, who looks well in Will's eyes at all times, and who he thinks will look especially well in this bonnet. Jenny lives about half a mile from Will's house, on the short-cut road; and now he thinks the wagon is light, and he may venture across country, and by so doing he will have the advantage of delivering the bonnet and seeing Jenny a little sooner. Alas, he came to grief! With great care, and with many escapes, the young man got to pretty nearly opposite Jenny Ray's door; and even now he was not much the gainer in the way of time; for what with the time consumed in taking care, instead of going ahead, and in extricating himself from one rut and another, he might have been nearly home by this. But the worst has to come. Snap goes the axle, close to Jenny's house, as Will is driving the wagon through quite a pond of water. Down rolls Will in the mud; out comes Jenny to laugh at Will for the ridiculous plight he is in, and then to scold him for the loss of her bonnet. The ale is spilled, the oil floats out on the top of the black water, the wheat is soaked, the groceries are spoiled, the farmer's clothes are done for. It is a week from that very day that the remnants of the wagon are brought home; it is a fortnight before the vehicle is put together again; Jenny and Will never make up that day's falling out; and altogether it forms a very pretty illustration of the proverb that "The longest way round is the shortest way home."

Nothing is ever eventually gained by shirking, or ignoring truth. What is, is; and no hiding of ourselves from the truth, or of the truth from ourselves, will ever prevent its being otherwise. The longest way round is the longest way by perhaps one, two, or twenty miles, as the case may be, but it is the shortest in the end. In sailing to and from Australia, I had an example of this. Any one looking at our course on the map would have said we were going altogether out of our way; and it is true we sailed over a greater number of miles than was apparently necessary, but we gained many days in time; for we caught certain winds which were known to be found in certain latitudes, and sailed ten miles in an hour where we should not have sailed two on the short cut; and so we found the proverb true that, "The longest way round was the shortest way home."

We must say "This is 'a long way round,' but it is one with a purpose, and I am travelling on it because I know it will be the quickest way of carrying out my design in the end."

We must believe in the long and short of the matter, the long way round, and the short way. And if we do, see how it will act.

A thorough belief in the truth of this proverb will make us patient. Patience is, in general, a necessary ingredient for success. An act of impatience will spoil whole months, or even years, of work. But we shall be patient if we are certain that we are on the right road; and that the end of the road, however round-about it may go, is the goal to which we want to attain.

It will make us hopeful. A down-spirited man has little or no energy for his work, and if he sees no end to his toil, he is likely to faint by the way. But when we have an end to our labour practically, though not actually, in view, we shall be cheery; we know that "long looked-for" will "come at last;" the very energy which this will infuse into us will help us to get over the ground of the long round-about way, and bring us to our goal far sooner than we should have reached it had we plodded along without going to our work with a will.

There will be ever so much more diligence too. No one cares to work for what has no end—to go round and round, like a horse in a mill. Let us say "Home, home—an end—on our way to it, and that the shortest way too;" and then we shall be a man to our work.

And now to look at the spiritual side of this proverb: we can see many points in which it is a true saying as regards the higher matters of our spiritual interest.

The longest way round is with God very often the shortest way to accomplish His designs. All Nature is full of processes which are round-aboats. Let us take a short cut to open out a bud into a flower—a little picking and unfolding with our fingers, no matter how carefully done, will leave us nothing but the wreck and ruin of what might have been beautiful and perfect if only we had let it go through God's processes in God's way and God's time. See what a round-about way the child has to travel before he gets the strength or wisdom of a man; what a round-about way the fruit has come to be ripe and mellow—passing through bud, and hard acidity, and hanging for many a day upon the wall apparently red and ripe but really hard and unfit for use. Winds and sun and time mellow it at last, by the processes of God.

And so God is continually leading His people by what may seem to them long ways round; but they are ever with the view of bringing them most safely, most surely, and most quickly too, Home.

"What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter," is the voice which we are now often called upon to hear, and to act upon in simple belief.

God leads us in ways which we know not of, but He knows all about them; and if only we be sure that He is leading us by the hand, we may be sure that there can be no mistake. He knows where He is taking us to. He, who has made our home, knows where it is, and the best way to it; and there is no necessity for our knowing the path, if He does. We are often presumptuous in wanting to know too much, just as on the other hand we are often slothful in caring only to know too little; but God will not give an account of His matters; very often all He will say to us is: "That is the road I have appointed for thee; day by day travel patiently thereon."

When we seem to be set providentially upon a path which we cannot understand, let us believe that it has a blessed ending, and that the God who has set us on it knows all the circumstances of the way. The child need not understand all about the road he is travelling if his father does; we need not know all about this dispensation and that, if our Father does. If we can fall back on a real knowledge of what God is, and of our connection with Him, we shall not be confounded by any intricacies of our road.

When the time comes for a Christian to die, and he looks back upon the experiences of perhaps a long and chequered life, he will say: "He hath led me forth by the right way, that I might come to a city of habitation" (Ps. cvii. 7). Perhaps in eternity we shall see whither our own short cuts would have led us—how some of them terminated suddenly in the precipice or morass; how others would have fixed our feet in miry clay or cut them with pointed stones; how others had dwelling by their road-side enemies able either to allure or force us on to ruin. Then we shall see that the same God led us that led the Israelites of old, and with the same consideration and care. "And it came to pass, when Pharaoh had let the people go, that God led them not through the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near; for God said, Lest peradventure the people repent when they see war, and they return to Egypt. But God led the people about, through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea" (Exod. xiii. 17, 18).

That was a long way round appointed in mercy, but there was another, lasting for forty years, which the Israelites brought upon themselves in judgment. Let us beware of bringing upon ourselves these "long ways round"—full of sorrow, even though manna be given to us to sustain our life.

And now as to God's dealing with us in our acquisition of character and being made holy: Is there a long way round in these? Very often—so often as to warrant our saying generally there is. Characters are formed as fruits are developed and ripened—by processes.

No doubt there are times when some great sorrow, or some extraordinary circumstances into which a man is thrown, seem to form his character at once; at least, to form it in some points which, under ordinary circumstances, might have taken a long time. But these are exceptional cases; in a general way, it is by many long ways round that character is formed. The patient man has had to bear many a long day's trial; the humble man has had to pass through many a humiliation; the heavenly-minded has had to go through many earth-weanings; the faithful man has had to grope in darkness for many days, when neither sun nor moon, nor stars appeared. Short cuts might have made surface characters, but the long way round has brought to heaven men fitted for eternity.

Bearing this in mind, we may be very hopeful for ourselves, very hopeful for and patient with others. We are not deserted of the Spirit of God because we are not slaying every enemy at a stroke. The walls of Jericho were compassed once a day for six days, and on the seventh day, seven times; then, and not till then, was the long blast with the horn to be given; not till then were the people allowed to shout; but the long way round was the shortest way in the end, for then the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they took the city (Josh. vi. 20).

We are very apt to despond about ourselves or others, if we do not see quick progress; but even failures may be round-about ways to success, and though real in themselves, be only apparent as regards the great result. We often rise from our failures far stronger than we were before; and they have done for us what no precept could have accomplished.

Let this teach us patience with others, and with ourselves too. God is patient with us; then let us be patient with ourselves—not tolerant of evil, but patient and hopeful in our conflict with it.

Everywhere we turn we are met with mystery—with the unknown; every day we see that it is not safe always to judge by the seeing of the eye, and the hearing of the ear. Let the One who has made our home for us, eternal in the heavens, be the One to guide us thither how He will. It is not for us to know the times, or seasons, or paths, which the Father keeps in His own power. Let us put our hand humbly but confidingly in His, assured that if He lead us so, even "The longest way round is the shortest way home."

"ONE OF THE LUCKIEST FELLOWS IN THE WORLD."

A STORY FOR BOYS. IN TWO PARTS.

PART II.

BUT commiseration and sympathy would not help George; and he went home that day with lingering steps and a heavy heart, for he knew Kate would be looking for his coming, and eager to have her hopes confirmed. As he turned the corner of the street, he caught sight of her fair young face, as she stood by the gate of their humble residence, waiting. Seeing his rueful countenance, she ran towards him, and guessing in a moment the secret of his grief, she put her arm through his lovingly, and they walked back to the house together in silence. Then, when she had him all to herself in the hall, she put her arms about his neck, and kissed him. "Never mind, George, you'll win it yet!" she said.

"No, I don't think I ever shall!" answered George, looking and feeling very despondent indeed.

"Why should you say that, George? I never heard you talk so dismally before."

"I don't think there's the least chance for me as long as Fisher is at the school."

"Why not, pray?"

"He is such a lucky fellow; he seems to take every prize without the least trouble or work. There's no use in one killing oneself for nothing. I'll never be able to take any prize from him, though he doesn't study half as hard as I do."

"I don't know that, George!"

"He says he doesn't; at least, you can see by the way he talks of his studies that he takes things pretty easy," answered George.

Kate was too fond of her brother to be angry with him; but she felt very much grieved, and dreadfully disappointed at the result of the half-year's work, and George could not avoid seeing in her face that this was so. But when his uncle came in, and saw how matters stood, he tried to cheer the young people up.

"You are much too anxious to make money, George!" said Mr. Bevington, in his kind genial way, putting his hand affectionately upon George's shoulder, and looking down at him with a smile of sympathy and affectionate pride. "If you had only half the confidence that young Fisher has, I believe you'd be a fair match for the old Doctor himself," and at this allusion to the head-master, whose attainments were justly celebrated, George smiled in spite of himself.

"It isn't because Fisher has won the scholarship, uncle, but because all my work seems thrown away," said George, looking up at Mr. Bevington very gravely. "Fisher deserves his luck, and I must be content with my stupidity."

"No, no, my dear boy, don't talk in that foolish fashion. The moment I hear people talking of luck in such things, I begin to think they are only learning the alphabet of life. You don't suppose, George, that all these things happen by chance, do you?"

"No, not exactly that. I suppose if Fisher wasn't clever enough, he wouldn't be able to win so many prizes," replied George, anxious to deal justly by his companion's merits.

"And the very worst mistake that Fisher or any other boy ever made was to suppose that he was what is called 'lucky.' The true secret of all success is industry, and depend upon it, that will come to the front at last."

"But some fellows are naturally quicker than others, uncle, you know."

"I know that, George. There will always be such differences. But bear this in mind, 'Every good gift is from above,' and God, who gives, will do with us, who receive at His hands, just what He knows is best. Our duty is to work, as in His sight, and leave the success or the failure with Him."

George was not at all satisfied with this explanation, although it aroused his interest.

"But, uncle, fellows must feel nervous and anxious; at least, I know I do—dreadfully!"

"I am sure you do, George, and perhaps that may be the cause of your failure sometimes."

"I felt this exam. as if everything I had ever learned had gone clean out of my mind; my papers must have been disgraceful."

"You were too anxious about the results, my boy. You must learn to leave them with Him," and Mr. Bevington glanced upward; "and if your Father in heaven means you for other work, He will withhold from you what most you desire now, in order that He may show you hereafter that His way is the best."

There was something in the earnestness of Mr. Bevington's voice and manner that made George remember a story he had once heard of his uncle's early life; how the brave-hearted Christian minister had relinquished his ambitions for himself, that he might fulfil the charge of rearing and educating the two orphan children left him by his sister when she died.

"I am sure uncle is right, George," said Kate, putting her arm about her brother's neck; "but he's never wrong in anything he says, I believe."

Mr. Bevington smiled.

"Then I must be lucky, Kate," he said, "in spite of all I have said to the contrary."

Nothing short of a warm embrace and a hearty kiss would be sufficient punishment for such wilful irony, and Kate administered her correction with such zeal and energy, that Mr. Bevington had to take refuge in his study, laughingly declaring himself penitent.

And so George bore his defeat, trying bravely to continue the same industry in his studies as he had always done, and endeavouring to drive the thought of luck from his mind as something unworthy of his better knowledge. Terms rolled by, and holidays after holidays became realities, and then passed into pleasant memories, and still Fisher seemed to have the old power of holding the first place in the school against all comers. Latterly no one had attempted to question his success in the final examination that would determine his right to go to the university; indeed, it would have been considered presumption upon any one's part to contest it with him now. He knew his own chance of success to be good, and he made little or no effort to prepare for the forthcoming examination. Some time before the day appointed, George Belford went up to him, and said, "Ned, I'm going in for this examination, and you won't mind my telling you that I've worked hard. Uncle thought it would be only right to mention so much to you."

"All right, old fellow," answered Ned, good-humouredly, "you always have worked hard, you know."

The boys pitied poor George Belford, in his anxiety to succeed, but no boy in the school had the least doubt as to the result. "Belford hasn't the ghost of a chance," was all that Bob Firmin said, but it expressed the opinion of the entire school. The minister's household was full of anxiety as the days of the contest drew near, and Kate, no longer certain of her brother's victory, but hoping in her heart that the prize would be won at last, watched George anxiously from day to day, as he worked on perseveringly at his books. Two days before the examination began, he came into the parlour, and flinging himself down wearily on the sofa, said, "I shall not look at a book again until it's all over!"

"George! why not?" inquired Kate, in alarm.

"Because I have done my very best, and, come what may, I am not afraid."

Kate was speechless, but thankful and glad.

Four days afterwards the successful candidate was proclaimed before the whole school. The old Doctor made a little speech, and then told the breathless scholars that the fortunate winner of the scholarship was George Belford. For a moment or so the boys seemed stunned; and then there rose such a ringing cheer as had not been heard within the walls for many years. Pale and trembling, Ned Fisher came over to where George sat, and took his hand.

"I'll not listen to any more flattery about my being the luckiest fellow in the world, George; you've beaten me, and I honour you for it, and, more than that, you have taught me a valuable lesson. Depend upon it, there's no such thing as luck, and I didn't work for this as I should have done."

George endeavoured to say a word in reply, but his head swam, and his tongue faltered. "Hold him up, Firmin!" exclaimed Ned, catching at the falling lad; for George, overcome by the new joy, had fainted in the arms of his friends. C. H.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 800.

334. Isa. lxi.

335. Prov. xiv. 15, 18. See Ps. xix. 7.

336. Thirty-three.

337. Barnabas (Acts iv. 34—37). See Numb. xviii. 20.

338. "Jesus answered and said, If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou me?" (John xviii. 23.)

339. See Matt. xiv. 22—33.

340. It descended from heaven (Lev. ix. 24); Nadab and Abihu (Lev. x. 1, 2).

341. With Christ. See Rom. x. 6—9.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 816.

342. John ii. 19; iii. 14; Matt. ix. 15; John vi. 51; Matt. xvi. 21; xx. 18; xxvi. 2.

343. Matt. xviii. 19, 20.

344. Isa. xxii. 22; Luke xi. 52.

345. The words occur only in St. Matthew's Gospel.

346. Jer. xxxi. 31; xxxii. 37; Heb. viii. 6; x. 16.

347. Matt. xvi. 18.

348. One-third of a shekel (Neh. x. 32).

349. "Let them alone, for if the work be of men, it will come to nought: but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it. And to him they agreed" (Acts v. 34—40).

"THE QUIVER" FUND FOR THE RELIEF OF THE FAMINE IN BENGAL.

SEVENTH AND FINAL LIST OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.

	£	s.	d.
Amount acknowledged to end of sixth list	2131	5	8
Miss M. O. Master, A. B. Ashburner, Low Hall, Broughton-in-Furness ..	0	11	0
Robert W. Boothman, 19, Mount Vernon Road, Liverpool	0	1	6
E. C. Fincham, Perth, near Launceston, Tasmania..	3	10	0
Mrs. Edwards, Rochestown, Cork, per K. A. Staveley	0	14	0
Thomas Henry Fitton, Hill-house, near Huddersfield	0	11	0
Misses Hettie and Jennie Hunter, Knaresborough	0	4	6
Mr. E. Rose, Wenhaston Vicarage, Halesworth, Suffolk	0	7	6
Carried forward £	2137	5	2

	£	s.	d.
Brought forward ..	2137	5	2
Miss Sophia Bagnall, Exhall, near Coventry	0	7	0
Mrs. E. Taplay, Stafford ..	0	11	6
G. Poultney, Longashton, Bristol	0	6	3
J. Garrick, 32, Esk Terrace, Whitby..	0	4	0
Amy and Clara Russell, York Cottage, Eden Grove, Holloway	0	5	0
Charles Edward Plumb, Wisbech	0	4	6
Isabella Gordon, Alvechurch, Worcestershire..	0	6	5
T. R. J. Fawkes, Wuhenford via Cotheridge near Worcester	0	5	0
S. M. G., Brighton	0	2	6
Carried forward £	2139	17	4

	£	s.	d.
Brought forward ..	2139	17	4
William Hood, 20, York Street, Manchester.. ..	1	0	0
John Smith, Rock Channel, Rye	0	1	6
A few gentlemen in Broughty Ferry	1	6	1
Some of the Curdworth Sunday-school children, per J Richardson	0	3	0
Florence E. Allen, Cotham, Bristol	0	1	9
R. T., Warwick	0	1	2
Cordelia Smith, 1, Grange Park, Thornton Heath, near Croydon	0	3	6
Thomas Barrett, Westbury, Tasmania	1	17	0
A. Hallam, Bowdon	0	3	6
Carried forward £	2144	14	10

	£	s.	d.
Brought forward ..	2144	14	10
Mary Bothia Innes, 88, Southampton Row	1	0	0
M. E. White, Blackheath (and donation)	0	8	6
A. Norman, 3, York Road, Fairfield, Wandsworth ..	0	3	6
James B Spence, Marwick School, Birsay by Stromness	0	13	6
Four Friends, Manchester ..	0	4	0
A few friends of S. Barnabas, Linslade	0	5	7
Thos. J. Gillespie, Park House, Newton-le-Willows	5	0	0
Sympathy, Deddington, Oxon	0	3	6
Mrs. Stockdale, Bridgefoot near Cockermouth	0	3	0
	£2152	16	5

Being subscriptions received to 24th August, 1874.

Further amounts received cannot be acknowledged, but will be transmitted direct to the Mansion House Fund.

In presenting to the readers of THE QUIVER the following Balance Sheet of THE QUIVER BENGAL FAMINE RELIEF FUND, the Editor cannot but express his gratification and thankfulness at the very generous response which has been made to his appeal.

BENGAL FAMINE RELIEF FUND BALANCE SHEET.

Cr.

	£	s.	d.
To Cassell, Petter & Galpin—Donation	50	0	0
,, Amounts received and acknowledged in first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh lists	2102	16	5
	£2152	16	5

	£	s.	d.
By Amount expended for Composing, Paper, Printing, and Distributing 330,000 Collecting Lists, and for Composing, Paper, Printing, and inserting in the Parts of the Quiver for April, May, and June, three lists of acknowledgments of £1,837 2*s.* 1*d.*, in nearly 2,500 amounts	215	5	0
,, Charge of Post Offices for cashing £415 Stamps	10	7	6
,, Postage of Letters and Petty Expenses	2	13	10
,, Amounts paid in to Mansion House Fund, as follow :—
1874.	£	s.	d.
5th March	100	0	0
9th March	100	0	0
13th March	200	0	0
17th March	100	0	0
18th March	100	0	0
20th March	100	0	0
24th March	100	0	0
27th March	100	0	0
1st April	100	0	0
8th April	100	0	0
16th April	100	0	0
20th April	100	0	0
27th April	100	0	0
5th May	100	0	0
19th May	100	0	0
5th June	100	0	0
6th July	100	0	0
5th August	100	0	0
24th August	24	10	1
	1924	10	1
	£2152	16	5

The Editor has much pleasure in announcing that in the next issue of THE QUIVER will be commenced a New Serial Story, of wide and especial interest, entitled "LOST IN THE WINNING," which will be Illustrated by Original Drawings from the pencil of Mr. F. BARNARD. Other new and interesting features have also been arranged for, and will appear in the course of 1874-5.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN, BELLE SAUVAGE WORKS, LONDON, E.C.
974

Winged Arrows:

BEING

THE EXTRA PART

OF

THE QUIVER.

CHRISTMAS, 1873.

CASSELL, PETTER, & GALPIN,
LONDON, PARIS, AND NEW YORK.

XUM

CONTENTS.

I. CHRISTMAS EVE AT STRANGEBURGH. By the Rev. W. B. Carpenter, M.A., Vicar of St. James's, Holloway. Illustrated by Edward Hughes 1

II. LIFE A TIME OF TRIAL. By His Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury 13

III. TROTTIE'S DREAM. By William Gilbert, Author of "Shirley Hall Asylum," &c. &c. Illustrated by Fred Barnard 16

IV. THE NOËLS OF SOUTH-WESTERN FRANCE, AND SPAIN 23

V. THE HOLLOW FARM: a Love Story. By George Barnett Smith, Author of "Alden of Aldenholme," &c. Illustrated by Charles Green 28

VI. BOB'S REFORMATION. By the Author of "The Troubles of Chatty and Molly," "The Dingy House at Kensington," &c. Illustrated by M. E. Edwards 33

VII. A BABY'S RATTLE. A Poem. By H. Savile Clarke. Illustrated by M. E. Edwards .. 42

VIII. THE DOVE-COLOURED SILK. By Louisa Crow, Author of "Spenser's Wife." 43

IX. MISSING. By the Author of "Better than Gold," &c. &c. 47

X. GRACE EDEN: a Story of Grenada. By William H. G. Kingston 50

XI. RUDOLF'S CASKET. By F. M. Owen, Author of "Soldier and Patriot." Illustrated by John Lawson 55

WINGED ARROWS:

BEING THE

EXTRA CHRISTMAS PART OF "THE QUIVER."

CHRISTMAS EVE AT STRANGEBURGH.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE GOLDBAGS AND THE PENTURBYS," "CAPTAIN BURSTWHISTLE'S TROUBLE," ETC.

INTRODUCTION.

THERE is not a prettier place among all the picturesque country towns of England than Strangeburgh. There you have the fascination of a moderately respectable antiquity — old-fashioned Elizabethan houses — blazoned and carved with strange figures, that hung cumbrous and crooked over the footpath of the High Street. There, too, you have houses dotted all over the town at varying and agreeable elevations, and yet no steep hills, but only gentle slopes, up which the horses familiar with the town trot with unabated speed. There, too, you may have pleasant country walks, now through leafy lanes, now through whole acres of hop-fields, and now through shady dells riven by softly-murmuring streams.

And all these you may have without foregoing the grosser conveniences of life; for you had a couple of posts a day, the London papers at your breakfast, not to speak of those weekly oracles—the Strangeburgh Mercury and the Strangeburgh Gazette. And then, talk of shops, where would you meet with a better-supplied, more commodious, or more richly ornamented shop than Mr. Lovesweet's, the grocer's, in the High Street, where two solemn-looking, life-sized mandarins—real China men too—gravely bowed their perpetual acknowledgments with the most indiscriminate good nature to the passers-by. No wonder that the enterprising Mr. Lovesweet sent to the inhabitants of Strangeburgh periodical neatly-folded circulars, delivered at your door with a rat-tat, disappointingly like a postman's, inquiring in tones of unfeigned surprise, and almost honest indignation, "Why go to London, when you can have Lovesweet's finest Pekoe for 2s. 8d., and Lovesweet's direct from Shanghai, per Blazing Bloomer, for 3s. 4d.?"

So you see that Strangeburgh was a very fortunate little town, and indeed none could say that it was not a very thriving place—"a town of rising importance," solemnly remarked old Mr. Prosy, a highly-respectable member of the ancient township. Of course I am only giving you the opinion of the residents—the nobility, clergy, gentry, and tradespeople of the little borough. To us, in all probability, Strangeburgh would have presented the appearance of a very ordinary provincial town, dull enough on most days, and only unpleasantly and unnecessarily busy every Thursday—the market-day of the surrounding district. I confess, however, to have a lurking prejudice in favour of Strangeburgh. Associations have more to do with our likes and dislikes than mere scenery, and there are several of my friends who are settled in Strangeburgh, and I have spent not a few happy hours in their company. I hope I may be able to introduce you to a few of them, and find that you, too, have taken a fancy to the dingy little borough.

CHAPTER I.—THE PARSON.

THE parish church clock had chimed through four quarters, and had then solemnly announced eleven o'clock. It was a majestic but somewhat grim-looking edifice, that old parish church. The good people of Strangeburgh exhibited it as one of their many show-places, and claimed for it an antiquity far greater than the archæologists would sanction. I am by no means certain whether the simple folk of Strangeburgh, who rested their belief on the tradition of their forefathers, were one whit more credulous than the astute literati of the Archæological and Palæontological Association, who rested their assertions on the curve of a gargoyle, or the angle of a tile, or the quality of a piece of mug; but however this may be, the verdict of all, both learned and unlearned, agreed to give the sacred edifice a very respectable antiquity. The interior formed another subject of contest; while some affirmed that it was a very comfortable and presentable place of worship, others asserted that it presented tokens of the most atrocious Vandalism—that it was utterly inconceivable that people in this enlightened nineteenth century (by the way, why do we call this an enlightened century? and would we not be wiser to leave our descendants the opportunity of the compliment?) should perpetrate such a violation of good taste as to block up the nave with pews. The church had been fitted up with modern oak pews some ten years before the date of our story.

I never meddled with these disputes; to me the church was a well-furnished and airy (draughty, perhaps) structure, in which it was perfectly possible for devout people to worship God.

Hard by the church stood one of those small, picturesque buildings, bearing the unmistakable impress of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners about it; very solidly built, very neatly designed, but—as that august body might not have been aware—a cramped, inconveniently arranged abode, very suitable for the young clergyman with one child, but would have been utterly inadequate to the requirements of the numberless little heads that crowd at the windows of some vicarages.

The clock had just struck eleven, and a lonely light was burning in the vicarage study window. Seated at his table was the vicar, painfully poring over disordered sheets of paper; various volumes, too, lay scattered over the table. The hours are passing quickly by, and soon the people will be trooping down the aisles and looking up to the minister. These friends of his, in their journey, will come to him, and he has nothing to set before them. "The hungry sheep look up and are not fed."

None but the minister who has experienced such a feeling can tell its poignancy; the feelings of utter inaptitude to the inevitable duty, when the householder goes to his treasury, and the things old look faded and tawdry, and the things new are not. No wonder then that the vicar, as he viewed the accumulated mass of preparation with despondent disappointment, looked weary and anxious.

"Nothing ready," he murmured, as he rose from the table and crossed over to the fireplace. "O my God! Help—help! Illumine my heart and understanding!" he cried, as he leaned over the mantelpiece. "It's incomprehensible," he soliloquised, "that a man entrusted with the most solemn trust—the duty of proclaiming to men their immortal destiny and their most splendid prospects, should yet be staggered for want of something to say. 'Take no thought how or what ye shall speak, for it shall be given you in that hour what ye shall speak.' I dare not trust to that; it was not given to me, but for the special occasion of a formal trial for religion's sake, and wonderfully was it made good in the clear and glowing utterances of the Galilean fishermen; but I dare not take it to myself; it would be offering to my God what cost me nothing."

God's providence often supplies our wants at the moment of our last extremity. Just at this moment the vicarage bell was rung, and a childish voice inquired for the vicar. Mr. Thornton stepped into the hall, and found there a miserably-clad, elf-like-looking creature; rich clusters of golden hair hung in cloudy abundance over her pale, precocious face; her bright eyes had a nervous, restless motion, but yet they fixed upon the clergyman's face with the look which would take no denial. Her papa was ill—dying; would he come and see him? He was stopping at Rumble's Houses.

It is a difficult point to determine at times whether a man is angry or not, and even a clergyman is angry at times; but really, knowing the gentleman most intimately, I could not undertake to say whether Mr. Thornton was even put out at the interruption; he was behindhand with his sermon; he had been much worried all day; his morning had been frittered away in signing pension papers for a perfect stream of military and naval men, and military and naval men's widows and sisters and cousins; his afternoon had been broken into by a number of sick visits; and in the evening he had been vainly endeavouring to recover the golden morning hours; to be interrupted again, to have to take a half-mile walk, and then to return to his unfinished and disordered sermon—well, if it was not enough to put a man out, it was an ample excuse for getting wrathful. But the vicar did not grow wrathful, nor do I believe did he feel so: there was a kind of lurking satisfaction that he had been once more interrupted. When we have long attempted something unsuccessfully, we sometimes welcome any circumstance which gives us the opportunity of ceasing, or at least relaxing our efforts.

"Has your father been long in Strangeburgh?"

"He only came yesterday," replied the little maid, as she hasted along at Mr. Thornton's side.

"What's your father's name?"

"I was told you would not know who we were, but it's Mr. Richard," said the child.

Mr. Thornton stopped in his walk, and looked his companion steadily in the face for a few moments. A doubt had crossed his mind: was this only a preconcerted plan to get him into an ill-conducted neighbourhood, and rob him? In the rambling chambers of the old-fashioned building now called Rumble's Houses such a scheme could be readily carried out; or were they only tempting him from home that they might rob his house? Something in his little comrade's face reassured him, and he continued his walk, thinking to himself, "I might as well have left my watch at home." And then there rose, like an angel's whisper to his heart, "There shall no evil happen to thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling."

They soon reached Rumble's Houses, which originally had been a sort of college; but the college had moved away, and an enterprising builder named Rumble had converted the college buildings into clumsy residences for the poor. The ancient college was built of quaint red brick. In the centre of the frontage was a large two-leaved doorway; on either side of this there stretched the houses, which were originally occupied by some officials connected with the foundation. Passing under the doorway, and through the width of the officers' residences, you found yourself in a quadrangle, surrounded by what are now moderately untidy, uncomfortable, tumble-down-looking houses. Once the open quadrangle was covered with soft, bright, well-kept grass, which sparkled radiantly beneath the blue sky and the balmy air; and jealously, too, did the porter watch lest any rude, invading feet should tread down the treasured turf. But now the blue sky was only seen now and then when a brisk wind blew a rent in the dull atmosphere of smoke which settled there; now, too, the sacred enclosure, so jealously guarded, was trampled down by every possible specimen of squalid infancy, and the bright, soft, mown grass had long since disappeared beneath the unwearied pacing of the myriad little feet, which had learnt lessons of sorrow and suffering, and had been taught lessons of crime within those venerable walls.

Had not the vicar been very well acquainted with the ins and outs, the stray turnings and sharp staircases of the old house, he would have lost himself in the labyrinth of rooms and passages; but as it was, after a good deal of stumbling and tumbling, he found himself in the doorway of one of the upper rooms. The room was beneath the roof, and the ceiling sloped down towards the square little window through which the minimum of light forced its way, after having suffered considerably in its efforts to pierce the murky atmosphere, the leaden gloom which always rested on Rumble's Houses. When I say that a small quantity of light made its way into the room, I must be understood as speaking of the daytime. When Mr. Thornton stood in the doorway he saw a crazily-furnished room, dimly pervaded by the feeble light of a dip candle. Alongside, or rather just underneath the window was a low, rickety bedstead, covered with a scant allowance of blanket and quilt. Vainly hoping to get warmth from the threadbare coverings, was the attenuated figure of a man—a young man, with soft brown hair clustering over a pallid, careworn face; anxiously watching beside him, leaning over him with careful fondness, was another young face—the worn and woe-begone face of his wife. In a distant corner of the room, quiet and sorrowful, sat two little children, with wonder and fear speaking from their wistful-looking faces.

The sound of Mr. Thornton's footsteps roused the wife from her absorbing care. Turning, she saw a kind face, and sympathising eyes.

"Ill?" he said; "what is it?"

"Nothing but exhaustion; utterly broken down with overwork."

"Have you seen a doctor?"

"No, sir—no; we only came in yesterday. My husband was hoping to hear of some situation as clerk, but——"

"I see," said Mr. Thornton, interrupting her; "but we must have a doctor first. Here, little woman," he said, turning to his guide, "you know the High Street? Well, on the left-hand side, about half-way up, is Dr. Oliver's. You can't mistake the house—it stands between two shops, and has a brass plate on the door. Ask him to come down here; tell him he will find the clergyman here."

Just at this moment the wearied man on the bed moaned out, "A lawyer—a lawyer."

Mr. Thornton looked inquiringly at the sick man's wife.

"Oh, sir!" she said, "he has been saying that all day long. He feels so ill, he says he will die; and he has a little money, about £30 a year, of his own; but if he does not make a will it goes to his sister or cousin, and he wants a lawyer to make a will and secure it for us; but what can we do? No lawyer will come without——"

"Oh yes, he will," said Mr. Thornton. "It will be much the best to relieve his mind of this anxiety. Look here, little woman, on the right-hand side of the High Street, not quite half-way up, there is a large white house, with a broad oak-painted door and a queer brass knocker. Call there, and ask the lawyer to come. Don't tell him that I am here, or that Dr. Oliver will be here; he is somewhat eccentric," he added by way of explanation.

Off the little maiden trotted with nimble feet, and Mr. Thornton took a seat by the bedside of the sick man.

CHAPTER II.—THE DOCTOR.

WEARILY up the High Street, one dark December night, trotted the worn-out steed of Dr. Oliver. The poor tired-out beast dragged after it one of those indescribable vehicles—a doctor's gig. There was no mistaking the medical character of the turn-out—the lob-sided sit of the springs, the depressed iron footstep, and the horse lank and lithe as a doctor's horse should be.

The clock of the town hall spoke its iron-throated utterance of the passing hour as the doctor's trap trundled up to his own door.

"Eleven," muttered the doctor, as he alighted. "Sixteen hours is a pretty heavy pull, aint it, old boy?" said he, addressing the horse, as he passed his hand rapidly and fondly over its shaggy damp coat.

A boy made his appearance with a lantern, and led the horse and vehicle round to the stable, having first received strict injunctions from the doctor respecting the comfort and feeding of the horse.

"The merciful man regardeth the life of his beast," said the doctor to himself, as he fumbled in his pocket for his latch-key. "My own impression is that the man who does not regard the poor creature's life is the beast," he added, as he entered the hall and shut the door. "The door was shut," he murmured, as the sound of the bang died away in the passages and lobbies: "may I never be shut out of the heavenly home." He then unrolled his muffler, took off his great-coat, and as he hung it upon the peg in the brightly-lighted hall, he still muttered texts—"Cast off the works of darkness, and put on the armour of light."

Then he entered his sitting-room—emphatically his—not the surgery, that was at the back, but the cosy little one-windowed room alongside the hall and looking into the High Street. He turned up the gas, and cast his eyes about in search of something—his slippers—put away very carefully by his over-tidy housekeeper. It is not a pleasant thing to be compelled to stoop down and fish one's slippers from beneath a cabinet—especially when you are cramped and cold after a long drive on a frosty night. Some men vent their disapproval of the necessity of such a proceeding in a very emphatic manner. The doctor only expressed his feelings by two or three very pardonable grunts—involuntary, I believe—as he at last brought forth his slippers from the recess in which the annoyingly tidy Mrs. Biggs had concealed them. I mention, as I wish you specially to observe, that the doctor was a very good-tempered man. Nothing exasperates a man more than these little bits of unnecessary trouble, which the carelessness or thoughtlessness, or the perverse and overstrained orderliness of others occasions. I don't call that man a good-tempered man who smiles placidly in your face when you are censuring his behaviour in strong terms; nor do I call that man good-tempered who finds fault with a ripple of complacent satisfaction on his countenance. These imperturbable individuals are only good-tempered in the sense that strife is so genial to them that they rather like the undisturbed enjoyment of fault-finding: their natures must be somewhat akin to that of the Indian deity, over whose bedaubed features a hideous grin is supposed to spread when a human being is immolated in his honour. The good-tempered man is the man who can put up with little irritating inconveniences at home; who can join his wife at a cold dinner without enlarging upon the pleasures of a dinner at the club; who can cheerfully partake of the under-done beef or the cinder-done cutlets without declaring that he "never saw such a house"—that he can "never get a decent thing in it," and so on, till the patient little heart, which is his, gives way, and a tear-stained pillow is the only sign of the night-long problem—how to mollify and manage the irascible spirits of the kitchen and the parlour.

When Dr. Oliver regained his feet his ruddy face glowed with the exertion, and though he looked somewhat jaded, and the shade of solitude was just visible on his face, yet you would have said at once, "What a jolly, good-tempered face!" A round, rosy face, with very few time-marks—a little thinning of the hair, and the spectacles which always shielded his merry eyes, were the only marks of age about him. If it had not been for these you would have set him down for five-and-twenty; but taking these into account, you would probably have said five-and-thirty. Both your estimates would have been wrong; the first as much below as the second was above the real fact.

The young doctor had a very considerable practice—that is, as considerable as could be expected. Of course he could not expect to disturb the serene orbits of those two well and long established practitioners, Drs. Powderson and Cupwell; but there were, notwithstanding, some who shook their heads significantly, as though they knew something which they would not tell, but ended the prolonged gesture by saying, that a young genius was better than an old fool.

As the doctor regained his feet he espied what he had not noticed before, a carefully-folded, but somewhat stout missive on the table.

"Careless to send money in that way," he ejaculated, as he unfolded the missive. £6 10s. in gold rolled upon the table as he did so. "With Mrs. Jingfumble's compliments. I thought so. Poor old lady! She's about the only person in Strangeburgh who would send money in this fashion. Well, she's a good old dame, and I think I've been enabled to do her a little good this year."

While the doctor was holding this soliloquy, he had drawn a vellum-bound book, tall and narrow, from the bureau. This he opened, and entered on the credit side £6 10s. Then he made some hieroglyphics on the debit side. After this, he returned to the bureau, replaced the account book, opened two little drawers. Into one of these he deposited five sovereigns, into the other he dropped the sovereign and the half. As the coin jingled in its fall, he murmured—"A little over is better than a little under. 'Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the firstfruits of all thine increase.' And truly," said he, as he locked the bureau and returned to the table, "my barns are full—that is, I mean I've got as many patients as I can manage. And to think that I'm the harum-scarum creature that came here fifteen years ago, with no friends but One! I remember the psalm that Sunday morning as I sat in old Powderson's pew, feeling somewhat qualmy, I confess—'Grant thee thy heart's desire, and fulfil all thy mind.' Well, He has fulfilled all my petitions; that is, except —— Now then, Nolly, none of that! You can't expect everything all at once; it will come in good time. He will withhold no manner of thing that is good. Poor little Rose! it's harder for her, shut up all day in that great prison, with her horrid—— I'm ashamed of you, Noll!"

So saying, Dr. Oliver put his feet into his slippers, sank into the easy chair, stretched his legs; then he mixed for himself a glass of hot water,—of course there was something with the water. This refreshing beverage he sipped with the contented smile of a man who has had a hard day's work, and is thoroughly enjoying his rest.

Presently he crossed the room, and took an old brown-coloured volume from the bookshelf; he eyed the cover fondly for a moment, and then opened it reverently, while the good-humoured smile toned down to an expression of cheerful solemnity and affectionate attention.

He was so occupied when a ring was heard at the door. An expression of weariness stole over his face as he rose to answer the ring.

It was one of Dr. Oliver's customs to send Mrs. Biggs to bed at half-past ten. "Mind, Mrs. Biggs," he used to say, "don't sit up after half-past ten. Just leave me some supper and a good fire, and let me manage for myself when I am out later than the half-hour. Why should the poor old soul be kept up, when I positively don't want her?"

I wonder how many of us show this consideration for our servants. How often do we expect them to wait up for us hour after hour, while we are amusing ourselves at a dinner-party or a dance, and then, unreasonably enough, we expect them to be about their work in the morning as usual.

I think a little attention to that law of Christ, "Bear ye one another's burdens," would materially strengthen the bond between master and servant.

Dr. Oliver opened the hall door.

"Please, sir, would you come over and see missis—Mrs. Frettersole, that is—she's very bad?"

"What's the matter, Jane?"

"Well, sir, I can't say; but she wouldn't be pacified unless I came over for you. I know, sir, it's a troubling you to bring you out again, and so late too, but what can I do?"

"All right, Jane, 'tisn't your fault; though I'm pretty sure there's nothing amiss with her. A little fancy and a little pudding have set her off. I'll come over."

"Well," muttered the doctor, as he hunted out his boots—he never, by any chance, remembered where he put them—"well, how much trouble might be saved by a little thought. Mrs. Frettersole doesn't want me in the least. I should have looked in to-morrow, or rather the day following, to see how she was after Christmas Day, and her ailments would have kept till then, and a poor, tired fellow would have had a good night. However, good humour's the word, and 'charity endureth all things.'"

By this time the doctor was ready for his walk, and issued forth into the frosty night air. After some half hour he returned, locked up the hall door, took his candle, and went up-stairs, talking to himself as he was wont.

"I'm sure I don't know what to think; but really there's a great deal of humbug in the world. I humbug people in one way. That old lady is as well as I am, and yet she is perpetually sending for me for nonsensical little ailments that a little attention and self-denial would keep off, or a little domestic physicking could cure. It goes against me to send an account in, and yet she's more trouble to me than far more real patients are. She humbugs me by her continual calls; but, what is worse, she sometimes unfits me for my day's work. Well, well,—'none of the inhabitants thereof shall say, I am sick.'"

Our friend had hardly closed his eyes upon the pillow when there came another ring at the bell. The doctor raised his head and listened; he was reluctant to get up again; it was a cold night, and the ring had been very faint.

After listening a few minutes, there came another faint tinkle; not from the night-bell, which rang in the doctor's bedroom, but from the day-bell, which rang down-stairs.

"Tiresome—very tiresome," growled the doctor, as he shuffled about the bedroom in search of slippers and matches; "particularly tiresome," he said, as he came into collision with the washing-stand, and set the jugs and glasses tumbling against each other. "Some other wild-goose chase, I suppose," he said, as he slippered his way down the stairs and along the hall.

A little girl confronted the doctor as he opened the door.

"The clergyman sent me, sir, to say, would you come and see papa, who is very ill?"

"What clergyman? and who is your papa?"

"My papa is ill at Rumble's Houses, and the clergyman is there reading to him, and he said you would be sure to come."

"Well, come in, my child," said the doctor, "while I get ready to go with you."

The little girl came in; he brought her into the little parlour, he poked up the dying embers in the grate, lighted the gas. There must have been something in the child's face which struck the doctor, for he placed the candle on the table and regarded her with attention.

She was a small child—a frail, elf-like little thing, as we have said, with bright golden hair and large sober-looking eyes. There was no need to ask why she had not rung the night-bell: her little hands could never have reached it, much less have pulled it with any effect.

She sat upon the chair by the fire at the doctor's bidding, and stretched the little palms of her hands and her tapering fingers over as if the warmth was grateful.

"Just like Rose was, I should think; very strange,"—this was the doctor's comment as he made himself ready. "And Thornton's there reading with her father. Just like Thornton! hope he's not been taken in; but he's just one of those generous, impulsive fellows, who never made an error of the heart in his life. 'Papa,' she said; I should have thought a less refined epithet would have suited the language of Rumble's Houses It's strange altogether. I only hope I may do some good," he gasped out, as he drew his stiffened boots on. 'Your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace.' Come along, my little maid!" he shouted, as he came to the foot of the stairs.

Once more the hall door was opened and closed, and the shabby little fairy trotted along by the side of the burly son of medicine over the crisp ground, just lightly covered with the feathery flakes of snow that trembled all over the pavement.

CHAPTER III.—THE LAWYER.

READER, do you know those uncomfortable comfortable rooms? A room where every article of furniture is of the very best, and the very cosiest in appearance,—substantial-looking bookcases, of dark, warm oak colour; strongly bound, well-clad books in compact order, and well protected with figured leather lappets; chairs of cumbrous and antique comfort—a room in which everything has been thought of! stray brackets whereon to place a convenient light, opportune racks and loopholes in which to stow away pertinacious papers;—a room, on entering which you would say, "What a comfortable room!" but a room in which you never could be comfortable! Such a room I wish you to imagine, and fumbling restlessly about it picture to yourself a tall, gaunt man, whose face seems to be formed of a mixture of the vellum and dull leather bindings of the legal folios on his shelves, and of the musty parchment deeds tied up in pink tape, and neatly arranged upon his writing-table;—a sapless face, with piercing, ferret-like, restless, roving eyes, and surrounded with sparse and lank hair of snowy whiteness. Such was Josiah Gatherall, attorney, of Strangeburgh. Nobody ever accused—nobody would have ventured to accuse Josiah Gatherall of any undue extortion or fraudulent dealing. Everybody in Strangeburgh, when pressed to say something in his favour, or to say why they disliked him, would answer, with a very unpleasant emphasis—"Oh yes! he's an honest man!"

And yet everybody who had any dealings with Mr. Gatherall scrutinised his bill very closely, but nobody ever yet was known to dispute his charges. There was something so like the imprint of justice—justice, without the faintest indication of mercy in his face: determination, without the shadow of a relenting expression on his face; law, without the show even of an equitable liberality—that most people bowed to his word; the greatest and the least accepted his fiat unquestioningly. And he received them all alike. The Marquis of Montfeckington, with his dashing four-in-hand; Mrs. Growinton, with her lamentable and constant deficiency of h's; and old Bendles, the parish clerk, were treated exactly alike. They were his clients, but nothing more. Neither exquisite dandyism, and interesting cockneyism, and silky, smooth-stroked moustachios of the marquis, nor the uninterrupted explanations and panting apologies, and h-less periods of the matron, nor the would-be-legal phraseology of the Church official, wrought a wrinkle of wrath or the ripple of a smile on Josiah Gatherall's face. He was a lawyer, and his face was like Burns's Digest, or Coke's Compendium, or Lyttelton's Blackstone, with a ready index to which you could turn for every conceivable case.

"Bother the fellow! you never get anything out of him. Shan't trouble him again!" lisped the ladylike (I beg pardon, the unladylike) aristocrat; but within seven days of his resolution, the iron-grey steeds, with their silver trappings, emblazoned with the arms of Montfeckington, might be seen champing their bits impatiently at Mr. Gatherall's door.

"'E don't tell you nothing; 'e don't seem to know nothing! Oh! dear, mercy on me! I wish poor dear Diddler had lived. It's 'ard on a poor lone woman. If there was any other law'er 'andy, I should 'ave at 'em; but what's the likes o' me to do? But I shan't trouble 'im in a 'urry, that's all."

But the gorgeous flunkey let down the steps for the ponderous tread of Mrs. Growinton within two days of her indignant speech.

And though the parish clerk confidentially informed his neighbour Blowze, the timid little journeyman tailor, that he considered he (the clerk) was a sight better acquainted with the law than old Gatherall, yet the parish clerk contrived to have, at least, a monthly conference with the ill-informed limb of the law.

But there are no clients in Mr. Gatherall's room to-night; he is prowling restlessly about, turning his sharp, suspicious eyes inquisitively in every direction, glancing quickly round at some unaccountable crackings of furniture, which sound weird-like at the midnight hour. Something has made Josiah Gatherall very restless to-night. Perhaps he is ill at ease with himself. It is Christmas Eve; indeed, in a few minutes it will be Christmas Day. Perhaps old memories make him restless. Old faces seem to start up among the books, or in the flickering embers of the fire. He is moving the books about in an unmeaning way. If his daughter were to come in—his daughter Rose. She is sitting, in pale-faced patience, in the dismal drawing-room, waiting for the cold, legal good night; the periodical tribute of parchment-like affection, so punctiliously and methodically rendered, that it seems like the setting forth of a deed of trust—"By tenor of these presents." If his daughter were to come in and ask him (a thing she would not venture to do) what he was doing, he would only testily say—"Settling, settling. No, no; go away, child."

She hardly would answer the description of child, for the bloom of sweet seventeen had faded out of her cheeks some ten years before; and though she cherished a hope that love would one day visit her heart,—and she often dreamt of a rosy face, with eyes that laughed beneath a pair of glasses, and under a quickly-thinning crop of hair—she yet continued her house duties with quiet, unrepining assiduity, often turning over the leaves of her Bible, and finding the places where it was written—"Though it tarry, wait for it; it shall surely come, it will not tarry;" and, "As thy day, so shall thy strength be;" and, "My God shall supply all your need."

Presently Josiah Gatherall, while nervously fumbling amid a heap of books, sent three or four tumbling to the ground. He stooped to pick them up, and as he was placing one of them on the table, it fell open naturally. It was a thumbed page, and down the margin might be seen faint, fairy pencil-marks.

The lawyer was not an imaginative man. Legal practice is an excellent thing for toning down an exuberant fancy; but there seemed, nevertheless, to Josiah Gatherall that some form hovered over that open page. He thought he saw bending over that book a graceful form—a face full of affectionate seriousness, dark wavy hair bordering a fair forehead, and shading large luminous eyes; a very young face, but grave, and anxious, and pale, with the marks of death in it, but drinking in life from that well-used volume. And the lawyer was transported in thought to a pretty country church; a bridal party were just emerging; village children were flinging soft little nosegays beneath his feet, and a trustful, tremulous arm was laid lightly on his. And then the vision changed; he was still in the churchyard, but the sun was no longer shining, and the village children were not strewing bright summer flowers before him, but were gazing with scared and wonder-stricken faces into a new-made grave, and dropping a tear over one who had befriended them all in her short married life.

The memories were very strong upon Mr. Gatherall that night, and the midnight chimes that rung out at that moment seemed to intensify their strength, for he sank into a chair before the open Bible, and his lips were about to touch the book that had raised such recollections, when his eyes were arrested by the words which lay open on the page before him. "This my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."

The words had sent the lawyer's memory out once more over the wilderness of the past. People said that Josiah Gatherall was a money-hugging man. If he gave everybody their due, which they declared they were bound to believe, as they could not prove it otherwise, they knew he would have his due, and would never forego it; but the older people of the place would say—it was not always so. Josiah was not always the hard, close-fisted man he is now. Ten years ago he lived—not in Strangeburgh, but in the pretty little adjacent village of Roston; he had lived there all his life since he was articled to old Grosler. He had married old Grosler's daughter, and had inherited old Grosler's house and practice. His move into Strangeburgh had not been with the view of increasing his business, for Mr. Gatherall, of Roston, paid a weekly or bi-weekly visit to Strangeburgh to meet his town clients; and for his country clients, who formed his most considerable practice, Roston was as convenient as Strangeburgh.

Nor did he forsake Roston when his young wife was taken from him, for he continued to reside there with his two children, Richard and Rose, for many years after his wife's death; but they said that he had had some trouble with his son. He had set great hopes on his son Richard. The love which streamed from his heart towards the grave, seemed to rebound toward his son Richard. Rose was nothing; she was content to be nothing. She was happy if she could sit by and hear her father and brother chatting about the son's lessons or the father's rides about the country, and sometimes even about the father's cases and suits, for Richard was an inquiring and intelligent boy; but, then—well, people did not know the rights of the story. Some said that the poor rector of Roston had a pretty daughter, and that Richard Gatherall had an eye for beauty, but that old Gatherall objected to an alliance with a family where a needy gentleman was vainly struggling to maintain seven children on £170 a year;—that Richard was as obstinate as his father, and that he determined to brave the world with his love, and the £30 a year which he inherited from his mother. Others said that the story was worse: that there had been strong language used, and blows had followed. Certain it is, however, that Richard went away, and old Mr. Gatherall—so he was called, though not very old, either—had removed to Strangeburgh; and people said that the hearty, genial man had grown into the hard, sharp, money-grasping lawyer.

This is what they said. All I know is that those words on the open page of his wife's well-worn Bible seemed to send his memory out to walk amongst relics and love-mounds of the vanished years; and he was only roused from his reverie by a sharp, jerky ring at the street-door bell. Who could be calling at this hour of the night?

A child wanted to see the lawyer: a miserably-clad, pretty little girl.

Would he come and see her papa?

"Who is your papa? and what does he want with me?"

"He wants a lawyer and a doctor, and I'm going for the doctor; and he's my papa."

"Tush, child! yes. But where is he?"

"At Rumble's Houses, sir."

"There, get along, child. I can't be going off to Rumble's Houses at this hour of the night."

"Please, he says he's dying, and has been calling out for a lawyer."

"And who am I to ask for at Rumble's Houses?"

"For Mr. Richard, please, sir."

"And, there, you want me to turn out and hunt down in Rumble's Houses for Mr. Richard at this hour of the night! No, no; go away, go away."

"But, do come, please sir;" and her face turned pleadingly up to his.

"There—there, child! don't look like that! go away—go away!"

So saying, he closed the door on her and returned to his study, muttering and mumbling, "What did the child look like that for? Why does every face look like hers or like his? I couldn't help his running away. I couldn't—I say I couldn't! Now, must I go and run the risk of my life in Rumble's Houses, and all for a child's face? No, nonsense."

But, notwithstanding this, Mr. Gatherall continued looking for his boots.

CHAPTER IV.—THE TRIUMVIRATE.

The sick man had sunk into a kind of restless doze. Patiently Mr. Thornton sat watching that troubled face—troubled even in its sleep. It was not a handsome face; but you would have certainly said that it was an interesting and an intellectual face. The forehead was not remarkable for height or breadth; but those who are accustomed to observe faces will know that more depends on a well-proportioned than a large-surfaced forehead. There are certain angular adjustments that we must carefully study before we can read ability or character in faces. From want of attention to this, we may, I suspect, account for the mistake into which, it is said, a modern poet fell.

It chanced one day that the poet stood gazing in rapt admiration at a waterfall. Hard by stood an old gentleman, whose silvery locks added dignity to the broad expanse of a massive forehead. Our hero's mind, poet-like, was seeking for words with which to describe the grand rush of waters, when from the lips of the old gentleman there issued the appropriate epithet, "Majestic!"

"Exactly so!" exclaimed the poet. "Permit me, sir, to shake hands with one who has felicitously expressed my thoughts. Do me the honour of joining me at dinner!"

The old gentleman, with becoming gravity, acknowledged the poet's complimentary language, and intimated his willingness to accept the invitation to dinner, which was soon served at the neighbouring inn.

During the meal the poet's new-found companion preserved the most tenacious silence, resisting most obstinately all the poet's lavish efforts to draw him out.

His companion's taciturnity only served to heighten the poet's admiration and eagerness to catch some golden sentence or choice sentiment from his lips. At length, in the course of the dinner, a dish was brought in, and the cover removed, revealed some savoury dumplings. The venerable old man's lips were parted; the poet was all attention, as his companion exclaimed, regarding the dumplings with the most unfeigned satisfaction, "Yoicks! them's the jockeys for I!"

After a few minutes' uneasy slumber, the sick man opened his eyes and gazed anxiously up at the clergyman.

Mr. Thornton bent down and said, "We have sent for a lawyer."

The poor man seemed to gain vigour at the intelligence. Seeing him so alert, Mr. Thornton said, "Let me read to you some of God's comforting words."

He then opened his Bible at the 15th of St. Luke, and began to read in clear, low tones, the parable of the prodigal son.

I don't know why he chose this passage in particular, except that he generally selected this to read when he was in ignorance of the circumstances of the patient, and he knew that for the wandering ones no words were more full of winning comfort; and even for those who had returned and received the welcome of the Father, no words could be more grateful and soothing than those which told of the Father's outstretched arms, His warm welcome, and His happy home.

He began to read the story, interspersing the narrative with judicious but brief comments as he went along. Presently he heard the sound of heavy footsteps groping their way up the dark, steep staircase. They came toiling up the stairs. The sick man was half reclining, half sitting, propped up by pillows, and the candle which was placed to give Mr. Thornton light fell full on his pallid face.

The stumbling footsteps had come nearer, and now the last heavy footfall was heard on the creaking stairs, and the large, gaunt, hard old man, whose features were half concealed in a muffler, stood in the doorway, gazing at a scene very strange to such a one—a wretchedly-furnished room, starving forms, and one face wasted with weakness.

The clergyman continued reading—"Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet: and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry: for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."

As these words fell from the vicar's lips, a trembling voice from the doorway cried, "It is! It is!" and the tall figure of Mr. Gatherall dropped down by the bedside, and bowed over the thin hands of his son.

To tell you all that followed would be impossible;—how the sick man, startled at first, soon revived; how the father and son vied with each other in expressions of regret and affection; how the old lawyer's arms were spread out to enfold his daughter, in the first warm and hearty embrace he had given for years; how he even unbent so far as to take the children—the two wonderstricken children, who had sat in silent awe looking on—to take them in his arms and kiss them, and even to leave a little dewdrop which glistened on their little cheeks; how he shook hands with Mr. Thornton, and thanked God again and again; how, at the lawyer's request, Mr. Thornton knelt down amidst the reunited family and gave thanks to God for His providential care—all this I must leave to your kind imagination. While, however, they were occupied in mutual congratulations, a rosy, good-humoured face, with merry eyes twinkling from under sparkling glasses, appeared amongst them, preceded by a shabby little fairy. Dr. Oliver and his little guide had arrived.

Amazement and amusement seemed to enter into conflict in the doctor's countenance; amazement at the strange scene of happy disorder, and amusement at the sight of the stern old lawyer dancing a little child in his arms.

"I don't seem to be wanted," said the doctor, "or, at any rate, this poor fellow"—pointing to the bed—"seems to have got a more healing dose than I could have prescribed."

Mr. Thornton quickly explained that the sick man was Mr. Gatherall's son; or rather he would have done so quickly, had he not been interrupted with spasmodic comments and hearty ejaculations of gratitude, delivered with a strange mixture of legal precision and tremulous pathos by the old lawyer.

(Drawn by EDWARD HUGHES.)

"The clergyman continued reading"—p. 10.

"And now, Dr. Oliver!" exclaimed the old man, when the doctor seemed to have quite taken in the whole situation; "and now, doctor, will you oblige me by going to my house and telling Miss Rose" (here the doctor's eyes twinkled with more than usual briskness) "to get beds ready and send the carriage down at once? for we must take the whole family in; and how many beds, my dear," he added, turning to his new-found daughter, "will you require? Do the children occupy a separate room?"

"There—there!" exclaimed Dr. Oliver, "Miss Rose and I will see to that. I can tell her there are three youngsters, with mother and father."

And off he sped. It was a sore temptation to the doctor to linger long at the house aiding Miss Rose in making preparations. He found her sitting patiently in the chilly-looking drawing-room, awaiting with demure patience her father's return home.

Though somewhat alarmed at the doctor's arrival, she was soon reassured that all was right, and I am not certain that George Oliver's welcome was not as hearty as any she could have given to her father; but on this we must not speculate, and notwithstanding that he sadly wished to stay and see that Miss Rose had everything she wanted to assist her in her preparations for the great incursion of a family, he conscientiously set off with the carriage to give what assistance he could in the conveyance of the sick man from his wretched quarters.

In an hour's time a vehicle, well filled with human beings, but with a very small supply of baggage, drove quietly away from Rumble's Houses, and shortly afterwards disburdened its freight at a large house in the High Street. Soon afterwards, in obedience to the doctor's imperative orders, the whole house was wrapped in silence. Whether all were sleeping or not I can't say, but all retired to rest, and Dr. Oliver stepped across the High Street to his own door in time to hear the hoarse-throated town hall clock announce, in fretful tones, the half after two.

* * * * * *

Some hours after, numbers of people were seen flocking up and down the High Street, and turning down Church Street, and wending their ways towards the solid old Norman edifice, whose many merry bells were bidding Christian hearts be glad, and join in expressing their gladness to the God of our salvation. Amongst them was Dr. Oliver, who murmured to himself as he went along, "Poor Thornton! I wonder how he will get on after his midnight dissipation—the luxury of doing good, I mean. Late hours and exciting scenes are not the best preparation for the pulpit; but, as the day, so is the strength."

Presently the whole congregation had assembled in church, and looks of surprise were cast about,—for I am sorry to say that even in Strangeburgh the congregation did not spend the little interval before the service began in quieting their minds and solemnising their spirits with due preparation of heart to worship God, but in looking about and criticising the width of a neighbour's dress, or the trimming of a bonnet. Looks of surprise were cast about as old Gatherall and Miss Rose, and a couple of little children, took their places in the lawyer's pew, which had not been graced with more than the lonely Miss Rose for the last five years. And then the service began, and the words of praise came sometimes with a choked utterance from the lawyer's pew; and when the general thanksgiving was read, a member of the congregation desired to return thanks for mercies lately vouchsafed to him.

At length Mr. Thornton ascended the pulpit. Somewhat jaded he looked, but full of joyous animation. The weary, inquisitive expression which he wore in the vicarage library last night had disappeared. The things old and the things new seemed to have vied with each other in the abundance with which they had trooped into his mind. The very line of thought which he had been seeking had been suggested to his mind in the strange incident of that morning, and it was with a trustfulness of tone that he announced his text—The Ministry of Reconciliation. He showed that there was a pathos in the word "reconciliation;" that though it implied alienation and enmity, that it implied even more than enmity, for it implied previous friendship and intimacy. That such was the fact between God and man—once friendship and intimacy; the daily, loving intercourse between Adam and his Maker; that this love and fellowship had been broken by man's sin; that enmity took the place of love, as it invariably does, and insolence superseded reverence; that, day by day, man had striven, aided by the suggestions of the wicked one, to widen the breach and intensify the enmity; that God yearned over His weak and erring creatures; that His love was not like man's, which was so frequently choked in its outgoings by false pride; but that He commended His love toward us in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us; that this really was our joy in this Christmas season—the joy that God had devised means whereby the wanderers might return unto Him.

Old Mr. Gatherall did not exactly wince at this, but I think he felt contrite that he had never devised any means of bringing back his son.

"But," Mr. Thornton continued, "the means devised of God were not easy means—means which occasioned no trouble, caused no sorrow, or involved no loss. We could have no conception of love unless we can perceive what sacrifices love is capable of. Look at the river, rushing with swift, smooth current to the sea; who can estimate its force as it glides noiselessly by? But oppose some obstacle. Cast a huge rock in the midstream, and see, you have awakened powers which slept. So it is with love. Some strange circumstance serves to call forth affections that seemed almost dead; and you see how wrong has been your judgment when you supposed there was no tenderness because tenderness was dormant. So had man's fall, man's misery, drawn forth before the universe the most wondrous manifestation of God's love. God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son. And it was in the proclamation of this reconciliation—in the declaring that God had made Christ, who knew no sin, to be sin for us—that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself—that we are brought near by the blood of the everlasting covenant—the ministry of reconciliation consisted. But it was not only in the preacher's lips that this ministry of reconciliation was brought to men's notice—in a Christian land at least. When we had Bibles and the means of grace, we might be reminded of the reconciliation. God preaches reconciliation in many ways. Do we not often meet with incidents so strikingly typical, that they seemed like the voice of heavenly Love pleading with us to be reconciled. The desertion of the prodigal in the land of his adoption, when of his chosen associates none were ready to relieve his wants; when the depth of his distress almost made him desire the coarsest fare, and the privations of a hard life made him think of his father's happy home, and then, without staying to let pride bid him hesitate, or indolence and apathy kill his repentance, he hurried homewards; and loving eyes descried the long-wished-for form, and a father's embrace welcomed the repentant one. If such a thought has arrested any of our minds, if any circumstance has turned our minds to think of the heavenly home and a Father's love, let it not die: cherish, act upon the prompting on this Christmas morning, when every word breathed of peace between heaven and earth, and on earth. I beseech you, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."

And then the people slowly filed out of church, and busy knots gathered together and nodded their heads significantly, and yet wonderingly, as old Mr. Gatherall passed by—a little child on each side of him, and followed by Miss Rose, who had most calmly appropriated Dr. Oliver's arm.

A few weeks after, the dwarf blinds in Mr. Gatherall's office window were taken down and repainted, and they thenceforth announced—Gatherall and Son. About the same time, too, Dr. Oliver took the large house next to the lawyer's, which Dr. Powderson vacated when he retired from practice—with a fabulous fortune, if you believe the gossips; and as soon as Dr. Oliver had settled the new house to his satisfaction, he occasioned no little stir in Strangeburgh, and not a few tears too, by—— well, of course, by going to church one morning and meeting several members of the Gatherall family.

Mr. Gatherall still lives on in Strangeburgh. He does not do much business now—his son takes that burden. But Mr. Gatherall is not idle: he is continually devising means for doing good. He has instituted a ragged school close to Rumble's Houses. He has grown very fond of Rumble's Houses, for he is to be seen there very often, climbing about the strange passages, as if they were quite familiar to him; and, indeed, I have caught him reading out of the Bible to poor sick people there, while his little granddaughter stands happy and patient beside him, and when I heard him he was reading the parable of the prodigal son, and his voice trembled a little when he came to the words—"This my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."

XUM

LIFE A TIME OF TRIAL.

BY HIS GRACE THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

"He that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still."—Rev. xxii. 11.

THESE words in the last chapter of the Revelations are spoken with reference to a time when man's state of trial has ended. For a long period God waits to be gracious, calling sinners to repentance; at last He waits no longer: the sinner cannot any longer change his state; he that is unjust, must be unjust still: and he which is filthy, must be filthy still. Again for a long period the faithful are still exposed to dangers. Even St. Paul in the days of his labour expressed a fear concerning his soul's state, lest, while he preached to others, he himself might be a castaway. The humble servant of God knows himself to be set in the midst of many and great temptations, and at times greatly fears lest his weakness yield to them. But a day is coming when all fears shall end, and he that is righteous and holy, relieved from the burden that has long pressed him down, shall reach a state from which he can never fall, and in which he shall enjoy the blessings of his righteousness and holiness secured to him for evermore. When will this day come, when the fate of the faithful and the faithless will be fixed by an irreversible decree for evermore?

Let us now consider the answer to this question. First, in some cases it would even seem that man's fate is practically fixed while life lasts. Many—shall we not say thousands of faithful servants of Christ, are so manifestly His people, even while exposed to all life's trials, live so devotedly in prayer and humble dependence upon Him, that we cannot for a moment think they will ever fall from Him. They themselves, however, will be the last thus to look upon their own state with satisfaction. In their humility, they will be painfully conscious of the power of sin still working within their hearts, and will feel every day that it is of God's great mercy alone in Christ that they are kept upright; yet their friends, looking upon them, will not doubt that they are practically safe with Christ, long before life's trials have ended. Others again, are so sunk in dead worldliness, care so very little for the things of Christ and the realities of another world, and have so long gone on thus carelessly, in spite of the most startling warnings, that we can scarcely think it possible for them ever to be roused. Probably such men also, like their counterpart, the faithful, will be the last to know their real state. They are often not dissatisfied with themselves. They have no thought of the danger to which they are exposed; their consciences are asleep; they are like men who have a deadly disease about them, and whose strength is daily failing, but who are so drugged and kept up by false stimulants, that they never know they are in danger till their last hour. Here is a fearful warning for all who continue deliberately in the neglect of heavenly things. Their hearts become daily more callous to good impressions. At last they may become hardened past cure, even while their life on earth is still prolonged. The Gospel of Christ, indeed, encourages us to preach pardon for repentant sinners to the most hardened as long as life lasts. It would be great sin in us to neglect thus to appeal to them. Many instances are on record of the most hardened heart giving way at last to Gospel motives, and of men at the eleventh hour glorifying and serving Christ, whom they have long despised. But still it is certain also that there is such a state as judicial blindness—blindness sent to the spiritual eyes in judgment, as a punishment for long-continued sin. There is such a state as that which those fell into whom our Lord called blasphemers against the Holy Ghost, who can never be forgiven, neither in this world nor in the next; a state such as St. John calls the state of sin unto death, which is past praying for.

We may say, then, that in some persons—though God alone can know who they are—the irrevocable decision seems to have been passed, even while they are still in this life. Some while still living upon earth being unrighteous, are sure to continue in their unrighteousness for ever; and some being made holy by the Spirit of God, through the blood of Christ, seem sure also to remain holy always. It is not, however, of such a decision of man's fate, while he is still in this life that our Lord speaks in the text.

In the second place, the fate of each is fixed by death. Perhaps there is no thought connected with death more solemn than that which occurs, when we see those who have long been careless of religion cut off in their carelessness. While there was life, there seemed still to be hope. Many of the careless, not contented with their reckless way of living, are saying to themselves habitually, when any serious thoughts by chance rise up within them: "This careless state of mine must not last always; I must certainly rouse myself some day to consider more fully the prospects that are before me when life fails." But then the serious fit passes, some frivolous temptation drives away the good thought which was struggling to win an entrance—all stands over to a more convenient season. And this trifling with the soul goes on month after month. Perhaps there are solemn times, when better thoughts seem almost on the point of triumphing. There are some seasons when the most thoughtless cannot but think. It is, say, the end of the year: a man cannot but reflect how quickly his life is passing. It seems but yesterday since he was in his boyhood. And of the many friends who were around him in his early days, how very many are gone for ever from his side! What an unknown blank does the new year, on which he is entering, present to him! How little can he calculate what will befall before its months close! One thing only is certain respecting it, that it will bring him much nearer to eternity. Many a man who has died at last in his sins, in cold, worldly indifference to all the great Gospel truths, has at such times had these serious thoughts. Every time they occurred at solemn seasons they have seemed to hold out good hopes that he might yet live to be an earnest Christian; but somehow they never came to anything—they passed away like an unsubstantial cloud and left no trace behind them. And now the man is dead. His friends, say, are going to attend his funeral; and as they call to mind the way in which his last months were spent, they cannot but confess that their good hopes for his amendment seem all to have ended in nothing; that as he lived, so to all appearance he seems to have died, with very little thought of the Gospel, appearing, even to the last hour he lived in the world, to cling far more to it than to the Lord Jesus Christ, who so long waited to be his Saviour. And now, as the earth closes over him, his friends are struck with melancholy in thinking how little that character with which he died was fitted to meet God's all-searching judgment; how impossible it would be for such a character to enjoy the presence of Christ in heaven, even if admitted there. He that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he that is sensual, let him be sensual still: and he that is worldly, let him be worldly still: and he that is without the love of Christ, let him pass eternity without loving Him. These are the melancholy words which might well be written over the tombs of the thoughtless—words that speak more forcibly than almost any others, of the utter wretchedness of a death without Christ; consigning him who thus dies to the perpetual endurance of the miserable ungodly state which he deliberately chose for himself on earth, but which now that he has left the earth he would give worlds to be freed from.

On the other hand, he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still. These words too have their appropriateness to the subject of death. They speak of the death of the faithful, and are full of comfort. Do we lay a Christian brother or sister in the grave? What a real satisfaction to know that they are taken away from all evil to come, and especially from those evil trials that seemed sometimes ready to shake their faith. No more shall weakness tempt them to be fretful under suffering; no more shall there be the slightest danger lest the world's seductions or its terrors persuade them to conform to its evil usages. They are quite safe now with Him whom they have long loved; and the graces, which by His Holy Spirit He gave them, and which so greatly adorned their character, even while living in the midst of weakness, are now matured, and certain to become only more lovely, and more the source to them of all pure happiness through eternity.

My readers, if at this solemn time, when we are about entering on a new year, the hearts of any of us naturally turn back to think of the many new years' days we have passed in the company of dear friends long lost to us, how great a blessing is it if, in thinking of them, we find all sorrow for their loss swallowed up in the calm assurance that they are in peace. When we recall the memory of the Christian graces which we loved in them, how pleasant to reflect that these graces are secure now to flourish through eternity; the character we loved no lapse of time can now alter or impair. While we recall the outward look, or word which told of the presence of such graces in the heart, we know that all which made such outward signs valuable to us is living and vigorous now, and will live and continue vigorous in the presence of Christ through eternity. Of the faithful dead it is the greatest comfort to feel that they are past trial. Of the departed, he that is righteous, must be righteous still: and he that is holy, must be holy still. He that loved Christ, can never cease to love Him.

But, thirdly, if we look to the words which go before and follow the text, we shall see that it applies, in strictness, neither to the way in which men's characters are often settled, as it were, firmly for good or evil while they are still living, nor yet to that final stamp which death sets on them. The speaker in the twelfth verse is plainly Christ Himself: "Behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." "I am," says verse thirteen, "Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last." And the sixteenth verse continues: "I, Jesus, have sent mine angel to testify unto you these things in the churches." We may, therefore, very naturally refer the words of the tenth and eleventh verses, which are connected with the twelfth without a pause, to the same speaker, Jesus. But however this is, certainly the verse immediately before the text—the tenth—ends with the words: "The time is at hand." And the twelfth verse, following the text, states what time—the time, viz., of Christ's coming: "Behold, I come quickly." The eleventh verse therefore, the text, states that when this time arrives—when Christ comes, and closes the long period of the world's trial—then all the sons and daughters of men shall remain for ever in that state of soul and character in which the close of their probation finds them. "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still."

Of course, the final close of man's trial settles his condition for eternity. And every year as it passes over our heads is bringing us nearer, not only each of us, to the full development and final settlement, as it were, of our character in life, and to the day of our own death, which seals the character; but, also, to that great day, when all things shall be settled for eternity. Many pictures might be drawn of the solemnity of this final settlement; many images might be brought out to impress the mind with awe in thinking of it, but nothing, perhaps, attending it is more striking than the simple fact set forth in the text: that whenever this final settlement does come, it must leave all living souls for ever fixed in the state in which it finds them, whether for endless sin and rebellion against God, or endless love of Him and enjoyment of His presence in holiness. From the state in which that hour finds our souls there can be no escape. God's judgments, however long His mercy may delay them, must at last be final and irreversible.

And here let me observe that the misery of those who die without Christ is here set before us simply as a continuance of their sinful condition. If they are wicked, if they are debased, they must be wicked and debased for evermore. And there is something very striking in this. To be thus left to themselves to follow their own courses, this is punishment enough; further, it includes in it all other punishment. For a soul created by God, and for which Christ died, to be left for ever in a state of estrangement from God, is the greatest of all miseries. In the state into which the soul passes when its trial is over, there will be no possible means of worldly enjoyments or debasing engagements, and, if it be without Christ, it must be miserable.

And now, in bidding farewell to the year which we have left behind, and entering by God's mercy on a new term in our probation, think, my readers, how far our characters are ripening for our great change—this great day of settlement. The characters which we have—for good or for evil—loving God in Christ, by serving Him and holding intercourse with Him in prayer and holy ordinances, and doing His will because we love Him; or, on the other hand, regardless of Him, and loving the world far more than we love Him—will, when matured, abide unchanged for ever. God of His great goodness has permitted us to see another year's end, while many around us have been cut off. How, we ask, are our characters ripening? Is the love of God growing in us? are we more truly living by faith—that is, more convinced of the reality of things unseen than we were twelve months ago?

TROTTIE'S DREAM.

BY WILLIAM GILBERT, AUTHOR OF "SHIRLEY HALL ASYLUM," ETC. ETC.

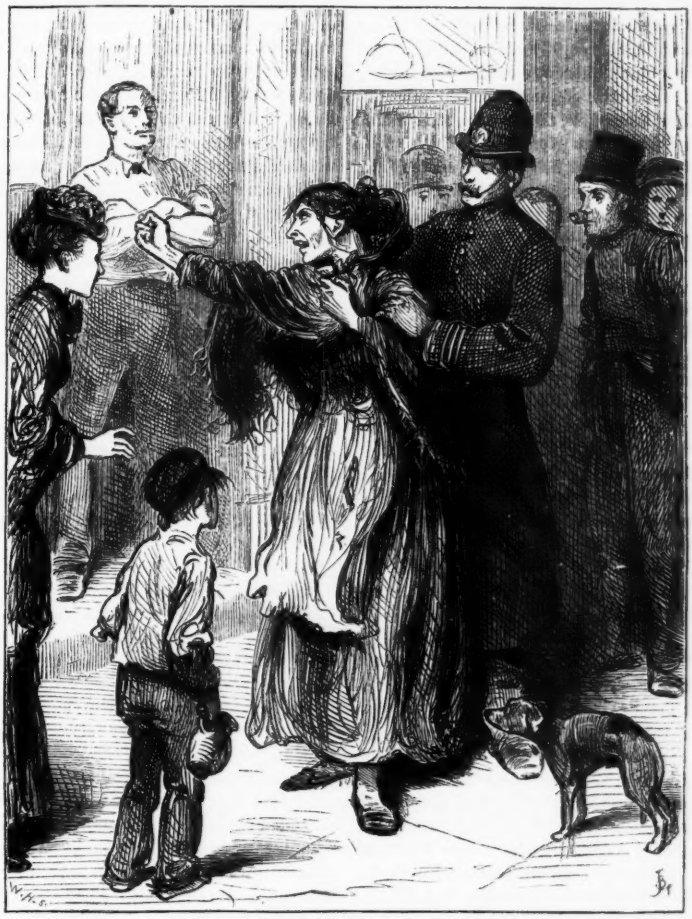
ON Christmas Eve, 1871, two poor girls, averaging between twenty and twenty-two years of age, quitted a large biscuit manufactory in Rotherhithe, in which they were employed, and continued their way westward toward the Borough, conversing as they went in what manner they should spend the next day. One of them, who lived in Lambeth, said to the other—

"At our house we intend to have a regular jollification, and I mean to spend eighteenpence of the money I've earned during the week in buying a bottle of good rum, to give my father and mother a treat of punch. And very happy we shall be together, for my brother Tom has just come home from sea, and Martha has got a holiday for three days from the shop she works at in Piccadilly. What do you intend doing, Trottie?—aint you going to give your people a treat?"

Trottie, a pretty brunette, replied that she was rather puzzled what to do. "The fact is," she said, "we're in a great deal of trouble at home. Father, who works in the Docks, has been thrown out of employment through the continuance of the east wind, which keeps the shipping from coming up the Channel, and poor John, my brother, who worked in the silk factory, has so sprained his leg that it is probable he will not be able to go to work again for some weeks to come. If it had not been for what I have earned, and mother picking up something at umbrella-making, we should be pretty well starved. As it is, the two little ones, Kate and Johnny, are getting so pale and thin for want of nourishment, it quite goes to my heart to see them. Still, I should like to give poor father a treat if I could, for he's very low-spirited, and it would cheer him up a little, and do him good."

"You'd better do so," said her companion; "and depend upon it, it won't be money thrown away. It's only fair a daughter should think of her father and mother's comforts."

By this time the two girls had arrived at the corner of Tooley Street, in the Borough, and after a very affectionate parting, each wishing the other the compliments of the season, the one hurried southward to her home in Lambeth, and Trottie continued her way onwards over London Bridge, towards the Commercial Road, where, in a bye-street, her parents resided, thinking as she went over the conversation she had had with her friend.



The poor girl was in a state of great indecision. She much wished to purchase the rum, but she had heard her father say it was his intention to take the pledge. He knew, he said, several men who worked in the Docks who had done so, and their report was that not only could they perform their work fully as well, and with as little inconvenience to themselves, as when taking three or four pints of beer during the day, but, in point of fact, found themselves in better health than before; that they rose fresher in the morning, and went to bed feeling less fatigued in the evening; also that their wives and families were made the more comfortable, on account of the money economised from the public-house. Still, Trottie argued, her father and mother had not yet taken the pledge, and therefore she would not be tempting them to break it. They could have a happy evening to-morrow, and then become teetotallers, if they pleased, the next morning. And then it occurred to her that, suppose they did not, would she, in any manner, have made herself answerable in keeping them from their good resolution? Other thoughts then came into her head. The family larder was at a very low ebb, and would it not be better to give her mother the money she had earned, to expend in good nourishing food for the family, instead of drink?

Poor Trottie continued onwards in a state of lamentable incertitude. At last she came to a conclusion. On passing a flaring gin-palace in Whitechapel, which, from the splendour of its decorations, probably surpassed Aladdin's palace (with the exception that the quaint Oriental magnificence of the latter might be worthy of some admiration, while the execrable taste displayed in the former was worthy of all reprobation), her eye was attracted by the glare of gas, plate glass, and gilding. She looked at the building for a moment, and found, among other labels, embossed in gold letters, in the window, "Fine old Jamaica Rum, eighteenpence a bottle." The words seemed to cast a singular spell over Trottie, and she could not keep her eyes from them.

At last the truth of the proverb, "What is once done cannot be undone," came across her mind, and she resolved to enter the gin-shop and purchase a bottle of rum. But attractive as the show and finery of the place might have appeared from the outside, and although the gilding and appointments on the inside were even more lavish than on the exterior, she soon found she was in a most uncongenial atmosphere. There was a crowd composed of women of the lowest character, working men (and, alas! some also had their wives with them), soldiers from the Tower, sailors, and others, few being quite sober, the majority slightly intoxicated, and some positively drunk. There was a considerable uproar going forward at the time, caused by the attempt of the barman to push out of the shop a wretched, ragged, drunken middle-aged woman, who screamed and fought with great energy. Of those present, some took her part; others were for her expulsion. Possibly neither party were much interested in her cause, but simply interfered from love of the fun it created.

This, however, was hardly the case, for she found it filled, though with a somewhat more decent set of customers than in the bar-room; but every sound and blasphemous expression used by those she had just left was as audible as if she had been among them. She could hear that the barman was evidently succeeding in turning out the woman, her defenders

"Continued her vociferations as loudly as ever."

Disgusted with the scene, Trottie left the shop, and went into the street, determining to continue her road homewards. She had not, however, succeeded in passing the shop, when she saw on a side-door, written also in gold embossed letters, "Bottle Department." Being somewhat of a determined character, and having resolved that she would carry home the rum, she entered this department, where she thought she could make her purchase quietly and unobserved.

at the time making still more noise, and using more horrible execrations as they found the other party the stronger.

Trottie could support this no longer, and, before making her purchase, she left the place, at the same time as the woman was expelled from the other door. When outside the house, the woman continued her vociferations as loudly as ever, totally indifferent to the remonstrances of a policeman, who earnestly advised her to go home, or he should be obliged to lock her up.

"You ungrateful vagabonds!" she roared out to the barman and others employed in the shop; "you ought to be ashamed of yourself, for you know you haven't a better customer than me. Why, this very evening I pawned the shoes off my children's feet; and now I've spent all the money I've got, you refuse to give me credit for another quartern. Oh! you're a precious set of Christians, you are! I wouldn't have my soul in any of your bodies for anything."

Here the policeman managed to drag her away, while poor Trottie, thoroughly disgusted with the whole scene, continued her way homeward, leaving all thoughts of the bottle of rum behind her.

When Trottie arrived at the house she found all the family assembled; but gloomy indeed was their appearance. The stamp of hunger was on the faces of all, and not without cause, for that day, with the exception of a half-quartern loaf, they had eaten nothing. Trottie, when she noticed their expression, was very pleased she had not purchased the bottle of rum. Without making any remark, she drew from her pocket the whole of the week's earnings and placed it in the hands of her mother, who silently kissed her, and then putting on her bonnet, started off for the open-air market in the Whitechapel Road, leaving Trottie to converse with the others, and make herself as useful as she could during her absence. After talking a little to her father and brother, and putting the tea-things on the table, she sat down and silently reflected on the temptation she had overcome. Presently an up-stair lodger entered the room, carrying on her arm a basket filled with good things for the next day's enjoyment. Trottie asked what she had got, and the woman, opening the basket, showed her many delicacies which she had purchased—plums, currants, tea, sugar, meat, vegetables, and other things, including a bottle of first-rate rum.

"You're determined to make yourselves happy to-morrow," said Trottie, looking at the rum.

"Yes," said the woman, "Christmas comes but once a year, and we may as well be happy as not. My husband works hard enough, and has enough to try his temper, and it would be sad indeed if he can't make a little merry once a year. Why, we always look for it on Christmas Day. I believe my husband would sooner go without half his meat than his glass of rum-and-water and pipe after dinner, and another in the evening."

The lodger continued conversing with the family for a short time longer, when Trottie's mother returned from market.

"And what have you got, mother?" asked Trottie. "Let's see if your basket is as well worth having as Mrs. Thompson's."

Trottie's mother seemed to have some diffidence in showing the contents of her basket, and possibly with some reason, for her purchases were vastly inferior to those made by the lodger. Trottie also felt half ashamed of the exposure, but made no remark.

"I see," said her mother to the lodger, "you've got something good there in that bottle. I should have liked to have bought one as well, but I'm sorry to say we can't afford it."

"Oh," said the lodger, "you ought to have made an effort. It will be hard indeed if Christmas night passes off without some jollification."

"We must try and be happy without the bottle," said Trottie's father, joining for the first time in the conversation. "And not only be happy to-morrow night, but every night in the week. I've rarely found any good come of the bottle, but I've known a great deal of harm. I was never a drunkard, but I can easily see now that if I'd kept away from the public-house altogether, and saved my money, we should not be in the strait we are now in. But it shan't occur again, though, if I can help it. Whenever I'm again in work I'll put by every farthing I should have spent in the public-house, and I suspect before next Christmas I shall not have as much dread of the east wind keeping shipping from coming up the Channel as now."

Trottie's mother argued on the other side, and expressed great regret that she was not able to obtain the same means as the lodger for their enjoyment the next day.

"For my part," she continued, "I think every working man wants something to strengthen him, and all the doctors now say there's nothing does so much good as spirits. A good glass of brandy is often worth all the physic in a docter's shop put together."

Trottie's father, however, although he did not contradict his wife, held to his own opinion; and Trottie began to think that his intended abstinence was occasioned rather by the pain he felt at seeing their poor circumstances, than from any dislike to the liquor itself.

The lodger now left them, and after their meal Trottie and her younger sister Kate soon went to bed.

Although tired with the day's exertion, Trottie did not fall asleep, but continued, in the darkness and solitude of her room, the train of thoughts that had occupied her mind during the evening. She was particularly struck with the words of her mother, and the sorrowful expression of her countenance when she lamented they had nothing whatever in the shape of spirituous liquors to gladden their hearts the next evening. Now Trottie was a good daughter, and intensely fond of her mother, and she began to consider whether it would be possible to obtain a bottle of rum, and make it a present to her. True she had just given all her week's earnings to purchase food for the family, but still there might be some plan by which to accomplish her object. No doubt her friend, Martha Jones, who accompanied her from the factory as far as Tooley Street, and whose parents were comfortably off, would lend her the money, which she could repay from her next week's earnings. Well, she thought she would do it, and then she thought she would not. "Better go at once," suggested itself to her mind, and that so plainly and distinctly that she thought it must have been whispered to her. Again the same words were uttered, and, if possible, more clearly than before. Trottie was in doubt whether she really heard a voice, or whether it was merely fancy on her part, when she felt a hand take hers. She attempted to withdraw her own, but it was impossible. Without any pressure, the hand seemed simply to clasp hers, but so cold and clammy was it that she shuddered as she felt it. And then she remembered, some years before, when she had seen her little brother, whom she had loved so dearly, for the last time as he lay in his coffin preparatory to its being screwed down, that she had kissed him first on his forehead, and then, taking his hand, had kissed that also, remarking at the same time how cold and clayey it felt. The hand that held hers at the present moment seemed that of a dead child's about her brother's age.

XUM

Without being able to understand in what manner it was done, Trottie found the hand leading her through darkness so profound she could distinguish nothing whatever. All, too, was silent around her. Still she went on, gliding swiftly, without meeting with any impediment, or without the dread of doing so. At length there appeared to be a glimmer of light, as if from gas or a lamp, which increased in clearness till she began to notice there were objects near her. These, in their turn, became more and more distinct, till she found herself, the dead hand holding her still, behind the counter in a large pawnbroker's shop. To her surprise, neither of the shopmen appeared to notice her; and she turned round to see who it was that held her hand, but she could neither see the hand nor her own. On looking round the shop, she found it contained three small compartments, like boxes, each having an occupant, with two of whom the two shopmen were busy completing loans. In the third was a respectable-looking woman, who remained silent till her turn came to be attended to. She kept her head turned somewhat aside, so that her features were not visible, and this was done in such a manner as evidently to show the wish to escape observation; and yet no one could see her, for, as before stated, the shopmen were busy with two other customers, and Trottie herself felt that she was as invisible as the one who stood beside her and held her hand.

And now it came to the woman's turn to be waited upon, who had so fixedly engaged Trottie's attention.

"What can I do for you, ma'am?" said one of the shopmen.

"I want half-a-crown on those," said the woman, putting something down on the counter, but Trottie could not see what, as the shopman stood between her and the woman.

Taking up the articles she had put down, the shopman carried them (a pair of child's shoes) under the gas-light, to examine them more minutely.

"Ah, you may examine them as much as you please," said the woman; "they're very little worn. I gave six shillings for them not long ago, and the boy's only worn them on Sundays."

"Eighteenpence," said the shopman.

"Eighteenpence won't do," said the woman.

"Take them back then," said the shopman, throwing them on the counter.

"Say one-and-nine," said the woman.

"Eighteenpence or nothing," replied the shopman.

"I'll take the money," said the woman.

The man now proceeded to tie together the shoes and make out a ticket, and the dead hand then drew Trottie from the shop.

How it was she could not tell, but, without hurrying or making scarcely any movement, Trottie the next moment found herself in a room overhead. It was fitted up in a singular manner, with racks and shelves raised round it and in the centre; and these were filled with objects of a most varied description, many of them folded up in cloths, while others were open to the eye, all having labels on them, and arranged in the neatest order. There were two men also in this room—one of them an assistant in the house, the other a visitor. They were conversing together on some common subject when a noise was heard in one part of the room, which seemed to proceed from a small cupboard in the corner. The assistant went and opened the door, and there, on a shelf, he found evidently the same pair of shoes which had been pledged by the woman below. The man, having inspected the ticket on them, took them to a shelf where a number of other pairs of shoes about the same size were arranged.

"How I do hate having to do with these things," said the man to his companion.

"Why?" he asked.

"I don't like them; they all tell the same tale," was his reply. "There isn't one pair of the whole of these shoes on this shelf that hasn't been taken off the feet of the child of a drunken mother."

"How do you know that?" asked his companion.

"A sober woman," he replied, "may be in distress, and bitter distress too, but she will part with everything she has sooner than pawn her children's clothes; while the drunken mother makes no scruple on the occasion, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred before half an hour has passed since she received the money every farthing of it is gone in the gin-shop. It would be very curious to trace the stories of those families whose children's shoes are on that shelf. Many a tale of the most heart-rending description would be found connected with them, and every portion of the misery endured, the fault of a drunken mother. Now as to these very shoes," he continued, "I can tell the history of the woman who pawned them;" so saying, he mechanically examined them under the light. "You see they're well made; there's no slop-work here. I can almost tell by the look of them that the child's mother has never pawned them before. I should have liked to have seen her when she was in the box offering them, and then I could have told. When I used to be below in the shop, I could always tell when a woman offered a pair of her children's shoes for pledge whether she was a beginner or an old hand."

"How could you know that?" asked his companion.

"If a beginner," said the man, "she generally turns her head on one side, and tries to conceal her face; if an old hand, she will brazen it out. Why, these shoes have not been worn a fortnight, or anything like it."

Trottie's eyes now fell on the shoes as the man was examining them, and it struck her they were remarkably like her little brother Johnny's; and she remembered that about a fortnight before a pair of shoes had been bought for him out of the last wages her father had earned before he was thrown out of work at the Docks. It also occurred to her that the shawl the woman wore strongly resembled the one which her mother had on when she went out to market. Her attention was, however, again riveted to the conversation of the two men.

"I wonder whether any of these female drunkards are ever reclaimed," remarked one of them.

"'We must try and be happy without the bottle,' said Trottie's father"—p. 18.

"Never," said the assistant. "I've been now in these kind of shops, in Ratcliff Highway and about Whitechapel, for the last five-and-twenty years, and as you may imagine, have had a good deal of experience, and beyond that, I belong to a temperance society myself;—well, I can assure you I've never in my life known a female drunkard reclaimed after once having pawned her children's shoes. I almost look upon it that when once she has pledged her child's shoes, she is as completely lost to all chance of reformation as the men we used to read of in former times who sold themselves to the Evil One.

"Isn't that carrying the idea rather too far?" said his companion.

"Not a bit," replied the assistant.

"You don't, then, consider it possible for a drunken woman to be reclaimed?"

"Not when she's once pawned her children's shoes," said the man; "and there's a very curious circumstance connected with it, showing how much more prejudicially drink will act on a woman's mind than a man's. A man may be an irreclaimable drunkard, and to satisfy his propensity for drink will purloin or steal anything he can lay his hands upon, but I never knew a case of a man, although very likely a dozen-times-convicted thief, ever having pawned his children's clothes for the sake of drink. A drunken woman, on the contrary, after once having perpetrated the act, never again hesitates. No, believe me, when once she has done that, she is thoroughly lost."

"And then a quarrel took place"—p. 22.

The dead hand now drew Trottie from the warehouse, and after passing through darkness as profound as that she entered when first led from her home, the light began gradually to appear, and objects, as of people passing her in the streets, became distinguishable. Then a great glare of light appeared in the distance, and presently she found herself standing near the Whitechapel gin-shop in which she had intended to purchase a bottle of rum, and then quitted it in disgust from the scenes she had witnessed. The same noise of shouts, quarrelling, and laughter which had appeared to her so repulsive, she now heard again, and with the same abhorrence. She would willingly have moved off, but the dead hand led her forward. She attempted to resist, but the pressure, which had hitherto been light, now became so strong as to be irresistible, and she was obliged to enter the place against her better judgment.

The scene here was, if possible, more revolting than the one she had before witnessed. There were more persons in the place, both men and women, and these in a grosser state of intoxication. Language of the most disgusting description was bandied about from one to the other, less in anger or jest than as ordinary conversation. One scene particularly attracted Trottie's attention. A middle-aged man, in a state of maudlin drunkenness, was crying, and a dirty, disreputable-looking woman was attempting to console him.

"Don't take on so," she said; "you know that'll do no good—you can't cure her that way."

"But she'll be dead before I get home," said the man.

"Well, you can't help that," said the woman; "it's very sad, but you can't help it. And when she's gone, I shan't make you a fashionable wife, but we shall be very happy together."

Turning from this scene, Trottie witnessed another still more painful. A girl about thirteen years of age was endeavouring to drag her father from the gin-shop. He resisted, however, all her endeavours, and the poor girl cried bitterly. And then a quarrel took place between him and a sailor, and a fight ensued. The sailor was by far the most powerful of the two, his adversary being evidently of a weak, dilapidated constitution, apparently a workman in one of the numerous factories in the neighbourhood of Whitechapel.

In a short time the sailor had so great an advantage over his adversary as to prove that the latter had not the slightest chance against him. He had got the wretched man against the wall, and was pommelling him in a most terrific manner, the poor child screaming violently, and begging the bystanders to interfere, or her father would be killed. The genius of the place, however, was dominant at the time, and no one offered to render any assistance, or to part the combatants; on the contrary, they called out for fair play, the sailors cheering their companion, while those of the workman's party advised him to stand up and show himself a man. At last the poor wretch fell, utterly senseless and exhausted, on the ground, his face covered with blood. Some of the bystanders evidently thought he was dead, and advised the sailor to decamp as rapidly as possible. He took their advice and left the place. The landlord of the house then sent for the police, and the poor girl remained by the side of her father, crying in a most pitiable manner. Here, it is true, many offered to console her, but even their consolations were mixed up with the odious influence of the locality.

"Come, cheer up, my gal," said one man; "your father will be all right, as soon as he's got the police to take care of him. Here, take a drop, it'll do you good," and he placed some gin to the girl's lips, but she pushed it away with horror.

At last the police arrived, and the man was placed on the stretcher. One of them then asked where he lived, and the girl told him.

"What a shame," said the policeman to the landlord, "for you to allow the man to have got so drunk in your house."

"So it is," said a woman, who now seemed to exhibit some kind feeling towards the girl, and who, had she not been in such a locality, might have been considered respectable; "it's a shame, for he is a hard-working man enough, if he had his way; but it's places like this that tempt him in. Why, the man spent as much money here to-night as would feed his family half a week, and they're pretty well starving at home."

The policemen now carried off the man on the stretcher, and the dead hand drew Trottie after them.

They had hardly quitted the threshold of the house when Trottie noticed a woman approaching. The dead hand now held Trottie stationary, and as the woman came nearer, Trottie began to recognise her as the same she had seen in the pawnbroker's shop. Onward she came toward the gin-shop, and just as she was about to enter, Trottie found, to her intense horror, she was no other than her own mother. She implored her not to enter, but her words seemed unheard. She then stood before her to impede her way, but her mother seemed to pass through her as if she had been a spirit, and unaware of her presence, and then to enter the gin-shop. Trottie, in despair, attempted to utter a violent scream.

"Why, Trottie, what's the matter with you?" said little Katie, her bedfellow; "what ails you to-night? One would think you were being murdered. What's the matter, dear Trottie?"

Trottie remained for some moments silent and motionless; she could hardly believe she was in her home, and in bed with her sister, so vivid and real had her dream appeared. She was inclined to believe she had been sleeping, and the scenes she had passed through were simply illusions; but then again the dead hand—how could she account for that? She still felt its pressure; her hand was perfectly numb, and then the thought occurred to her that she had been lying on it, and the pressure she had felt was only caused by stagnation of blood.

In a few moments Trottie was fully awakened by little Kate, who passed her arms round her neck, and after kissing her said, "Dear Trottie, what is the matter with you? Do tell me what made you cry out in that dreadful manner." Trottie only kissed her sister, but did not give her any explanation as to the cause of her cry; nor did she to any one else.

No visit was paid that day by Trottie to her friend Martha Jones, and no rum was purchased. Christmas evening, however, could not have passed more happily with the family than it did, had Trottie carried out her determination; and the money the rum would have cost was not only economised, but probably a mischief not less terrible than that which Trottie had witnessed in her dream avoided.

THE NOËLS OF SOUTH-WESTERN FRANCE, AND SPAIN.

AMID all the divisions of Christendom some few patches of common ground are still to be found on which nearly all of us may meet. Some few associations there are which speak to the sympathies of almost all, and which awaken memories on which the minds of all true Christians, of whatever branch of Christ's Church, may dwell with genuine, if not with equal, delight. Such especially are the associations connected with Christmas, when

> The time draws near the birth of Christ, and such are all the amusements, kindnesses, family meetings, and social charities of the season: for, as Sir W. Scott says, of old—

> A Christmas gambol oft could cheer
> The poor man's heart through half the year.

One of these associations which memory retains the longest is that of singing or hearing Christmas carols, ballads, or hymns—a custom which, either in the services of the church, or beyond its walls, seems almost co-extensive with Christianity, and of which some authors claim the angels' song at Bethlehem as the first specimen. Few hymns are more popular than those which tell the story of our Saviour's birth; they are the most readily learned in childhood, and are perhaps the last to be worn away from our memory by friction with the world. Most of us who have lived in the country have some recollections of lying awake in early years to listen to the voices—often most unmusical it is true, but which came to us softened by distance—of the waits, who sang their carols from house to house; and if we have been wakened from our slumbers on the Christmas morning by such sounds, we have hailed it as a good token for the coming day and year.

But this custom of carolling is by no means confined to our own land, or to the English language, or is even chiefly or most extensively practised there. The Noëls, or Christmas carols, of France, Spain, and Germany are far more numerous than those of England, and in fact form of themselves no small field of literature. Some little courage and hardihood is needed to go out into the wintry night, and to stand in snow or keen frost singing under the windows of the wealthy, in hopes of a gift of good cheer or pence to reward the song; but in warmer climates, where the nights are less inclement, singing the Noëls is a far more agreeable occupation. As we go southwards we may observe, too, that their tone changes—the Noël, or carol, becomes more joyous, more free in its expression, more dramatic in its form, and assumes the shape of a real outburst of popular joy.

Above all, the Noël seems to have been essentially the poor man's poetry. Although the self-titled infallible Pope has lately declared that Jesus Christ was of an aristocratic family, and that He loved the aristocracy, yet the warmest, heartiest, and most touching welcomes seem ever to have been given to Him by the poor. In countries, as in a great part of Southern Europe, where the languages are divided into two dialects, one for rich and another for poor—e.g., as in France, where French is the language of the upper classes and of literature, and where the many "patois" are the household tongues of the heart and home of the lower; it is in these "patois," whether in the North or South, Burgundian, Gascon, or Provençal, that the finest Noëls are invariably found. It is a slight account of some of these Noëls in South-western France, and its neighbour Spain, that we shall endeavour to give.

Two derivations have been given of the word "Noël." One, perhaps the less probable, makes it a contraction of nouvelles, les bonnes nouvelles—"the good news of the gospel." The other adopted by Littré, takes it as an abbreviation of the Gascon or Provençal nadaü, nadal, which undoubtedly is the Latin natalis—i.e., dies natalis, "the birthday."

So much for the word. Some Noëls take the form of hymns, a few of which are exceedingly grand, and have apparently been translated from the Latin. Others are religious ballads; many of them are in dialogue, and some evince a no inconsiderable amount of dramatic power. Of those in dialogue the speakers are very various. Sometimes it is an angel who announces the good news to an incredulous shepherd, and the shepherd who replies. In one the conversation is between St. Joseph and the landlord of the inn at Bethlehem; in another between a Jew and a Christian; in another, Climène and Sylvandre are the somewhat sentimental speakers. Some are trialogues, and an angel and two demons are the debaters, or the three kings, or magi. In such cases the Noëls are occasionally macaronic; the French, Latin, and patois, being all three used, or only two of them. The angel generally speaks in Latin, or in polite French, while the peasants reply in much rougher style, in patois. As an example, we give a verse in French and Latin—

Voici le roi des nations,
Natus ex sacrâ Virgine,
Ce Fils de bénédiction,
Ortus de David semine,
Voici l'Etoile de Jacob,
Quam prædixerat Balaam,
Ce Dieu qui détruit Jericho,
In clarâ terrâ Chanaam

In others the angel begins in French, and the shepherd replies in patois—

ANGEL.

A God to you appeals;
Come, shepherd, leave your rest.
Hasten with ardent zeal
Towards your Saviour blest.
The great God of Thunders
Doth promise from henceforth
The end of all your wars,
And peace for aye on earth.

SHEPHERD (sleeping).

Do let me sleep,
And don't my wits confuse.
Do let me sleep.
Be off, and to your business keep,
For sentinels I have no use;
I've nought to do with your grand news,
Do let me sleep;

and so on through fourteen long verses. But the interlocutors are by no means always of such high distinction, they are sometimes simply husband and wife. The theme of most of such Noëls is the same. One or the other is awakened by a strange light, and hears voices and music, saying, "Christ is born." The believing wife then, in homeliest and most energetic terms, tells her more lazy and incredulous husband to get up and go and see Him.

JEANETTE.

See, sure the sky's a fire!
Put on thy garments, man!
Come, listen to the choir
Whose songs thy ears will charm. Noël.

JEAN.

'Tis but the tambourines
Of our own neighbourhood;
One of our village swains
No doubt's been married. Noël.

JEANETTE.

John, thou art sure not wise
To doubt the words I say;
To see what's in the skies
Thou know'st there's nought to pay. Noël.

This last argument is effective, and up the husband gets, and finds all true. The locality of the Noël almost always reveals itself, by mention of the spots over which the glorious light is seen—

To yonder hill 'tis near,
We'll shortly see it now;
'Tis sure at Beauplaisir,
At Guiche, or at Loustau.

The birth ought always to have taken place at the nearest great house in the neighbourhood, instead of in a stable—

Whoever would have thought,
Since to be born you were,
That you'd not rather sought
Bidache's castle fair?

A present has always to be taken to the Infant God, but they have nothing good enough; and the discussion of this point often brings out in the most pathetic way the extreme poverty in which the French peasant lived before the great Revolution.

JEANETTE.

What is there in our power,
John, that His heart may please?
We've neither fruit nor flowers,
Nor bread, nor even cheese.

JEAN.

Of wood we've not a stake;
He's perishing of cold;
Some bundles let us take
Of vine twigs, and some clothes.

JEANETTE.

This little meal shall make
(Which lately we had ground)
A goodly girdle cake,
When we the Child have found.

The shepherds and mountaineers have a very pleasing fashion of singing these Noëls in dialogue. Originally they seem to have been intended to have been sung antiphonally in church; but for many years this has been discontinued, on account of the effect which their exceeding naïveté and directness has on the risible muscles of a modern congregation. So now they are chiefly sung as the waits sing carols, during Advent, or most of all, when going to the midnight service on Christmas Eve. Then the singers, to the number of eight or ten, walk about three or four paces apart, and one set takes one character, and one the other. Nothing is more pleasant than to hear these bands descending from the mountains, and converging by different, often very winding, paths, to the village church. The Béarnais mountaineers have generally fine voices, and sing well in parts. When mellowed by a little distance, and the different voices are caught now clearer, now softer, according to turns and inequalities of the ground, the effect is very charming. As the parties unite, the merry laugh or cordial greeting and Christmas good wishes are heard on all sides, as they pause for a few moments before entering the church porch. One wonders not then that the midnight service at Christmas should prove one of the most popular religious festivals in France — equally popular in the great cities, where the finest singers obtainable burst into the "Gloria in Excelsis," and in the country where the peasants sing these Noëls, in a tongue which the citizen would not comprehend.

But the charm is not confined to peasants. Hear how one of the most graceful of modern French writers, Eugénie de Guerin, describes to her brother in Paris a walk to a midnight service in the mountains of the South:—

"Christmas has come; beautiful festival, which I love the most, and which brings as much joy to me as to the shepherds of Bethlehem. Truly one's whole soul joins in the welcome to God, which is announced from all sides by hymns and by the pretty nadalet.* Nothing at Paris can give you an idea of what Christmas is. . . . We all went, papa walking first, on a delicious night. Never was there a finer sky than that of this midnight, so that papa from time to time thrust his head out of his great hooded coat to look upwards. The ground was white with frost, but we were not cold; the air besides was warmed by the bundles of pine torches which our servants carried before us for light. It was charming, I assure you; and I longed to have you walking with us to the church on paths bordered with little bushes, white as if they had been in flower. We saw one spray so beautiful that we wished to make a bouquet of it for the decoration of the church, but it melted in our hands. . . I slept at the parsonage; the rector's good sister kept me, and made me an excellent nightcap of hot milk. Papa and Mimi came to warm themselves at the huge fire of the Souc de Nadal" (Yule-log).

The hospitality of the country parsonage is most cordially and fully exercised this evening. In some parts of the Béarnais mountain district it is the custom, where the people come from far, to bring with them a choice lamb decked with ribbons and flowers, which is killed and dressed during the service and eaten afterwards, as a breakfast by those who could not return and be back before the services of Christmas Day. One recently-appointed priest thought within himself, "What a pity it was to kill these pretty creatures! If he could but keep them alive there would be another lamb next year, then another, at last quite a little flock, and the wool from them would suffice for priestly stockings, comforters, &c." So when his congregation returned from church there was a handsome collation of bread and cheese, soup and wine, but—no hot lamb. But one must rise very early in the morning to get the better of a long-headed Béarnais peasant. Not a word was said. But the next year no lamb appeared, and the good priest found that there was no likelihood of any lamb appearing on other conditions than those of its being consumed. So to this day lambs are slaughtered and eaten on Christmas Day in the Valley of Labassère.

Few things have provoked more derision than the singing of our English churches and chapels, where, as Pope has it—

> Heaven is won by violence of song.

The repetition of the same syllable again and again without regard to the sense has been held up especially for reprobation. But what can we say to this imitation of the angels' music as the chorus to a Noël?—

> Fa, fa, fa, sol, la, mi, la, mi,
> Re, mi, re, mi, fa,
> La, fa, sol, la, mi, la, mi, re,
> Mi, fa, sol, la.

Or this other:

> Courons au, zau, zau,
> Courons plus, plus, plus;
> Courons au, courons plus,
> Courons au plus vite.
>
> Le plus beau, beau, beau,
> Le plus fro, fro, fro;
> Le plus beau, le plus fro,
> Le plus beau fromage,
> De notre village.

Or another burden: "Tararou, pou, pou; tararou pou, pou," and almost any number of similar endings tacked on to verses which are serious, and sometimes beautiful in their simple piety.

The Noël is very wide in its sympathies and its toleration. It is striking to see how men's hearts warmed at this season. Theological dogma could not permit Jews to be introduced rejoicing at the birth of Christ; Mahommedans too, always excepting el Rey Moro, the Moorish king, one of the three magi, would find no place. But these Noëls included all they could. Thus there are Cagots' Noëls, and singularly beautiful gipsies' Noëls. There is also a beasts' Noël and a birds' Noël. From these we will give some extracts. The finest of the gipsy Noëls was composed in

* Nadalet. A peculiar fashion of ringing the church bells on Christmas Eve.

1680 by a bénéficier of the cathedral of Aix. The form is dramatic. Each of the three gipsies, after a short introduction, tells in turn the fortunes of the Holy Child, His mother, and St. Joseph :—

NOËL DES BOHÉMIENS.

"Naoutrés sian trés Booumians."

Three wandering gipsy loons are we,
People's good fortunes we do tell;
Three wandering gipsy loons are we,
We pick and steal where'er we be.
Thou loving Child, so full of charm,
With silver quickly cross my palm,
And each shall tell Thee all
Henceforth shall Thee befall.
John, do thou try
Immediately
The lines within His hand to spy.

Equal to God, I see,
In dignity,
His Son, worthy
To be adored.
Equal to God, I see,
In dignity,
Thou'rt born for me
Into the world.
A child Thee love did make
For human nature's sake;
A virgin Thee did bear
Without a father's care;
All this from out Thy hand I take.

Still a great secret there doth lie
Which John to Thee dared not to tell.
Still a great secret there doth lie
Shall take effect right speedily.
Come, quickly come, Messiah grand,
Place, quickly place, within my hand
The silver piece
That may our hearts rejoice.
John will then divine.
Sweet Infant mine,
Give it to us that we may dine.

Amid such varied means
Something is to be seen,
For our weal
Full hard to bear.
Amid such varied means
Something is to be seen
For our weal
Harsh and severe.
Yes, there a cross I see
Shall our salvation be;
And, if to say so I may dare,
Why Thou a martyr's pangs dost bear
Comes of Thy too great charity.

But there remaineth something still,
Abutting on the line of life.
But there remaineth something still,
I'll tell to Thee. Be still awhile.
Come now, come now, Infant fair,
Thy little hand give quickly here;
And I'll foretell to Thee
Something more pleasing far to hear.
But hand the money here,
For fear
Thou otherwise may'st nothing hear.

God Thou art; and mortal too!
Since Thou art so
Short time Thou'lt go
In our humanity.
But Thy Divinity
Is from eternity.
Of all life Thou art the spring;
And Thy infinite Being
Bounded by nought can be.

Wilt Thou not that we should say
Something to Thy mother blest?
Wilt Thou not that we should pay
At least to her our homage?—say.
Lovely lady, hither come;
For to us ere now is known,
That in your snowy hand
Lies a myst'ry deep and grand.
Thou who art so polite,
To her relate
Something may her delight

Thou art of royal blood!
Thy house e'er stood
Highest in good
Within the world.
Thou art of royal blood!
Thy house e'er stood
Highest in good.
From what I see,
Thy Son, He is thy Lord,
His Father is thy God.
What greater lot for thee,
Child of thy Lord to be,
And Mother of thy God?

And thou, thou good old man,
Standing at the manger's end;
And thou, thou good old man,
Wilt thou not that we read thy hand?
Say, p'rhaps some fear dost feel
Lest we should the donkey steal
That's tied to yonder stake?
Rather would we the Infant take.
Some silver coin here lay,
Kind sir, we pray;
We've not yet drunk to-day.

These lines to me impart
How great thou art,
How good thy heart,
And also that thou'rt just.
These lines to me impart
How great thou art,
How good thy heart,
And loved of all.
Ah! holy husband, tell,
Hast thou observèd well
A holy abstinence?
Thou guardest Providence,
Should It not guard thee well?

Now indeed we clearly see
That Thou didst come into the world.
Now indeed we clearly see
That Thou didst come in poverty.
Fair Child, nought more of that we'll say,
Since there we see Thee naked lie.
And Thou didst fear, from what we see,
To fall in gipsies' company!
Fair Child, fear need not touch Thy heart
Since God Thou art.
Hear our farewell, ere we depart.

Should too much liberty
Be cause that we
Foretold to Thee
Thy future fate:
Should too much liberty
Be cause that we
Have spoke to Thee
Too openly:
Full humbly Thee we pray,
That in the selfsame way
Thou our good fortune deign to make;

And grant that we thereof partake
Through all eternity.

We have met with another gipsy's Noël in Spanish nearly as beautiful as the above, "The Gipsy Woman's Prophecy:"

LA PREDICCION DE LA GITANA.

A gipsy woman once came forth,
And to the Virgin pure drew near;
Her knees she bent upon the earth,
And thus her fortune told to her.
The things I know,
My darling sweet,
Within my heart
Close-locked I keep.

"Mother of love, surpassing fair,"
Thus unto Mary did she say,
"The Child to Egypt thou wilt bear,
With Joseph with thee on the way."
The things I know,

&c. &c., through eleven verses. And also a fragment in the same language, called

EN EL PORTAL DE BELEN.

The gipsy boys have entered in
At the gates of Bethlehem,
And, the rogues, the new-born Child
Of His clothes have quite despoiled.
Ah, the naughty, thievish rogues,
Olive faces, sour as sloes!
The Child of clothes they have bereft,
Not a rag have they Him left!

This last fragment leads us to observe what very free reins the Spaniards give to their imagination when treating of these themes. Their fancies are often graceful and tender, with a not irreverent playfulness, which is very pleasing. But the incidents related go far beyond those of the Gospels—nay, even of the apocryphal Gospels; though some doubtless are traditionally derived from them. Thus the Spanish Noëls of the "Noche Buena," (the Good Night,) or the "Noche de Navidad" (Night of the Nativity), as it is indifferently termed, tell you, not only that our Lord was born between the ox and the ass or mule, and the names of the three kings, or magi—Melchor, Gaspar, and Baltasar—and that one of them was a black man, but they know the names of the shepherds too—Blas, Nicolas, and Tomas; and not only that, they know the names of the dogs which accompanied them.

"'But why is he called Melampo?' persisted the child, with that child's zeal for interrogation, which their elders ridicule instead of respecting.

"'He is called so,' replied the good Elvira, 'because it is the name of one of the dogs which went to Bethlehem with the shepherds to see the new-born Child. They were three—Melampo, Cubilon, and Lobina, and the dogs which bear these names never go mad.'" *

But this is an enticing subject, and space warns us to close. We will conclude with a short specimen of the Hymn-Noël from the Basque; in order to give one example from the strangest language of South-western France, although the Basque Noëls are not so remarkable as some others.

NOELA.

Dugun alegrantcietan.

With joy and glad delight
The birth of Jesus sing,
And with all our might Honour God's Son our King.
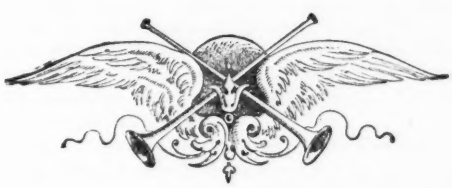
O Jesus, may Thy grace
Sin from our hearts efface.



We hear the angels raise
Their heavenly hymns on high;
And we the Lord will praise
With hearty sympathy.
O Jesus, may Thy grace
Sin from our hearts efface.

Shepherds and kings of might
At Jesu's feet fall prone,
By that all glorious sight
To us our God is known.
O Jesus, may Thy grace
Sin from our hearts efface.

Jesus, in winter's frost
Straw formeth all Thy bed;
How can we be so lost
As be by pleasures led!
O Jesus, may Thy grace
Sin from our souls efface.

Thy childhood's lowly state
Doth preach humility
To us, who elevate
Ourselves vaingloriously.
O Jesus, may Thy grace
Sin from our souls efface.

* Fernan Caballero, "La Familia de Alvareda."

XUM

THE HOLLOW FARM: A LOVE STORY.

BY GEORGE BARNETT SMITH, AUTHOR OF "ALDEN OF ALDENHOLME," ETC.

THE scene in which this little story is laid is one of those picturesque spots which abound in the Midland counties of England—counties which are famed for a certain quiet beauty not to be met elsewhere. You have, perhaps, been travelling all day, country fashion, and not by the swift, hurrying aid of the railway, when, just as the sun is setting, you ascend a gentle eminence, and from the heights look down upon pastoral charms which cannot fail to excite the most pleasurable emotions. You discover that the old country has more landscapes worthy of remembrance than you had previously credited her with, and resolve in future to see what she has to offer before discounting her advantages as compared with those of Continental lands. The prattling brook, the broad fields, the woods and the hillocks, all combine to constitute a picture whose impress is left on the memory many days after the visit has terminated, and the gazer once more mingles in the busy hum of the city. Even in winter these districts are beautiful; there is not so much life, not so much music, for the songsters are still; but there is a quiet which is exceedingly restful, and the "rude" season, as it is generally termed, has phases and periods of supreme attractiveness.

In such a landscape as we have been describing the village of Fairleigh is situated, and the day on which we are to be introduced to its vicinity is Christmas Eve in the year 1867. Its closing hours promised for the memorable day which succeeded it one of those seasons regarded as peculiarly suitable to that sacred period. A calm that might almost be felt pervaded the earth, a fit prelude to the approaching time of joy. The beams of the dying sun, as they fell athwart the fields, had no power to dissolve the pure white snow, but they caused a million feathery diamonds to sparkle in the light. The atmosphere was of an intense cold, though, withal, clear and bracing. Looking across the wide meadows, the hedges were almost obliterated by the depth of the soft, white element, whilst it hung over the branches of the lofty trees in a myriad fantastic shapes. The earth appeared beautiful as one attired in her white, spotless bridal robes.

The Hollow Farm was situate about a mile from Fairleigh, and had probably taken its name from the hollow which extended for a considerable distance—as far as Milton Wood—on one side of it, and on the other reached forward to the village. It was one of those desirable residences which are now fast disappearing, but which were erected with a view to the comfort of our forefathers, who certainly appear to have surpassed us in this respect, if we have left them far behind in others. The Farm was built mostly of wood, and possessed those deep, projecting windows, in which were snug corners—the dear retreat of lovers at all times, and in summer very delightful as one sat at the open window and enjoyed the fragrance of the growths, which covered the walls with their luxuriance, and almost obscured the glaring sun from the windows. The rooms were spacious and lofty, and the furniture quaint as became the habitation.

But as to the occupants of the Farm; for here, after all, does the interest in any human abode lie. They were only two (in addition to the maid-servants and the men-servants)—viz., Mr. Joshua Gilbert and his daughter. Mr. Gilbert had been enabled by nature to support the general idea of the farmer, which apportions to that individual a frame of considerable bulk and a most jovial temper. Maintaining an excellent character for hospitality, there were few individuals in the district who were so generally approved, or who won more encomiums from all classes of people. Considerate to a degree to those beneath him, he was also a favourite with others of a higher social status than himself, who found much shrewd intelligence mingled with his good humour. He had not been without his troubles, however, though these had not been instrumental in altogether crushing his spirits, and rendering him a prey to melancholy. His one great trial had been the loss of the partner of his life some years before the date of this narrative; but for the sake of his beloved daughter he endeavoured, as far as possible, to conceal the effects of the wound which had been struck deeply into his heart—how deeply none but himself could ever know. He set himself to cheer the only being left to him, and who, to his sad knowledge, was also grieving over a loss which was as irreparable as his own. Mother and daughter, who had lived together with scarcely a break, had been torn asunder; and for a long period it appeared as though the latter must for ever remain inconsolable. But Time, whose mission it is to reconcile us to the inevitable, slowly drew the years along, and solaced at length by many blandishments the spirit bounding with the pulse of youth.

To say May Gilbert was fair would only be giving utterance to an opinion proverbial amongst story-tellers when describing their heroines; suffice it to say, without more minute description, that she was perfect in her witchery, and as utterly unlike the generally accepted beau-ideal of a farmer's daughter as possible. The bloom of health, those carnation tints which Nature knows so well how to dispose, certainly made beautiful her cheek; but there was none of the robustness, almost degenerating into coarseness, or embonpoint, visible in her form. Lithe and supple, she yet possessed a grace of movement which is supposed to be the monopoly of the city belle alone, and the result of a studious course of "deportment." To look upon her was to admire; with many it was to love. She could, on occasion, shake her locks coquettishly, and the dancing light of her eye caused great devastation amongst the male hearts of her acquaintance. The great question was, who was to be the inheritor of the treasure? But whilst each individual discussed his own probabilities, May preserved her own secret—one which they recked not of. With such a daughter under his care, who could marvel that her father, with no other object in life than her welfare, should dote upon her as a treasure far surpassing money or lands? Occasionally he became irritable if she appeared to thwart him in his wishes; but the sight of her tears—the most effective weapons ever wielded by woman—would at once transform the irate parent into the willing slave.

As the light waned fast, and the shadows began to gather about the Farm, two persons stood in the broad recess by the window, watching the rapid approach of evening, and yet engaged in earnest conversation meanwhile, as could be gathered from their varied gestures. May was one of these persons, and the expression of her face after the conversation had proceeded to some length, combined with the generally pensive attitude of her figure, interpreted the interview in which she was engaged to be one of a not altogether pleasant character. The eyes of the sweet girl of twenty were moist with emotion as she listened to the pleadings of one who stood by her, and whose conversation we must make bold to convey to the reader. His impassioned looks lent to a countenance not otherwise strikingly agreeable a fascination which would have been dangerous to the heart of many a fair one brought under its spell. But with May, on the contrary, it only seemed to increase the distress of her spirit.

Her companion was Sir Robert Milton, of Milton Castle, whose grounds ran close to Mr. Gilbert's fields, and whose noble residence could be viewed from any portion of the farm. The baronet was neither old, clever, nor, as we have hinted, handsome; but there were a cheerfulness and bonhomie in his countenance which stood him in good stead, and made him a favourite wherever he appeared. Latterly, however, he had been missed a great deal from his old haunts, and from his old society. Miss Pilkington, the daughter of the rich merchant whose estates were not many miles from Sir Robert's, was suddenly overcome with chagrin at her titled neighbour's coolness. She called it gross neglect. Nay, it was more; was it not heartlessness for him to disappear just when all her plans had been carefully laid, and she considered the landing of the fish but a matter of time? It was true she was not beautiful; far otherwise. Nature had been exceedingly sparing of her embellishments with regard to her person; but then she was immensely rich, and had been taught to consider that on that ground a match between herself and the proprietor of Milton Castle would be both suitable and desirable. The Pilkingtons had no "family," you see, and were anxious to be engrafted upon a respectable stock. It was natural, therefore, that when thwarted in her ambitious project, Miss Pilkington should chew the cud of bitter misfortune with a very ill grace.

Sir Robert Milton was now pleading with a passionate earnestness with his fair companion, but his suit seemed to meet with very little favour. Once he attempted to take her hand, but she withdrew it instantly from his grasp, and appeared to listen almost in pain to his beseeching words.

"May," he said, "you know how I have loved you long—that I have sought nothing in the world, and care for nothing but your love. Nearly two years have passed since I dared to refer to my passion before you. When first I mentioned it, you did not know your own heart."

"Sir!"

"Forgive the expression, for the thought it conveys has ever been my comfort. I have hoped and still hoped that you did not know your heart, and the wish to discover you did not has been my food. Make me happy now by confessing that I am not indifferent to you."

"Sir Robert," returned May with emotion, "I'm a poor unfortunate girl, for I cannot love you. I know you have a noble nature, but I have not given you my heart, and without that I could never be your—your wife."

"Why not?" asked the baronet. "Love will come with the years."

"No—no," rejoined May; "we cannot bid love come at will, and to commence life without it would but perpetuate and intensify misery."

"Ah!" sighed Sir Robert, "the fears I have sometimes indulged, in spite of my desires, were too well founded. You have not forgotten my rival yet. I was buoyant with the secret assurance that time had effaced his name from your memory. Tell me, is it not true that you cannot look favourably upon Robert Milton because you believe Dick Handley may yet be alive?"

"Sir Robert, this is the first time in our long acquaintance that I have felt you to be ungenerous. It is unmanly to treat a defenceless girl thus. Were it true what you say, is not that all the greater reason why you should not have mentioned the subject in my presence?"

"Forgive me, May," hastily replied the baronet, "and let the warmth of my love be the best excuse I can offer for conduct which I can now clearly see is incapable of justification."

"Let the matter be entirely a thing of the past, and let us converse upon other topics," answered Miss Gilbert.

"Not yet," said the other; "promise me before I go that if you are still free in six months from this you will listen favourably to my suit. I cannot bear to look upon scenes which are dear to me unless you consent to share them with me. Give me a hope, or else I must leave Milton Castle, never, I fear, to return."

"Oh, Sir Robert! think of the many claims upon you, and act worthy of your name. Do not leave your sphere for me; you can do much good, which it is your duty to perform. Besides, you may find some one more suitable in station than I am, who will love you and make your life noble and happy."

"I thought Miss Gilbert knew enough of the passion to know that it could not be placed at will, and that it laughed at what the world chose to call suitability."

May blushed, but added—"Indeed, the wish for your happiness was genuine. I still think it possible that you may meet with one who will fulfil all the conditions which even you would impose."

"Never! never! listen, May," and Sir Robert spoke with strong energy, for he was considerably moved now, "I care not what becomes of me if you do not give me your love. Death would be better welcome than life would be endurable; for the grave would give me the peace I could not enjoy while another was blessed with your smiles. Tell me, as I go from you, that I need not utterly despair. Remember your father: he is not indifferent to me; and think what a joyous family we should be, while my position is such as to enable those I love to live in comfort for ever. Say that if you are free in six months I may renew my suit with hope. Speak, May, save me or kill me!"

He grasped her hand and she could not withdraw it. He then poured out every argument he could think of to induce her to consent to his proposal. She wept and sobbed audibly, for she saw the real strength of his passion. But he only redoubled his ardour. He sank on his knee beside her, and still holding her hand tightly in his, begged her for dear life to speak but one word of comfort.

"Go! go!" she burst forth in anguish; "leave me to think, Sir Robert, for my heart is breaking."

That was an appeal which he could not resist. He kissed her hand and was gone. Not without some lingering hope of success at a future period. As he wended his way across the fields he thought of her as gradually relenting and being drawn towards him. She had not wholly repulsed him.

But what of May? With her head resting in her hands, she wept bitterly and bewailed her lot. On this eve of the sweetest day of all time, her heart was filled with unrest, and like the homeless bird saw nothing before it but a wild waste of waters. Her soul told her she had done right in rejecting Sir Robert Milton's offer, and yet when the image of her father rose up before her, and she thought of the affluence she could have secured for him had she yielded, she was sad. Her nature was not selfish, and there was but a narrow stream to cross into the paradise beyond—or what would have been such to her parent.

Another reason, also, which lent additional weight to the entreaties of the lover who had just left her was the position of her father, which she vaguely knew to be somewhat precarious at this moment. The times and the seasons are not in mortal hands, except so far as ingeniously using them, and they had fought against Mr. Gilbert during recent years in a manner unparalleled in his history. He was a man of considerable energy, and had laboured hard to overset his difficulties and pave the way for making a smooth path in life for his daughter. It seemed, however, that his hopes were doomed to disappointment: with each succeeding year his prospects grew darker, and he was in the habit of spending many sad hours which the second occupant of the Farm was not allowed to share in, and of whose passage, in fact, she was not even aware. The skeleton in his cupboard was the pang when the thought struck him that probably his darling child would have nothing from him but his honest name, when it should please Providence to remove him from the scene of his toils. Secretly he had again and again considered his position, but derived no comfort thereby; the outlook was dark and lowering, and, strive as he may, it was impossible altogether to shake off the feeling of sadness which supervened.

May well knew that her father would have blessed her had she taken Sir Robert Milton, but she had obtained his promise that if Richard Handley ever returned she should marry her own true lover. For this reason, therefore, Mr. Gilbert never pressed his daughter on the subject of Sir Robert, but, as she was yet young, he waited for the train of events.

"Oh, Dick! dear, dear Dick! why do you not come back?" cried the agonised girl. "You do not know what I am bearing for you."

And with head bowed through deep grief sat the beautiful May. The interview she had just gone through had unnerved her at last. It had brought up a crowd of poignant recollections which would not be suppressed, and her feelings therefore had their way. The darkness fell fast, as she sat watching the burning embers, having sought refuge in her own chair by the fireside, where she had often sat in days gone by with the stalwart form of the absent Dick by her side. Strange that one whom she so deeply loved should be so far away, whilst another who deeply loved her was her next neighbour, and also sat in lonely despair, fearful lest the treasure which he hoped almost against hope might yet be his, should finally slip from his grasp. The cross purposes of the world were once more exemplified. On many hearths upon that Christmas Eve the joy of meeting after a long absence was being experienced; but she was shut out by a cruel fate from participating in such profound happiness. The expectations which had been so strongly fostered were again destroyed, and she was alone.

By-and-by her father came into the room. He saw that his daughter had been weeping, and accordingly drew her towards him and caressed her. He stroked her silken hair, and spoke soothing words to her, which served almost to increase her sadness and perplexity. Surmising the nature of the interview which had just terminated, he gradually drew from May the details of the conversation—at least so much of them as served to elucidate the position of the two persons most intimately concerned. She told him that she had not given Sir Robert a flat refusal, and that she was afraid he would construe her confusion into encouragement. This she had never intended, and the reflection had made her miserable. Mr. Gilbert told her to dry her tears.

May looked up in happy astonishment at finding him so cheerful. It was not what she had expected. She smiled through her tears.

"They shall not run away with my treasure," he said, "till she is perfectly willing to go."

"And when will that be?" she inquired archly.

"Nay, nay, I do not know. Surely that is better known to you than to your silly old father, who will never be able to bear the parting with complacency."

"Nothing will separate us," returned May, as she wound her arms round his neck; "I have given myself to you first of all."

"Nonsense, child, we shall see," Mr. Gilbert replied, inwardly pleased nevertheless at this mark of filial devotion.

It will have been perceived by the above brief conversation that Mr. Gilbert was a sensible man, except in the eyes of those who are given to match-making, and those who sometimes give themselves in matches. The violence of May's emotions gradually assuaged, and the colloquy at length fell into a quiet groove. With a judiciousness that did him credit, Mr. Gilbert distracted his daughter's mind from the exciting topic which had lately occupied it, and went on to inquire as to the decorations which had been made for Fairleigh Church on the occasion of the Christmas services.

In these decorations May had taken a prominent part, and assured her father that they were of the most chaste and beautiful description. The young curate had been down to the "dear old church" in the afternoon, and had pronounced them "ekthkwithite,"—praise surely lavish enough to satisfy May and her fair assistants. Fairleigh was famous for the reverence with which the recurring anniversary of the birth of Christ was kept.

The question of church beautifying having been exhausted, and May having answered queries on other subjects, and told her father that she had now become more calm, she had just risen to ring for lights when a loud knocking was heard at the door. She ran to the window, but by this time it was quite dark, and she could distinguish nothing of the form of the visitor.

Who could it be? Not Sir Robert returned? Yet Mr. Gilbert looked at his daughter in such a manner as to convince her that the same thought had struck both simultaneously.

The servant entered the room.

"A stranger, miss. Wouldn't give his name. Said he wanted to see either Mr. or Miss Gilbert."

"Show him in, Mary," said May, perplexed greatly as to his identity.

The stranger was a tall, handsomely-made man, as was seen when he unfolded a large cloak which he had wound round him. He merely bowed to Mr. Gilbert, who asked him to what circumstance he was indebted for the visit. Before the stranger could speak, and in order to identify him if possible, Mr. Gilbert stirred the fire somewhat fiercely. The coals burned brightly and shed a ruddy glow over the room. But ere Mr. Gilbert could turn round from his occupation, May with a startled cry had recognised the visitor.

"Dick! Dick!" she exclaimed, and fell into the arms of her lover of old. There was silence for some moments, while the stranger pushed back the flowing hair from the young girl's forehead, the better to drink in the expression of her loving eyes. He grasped Mr. Gilbert's hand, but the first words he uttered were—"My darling, I have come again, and the long, long separation is over."

"Thank God, Dick, you are safe," said May; "but, oh! Dick! wasn't it cruel not to write to me for ten long months?"

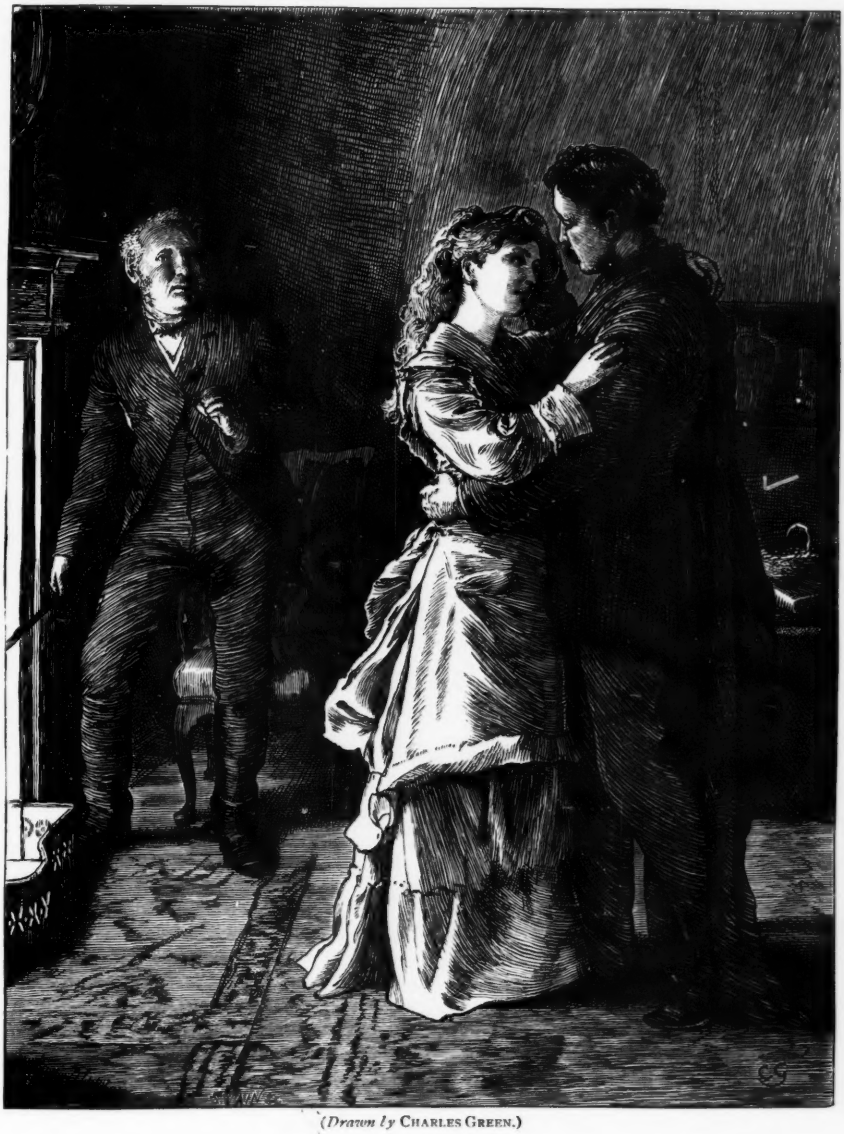
"Ten months!" ejaculated the other in a tone of surprise. "I have written always once a month, and wondered why I ceased hearing from you. At last I could bear the suspense no longer, and determined to return."

"Never to go back again," added Mr. Gilbert.

"No, no, never, Dick," whispered May, as she clung to her overjoyed lover.

It is needless to add she drew from him a promise in accordance with this asseveration, because it is well known that when a woman chooses she can assume an air which is irresistible, and which makes the title of "the stronger sex" when applied to man appear a complete misnomer. Here, however, Handley's views were in complete accord with those of his questioner. He did not desire to return, and if he had done so, a wish from May's lips, enforced by such glances as she could have given, must have melted his obdurate heart. And now, on this Christmas Eve, he told the story of his wanderings, like Othello of old. The father invited him, the daughter questioned him, and he became eloquent as even the most prosaic of individuals must under similar circumstances. He had seen much and borne much, but beyond a bronzed cheek there was nothing to show that he had dwelt in a foreign land, much less gone through dangers the record of which was well worth listening to.

May drank in eagerly every word of his narrative, and the changing smiles and sighs which she gave fully attested her pride in, and solicitude for the narrator.



The story ended, and for one person in the group it was much too short. At length the hour of parting came; but how sweetly closed that day, which had opened with no hope, and as it progressed had brought so much sorrow for May! Another instance had been afforded of the close contiguity of joy and sorrow; of the fact that when the atmosphere is ofttimes at its blackest darkness the glorious light is immediately beyond.

Fairleigh Church on the morrow bore witness to the fact that Christmas had dawned—and that at a very early period, too, as the old bell-ringer could testify, for he had trudged across the snow when the inhabitants of the village were tranquilly sleeping. But of course he did not begrudge his journey on this occasion, which of all his duties in the year was the most pleasurable. On the quiet air, under his instrumentality, broke the sound of happy bells, which somehow seem to sound doubly sweet when the fields are covered with snow. Clash! went the merry peal, rousing the somnolent villagers, and reminding them—if, indeed, any reminder were necessary—of the blessed morn upon which the world had entered. Unlike the song of the waits, the bells were heard far and near, as they chanted the staves suitable to the period—which never seem to grow old.

With bright and ruddy face May presided at the breakfast table at the Hollow Farm, and as she poured out the tea she could scarcely grasp the whole truth that by her side sat one whom, but yesterday, she imagined to be thousands of miles distant. Then her countenance fell as her thoughts travelled for a moment as far as Milton Castle, and she pictured to herself the disappointment in store for its owner. She was not selfish in her happiness, and experienced a momentary feeling of unfeigned sorrow for Sir Robert, wishing that with some one else it had been his lot to be as happy as she herself was at that moment. The cloud over her brow was, however, but temporary, for how could it be otherwise under the existent circumstances? She was speedily herself again, and Mr. Gilbert rallied her upon her improved looks, which only deepened the crimson upon her cheek. As for Dick, if he had not been happier than the pen of poet could depict, he would undoubtedly have been the most ungrateful creature in God's universe.

But it would have been folly to have supposed otherwise, as he was afterwards walking to church with May and her father.

Many on the way identified an old acquaintance, and, after the first surprise at so sudden an apparition had been conquered, expressed the pleasure they felt at his return. Meanwhile, May's heart fluttered in a kind of nervous excitement, for she was afraid of encountering Sir Robert's gaze—or, at least, if not afraid, unwilling to do so, because of the pain the baronet would necessarily feel on recognising her companion. She had not yet told Handley of Sir Robert's proposal, though she fully intended to do so. This circumstance also added to her embarrassment. In church, however, Mr. Gilbert's pew was some distance behind that of Sir Robert Milton, and the latter had already taken his seat before the party from the Farm arrived. Service over, the congregation prepared to depart, and to May's trepidation her father did not essay to move from his seat, thus keeping her in the pew, and compelling her to engage in conversation with Handley. At last she saw the baronet approaching, and her terror increased. As he got near to the pew Sir Robert was about to exchange salutations with Mr. Gilbert when his eye rested upon the other occupants of the pew. For a few moments he was spell-bound, and his gaze was fixed.

(Drawn by CHARLES GREEN.)

"'Thank God, Dick, you are safe,' said May."

"HOLLOW FARM"—p. 30.

"Is it possible?" he then exclaimed—"Dick Handley!" and he immediately fell down in the aisle. Several of the parishioners rushed to his assistance, and discovered at once that the baronet had been seized with a fit. Aid was procured, and he was speedily conveyed to the Castle. Considerable speculation was of course rife in the village as to the cause of the sad event, but the gossips were at fault, and much chagrined that, according to their view, there was no reasonable ground to be assigned for it. It was not known that Sir Robert had been accustomed to such attacks, and this only rendered the matter the more puzzling. What was of far more importance, however, than their idle speculations, was the satisfactory fact that Sir Robert gradually recovered, much to the relief and joy of his tenant, Mr. Gilbert, in particular, who entertained a profound feeling of respect and friendship for him.

The wedding-day of May and Dick was now fixed, but before it arrived Sir Robert Milton had taken his departure from the Castle, going abroad, as his solicitor reported, for some years. Miss Pilkington was in blank despair. Her chances with the erewhile friendly baronet looked more dubious than ever, if not absolutely hopeless. She tried to reconcile herself to his loss, comforting herself with the reflection that a person of so eccentric a disposition was, after all, not such a desirable partner for life as she had once imagined.

The day on which he left England a parcel addressed in his handwriting to "Richard Handley, Esq.," was left at the Hollow Farm. The recipient opened the packet, and after mastering its contents, passed over a letter to Mr. Gilbert, being unable for emotion to say more than the words necessary for the intimation to read it.

Mr. Gilbert discovered from the letter that the accompanying document was a deed of gift of the Hollow Farm to Dick Handley and May Gilbert. In the letter the donor referred to their affection for each other, and wished them life-long happiness. This unbounded generosity deprived the three for some moments of the power of utterance. May was the first to break silence.

"God bless him!" she simply said.

"Amen!" responded Mr. Gilbert and Dick.

Sir Robert Milton has not yet returned to his ancestral mansion, but May and Dick are happy at the Farm, and hope some day not far distant to be able to thank their self-sacrificing friend in person.

BOB'S REFORMATION.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," ETC. ETC. IN TWO PARTS.

PART I.—BOB TALKS ABOUT IT.

THE Carrs—father, son, and daughter—lived in Wonderland Place, Bayswater. Major Carr was on half-pay—a stern-looking, handsome man, with a grizzly moustache, and a bald place on the top of his head,—a man who prided himself on being absolute ruler in his own house, and especially over his children.

May Carr was a pretty little blue-eyed girl, with a great relish for fun, and the most decided, but innocent young flirt you could come across in a day's gallop, much less in a day's march.

Robert Carr, the son (his sister always called him Bob), had been a "handfull" to the major. He was handsome, careless, generous, and good-hearted; but up to the present time had distinguished himself chiefly by getting into debt, and by steadily sticking to nothing. He had been brought up for the civil service, but had failed to pass. He thought he should like the law, and read steadily for a couple of months in chambers, then flirted with his landlady's daughter, sold his books, and announced his intention of going abroad. He went, and returned in a year, with his luggage consisting of his tooth-brush. Then there was a desperate quarrel with his father, which resulted in his enlisting (he was only twenty then). He was bought off, of course, promised reformation, and thought he would try authorship; had one article accepted, got into debt on the speculation of making a fortune, had three articles "declined with thanks," and gave up authorship in disgust. Then the major, in despair, got him into a merchant's office; he had eighty pounds a year there, stayed three months, during which period he had wild dreams of being made junior partner or Lord Mayor of London, and gave his orders to the Bayswater tradespeople accordingly; then blotted he ledgers, declared figures were only invented to fill up almanacks, and accepted his dismissal with a philosophical air which excited the admiration of all who beheld it. This was Bob's last exploit. He had only arrived at the mature age of twenty-two in spite of his varied pursuits. He was anxious just now about his debts, concerning the majority of which his father was in blissful ignorance; and he had made up his mind that come what might, he would turn over a new leaf for the future.

"It is an awful bore, Christmas being pay-time," he said to May, as they put up the holly round the dining-room on Christmas Eve; "it so spoils the season to know that every dun a fellow has will soon be clamouring for his money."

"But, Bob dear," May said meekly, "you should not have duns."

"I never thought that Clack and Co. would turn me up. I wish I could make a clean breast of it to the governor and get a fresh start. I really mean it, May, I'm going in for reformation."

"Yes; but, Bob, it is a pity you asked Grace Kenneth to have you till you had something to keep her on. I cannot think how you could be so foolish."

"We are not going to get married yet," he answered. "You see she has no sisters, and her mother has never been a companion for her; and I've been in and out so much that we've got to tell each other our troubles, and I told her about the bills, and how I feared there'd be a storm, and thought I'd better go abroad again; and then she began to cry, and it's awkward when a girl cries, unless you can tell her plainly not to be a little donkey, so I consoled her as well as I could, and told her I was very fond of her, and that cheered her up; and then somehow we agreed that we'd get married some day, and that I should reform and pay off everybody first, and that we would not tell anybody about it till then. I'm going to be a model in future" (he laughed at May's shake of the head), "and she's a jolly little girl, and says she'll wait for ever if I like. I say, where's the mistletoe?"

"Oh, Bob," said May, "I sent it all down-stairs, for Aunt Mary looked so horrified last year, and said she was above it."

"Well, it wouldn't be the slightest use her being beneath it. Here, Jane," he called out, "bring up the mistletoe. There, that's right. Now, May, I'll drag you under it and kiss you, and you shall scream and run away."

"Oh no, please don't," she said imploringly; "you'll rumple all my hair, and I couldn't scream naturally for my own brother."

"Anything going to happen, that you are so particular? I know! Kenneth is coming! We shall have a double event then, and wind up the matrimonial affairs for the whole family, eh, May?"

George Kenneth was a young doctor, whose only fault was that he had no patients. He was Bob's great friend, and had a year before been introduced in that capacity at Wonderland Place. He and May were just in that uncertain stage when neither is sure of the other, and yet each is eager for the crisis they fear. George was the only member of the Kenneth family May knew, for the Carrs were people who never visited or entertained as a rule.

"I believe you are spoony on George, Miss May."

"How can you talk such nonsense, Bob! I am sure I am not," she answered, celebrating that Christmas-tide with a very fine fib; "and as for Mr. Kenneth, I don't believe he cares a bit about me."

"I think he does," said Bob, thoughtfully. "Look here, shall I try and find out?" he added, a bright thought striking him.

"Yes, do," she answered eagerly, "I should like to know; not that I care."

"No, evidently you don't, that's why you are looking so stupid, girls always blush for the wrong man, don't they?"

"Reformation is very hard work," Bob Carr informed his sister a week later. "I have answered every advertisement, and walked into every merchant's office in London during the last week. I'm half a mind to go abroad again. George Kenneth is half a mind to go too; he'd lend me the passage money at a push. If it wasn't for the debts I'd go. George is spoony or he'd go to-morrow."

"Who is it?" asked May, quickly.

"I'll tell you presently; I want you to come up-stairs to my room. I've got in every bill I owe, and have arranged them in an artistic manner round the shelf. Come up and see them;" and they solemnly trudged up and looked at the interesting documents. "There they are," he said; "I stuck them up so that you might take them in at a glance—sum total, ninety-five pounds; balance in hand, nothing at all."

"Oh, Robert! you should not joke about it; and what can all these bills for provisions be for?"

"Oh, they are nothing," he answered carelessly; "some poor people I picked up, and managed to be of a little use to. Those bills prick my conscience least; they were incurred for a righteous end."

"Ah, Bob," answered May, "we may not do evil that good may come; that always seems to me one of the hardest temptations to resist. What is this in this tiny envelope—another bill?"

"No; that is only a note from Gracie; I put it there as an antidote to the other things. Now come out and I'll turn the key, which means that no one is to enter." Then they went down-stairs, and Bob's face became grave and earnest. "I can't tell you how the debts worry me, May dear," he said; "for, in the light in which I see things now, I think that getting into debt without a certainty of being able to pay is only one way of being downright dishonest. I will work steadily in future, if I can get nothing but a crossing to sweep, and I'll pay every one up in time, if it takes till I'm ninety to do it."

"If I were you," said May, "I would tell papa. He might help you."

"Do you think you could feel the way and see how he takes it, May? It would be a grand thing if he would give me one more chance."

"I'll try; I think he might be coaxed over. And now, Bob dear," she went on softly, "tell me who George Kenneth is spoony on."

"You shouldn't use slang; it isn't lady-like," he answered solemnly and grandly, with a mischievous twinkle in his laughing eyes. "Why should I betray George's confidence and tell you about the girl? It is not as if you had cared about him; your feelings might then be an excuse."

"Oh, then it isn't——"

"Me" she was nearly saying, while her heart sank, for though George had not told her that he loved her, she had felt almost certain that he did and had lost her own heart to the upright, manly young fellow who was her brother's friend, and who on one excuse or another had continued for nearly a year to run in and out of the house in Wonderland Place two or three times a week. She could scarcely believe her ears when Bob told her he was thinking of some one else. Besides, a proud woman always feels insulted as well as slighted when she hears that a man who has paid great attention to herself cares for another; so she indignantly checked her tears, and questioned Bob a little further. "Tell me who it is, Bob," she said.

"Well," he answered gravely, "it's evident that you are wildly jealous, and so I'm not sure that it would be safe. You might think it necessary to the upholding of your dignity to do her some bodily harm."

"Oh, how can you talk such nonsense!" she said hotly and indignantly. "Mr. Kenneth is nothing to me."

"Then we won't say any more about it."

"Yes, do, Bob. Is she pretty?"

"Middling," he answered, making a wry face and taking care not to smile. "He thinks so; no doubt you will say she is frightful."

"Have you seen her?"

"Oh yes," he said, solemnly sighing, "I've seen her."

"Tell me her name. And does he care very much for her?" she asked, almost pleadingly.

"Yes, I think he's very fond of her. As for her name, I am not sure that it would be safe under the circumstances to trust you with it, for her sake."

With a gesture of impatience May turned away, almost ready to cry. Girls of eighteen can cry as heartily over their sweethearts when no one sees them as girls of eight can over their biggest dolls.

"May," said her brother, suddenly changing his tone, "there's father coming in at the gate. Could you not tell him about the bills now, and see what can be done? Tell him that I won't disgrace him this time, whatever I have done formerly. I'll go out for half an hour, while you try what you can do. Mind you must not say anything about Gracie. Do your best, May, there's a little darling, and then perhaps I'll tell you the name of George Kenneth's sweetheart, provided you promise not to tear her eyes out. But look here, May, joking aside, I am very anxious about these bills, and if my father would only take me in hand again he should never repent it."

May had no easy task. Major Carr had learnt to consider his son as a blank disappointment, and was getting hopeless of any reformation; not that they were bad friends, on the contrary. Bob, in spite of his faults, had one of those happy dispositions and pleasant tempers that, unless you were absolutely not on speaking terms, or, as he once expressed it, "at fighting pitch," you could not live in the same house with him and not be good friends. Still May had a difficult task; but she did her best, promising amendment and carefulness in the future, and begging her father to try and help him just once more, for the last time; not to pay his debts, he did not ask that, but to help him to quiet his creditors till he could do so himself, and to use any influence he had to put him once more in a position to redeem his character and his credit.

"But," said the major, and there was a great deal of justice in his wrath, "I did not expect to hear of another set of bills."

Still, though it seemed hopeless, May went on, and told him how some of the debts had been for provisions to give away to poor people, so Bob must be good-hearted.

"No," answered her father, sternly. "What did that cost him? Nothing. He was generous at the expense of the tradespeople who trusted him. Real charity is that which involves some self-denial, incurred for the pleasure of doing others good."

Yet he softened in the end, and almost laughed at May's account of how Bob had stuck up the bills round his bedroom mantelshelf; and at last, stroking May's fair head, and thinking inwardly that just for her sake he would not be very harsh to Bob, he went up-stairs to his study, just as George Kenneth knocked at the street-door, and entering the drawing-room found May Carr alone.

If George Kenneth had expected a welcome that evening he was disappointed, for May, remembering what Bob had said, was merely polite and dignified, and freezingly courteous. She had never supposed George Kenneth wished to marry her, nor had she had any idea of his asking her, matrimony was a question she had not troubled her head about; still, if he had not cared for her, and still more, if he cared for some one else, there were a hundred little words and deeds in the past which she felt would have been better unspoken and undone, and which remembering now, made her burn with shame and anger. She determined, however, that he should not flatter himself he had made any impression on her, and at the worst should but conclude she had, like himself, been only flirting. Still she could not help seeing how disconcerted he looked when, half an hour later, he rose to go, and yet lingered as if to say some farewell words.

"I wanted to tell you something, Miss Carr," he said; "I came on purpose, and yet somehow this seems hardly the time to say it."

May's heart began to beat quickly, but she stood her ground. "You had better put it off till some other time," she said stiffly, "for I hear papa calling, and must say good-bye."

She held out her hand, which he took and kept a moment. "Let me tell you now, May, for I fear Bob may do so else, and I want you to hear it from me—something which concerns my happiness very much."

She drew back her hand indignantly. It was insulting, she thought, to make her a confidante. "I have not time now, Mr. Kenneth, papa is calling me. Bob has already told me what you allude to, and while wishing every happiness, you must pardon my adding I have nothing more to say on a subject which cannot concern me. Good-bye;" and she escaped, thankful that she had made her speech so well, and that she had not met his eyes, or she felt she should have broken down.

Twenty-four hours later May was sitting alone in the dining-room. Major Carr was in his study, Bob was out, and she waiting for his return. She was very miserable that evening, for she had innocently brought down a terrible storm on Bob's head. While she had been giving George Kenneth his dismissal, her father had walked up-stairs, with his heart softening in favour of his son, and remembering May's account of how he had stuck up his bills for her edification, on a moment's impulse had entered his son's room—a thing he never did in a usual way. There were the bills still, and his wrath returned as he beheld them. He took them down, and was walking off with them, when suddenly he caught sight of Grace's little note, which Bob had forgotten to return to his pocket. He opened it, and read the sort of love-letter a girl of eighteen generally writes, assuring her own dear Bob that she would always be true to him, and wait as long as he liked, and hoping he would soon get something to do, and get out of debt, though she did not mind how poor they might be in the future, for happy in his love, she would be quite content. Then the storm burst forth. He asked May if she knew anything about it, and May could not deny the knowledge, so shared in his displeasure. Bob came in, and stuck to his colours manfully. He very much regretted his past conduct, and he would try with all his might to redeem his past character, but he would not give up Grace Kenneth. If his father would forego his anger, he would not ask for any help, and would fight his own way in the world, but to absolute control he would not submit. This only inflamed Major Carr the more, and refusing to speak to either of his children all the next day, he kept to his study, while Bob and May tried to make plans for the future. He should go round to his creditors he (Bob) said, and tell them the truth, and ask them to wait, and then, if he failed to get anything in London, he should go abroad. George Kenneth had a couple of hundred, and had told him (Bob) he would lend him the passage money, and perhaps go with him for a year.

Bob went out in the evening, and May was left alone, and passed a dreary hour thinking over the past week, and was wondering whether it would be of any use to try and effect an entrance into her father's study, when suddenly Bob returned, flushed and excited.

"May!" he exclaimed, "look here; do you call that proper conduct in my father? He sent this letter to Mrs. Kenneth." And he dropped the unpaid bills, which the major had not returned to Bob the day before, into her lap, and a note which he had sent with them to Mrs. Kenneth. It was as follows:—

"MADAM,—I understand your daughter and my son intend to get married. With regard to my son, I beg to say that I shall do nothing for him, that he never earned a fifty pound note in his life, and is never likely to do so; and what his prospects in general are, you can perhaps gather from the enclosed bills, which he has not the slightest chance of paying. Whether, therefore, the match is a desirable one, I leave you to decide. —Your obedient servant, "F. CARR."

May's face turned white as she read it, but before she could make any reply, Bob (he had a hot temper when once roused, and it was roused now) snatched the letter from her, and rushed up-stairs to his father's study. Then there came the sound of loud and angry words. "A parcel of beggars marrying without even bread and cheese to eat," she heard her father say. She would not hear more, but stopped her ears and waited in fear and trembling for the result. It came soon; she heard Bob descending the stairs, and her father speaking.

"I forbid you to stay in my house any longer; you may go and do the best you can. I never dared to use such words to my father!" and then Bob entered, and hurriedly kissing her, seized his hat, and went out of the street-door, not to return again for many and many a long day.

* * * * * *

"DEAR MAY,—Send everything of mine to the enclosed address at once; I'm going abroad with Kenneth. I shall come back some day; God bless you, darling, and don't fret. Your affectionate brother "BOB."

"Let everything be sent," said the major, "and never let me hear his name mentioned again."

PART II.—BOB DOES IT.

MONTHS passed, and no tidings came of Bob. May went by Mrs. Kenneth's house once, but it was empty, and a bill up announcing that it was to let, and so she could only wonder in silence how things went on. The major's face became a little careworn, and he grew kinder to May, indulging all her little whim and fancies, excepting when she tried to say a word in favour of her brother. A letter came from Bob at last. He and George Kenneth were in Australia, and he had obtained a good situation in a merchant's office, and was doing well. There was no mention of his father, and Major Carr's face got a little harder as he noticed the omission.

A year went by, and there was a dreary Christmas in Wonderland Place; the second spring came after Bob's departure, and the summer slipped by; autumn sobbed itself away, the snow fell, and the frost sent a death chill into the heart of the last sensitive plant that had not deserted the desolate earth, and then once more Christmas Eve came round again.

"Two years," thought poor little May, sadly, "since Bob and I put up the holly." There was no holly in Wonderland Place that year—nothing to mark Christmas for May and her father, as they sat gravely one on each side of the fire-place that evening, each thinking silently of the wanderer far away. Suddenly May remembered some little direction she had forgotten to give to the servant, so she rose and went down-stairs. Perhaps it was a relief to speak to some one of her own sex, for she lingered a few moments longer than was necessary, and, suddenly there was a little sound outside, and some one softly descended the area steps, and looked in at the uncurtained kitchen window. May looked up, half-frightened, then with a little scream of joy and surprise rushed out, and exclaiming, "Oh, Bob!—oh, dear Bob!" was folded in her brother's arms all in the area and right in front of the kitchen window.

"Was folded in her brother's arms."

It was not a very picturesque place to meet in, but Truth has sometimes but little mercy on Romance.

"Oh, Bob!" she sobbed, as, laughing and crying together, she dragged him into the kitchen, made him sit down, and kneeling before him, looked up into his face, and thought how handsome he had grown. "Oh, dear Bob! to think you've come back!"

Jane discreetly vanished, and the brother and sister were once more alone together. Then May eagerly asked Bob all sorts of questions, and Bob told her how he had been in Australia, and had got a situation in a merchant's office, where he had given so much satisfaction that his employers had sent him over as manager of an English branch. The debts were paid, he informed her, for he had worked hard and earned money after office hours, and they had all trusted him, and Grace Kenneth had been true as steel, and he was going down to Clifton, where she now lived with her mother, to see her as soon as he had settled matters in town. "I am obliged to stay till Tuesday," he went on; "so I went to Mary Taylor's on my arrival, and found she had her two small, shabby drawing-rooms to let, which I took for a week, after she had received me with a scream of astonishment." (Mary Taylor was an old servant who was married, and lived a mile off, in Northland Place, and turned an honest penny by letting some of her rooms.) "Then I thought I'd come and look at the house, noticed the kitchen blind was up, and looking down saw the top of your lovely head; the result was the affecting tableau in the area. There, you have my history complete, May; and now," he continued, "I would give anything to make it up with the old man. It's Christmas-time; don't you think we can get him round? He behaved very sternly to me, you know."

"Oh yes," answered May, "we'll try. Let us go up softly, and take him by surprise." Then she added doubtfully, "How is George Kenneth?"

"Very well, but he didn't succeed out yonder. Just in the spot we were there was a doctor who killed the people so blandly they liked it—a great fellow with two even rows of big white teeth, giving one the idea that he carried about tiny models of the tombstones of all his defunct patients inside his mouth. So George didn't do. However, his Uncle Thomas has died—lucky fellow to have an uncle, eh?—and left him enough money to console him. You lost a good chance, May, though I'm certain he's spoony on you still; I never thought you were going to snub him so."

"I didn't," said May, in astonishment; "you told me he liked some one else."

"I!" he exclaimed; "why, you little goose, you surely never believed my chaff! It was you he told me he liked."

"Oh, Bob!" exclaimed May, sorrowfully, "I snubbed him dreadfully, and I've never liked any one else."

"Oh, haven't you?" he replied; "I'll tell him so."

May could not answer, for she was dragging him softly up the kitchen stairs to the dining-room. They went on tiptoe to the door, which was a little way open, and saw the major with his back towards them.

"Father," said May, putting her hand on his shoulder, "here is Bob come back again."

Her father rose to his feet in a moment, and turning round, faced his children, but not a muscle of his stern, hard face relaxed. "I thought I had forbidden you ever to enter my house again," he said to his son.

"Won't you forget the past, father?" Bob said, holding out his hand; "I have done my best to atone for it. Won't you be friends now, father?"

"No, sir," he answered angrily (and at the sound of his voice May's heart sank with fear and dismay), "I will not. A man who gets into debt again and again, and then tries to marry a girl with the certainty of nothing but debt and poverty and misery before them, shall be no son of mine; and it would take a little longer than two years to make me believe in any reformation of yours. No," and he shook off May's entreating hand, "I will not be friends, sir. I never spoke to my father as you did to me. I forbade you my house then, and I forbid it to you again now."

"Father, let me speak——"

"No, sir, I will not; you have no business here, and I have nothing more to say. Your presence in this house is an intrusion."

Then Bob pulled his cap out of his pocket. "I will never enter it again until you ask me, father," he said; and without another word walked out of the room and out of the house.

"Oh, father!" gasped May, as they stood blankly staring at each other; "oh, father! you might have forgiven him."

Then they sat down and looked at the fire again, till the neighbouring clock struck ten.

"We will read the prayers and then go to bed," Major Carr said; but his voice was dreary, almost sad, it seemed to May.

He rose and brought the Bible and prayer-book from the shelf, as was his custom. He opened the former and read a chapter, but May could not listen, she was thinking of Bob in his lodging, not a mile off. Surely it would be more thorough religion to tell Bob the past was forgotten, she thought, than to sit there reading God's Word, telling of His goodness and mercy, and yet feeling hard and cold and relentless.

Then they knelt down, father and daughter together, the major's even voice sounding clear and distinct in the dull stillness of the room, and his daughter hiding her face in her hands. Suddenly the words, "Our Father, which art in heaven," fell on her ear. All other prayers may be sometimes said with the lips only, but surely that one has power to drive all worldly thoughts away; so May joined her hands, and followed her father, heart and voice. On he went, slowly and distinctly, and softly echoed May's sweet voice the holy words our Lord has taught us, till they came to—"As we forgive them that trespass against us."

Then, forgetting all else, she broke forth, "Oh, father! you have not forgiven Bob!" and moving close to his side, and still kneeling, she put her arms round his neck and burst into tears. "Oh, father!" she said, "you must not say those words, for you have not forgiven Bob."

"What is the matter, May? how dare you interrupt me in this way? Go back to your place."

"Oh no—no!" she pleaded, "how can we go on? It is asking God not to forgive us, if we say that prayer while we are angry with any one. 'Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us——'"

"How dare you interrupt me?" he said again.

"Oh, but, dear father, it is a mockery," she said gently; "you cannot go on until you have taken Bob back." It seemed to May as if she were pleading for two things—Bob's pardon on earth and her father's in heaven. "Oh, forgive him—forgive him now, father, and let to-night end it. It will make to-morrow such a blessed Christmas Day; and remember, as we forgive so shall we be forgiven. You would not spend to-morrow a single mile away from Bob, and yet so very far apart. Listen to me, oh! dear father, pray do!" and then she told him how Bob had paid his debts, and worked his way on, and had won the confidence of his employers, and how he was alone in Mary Taylor's little drawing-rooms in Northland Place.

Major Carr had resumed his seat, and listened to his daughter in silence, but gave no sign of relenting. She was silent at last, and waited for what he might say, still kneeling and looking up at him with beseeching face and tearful eyes. Then, after a moment or two, she turned sadly away from him. "I would give all the world if Bob were here to-night," she said. "Don't you remember how we decked the rooms with holly two years ago, and how happy we were?" Then her eye caught the open book upon the table, and she closed it quietly. "It is no use praying any more till Bob is forgiven," she said slowly. "Father," she added, "won't you forgive Bob, as you some day hope to be forgiven?"

"I never treated my father as he treated his," he repeated; but his face had softened a little, and half-absently, half-tenderly, he smoothed May's rumpled hair.

"But we have all sinned against our heavenly Father," she said, almost hopelessly, for she was beginning to fear it was in vain to plead longer. Then there was a silence, a long silence it seemed to May, and it was broken at last by the major, and his tone had lost its dogged sternness.

"Where do you say Bob is?"

"Not a mile off—at Mary Taylor's." She looked up as she answered, and he saw the expression of eager hope and surprise which had come into her face with his question.

"You are very fond of him, May," he said.

"Yes, father," she answered, "I am very very fond of Bob, and so are you in your heart, and I and you both know it."

"Perhaps," he said very slowly, "I will let him come here to-morrow and dine."

"Will you!" she cried excitedly. "Come to him to night, father; oh! you darling—you dear, kind father! oh! pray do!" she said; "come, oh! do come! it is but just a little way," and she rose and began kissing him, beseeching and crying at the same time.

"Why, you silly child," he said, "you have gone out of your senses; how can I go to-night?"

"No, I am quite in my senses—I am indeed. Come to-night, he will not have gone to bed, and we can do as we like at Mary Taylor's. Let me come with you, oh! do; and I'll knock at the door, and then you shall come in afterwards." She almost pulled him up from his seat. "Oh! you dear, kind father!" she said, "I never loved you so much in my whole life, as now that you are going to forgive Bob."

"Nonsense," he said, "we cannot go now; I'll write to him in the morning."

"No, come now," she persisted, and, carried away by her excitement, he allowed himself to be half dragged into the hall, where, almost without knowing it, he put on his coat and hat, and waited while May wrapped a shawl round her and tied on her garden bonnet, and then they set off under the clear, starry, frosty sky for Bob's lodging. May clung to her father's arm, and almost pushed him along when now and then he hesitated, and once or twice she lovingly stroked the coat-sleeve on which her hand rested, and looked up at the handsome, stern face. The hard lines in it seemed softened, and it was a grand face, she thought; and to-night it looked as if one of God's angels had brought down a little love from heaven and dropped it into his heart, so that it shone out of his clear, unflinching eyes. Oh! she would always love her father dearly in future.

"We are nearly there," she said. "Hark! there are the waits in Bob's street."

"Well," asked her father, "what am I to do next? You should have brought Bob to me, I think, not taken me to him."

"Hush!" said May, softly, for suddenly on the still air rose the voices of a wandering church choir which had taken to carol-singing on that Christmas night. They stood still and listened while the wondrous story was told again, under the stars and outside Bob's lodging, by the singers of the neighbouring church. They seemed like God's messengers, May thought. They waited till the third verse—

"To you in David's town this day
Is born of David's line

A Saviour, who is Christ the Lord,
And this shall be the sign."

"Father," whispered May, "He came that we might be forgiven."

Major Carr turned his head away, then suddenly stooping down he kissed his daughter. "Go and tell your brother first, if you like; prepare the way as you wish, my dear. You are a good little girl." So from that night there seemed a bond between the father and daughter.

The drawing-room window of the house was wide open, but the blind was down. Bob, too, had evidently been listening to the Christmas song.

May knocked at the door half tremblingly; she did not know who might answer it, or what she should say. Major Carr walked on a few paces, wondering if he was awake or asleep, thinking suddenly that he had placed May in a very strange position in allowing her to seek even for own brother at that time of night.

Mrs. Taylor answered May's knock, and Bob, who had evidently been at the top of the stairs, came down in astonishment. "May!" he exclaimed, "and at this time of night! Whatever is the matter?"

"Let me come up and I will tell you," she said. It was odd, but May thought she heard footsteps as she went up, but Bob's sitting-room was empty. "Bob," she said, "what would you say if father asked you to come home to-morrow?"

"Nonsense, May; you have gone out of your senses—besides, I should not think of entering the house again. Tell me why you have come."

"Wait here one moment," she said, gently and gravely, for she felt almost choking, "I am going to surprise you, dear; wait till I come back." Then she went down, but returned in a minute or two. He heard her coming up-stairs, and, bewildered, heard other footsteps besides hers. Clearly May was dazed that night, he thought. The next moment she re-entered the room. "Bob," she said, "here is father, and he has come to forgive you." Then she saw through blinding tears Bob bound forward and clasp his father's hand, but that was all, for she escaped under the window-blind, threw the open casement out into the little balcony, and knelt down, half crying with gladness, half praying with gratitude, and listened to the voices of the singers again. She did not feel the cold, frosty air in her excitement, she only knew that her father had forgiven Bob, and that they were together in the room behind her. Fainter and fainter in the distance grew the sound of the Christmas hymns, yet still she did not move, till she heard the door of the drawing-room open and shut, and Bob say hurriedly, as if anxious to get rid of some one, "Go into the balcony, Kenneth." She drew her shawl closer round her, and turned her face more decidedly in the direction of the waits. The next moment the blind was lifted and George Kenneth was standing by her side.

"May," he said, "haven't you a welcome for me after all this time?" She raised her head so suddenly that her bonnet fell back a little way, and he saw the fair face again in the starlight—a face which had lost none of its old sweetness, though it was a woman's face rather than a girl's now.

"Yes," she answered, putting her hands into his extended ones, "I am very glad to see you back, George."

He thought he would settle matters while he had the chance. "Bob told me of the mistake," he said abruptly; "you don't know how it has worried me."

"Bob was a great stupid," she answered, rapidly recovering her composure and looking out in the direction of the vanished singers, "and now I will not forgive him."

"Yes, you will," he said.

"No, I won't," she answered decidedly.

"But you'll forgive me?"

"No, I won't."

"But you don't know what I want to be forgiven for yet," he said.

"Oh no, no more I do," she suddenly recollected; "but I won't, nevertheless."

"Well, never mind," he said, "we'll do without the forgiveness. You are glad to see me back, May?"

"Yes, very," she said. She felt matters had come to a crisis, and thought it wasn't worth while to dilly-dally any longer.

"And you haven't forgotten me all this time?" he said, and he felt May shake her golden head. Somehow he had got very close to May—you see the balcony was small. "And you will never make any more mistakes?"

"Never," she said; and that settled the business.

"May!" called her father; "why, we'd forgotten May."

"I'm glad of it," she thought, as she made her appearance, and took care not to see Bob shaking his fist and turning up his eyes in mock horror at her.

There was a very happy Christmas party in Wonderland Place the next day, and a still happier one on New Year's Day, when Mrs. Kenneth and Grace were included in it.

Two or three months later there was a little performance at the church close by. It was not a christening, nor a confirmation, nor a burial. Now, guess what it was!

XUM

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS.)

"She crowed and laughed in the Summer"—p. 42.

A BABY'S RATTLE.

I.

ONLY a baby's rattle,
And yet if you offered me gold—
More than my heart could dream of,
Or jewels my hand could hold,

For that worthless toy, I should answer.
You cannot buy the tears
Of love and of joy, the remembrance
Of all that it means for all years.

The old associations
Of the years that have waned and fled
Lie there with the childish token—
That was clasp'd by a hand that is dead.

And beyond all earthly treasures
That prowess or brain could win—
I prize that worn old plaything
For the memories shrined therein.

There may be hopes in the Future,
With its dreams too bright to last,
But they lack the consecration
That clings round the thoughts of the Past.

II.

She came when the May-time scattered
May-buds upon holt and lea:
And the glint of the sunshine seemed sweeter,
And a new song was sung by the sea.

'Twas a page from the book of Creation,
With an imprint I knew was Divine,
And I felt the infinite yearning
For the new life sprung from mine.

Ah me! how we loved our blossom,
And it scarce seems days ago,
That she crowed and laughed in the Summer,
And faded in Winter snow.

It seems like a vision remembered
Of a death, in unrestful sleep,
When fearsome thoughts come upon you
As storms brood over the deep.

And whenever I hear the laughter
That rings from a child at play,
I think of our dear dead snowdrop—
And it seems but yesterday.

III.

The May-time had changed to Summer,
And the roses of August come,
The birds sang blithe in the branches,
But blither the birdie at home.

The cynic may sneer at the feeling,
For a cold hard creed is rife;
But I know that my love for my darling
Was my purest thought in life.

She grew with the Summer's fruitage,
But in warm Autumnal days
She faded, it seemed, like the leaflets
That strewed the woodland ways.

It was hard to mark, and still harder
To think that the hopes we kept
Must be buried away with old fancies,
And dreams that in silence slept.

Were we never to see her joyous
In childhood's innocent play?
Ah, no! she was called, and left us—
And it seems but yesterday.

IV.

At last—how well I remember
The long and lingering night,
When we watched by the tiny cradle
Till the morning's earliest light;

And then when the desolate morning
Shone cold through the winter bars,
Lo! God had taken our snowdrop
To blossom beyond the stars.

It was hard to bow in submission,
When we thought of the vacant place,
And there within the cradle,
The white little baby face.

Only one thought could comfort,
The echo of words Divine,
That tender as any mother
By the waters of Palestine

He spake, who bade the children
Draw near on the sacred sod,
When He stretched out hands of blessing—
"Of such is the kingdom of God."

H. SAVILE CLARKE.

THE DOVE-COLOURED SILK.

BY a kind and thoughtful arrangement on the part of their employers, every domestic in the house of Sir John Dayton, baronet and banker, received his or her salary one week before Christmas Day; and, in consequence, many a seasonable gift was purchased, and sent off to parents or friends in the country, delighted to be thus remembered by the boys and girls who had left the home-nest, to begin the battle of life on their own account.

Very bright and tempting looked the tiny pile of sovereigns that Lottie Warde, Miss Dayton's own maid, carried away to her chamber, and sat meditating over, with a cloud on her pretty face such as it seldom wore. Last Christmas the spending of her money had cost her no trouble, except a quickly-stifled regret that she could not do more with it for those dear ones, whose kisses and joyful thanks had been such pleasant requital of her generosity. And, after all, how much had been done with those few pounds! They had given warm frocks to Lottie's little sisters, a new suit to the studious young brother, of whose abilities she was so proud, and even cleared off that account of Dr. Welby's which had been such a trouble to the widowed mother, who, with a very straitened income, contrived to bring up her children respectably.

In Lottie's memory all these little things revived against her will; for they did not give her as much satisfaction to remember, as if she had intended to repeat her acts of generosity. Although she was as dutiful and loving a daughter, and as kind a sister as of yore, there had been an event in Lottie's life since the year began that was closely connected with the impatient sigh she gave, as she sat gazing at her gold, and abstractedly turning it over and over in her palm. She had met, at the house of an old friend of her late father, a young man, so well connected that many wondered he should think of wedding a girl who was "in service." Mr. Charles Morison, they argued, with his good prospects and excellent situation in the office of Smithson Brothers, ought to look higher for a wife than Lottie Warde, whose father had died bankrupt, and whose mother's sole dependence was the annuity some of Mr. Warde's compassionate creditors had purchased for her. But if Charlie Morison heard these things hinted, he laughed and forgot them; he loved Lottie for herself—her sweet temper, her good principles, and the pretty face and figure, that were always set off by the perfect neatness and propriety with which she dressed.

Lottie, however, had taken to heart many of the remarks made in her presence, or told her by ill-natured friends, and had rather hastily decided in her own mind that the relatives of her affianced husband looked down upon her because of her position. This fancy—for it was no more—had made her shy of meeting them, and unwilling to accept the invitations so kindly sent to her. But Charlie had made a point of her acceding to his parents' wish that she should join the family party they always gathered round them at their handsome house at Clapham on the eve of the great festival; and as Miss Dayton had cheerfully consented to spare her, she had not been able to excuse herself.

Naturally timid, and shrinking from strangers, Lottie looked forward to this visit as an ordeal rather than a pleasure. She was to be introduced to Charlie's married sister from Manchester, and to the wealthy uncle from whom he had expectations; and her anxiety that they should think well of her culminated in the inquiry, "What shall I wear?"

It was no use discussing this question with her betrothed. She knew he would say that nothing could be in better taste than the well-fitting dark merino that had been her best dress since the commencement of the autumn. But Lottie had her share of girlish vanity, and as she raised her eyes to her looking-glass a vision rose before her of a certain dove-coloured silk in a mercer's window near St. Paul's, that would become her admirably. It was true that such an expensive purchase would absorb every farthing in her possession; but she chose to ignore this. She had once tried on a dress of a similar tint belonging to her mistress, and had blushed with pleasure at her own appearance, as the lustrous folds of the silk fell gracefully around her, and delicate lace shaded her arms and throat. So strong grew the temptation that when Lottie went that evening to visit her mother, she lingered long at the mercer's window, and decided that on the morrow the dove-coloured silk should be her own.

The children threw down their books and toys when Lottie entered, for they loved her dearly, and Mrs. Warde, though she had been wearing a very anxious face, as she stitched busily at some childish garment, contrived to smile at her eldest daughter, who, however, was not easily deceived.

"Something has gone wrong, mother; I am sure of it by your looks. What is it?"

"Nothing you can alter, dear; nothing, in fact, that I ought to dwell upon. I heard, by chance, that the man through whose roguery your father failed has returned to England, and is in prosperous circumstances; and it worried me for a little while to think that my excellent, upright husband went to his grave in sorrow and poverty, while this dishonest man holds up his head and grows rich; but it was only for a minute, child;" and Mrs. Warde smiled now with less effort. "I know to Whom I have committed my cause, and I will not murmur at anything He wills."

Lottie kissed the placid speaker affectionately, but she was not as sympathetic as usual. Her little sisters hung about her, wondering whether they should have a Christmas pudding, and one of them blurted out a fact hitherto concealed; that mother did not go to church on Sundays till evening service, because her shawl was so shabby. Lottie slid her hand into the pocket where lay her little purse, but drew it back again, telling herself that she could not possibly go to visit Charlie's friends meanly dressed; and when the youngest child climbed on her knee and frankly asked what she was going to bring him for a Christmas present, he was set down again, and so sharply told not to tease, that Mrs. Warde's mild eyes were raised in surprise.

"I beg pardon, mother," said her daughter, colouring under the reproof the look conveyed. "I am afraid I am rather stupid this evening. What were you saying about Robert?—he is elected pupil teacher at his school. Of course he is—I knew he would be! he has worked so hard for it, dear, good boy!" and she ran across the room to kiss the studious lad, who warmly returned her caresses.

"Then you're glad of it, Lottie? So am I, only I think mother's bothered a bit about the books I shall want."

"Will they cost much?" asked his sister.

"Well, dear, it seems much to persons of our limited income," Mrs. Warde replied. "And he must have a new suit of clothes. But I hope to manage it without running into debt, if you can help me a little."

Lottie did not speak, and her mother thoughtfully added, "The girls will have to do without the new hats I promised them; and baby's pelisse must last another winter; and——"

But here her daughter stopped her by pettishly saying, "Oh, mother! pray don't tell us of any more wants; they seem endless. How miserable it is to be so poor; how sick of contrivances and makeshifts you must be. I know I am. And somehow the children always seem to need most when one has least to spare."

"I did not know you were in that predicament, dear, or I would not have spoken so plainly," Mrs. Warde replied; "but don't let it worry you," she added, with the cheerful air that covered a multitude of anxious thoughts; "we shall manage very well, I dare say."

Lottie went away with her money still in her pocket, but with a load at her heart—half shame, half selfish ill-humour—which was not lessened by standing at the mercer's window for another half-hour before she went back to Sir John's. While her gaze was fixed on the silk, her rebellious spirit was murmuring at the difficulties of her position. It was so hard that she should always be hampered with the home-cares. Other young people could spend their salaries on themselves, while her purse had such constant calls upon it that there was nothing left for herself. And mother was not thoughtful for her; she never seemed to remember that a girl of her age would naturally wish to be smart, especially when she visited persons in better circumstances than herself.

Lottie was fast working herself up into a conviction that she was ill-used, when, within a few yards of Sir John's house, she met Charlie Morison's brother clerk—the gay, handsome son of the friends at whose residence she had first met her lover. They had been children together, and fancying the young man looked ill or harassed, she forgot her own annoyances in cordial inquiries after his health.

"I am very well; what made you think otherwise?" he answered, rather hastily. "Turn back with me, will you, Lottie? I have a message for you. I have just seen Charlie; he is leaving London quite suddenly, and has waited at Sir John's to bid you good-bye, till he dared not wait longer, lest he should lose his train. I promised to watch for you, and tell you so."

A flush of vexation coloured Lottie's cheek. Her loitering at the shop window had deprived her of the pleasure of hearing Charlie's adieux; and it was all the more provoking that no one was to blame for this but herself. "Was this all he said?" she asked. "Did he not tell you when he would return?"

"No," said Austin Crawley, knitting his brow thoughtfully; "he was in a hurry, and he was in some way different to what he usually is; he positively would not see the hand I offered him. Why was this? do you know the cause, or must I guess it?"

"I know nothing, except that I am tired and cross," Lottie answered, trying to speak gaily, and failing; "so I'll say good-bye, for I have already outstayed my time."

"You have not heard all I wish to say to you, Lottie. We are old friends, and therefore I may speak to you more freely than another might."

Wondering a little at his gravity, she suffered herself to be led down a quieter street close by, and promised him a patient hearing.

"Has Charlie ever spoken to you of certain unpleasantnesses that have occurred at the office?"

"No—oh no! what do you mean? Is it in connection with these that he has gone out of town so unexpectedly?"

"I begin to think—to fear so. Lottie, if any one very dear to you was to commit some act that disgraced him, what would you advise him to do?"

He spoke with an earnestness and significance that made her tremble a little as she exclaimed, "What an odd case you are putting to me."

"It is a very common one, Lottie; remember that, and answer me."

"Why, then, I should advise him to confess his sin, and make all the restitution in his power. Could he do better, if sincerely penitent?"

"But if he had not the courage to do this?—if he preferred to hide somewhere till the storm had blown over, then how would you act? Join in the cry that would be raised against him, or strive to believe that he was not wholly a villain, and would yet do his best to prove his repentance?"

"Why do you ask me this?" she demanded agitatedly.

"Because I want to save you a shock, Lottie; because you may hear ill news in the morning."

"Are you speaking of Charlie?" she cried, pale to her lips. "Oh no! impossible! he is too conscientious, too honourable to wrong his employers. Austin, you are cruel to frighten me in this way. Speak more plainly, so that if some false accusation has been brought against him I may warn him of it."

"I have no more to say—I am sorry I spoke at all," Austin hastily replied; "but I had a fancy that you would be best able to break it to the poor old father and mother, if—things are as I fear."

She would have questioned him further, but a group of men on their way home from work pushed between them, and when they had gone by Austin had disappeared.

Lottie went to bed depressed and uneasy, but a refreshing sleep and her firm faith in Charlie's honour enabled her by the morrow to shake off these unpleasant sensations. After another debate with herself the dove-coloured silk was bought, and in the course of the evening it was proudly displayed to her admiring fellow-servants. She was deep in discussion with the good-natured housekeeper upon the best way of trimming it, when the drawing-room bell rang for her.

Miss Dayton wanted some trifle brought from her own room, and Lottie had executed her commission and was retreating, when the voice of Sir John, who was reading the evening paper, arrested her. "Dear me! how sad these cases are; one never knows who to trust. Listen to this, Letitia: 'The confidential clerk of Smithson Brothers absconded last night. His employers had had their suspicions aroused by some circumstance or other, and hinted an intention of looking into his accounts. As soon as he learned this he made business in the country a pretence for his flight, and it is supposed that he is on his way to America.'"

To Lottie's strained ears every word of this was horribly audible, and the next minute she was running down-stairs, putting on her hat and shawl as she went.

"If I am asked for," she gasped to the wondering housekeeper, "say that I am ill—that I have gone to my mother's; but don't stop me—don't question me, or I shall die!"

But it was to the home of Austin Crawley she first took her way. She would not give up all hope till she had seen him, and heard his lips confirm the dreadful tale; and as she went along she tried to comfort herself in repeating, "It cannot be! Charlie Morison a defaulter, a fugitive from justice—it is impossible!"

Mrs. Crawley herself answered Lottie's knock, and her smiling, cheerful face made the girl feel her own misery grow sharper.

"No, Austin had not returned from the City yet," she said. "Would not Lottie come in and wait for him? She was quite alone, for Mr. Crawley had been at Smithsons' all day, taking the place (she believed) of Charlie Morison, whose absence seemed to have put the firm very much out of their way. There was nothing amiss, was there?" she added, as she took a closer survey of her visitor's face.

But her question remained unanswered, for Lottie was already hurrying away. The last faint hope that the report was a dreadful mistake had perished before Mrs. Crawley's placid utterances. Austin, the gay and careless, whose spendthrift habits had often displeased his parents, had preserved his integrity; while Charlie Morison, the son of many prayers, the steady, intellectual young man, who indulged in no low tastes, no "loud" attire, had forfeited his high character and disgraced his family—this was her conclusion.

Away through the busiest streets of London, hurrying on with her face muffled in her veil, lest any one should perceive the anguish depicted on it, she walked, till she found herself before the well-known offices of Messrs. Smithson. They had been closed hours earlier; but the old man who was porter and care-taker was standing at the door, talking to some curious acquaintances.

Unperceived by the garrulous speaker, Lottie paused long enough to hear her lover's name coupled with words indistinctly caught relating to the large sums of money that were missing.

"His father was here this morning, as soon as the news was made public," the porter went on—"such a respectable old gentleman." But here his voice was lowered, and Lottie passed by, hearing only something about the young man's broken-hearted mother as she went; but it reminded her that she was not alone in her grief: that the loving parents, who had cherished their son in his childhood, and seen him gradually expand into the bright, intelligent man, must be well-nigh crushed beneath the blow that had so suddenly fallen upon them. Oh! what was her grief to theirs?

And now Lottie flew to her own haven, the arms of her mother, and there wept the first tears her burning eyes had shed.

Shocked, and for some time incredulous, Mrs. Warde, with infinite patience and tenderness, sustained her child during those hours in which her anguish was almost more than she could bear.

Never again would Lottie accuse this dear friend and comforter of being wanting in sympathy. Who else would have borne so kindly with her wild bursts of impatient sorrow — her restless pacings to and fro—her passionate complainings? who else so skilfully taken advantage of her better feelings to bring her to her knees, and teach her to bow her head to the Divine will?

"How good you are to me, darling mother!" she sobbed, when Mrs. Warde had prevailed upon her to lie down, and was bathing her aching head; "and indeed I don't deserve it. I have been so selfish, so ungrateful, that if you knew all my hard and bitter thoughts you would surely cease to love me at all!"

Mrs. Warde's only reply was to stoop and kiss her; and that kiss uprooted the last fibre of selfishness in her child's heart. Never again did Lottie let vanity stand in the place of duty; and in the midst of her trouble she could be humbly thankful that this dear mother was still all her own.

All that night she wept and bewailed herself, but when morning dawned and she saw how weary and exhausted Mrs. Warde was looking, Lottie put her good intentions in practice, and restrained her grief.

While her mother rested, she moved quietly about, dressing the little ones, whom her altered looks and swollen eyes awed into unwonted soberness; nor was it till every task had been accomplished that could spare Mrs. Warde fatigue that she seated herself at her mother's feet, and wept herself into the sleep of exhaustion.

But stronger arms were sustaining her when, with a start, she awoke. It was not the mild face of her mother that bent over her and smiled at her, it was Charlie Morison himself, and for a moment she believed herself to be in a happy dream.

"Can it be you?" she asked wistfully. "Speak to me, for I know not what to think, nor what to believe."

"You may believe that Charles Morison has committed no act that disgraces him," said her rejoicing mother, who stood by. "Need we tell you more?"

Lottie pressed her hands to her head, and looked from one to the other, till the tender smile on Charlie's lips confirmed the tidings.

"I seem too much bewildered to be as glad as I should be," she exclaimed. "Am I really awake?—has there been no robbery after all? That dreadful newspaper!—why did I believe the paragraph I heard Sir John read from it?"

"Sit down here, you poor, pale child," said Charlie, "and let me help you out of your mystification. I think it began the night before last, when I sought you at Sir John's to say good-bye before I went on a hurried journey, and to tell you the two-fold object of it."

Lottie felt a sharp pang. If she had not loitered to feast her eyes on the dove-coloured silk, and picture the sensation she should create when she appeared in it, she might have been spared all this suffering and suspense.

"I had heard, dear, that the man who was the cause of all your father's misfortunes was at Birmingham; and Messrs. Smithson freely gave me permission to go there, and see whether my remonstrances, and, if those failed, my threats to expose his nefarious proceedings, would induce him to do justice to your father's widow and orphans."

"And you succeeded?"

"Beyond my expectations. I have just had the pleasure of putting into your mother's hands a sum that will enable her to educate her children with comfort."

Lottie was obliged to interrupt him that she might throw her arms around Mrs. Warde's neck, and congratulate her rapturously. Then Charlie himself had to be thanked in loving, tearful whispers; and then so many pleasant little plans were discussed for the widow's future, that some time elapsed before they recurred to the explanation.

"When I had completed my own business, Messrs. Smithson desired me to go to Sheffield and make some inquiries there for them. The drift of these I scarcely understood when I started, but I soon discovered that they had reference to certain suspicions they were entertaining."

"But not of you, Charlie?"

"No, love; they have never had any reason to doubt my integrity, and they have just proved their confidence in it, by promising me an increase of salary. But another of their clerks, led into temptation by a love of gaiety——"

"I see it all now," sighed Lottie. "Poor Austin! it was of himself he spoke when I saw him that night. If he had but confided in you!"

"He had the opportunity," said Charlie, gravely, "for he walked with me from the office to Sir John's, and rather vexed me by what I considered an impertinent curiosity respecting the business that took me away so suddenly. He must have guessed the discoveries to which it would lead, and perhaps this made him determine on his flight."

"Poor Austin!" said Lottie again, after recounting the conversation she had held with him; "if I had but known that it was of himself he spoke I might have succeeded in urging him to stay and confess all."

"I fear not," Charley gravely made answer. "It would have required more fortitude than Austin Crawley ever possessed to face the misery he has brought upon others as well as himself. My father, for whom, as an old friend, Messrs. Smithson sent, to assist them in breaking the news to his parents, can scarcely bear to speak of the scenes he witnessed. Mrs. Crawley is very ill, Lottie. The truth was concealed from her as long as possible; it was not until late last night she learnt that it was to hear the tale of her son's guilt Mr. Crawley was summoned to the City; and it appears that no one had suspected how, while Austin was believed to be quietly sleeping, he had packed a portmanteau and stolen out of the house in the dead of night, to embark for America."

And so Lottie's joy in her betrothed's innocence was tempered by the knowledge that, if his parents had been happily spared such deep sorrow, others were enduring it.

She spent her Christmas Eve at Clapham, but not in the dove-coloured silk. She was clad soberly in the dark merino, and heard, with drooping head and a troubled conscience, Mrs. Morison tell her how fully she and her husband approved their son's choice; and how her conduct as a daughter and sister had won their esteem long since.

"I am not half as good as you think me!" Lottie tearfully confessed, and deepened their interest in her by her honesty.

After all, it was Mrs. Warde who wore the dove-coloured silk at her daughter's wedding. It was made up for her by Lottie herself, who, as her needle passed in and out of her work, drew from the events connected with her purchase the lesson every wise or foolish deed conveys to the heart that is opened to receive it. L. Crow.

"MISSING."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "BETTER THAN GOLD," ETC. ETC.

I.

THOSE are hard things to throw in a man's teeth, uncle, and I shouldn't like to think that you meant them all."

So spoke John Birch, the carpenter, as he stood up before the old bird-fancier—tall, sinewy, and strong, with his handsome face in a hot glow, and a flash of temper in his eyes—a specimen of a fine physical type, showing in marked contrast with a puny, pale young man about his own age, who sat in a corner, apparently reading, but in reality intently watching what was going on.

"The harder the better, so that they hit the mark; but what I have said to-night I am ready to say again—ay, and mean them too."

John Birch had never won much favour from the little, hard-featured old man who kept the bird-shop, and lived there with his pretty granddaughter. But to-night he had been insulted, and before a witness, between whom and himself there was an open feud, for it was as rivals that they met. Tom Bartlett, the soft-spoken schoolmaster, had managed to insinuate himself in the favour of David Birch, and was also striving to supplant the young carpenter in the regard of his cousin Polly. The old man was the first to speak.

"You need not glare at me like that, because I have found out what brings you sneaking round here."

"I never sneak, uncle; that does not belong to the Birches."

"No, it does not, my lad," the old man replied, in a slightly mollified tone; adding, "and I'm sorry you don't take after them. There's a spice of your mother——"

John Birch interrupted him, saying passionately, "Silence, Uncle David, you must not dare to say a word against her."

"This to my face! Get out of the house, and never dare to cross my door-step again till you are sent for, which will be long enough, for I tell you once for all, that if I can hinder it, Polly Carson shall never marry an idle, beggarly fellow, always out of work, who can find nothing better to do than live on his sister's earnings."

This was the stab that cut keenest of all. The young man's voice quivered as he said, "That is too bad, Uncle David, you don't know what feelings you stir in me;" and in his excitement he laid his hand on the old man's arm.

At that moment the sly, watchful reader in the corner came forward, and, wilfully misunderstanding his intention, thrust himself between them, saying, "Come, no violence, it would be a pity, and I should be so sorry; you ought to remember Mr. Birch is your uncle, and an old man."

In an instant he found himself put back with just the amount of force which a strong man would feel it needful to use in dealing with some puny obstruction which he held in contempt.

"Mind your own business, Tom Bartlett, and don't meddle with mine; it doesn't need your sly tongue to teach me what I ought to remember. My uncle is in no danger of violence from me, and you know it. Then, turning to the old man, he added, "Uncle, I shall not want telling twice to go. I know you bear me ill-will, but I didn't think it was in you to upbraid a man for what is no fault of his; for I defy any one that knows me to say that I ever shirked work when I could get it to do. I am sorry for what has passed to-night, and perhaps you will be before you are many days older;" and snatching up his cap, he strode angrily through the shop into the street, without deigning another look at Tom Bartlett, who had slunk back into his corner, and was once more taking mental note of everything that he saw and heard.

II.

To the surprise of the neighbours, David Birch had not taken down his shutters, though it was nearly eleven o'clock; such neglect of business had never occurred before within their remembrance. But a greater marvel still was the circumstance of the old man himself being dressed in his best black suit, which he only wore on important occasions. It was clear that he was going to keep holiday that day, and that something unusual had happened. They would have been convinced of this, if they had penetrated to the little back parlour, and heard the old man talking in his unwonted flow of spirits.

"Put on thy best gown, Polly, and wear it in honour of the good fortune that is coming to us; thou shalt be dressed in silks, my bonny one."

"I would rather you gave some of the money to poor Nellie Birch, grandfather."

A shade crossed his face. "Yes, give it her to support her idle brother—not a shilling! It is enough that the will gives it to him after my death, more the pity; if I could keep it from him I would."

"Oh, grandfather!"

"I tell thee I would; but don't talk about him, child. I do not want to be angry just when I'm going to carry my good news to old Jacob Moss."

"Am I to open the shop, grandfather?"

"Do just as it suits thyself, child; we shall be rich enough not to care about the shop."

While talking he consulted his large silver watch, which, for antiquity and size, might have been the patriarch of the entire race of watches.

"I shall be back before nine, Polly; and perhaps Tom Bartlett may drop in and spend an hour with you."

"I hope not, for I don't want to see him."

"Ah! that's the perverse way of girls; but never mind, I dare say thou wilt look much higher than Tom now;" and he chuckled as he kissed her round, dimpled cheek, leaving her to take care of the feathered songsters and herself, the brightest thing that the place could show.

III.

MISSING, since the 23rd inst., an Old Man, named David Birch, dressed in black; height, about 5 feet 3 inches; grey hair; thin. He left home with the intention of visiting a friend at Fulham, and has not since been heard of. A reward of Twenty Pounds will be paid to any one giving information that may lead to his discovery.

So ran the advertisement which was going the round of the leading papers, and being repeated in large printed placards on the walls of police-stations. In the immediate neighbourhood of the bird-shop there was much excitement and consternation at the old man's mysterious disappearance, mingled with lively sympathy for the distress of his granddaughter, whose pale face and swollen eyelids told how she had watched and wept. None were more demonstrative than Tom Bartlett, who kept hovering about her in spite of her visible shrinking from him, persistently pressing his services as though he alone had the right to act for her. Meantime, the day appointed by the lawyers for entering into arrangements with their client, respecting the fortune of which he had unexpectedly come into possession by the death of a brother abroad, had come and gone. The perplexed legal firm, acting in the interest of their client, instituted a rigorous search, but without success. The friend, Jacob Moss, a feeble old man, had been duly communicated with, and keenly cross-examined. David Birch had paid his visit on the day named, arriving, as far as the old man could recollect, about half-past two, and starting on his return journey about dusk. Here the clue was lost. Thus the days went by without throwing any light on the old man's fate, and poor Polly, worn with grief and anxiety, often cried herself to sleep.

IV.

"Oh! Nellie—Nellie! you don't know what has happened!"

It was with these words that John Birch had suddenly presented himself to his sister, a tall, dark-eyed girl, who might have been taken as a softened likeness of himself. She was busily at work when he came in, but on the first glance at his agitated face she dropped her needle and rose hurriedly.

"Oh, John! what is the matter?"

"Uncle David has been missing from home since the 23rd of last month, and no one can tell what has become of him."

"Missing from home, John! why, it was only last week that we heard he had a fortune left him by his brother."

"Yes, that's true enough, Nellie; and I hear that it comes to me after his death. The lawyers are seeking him everywhere. But think of poor Polly being in all this trouble, and us never to know it. It just seems as if that odd job of work in the country came on purpose to take me out of her way; and you're so moped up here that you never hear anything," he added fretfully.

"John, I'll put on my things and go to her at once, if you think I can do any good."

"Yes, Nell, I think you may. I know I always like to have you by me when I'm in trouble. I would go myself, but I'm forbidden the house. You remember what I told you of my quarrel with the old man. I wish to heaven those ill words had not passed between us."

At that moment there was a sound of heavy footsteps on the stairs, followed by a smart rap at the door. Nellie went to open it, but started back at the sight of two policemen on the threshold.

"Does John Birch live here?"

"Yes, I am John Birch," the young man called out; "what do you want with me?"

"Come this way and I'll tell you."

"No, tell me here."

The officer glanced compassionately at Nellie's white face as he answered, "Well, if you don't mind the young woman hearing, you're our prisoner."

"Your prisoner! Impossible! On what charge?"

"I dare say you know well enough. There's been a body found by the river, and it's thought there's been some foul play."

"Whose body?"

"David Birch's, the bird-fancier, that's been missing lately."

"My uncle!" gasped John.

"Exactly. You're our man. You've had a quarrel with him, and you're arrested on suspicion. We got the clue from Thomas Bartlett."

"Bartlett!" The young carpenter repeated the name with a groan, and staggered against the wall, adding, "May God forgive him this wickedness!"

At the same moment his sister threw herself on his neck with a cry that thrilled those who heard it.

V.

Yes, it was true: a body had been found; and there was evidence that identified it as that of the old man who was missing. The story went that it had been first seen by some workmen on their way home one wet evening. It had floated up with the tide, and been toyed with as a ghastly plaything, then beaten against one of the low-lying river banks, and flung out, a piteous sight for men to shudder at, as it lay with the defiling river-slime clotted among its tangled grey hair, and its dead, bruised face turned upward to the sky. From examination of the body, it was thought that there had been a struggle. The motive had clearly not been robbery, for a purse containing a sovereign and some silver was found in one of the pockets, together with a very remarkable antique silver watch, on which were engraved the initials "D. B.," which were readily translated into David Birch. When the watch and purse, with the old-fashioned coat found on the body, were shown to the bereaved granddaughter, and tearfully recognised by the trembling girl as belonging to her grandfather, the evidence of identity was complete. How had the old man come by his death? There was no cause to suspect him of suicidal intentions; and it was proved that he was sober when he parted from Jacob Moss. Then had followed the query, was David Birch at enmity with any one? At this point in the judicial investigation, Tom Bartlett put in a deposition to the effect that he had witnessed a quarrel between the old man and his nephew a day before the deceased had taken his fatal journey. He detailed what he remembered of the scene between them; how he (Tom Bartlett) had been apprehensive of violence on the part of the young man, who had told his uncle "that before he was many days older he would be sorry for what had passed that night." This ended in the arrest of the young carpenter. The news was carried to Polly Carson, but the sorely-tried girl rose against this crushing blow. "I cannot believe it. John Birch would not harm my grandfather; and I wouldn't take Tom Bartlett's word against a dog."

* * * * *

"I am doing my best, Nellie, you may be sure of that; if there's ever so small a loophole for escape, trust to me that poor Jack shall have the benefit of it."

The speaker was Nellie's plighted lover, George Denton, the detective, a thoughtful-looking man, some years her senior, who had already given evidence of more than average ability in his calling.

"My brother is not guilty, George; I could stake my life on it."

"So could I, Nellie; but leave it to me. The examination is adjourned, and I may do much in the meantime."

His words gave Nellie Birch comfort for the present, and she trusted in them.

VI.

THE court was crowded, for much interest had gathered round the case of the old man, whose mysterious death had followed so suddenly upon his accession of wealth. The prisoner was pale and haggard from mental suffering and want of sleep; but, holding his head erect, and gazing before him with eyes that never lowered or shrank, and looking very unlike a man charged with murder. But the evidence had gone against him, and he was committed to take his trial for the wilful murder of his uncle, David Birch. The decision was received by the prisoner with a shuddering gasp for breath, and a wild look of agony in his eyes, as a scream from a woman came from the crowd—it was a voice that he knew, for it was poor Nellie who had dropped down insensible. He was about to be removed when there was a sudden stir in court, and a man whom many there recognised as George Denton, the detective, forced his way through the crowd. Another moment, and he was standing before the magistrate, every ear drinking in his words.

"The prisoner, John Birch, is not guilty, and I am prepared to prove it."

"On what evidence?"

"That it is a case of mistaken identity; the man whom he is accused of murdering being still alive. He lies helpless on a sick-bed, or he would have been here to set this wrong right."

The deposition which was made before the startled bench may be briefly summed up as it was afterwards related in the presence of a reunited family circle, when the old bird-fancier got well enough to add his portion of the story. He explained that, after leaving his friend Moss, he had been met and attacked by a man in an unfrequented lane. They had a struggle, during which he received a blow on the head that must have made him insensible, for he remembered nothing more until he found himself in bed in a strange room; how long he had lain there he could not tell. He had been taken home by a humane market-gardener, who found him lying senseless in the road, without hat or coat; his injury proving to be a serious fracture of the skull, and the death-like stupor continuing, he was left on the hands of the good Samaritan, who, living some distance from London, had no chance of gaining any information about him.

At this point George Denton took up the narrative. His first step had been to obtain sight of the body; he had found a peculiar mark on the right side of the neck, which led to the suspicion that, instead of being the body of David Birch, it was that of a notorious burglar with whom he had been several times brought in contact in the course of his profession. This was further proved when he found on inquiry that Light-fingered Joe—as he was called—was missing from his accustomed haunts, and one of his associates remembered having seen him in the neighbourhood of Fulham on the night named. Upon making inquiries in that locality, George learned that a market-gardener had been asking whether any one belonging to the neighbourhood was missing, as a man unknown was lying ill at his cottage.

Thus, step by step, the detective had unravelled the mysterious affair. It was thought that the drowned man had ended his night's work by getting drunk; and, losing his way in the dark, had fallen into the river. This was the history of the mistake through which the young carpenter had so unjustly suffered. But the old bird-fancier seemed anxious to make up matters by a full reconciliation with his nephew, satisfying his granddaughter by his unexpected liberality towards the brother and sister, not forgetting a reward to George Denton for his faithful service. Polly made no secret of her feelings towards John, and it was easy to see how it would end with the young people. And this Christmas is as happy a one to them as, I trust, it will be to us all.

GRACE EDEN:

A STORY OF GRENADA. BY WILLIAM H. G. KINGSTON.

A FINE frigate, her snow-white canvas spread alow and aloft, was gliding swiftly across the Caribbean Sea towards the beautiful island of Grenada. Her approach was watched with intense interest by two young girls, who were standing on the shore of a deep bay, formed by two headlands, spurs of the mountain-ranges which, clothed with the richest tropical vegetation, rose to the eastward. It was one of the most lovely scenes in that lovely region. Every available spot was covered with coffee or cocoa plantations. The white residences of the owners, with gaily-coloured verandahs, peeping out from amid the dark green foliage; while the graceful feathery-topped trees reached down almost to the blue water, in some places overshadowing the narrow strip of sand which fringed its margin; dark, fantastically-shaped rocks appearing here and there, and forming miniature bays, or still more sheltered pools, into which no ravenous shark could make its way. In the largest of these pools the girls had been enjoying an evening bath, judging by the bundle of linen one of them, a black damsel, carried in her arms. The other, apparently her mistress, was more than commonly pretty. Her figure, though small, was graceful; her complexion very fair, and even the hot sun of the tropics had been unable to drive the roses from her cheeks.

"I wonder, Diana, whether that fine ship is really coming into the bay," she said, as she stood shading her eyes from the rays of the sinking sun, which cast a bright light on the horizon.

"Oui, me tink' cela, Missie Grace," answered the negress, speaking in language composed of words learned from the alternate English and French possessors of the island. "Ships come many fois to get de vater and de bois."

"Oh! I hope she will come. It would be very pleasant, as I suppose Uncle Walkinshaw will invite the officers to the house," observed the young lady.

The black Diana shook her head and said, "But suppose ship is French. Dey come before, and kill and burn and rob. What we do den?"

"I trust that she is English," said Grace. "Surely no enemy's ship would venture to anchor in the bay while British men-of-war are, as we have heard, in George Town Harbour. I fancy that I can already make out the flag. Try if you can tell what it is, Diana."

The young negress opened wide her large eyes, then screwed them up and shaded them with her black palm, but declared that it was impossible for unaided human sight to distinguish whether the flag was that of France or England.

Grace Eden looked disappointed. She was more interested in the matter than her attendant supposed. Having become an orphan at an early age, she had been left to the guardianship of her mother's half-sister, her only near relative, who had married Mr. Peter Walkinshaw, a planter in Grenada. On the completion of her education in England, rather more than a year before the commencement of our story, and a few months preceding the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and France, in 1793, she had come out to the island under the charge of Mrs. Home, wife of the lieutenant-governor, on board H.M. frigate Hebe, commanded by Captain Roden, an old shipmate of her father, Lieutenant Eden. Those were halcyon days to the young girl on board the Hebe. The voyage was long, but she would gladly have had it longer. So would Harry Raper, the third lieutenant of the frigate. He was a relation of Mrs. Home's, and a great favourite of hers, and thus had more opportunities of speaking to Miss Eden than any other officer, without its being especially remarked. He was, as might have been expected, frequently a guest in the captain's cabin, and was always ready on the quarter-deck to receive the ladies,—indeed, he seemed instinctively to know the moment they were to appear there. Grace hesitatingly took his arm when there was more motion in the ship than usual, and she could not walk alone; but by degrees she learned to look for his support, and was perfectly ready to let the captain attend to her chaperone. If Mrs. Home suspected how matters were going, she did not think fit to interfere. She thought, perhaps, that her young friends were well suited to each other, and had no wish to throw obstacles in the way of the attachment she saw springing up between them. She feared, however, that Grace would have, in consequence, many difficulties and much annoyance to contend with. She had not herself formed a favourable opinion of Mr. Walkinshaw, and she could not help giving Grace an unpleasant impression of her unknown uncle. On landing, Grace went to her house, and remained with her for some days, during which Harry Raper was a constant visitor till the Hebe had sailed, when, with a heavy heart, she set out for St. Antoine, accompanied by Mr. Walkinshaw, who had come to escort her to his estate.

Grace Eden watched the frigate, hoping that she might be the Hebe, and would anchor in the bay. "Should dear Harry come on shore, and Uncle Walkinshaw find out who he is, he will not meet with a very cordial reception, I fear," she thought. "How fortunate that I did not tell aunt his name; and if he comes, I must try to warn him not to appear more glad to see me than the other officers are. She may think that the one to whom I confessed I had given my heart is not among them."

The sun, appearing like a vast globe of fire, was just dipping in the purple ocean. Still Grace lingered, watching the frigate, which she felt sure was steering for the bay.

It was dark when they reached the house. Her aunt was standing in the verandah.

"I wonder, my dear Grace, that you cannot recollect the customs of the house!" exclaimed the lady, in a sharp tone. "Your uncle has been waiting for supper; and poor Nicholas, though half-starved, was compelled to go out and look for you before he would sit down. However, I hope some day he will be able to teach you what is due to others."

Nicholas shrugged his shoulders; and Grace, without replying, hurried to her room to prepare for the meal. It was not a very lively one. Mr. Peter Walkinshaw, a stout, fussy-mannered gentleman, was troubled about many things: the crops were not promising well; the political state of the island was not satisfactory; the mulattoes and blacks were, it was whispered, plotting mischief; and he could not help observing that the attempt of his son Nicholas to win the heart of Grace Eden was not prospering. His ward possessed an estate in the island, which he endeavoured to make her believe was of small value, and that she was mainly indebted to his bounty for her education and support, hoping that gratitude to him would assist his son's suit. Mrs. Home had, however, enlightened her, and his remarks on the subject had naturally a very different effect to what he wished.

Her aunt, who entered into Mr. Walkinshaw's views, grew vexed and angry; and Grace, though of a happy and buoyant disposition, found her life at St. Antoine becoming every day less agreeable.

Grace awoke at day-break, and looking out of her window, saw a frigate at anchor in the bay. Could she be the Hebe? Grace counted the ports; they were the same as those of Harry's ship.

"Yes, I am nearly certain it is she," she thought; "yet one frigate is very like another. I wish that I could get Nicholas's spy-glass; he left it last night in the dining-room.

She got the telescope, and soon satisfied herself that the frigate was indeed the Hebe. Having dressed, she summoned Diana, and hurried down towards the usual landing-place, hoping that no one had seen her leave the house. She could trust to the discretion of her black waiting-maid, who followed, supposing, according to her ordinary custom, that she was going to bathe. Grace was sure that Harry would try to be the first to land from the ship, and she hoped to meet him, if only for a few moments, to put him on his guard, so that there might be less risk of their subsequent intercourse being interfered with. Her uncle, though not the most amiable of individuals, would not depart from the hospitable customs of the island; and on the previous evening had expressed his intention, should the frigate anchor in the bay, of inviting the officers, and making them welcome at his house; and Nicholas had been directed to go on board at an early hour with a polite note penned by Mr. Walkinshaw himself.

She had nearly reached the shore, when, near a turn of the road shaded by thick foliage, she heard a quick footstep, and, directly afterwards, a young officer in a naval uniform appeared. Forgetting her attendant, on the impulse of the moment she sprang forward. It was Harry.

"Dearest Grace! this is a happiness I had not expected!" he exclaimed, taking her hand.

"I may say so too," she answered, looking him sweetly in the face; "but——" and she told him how matters stood, and how she wished him to act.

"I will make my appearance with the rest, and act discreetly," he said. "I should like, though, to get that fellow on board the Hebe for a cruise; it would take him out of your way, if it did not cure him of his love."

"Does absence usually produce that result?" asked Grace, naïvely.

"Far from it; where the love is real it rather intensifies it," answered Harry. "But, dearest, I cannot bear to think of the annoyance he causes you." A good deal more was said to the same effect, when Grace wisely suggested that Harry should go back to his boat, while she and Diana returned to the house by a different road, which Mr. Nicholas was not likely to take. Harry begged to accompany her most of the way, and, fortunately, she got home without meeting any one.

Captain Roden and several of his officers came up to luncheon, and were formally introduced by Grace to her uncle and aunt; but Mrs. Walkinshaw, though on the watch, did not perceive anything in the manner of Harry, who was among them, to arouse her suspicions. Both he and Grace were so wonderfully discreet that even the captain was surprised at the apparent indifference of his young friends.

The officers were invited to dinner, and a picnic was proposed for the next day. Captain Roden consented, provided the spot fixed on was not far from the shore. "We came in here to wood and water, and to give the ship a few repairs; but should an enemy appear off the coast, as is not improbable, we shall immediately sail in chase," he observed.

The picnic took place at a beautiful spot where the river Douce comes rushing down the mountain-side, amidst the richest tropical vegetation. The families of a number of the neighbouring planters joined it. Among them were several pretty girls, to all of whom in turn Lieutenant Raper paid due attention, though he managed occasionally to be by Miss Eden's side. The officers had brought their telescopes, and one was constantly pointed either towards the mast-heads of the frigate, or was sweeping the distant horizon seen from their elevated position. At length, however, one of the midshipmen hurried down from a rock where he had been posted.

"A sail in the offing, and the frigate is signalling, sir," reported the midy.

Harry summoned his brother officers. The signal was for their recall; not a moment was to be lost. The party dispersed, some being invited to St. Antoine on their way.

Harry sprang into a carriage, in which Grace was seated, with another young lady and a retired navy surgeon practising in the island, a bachelor, and a professed admirer of the latter.

Mr. Nicholas offered him a seat in another conveyance. "Thank you," he answered, laughing; "but unless these ladies wish to turn me out, I will remain."

Both protested that they had no such wish, and the carriage drove on.

Three days after the Hebe had taken her sudden departure, as at early morning Grace with her sable attendant had gone down to the shore, she saw a sail which shone with snowy brightness in the rays of the rising sun appearing above the horizon. Taller and taller it grew, till she felt convinced that it was the frigate coming back. Some time must elapse, however, before she could anchor in the bay. Grace was compelled to go back to breakfast, though she longed to wait till she could be certain of what she hoped was the case. Some time elapsed, during which Grace could with difficulty restrain her anxiety, when a party of seamen appeared carrying in a sail stretched on two spars a wounded man, and accompanied by a surgeon's mate, who delivered a note to Mr. Walkinshaw Grace had seen the party from her window, and mustering all her nerve she hastened down to meet it. Could it be Harry? and if so, would she have the consolation of nursing him? Surely her uncle would not refuse to receive a wounded officer; yet she scarcely dared approach. She heard Mr. Walkinshaw read the note to his wife. It was from the captain. The Hebe had had a sharp engagement with a French frigate, which had unfortunately blown up just as she had struck. The ship was crowded with the prisoners saved, and as the surgeon considered it important that the lieutenant, who was severely wounded, should be landed as soon as possible, and as he had great confidence in the skill of his old friend Dr. Lance, whom he met the other day, he had ventured to send Mr. Raper on shore, trusting that Mr. Walkinshaw would receive him till he could be removed to the doctor's house. Mr. Walkinshaw's credit for hospitality was at stake. Refuse he could not, whatever he might have wished to do; and Grace heard her aunt order a room to be got ready, into which the wounded officer was carried, while a messenger was sent off for Dr. Lance.

Poor Grace had had but a glimpse of Harry's pale face, but he had seen her. The young surgeon had received a hint from the captain, and observing that he could not make the black people understand what he wanted done, requested her assistance, and begged her to superintend Dick Marline, an old follower of the lieutenant's, who was to be left on shore to look after him. "If in a few days, when the risk of fever has passed, you could read to him and try to amuse him, you will greatly contribute to his recovery," he added.

Grace promised to obey his instructions, and on the strength of the request she had received, ventured to approach Harry's couch, and to whisper a few loving words in his ear. The surgeon's mate waited the arrival of Dr. Lance, and after a brief conversation returned to the ship with the men.

Dr. Lance insisted on appointing Miss Eden as head nurse. "Unless you, my dear madam, wish to take the office," he added, addressing Mrs. Walkinshaw. "As an act of mercy and charity, I hope the young lady will not refuse to see that my directions are carried out. Honest Dick is not quite fitted for the work, and we cannot, you know, trust the negroes."

Mrs. Walkinshaw hesitated, but at last consented that her niece, if willing, with Diana to assist her, should take the responsibility of seeing that the doctor's directions were carried out.

Dr. Lance looked in two or three times each day, and highly approved of what Miss Eden had done. At the end of a week he requested her, if she could find time, to read occasionally to his patient. "He will be the better, too, for a little lively conversation," he observed; "it is important to keep up the spirits of a wounded man."

In a short time Harry, with the aid of Dick, was able to leave his room and to sit in the verandah, enjoying the fresh air. No one could have been more attentive than was Grace to their guest; and her aunt confessed that had it not been for her she should have felt the responsibility of entertaining him very troublesome.

The gentlemen were absent during most of the day, attending to their plantations. When they came home they were anxious and out of spirits. Alarming reports of a threatened outbreak of the coloured population were more than ever current. French emissaries were known to be in the island engaged in exciting the people to rebel.

Harry was now able to walk a short distance from the house, and though Dick and Diana followed, he found Grace's arm quite sufficient for his support. Dr. Lance had not proposed removing him to his house. Harry and Grace had one day extended their ramble further than usual, when they saw the old negro butler, Jacques, who had formerly been a sailor, and had become a great chum of Dick's, hurrying towards them.

"Oh, Missie Grace! oh, Massa Lieutenant, dreadful ting happen!" he exclaimed, when he found breath to speak. "De brown and nigger rascals rise up all ober de island. Dey burn de houses and kill de planters eberywhere. Dey in great numbers between dis and George Town, and many march here from other side."

"Oh! what are we to do?" exclaimed Grace, trembling.

"We will consider how you and your relatives can best be protected," answered Harry.

He soon came to the conclusion that there was no prospect of defending the house. Escape by land was cut off. The sea-shore was open to them. Jacques said there was a fine boat with sails and oars in a boat-house not far off belonging to his master.

"Then you and Dick and I will go and get her ready," said Harry. "And, Diana, do you hasten to the house and beg your mistress, with the gentlemen, to come down and to bring as many provisions as they can carry with them. Grace, dearest, we will not be separated, and Diana will bring what you may require."

The lieutenant, with the two men, made their way to the boat-shed, and soon got the boat afloat.

"Here dey come!" shouted Jacques, who had gone some distance up from the shore to look out.

"Oh, Harry! the rebels?" cried Grace.

"No, our friends, I trust," answered Harry; and Mrs. Walkinshaw and Diana, with their arms full of bundles, were seen hurrying down the sloping shore, followed by Mr. Walkinshaw and a dozen negroes and negresses, carrying provisions and other things.

"Provisions are of most consequence," said Harry, turning out some of the articles which had been snatched up in a hurry by the frightened slaves. "And these poor people, we cannot carry them all."

"They must look out for themselves, and hide away; the rebels won't hurt them," said Mr. Walkinshaw. "But where is Nicholas?—he was following us, I thought. Run, some of you, and hurry him on; he never will put himself out of his way to move fast."

Several of the negroes, at their master's bidding, scampered off. Harry, in the meantime, got Mr. and Mrs. Walkinshaw, with Diana and another black girl, and two men who could row, on board. Scarcely was this done when a negro appeared among the trees, shouting, "Dey come—dey come!" and again as quickly was hidden from sight. At the same moment fierce, loud cries were heard, and a cloud of smoke was seen rising from where the house stood.

"The place has been fired! Oh, my son—my poor Nicholas!" exclaimed Mr. Walkingshaw, wringing his hands.

His wife and Grace tried to console him, observing that Nicholas might have escaped, and hidden himself rather than embark.

"Shove off," said Harry; "we must not risk your lives by delaying longer. The rebels will fire at the boat if they see us."

As there was a light breeze off the land, the sails were hoisted, and the boat glided down the bay. She had not, however, got far when a number of people appeared on the shore, shouting and gesticulating. They soon ran off, and then others came, the barrels of their muskets gleaming in the sun, and began firing away. The bullets flew thickly round the boat. Harry placed himself before Grace, and Mrs. Walkinshaw threw herself into the bottom of the boat, her example being followed by her black maidens. Several shots passed through the sails, and three or four struck the boat's stern, or glanced along her sides. One, which might have pierced Grace's fair neck, tore Harry's arm; but he did not even wince, and she was not aware that he was struck. Gradually the bullets fell wider, or dropped astern of the boat, and she was at length beyond their reach. When well out of the bay Harry steered for George Town Harbour. The weather, however, looked unsettled; a dead calm came on. It might be a long time before they could reach their destination. Not till all danger was passed did Harry quietly ask Grace to help him take off his jacket and tie a handkerchief round his arm.

"A sail on the lee bow!" cried Dick. The boat was kept away for her. "She is the Hebe!" he exclaimed joyfully; "I know the cut of her tau'-sels."

He was right, and in an hour the party were on board. The frigate was returning to George Town Harbour.

"I want you, my dear sir," said Captain Roden to Mr. Walkinshaw, "to fall in with my views about a certain matter. You see my third lieutenant requires a spell on shore to help him regain his strength, and as he is not likely soon to have so much spare time again on his hands, I really don't think he can spend it to greater advantage than by splicing a wife, as we sailors say. He is a most promising young officer—certain of promotion, and with excellent prospects. He and your fair niece are over head and ears in love with each other, and so I hope you and your excellent lady will not refuse to make two young people happy. He will want some one to look after him on shore, and I don't think she will decline the post. Come, say yes, my friends, and put them out of their misery."

"I can't refuse you, captain," answered Mr. Walkinshaw. "But, oh! Nicholas, what will he say, and the estates not united?"

As Nicholas never turned up, his opinion on the subject was not asked, and the wedding took place, in true nautical style. Harry, in due course, became an admiral, and he and his pretty Grace—pretty even when an old lady—were as happy a couple as mortals can hope to be, and beloved and honoured by a large number of descendants and by all who knew them.

RUDOLF'S CASKET.

A STORY OF CHRISTMAS IN THE ALPS. BY F. M. OWEN, AUTHOR OF "SOLDIER AND PATRIOT."

I.

AFTER days of rain and darkness the sun had come out again in full glory; the great sheets of misty cloud were folding themselves up and rolling away from the mountains, allowing the snowy tops to be seen, all shining with that living light with which pure snow glows in the sunshine.

The valley, which lay like a green bay amongst the mountains, looked refreshed and purified; the stream which ran through it rushed on, swollen with many waters, no longer babbling over its stones, but with a deep roar which told of its newly-gotten strength.

Even the ferns and the flowers held up their heads and smiled gratefully at the sun; the grasshoppers sang their loudest; while the bright butterflies—yellow and blue and silver—darted about, and looked as if some of the flowers had taken to themselves wings and were out for a holiday.

This was a summer morning in Switzerland, and the village of Engelberg seemed more than usually full of life. There had been many wet days, and now that the sun had come out at last there was much to see and to be done.

Before the doors of the hotels and lodging-houses stood numbers of horses and mules—picturesque groups of guides with edelweiss in their hats and strong sticks in their hands, were waiting for employment, and tourists in every sort of light summer dress were setting out on their various expeditions.

Close around lay the brown village with the dark abbey rising up out of the midst of it. In the pasture-lands on the sloping green hill-sides the working folk were busy with their grass, "making hay while the sun shone;" and round all stood the great chain of mountains, the giant Titlis raising its snowy head above the others, and seeming to keep guard over the peaceful valley and the brown huts and châlets.

"I want a boy to lead my horse," said a lady who stood on the steps of the hotel, looking sometimes at the shining snow-fields amongst the mountains, and sometimes at the green hill-sides, and the trees, whose boughs were still dripping with moisture.

"Little Rudolf is here," said some one amongst the crowd of guides; "he will do as well as another."

"Where is he?"

And Rudolf came forward — a square, sturdy-looking little lad, with dark brown eyes and a tangle of sun-burnt yellow hair. He looked well-pleased to get some employment, and smiled at the lady as he said that he knew the way to all the beautiful places in the neighbourhood.

In a few minutes he was walking beside the lady's horse through the meadows in the valley, chattering away to her in his patois, stopping sometimes to pick flowers for her, and to point out all the mountains and tell her their names.

"And where do you live, Rudolf?" she asked kindly.

The boy pointed eagerly to a neat little wooden house that stood on the hill-side, not far from them; it was easily to be distinguished by the bright fresh green of the two or three fields about it, from which the hay had lately been gathered in, and a few flowers grew about the door.

"That is my home—mother stays there and the children, but my father is the guide Hans Müller; he is a good guide, lady; he is away now going up a snow mountain with a gentleman from England; it is a very hard mountain, and no guide knows it better than father."

"But he can only be a guide in the summer, what does he do in the winter?" asked the lady.

"He carves wood, he is one of the best carvers, and he takes his things to Lucerne, where the folk come in the summer-time and buy them."

"And do you carve wood in the winter too, Rudolf?"

"A little," said Rudolf, modestly; "I like it."

"I suppose this valley is quite shut in with snow in the winter; you cannot get down to the lake?"

"Sometimes we can get down, it is a good road; but when there is much snow it is very difficult;" and the little guide told the lady many strange stories of winter adventures, of frozen travellers and of spring avalanches, when the snow of the winter became loosened by the first spring sunshine, and fell in masses to the valley below, sometimes burying whole villages in its fall.

Then he darted off from her side, seeing a flower which he thought she would like, and returned with his hands full of the beautiful white convolvulus which had wound itself about a hedge-row they were passing, and in the fresh morning the pure blossoms had all opened their deep white cups to the light.

"They are like cups made of the snow," said the lady as she took some of the flowers; and then she noticed that Rudolf was much engaged with a long spray, which he had kept in his hands and was winding about into different forms.

"I've been looking for this," he said, smiling over it; and taking out of his pocket a small tin box which had once held biscuits, and had been given him by one of the hotel servants, he placed the flower, all wet with dew, inside it. That flower was destined to play an important part in Rudolf's future fortunes.

"I want a boy to lead my horse"—p. 55.

All the snowy mountains were glowing with the rosy sunset when Rudolf got back to his home that evening. His mother was sitting by the door with little Carl in her arms, and two or three other children were playing with two goats that were close to the gate.

"Here is Rudolf," said the mother gladly, and the year-old baby smiled at the sight of his brother; the little ones ran to meet him, and a figure came stealing out of the open door at the sound of his voice. It was a boy who was something like Rudolf in appearance, only thin and ungainly looking; he had the same tawny hair, but it was long and straight; his eyes, instead of being bright and full of life like his brother's, were dull and heavy; his lower lip hung down, and he held his finger in his mouth. He laughed with a short screech of pleasure when he saw Rudolf, and came shambling down from the house to meet him.

Rudolf had a merry greeting for all, but it was for the poor idiot boy Franz that he kept his kindest words, and a handful of berries which he had picked in his rambles. Franz chuckled with delight, and sat down on the ground to eat them, driving away the other children with one hand while he crammed the berries into his mouth as fast as possible with the other. When they were all gone, he came up to Rudolf and held up his hands for more looking into his face with a pleading, wistful earnestness as if he had been a dog.

"All gone, Franz—all gone, good boy," said Rudolf, very tenderly, and he put his arm lovingly round the idiot boy's neck.

"More, more," said Franz.

"No, I've got no more, Franz has had all," said Rudolf; "but here are some flowers," and he held out to him some of the bright crimson Alpine roses.

Again came the screech of pleasure, and Franz began twisting the flowers with some ferns into a fantastical wreath, which he first put on the head of the gravest looking of the goats, and then snatching it off, he placed it on his own head and danced about with his crown.

"When is father to be back?" asked Rudolf, as he stood with a large tin can in his hand, waiting to go down to the spring to fetch some water for his mother.

"To-morrow night, I hope," answered the mother. And then Rudolf went off whistling and swinging his can. It was refreshing after the long hot day to stand in the field, where the clear spring water came running through a little trough, with a cool, gurgling sound, and falling into a small pool below, which was surrounded with ferns perpetually kept fresh by the dripping water.

Rudolf bent his face down and made a cup of his two hands, and took a long drink; then he took out his tin box and peeped into it. All the white blossoms had closed themselves up. He sprinkled a few drops of the cool water in the box and said to himself, "It will come out in the morning, and it will be the very thing. Ah! how beautiful I will make it! how surprised they will all be. They will say, 'We did not think Rudolf could carve so well;' and I will take it down to Lucerne and sell it, and I will buy a cow for mother, and new boots for father, and a fine drum and a flag for Franz; but mother will be wanting the water," and he went gaily back through the field, singing as he went. All the world seemed glowing to his eyes, in that same rosy glow which had been on Titlis at sunset-time, and the boy did not know how soon the dark night shadows were to creep up and make his life hard and sad and stern.

II.

Morning came again, and as soon as the first rays of the sun had found their way over the mountains which shadowed the quiet village, Rudolf was up at work. He had placed his white convolvulus in water, and soon the petals began to unfold, and each pure white blossom to spread itself out to the light.

Then Rudolf got out his carving tools, and unfolding a bit of old cloth which his mother had given him, he looked at some pieces of carving which he had already done, and kept hidden there. They were the sides of a box, and the boy had been at work on them a long time.

He had a wonderful talent for the carving; but his father did it so well that he was ashamed to show his own handiwork, and therefore his performances were hidden away, and only shown in private to old Gottfried, who lived in the village, and did beautiful carving for the churches. Rudolf felt as if it was easier to show him his attempts, and to hear their faults from him, than for his father and mother and all his brothers and sisters to see them.

Old Gottfried was very famous for his work, and many a long hour had Rudolf spent in his workshop, watching his clever fingers at their task, and many a scramble had he taken to get oak leaves, acorns, ivy, and ferns, and briony wreaths, which the old man reproduced in wood.

And now he and Rudolf had a secret between them. Rudolf had carved several of the rougher and easier objects, and Gottfried thought he might go on to something more ambitious. Accordingly a box was commenced under Gottfried's instructions; it was carved in white wood; the sides had each a group of bramble leaves and berries upon them, mixed with a spray of the small pink convolvulus, and Rudolf had been on the look-out for this spray of the large white convolvulus for the top. He twisted it round and round his fingers into the most graceful grouping he could manage, and then began sketching it as fast as he could. He could draw but roughly, but he had an eye for seeing what was beautiful, and he was very happy over the graceful leaves and white blossoms, when he heard his mother calling to him. The cow had to be driven up from the pasture, and to be milked, and it must be done at once. Rudolf was vexed; but he threw down his tools and went directly.

The cow was more than usually difficult to drive, and it was quite half an hour before Rudolf got back to the house.

At the entrance stood Franz, his finger in his mouth and a smile on his face. Rudolf smiled back.

"Good old Franz! Franz shall have more berries when Rudolf comes back to-day."

Then Franz shook his head and laughed outright, while he pointed with his finger. But Rudolf was in a hurry to get to work again, and ran back to the place where he had left his tools. He looked on the work-bench; his carving was there, but the flower was gone! The idiot boy had followed him into the room, and stood watching him curiously, but still laughing.

"Where is my beautiful white flower gone?" cried Rudolf, in dismay. "Franz, have you seen it?"

Franz grinned, and pointed to his head, and then to the open door, where, solemnly coming round the corner of the house, Rudolf saw the grave old goat with the white convolvulus wreathed round his horns.

For one minute the boy's face flushed with anger, and he raised his hand to strike Franz; then it fell again to his side, he was too manly to hurt anything so helpless; but tears of vexation came into his eyes as he said, "Oh, Franz! my carving is spoilt now; you naughty, mischievous Franz!"

The idiot boy saw that something was wrong; he said a word or two incoherently and then darted out of the room, returning presently with the withered crown of Alpine roses and fern, and placing it on Rudolf's head.

"No—no, Franz; it was white flowers I wanted."

Franz shook his head and shivered, pointing out at the open door to Titlis with its snowy crown, as much as to say he did not care for Rudolf's white flowers, they were cold like the snow.

Then the mother called the boys to give them their breakfasts, and Rudolf put away his carving tools and the unfinished sketch with a sad heart.

He spent that day as he had spent the day before, in leading the lady's horse. The lady went down the mountain road to Stanz, and Rudolf brought back the horse in the evening to Engelberg. He was tired, and it was getting late as he reached the first spot from which he could obtain a view of the village. He saw the lights of the houses twinkling out here and there. It was a wet evening; the rain was beating in his face, and the wind whistled round him, as he entered the valley.

"Father will have got home before me," he said to himself. As he reached the outskirts of the village, in the late twilight he saw two figures coming towards him. One he recognised as Nicholas Bauermann, the owner of their cottage, and the other as the doctor of the neighbourhood.

"I shall not see much more of my money for that place for some time to come," said Nicholas as he came near; "and though of course one is sorry for the man, and his wife and children, I have got my own interests to think of, and I can't let them stay there."

"It is a sad thing, but of course, neighbour Nicholas, you cannot rob yourself," said the doctor. "Heinrich Pfeffer wants the house, doesn't he?"

"Yes, and although I have nothing to say against Hans—he is a good man—Heinrich would give me my money as well."

Rudolf's heart began to thump, he hardly knew why. As he passed by the two men he saw that they recognised him, and he heard the doctor say, "Isn't that Rudolf? poor little lad, it will be hard for him when he goes home."

Rudolf's heart beat faster as he wondered what it could all mean; was there bad news waiting for him at home? The road seemed longer than ever, the rain fell faster, drenching his clothes; the wind had a dreary sound of sadness and coming sorrow as it howled past him, and he urged on the tired horse.

When he had brought the horse to its stable and was turning his steps towards his home, he met Wilhelm Kustermann, a guide who knew his father well.

"Ah! Rudolf, my lad," he said kindly, "I am very sorry for thee."

"Wilhelm, what is it?—tell me; I heard Nicholas Bauermann talking to Doctor Weiss, and I am frightened. Has anything happened at home?"

"Ay, poor boy, and more than enough," answered the guide, in a quivering voice.

"What—what is it?"

"Your father slipped and fell when he was near the top, and——"

"And is killed!" screamed young Rudolf.

"We do not know yet," said Wilhelm; "we hope not. Jacob Krauz and Heinrich Pfeffer are gone to look for him. They did get somewhere near him; he fell into soft snow and on a ledge. They heard him groan; there is hope. I have not heard yet if they have come back, I was going to see."

"Father—father!" cried the boy, and he sprang from Wilhelm's side, entirely forgetting his tiredness in his excitement and desire to know all. A few minutes brought him home; Jacob and Heinrich were smoking at the door. Franz came shuffling out to meet Rudolf, and for almost the first time in his life Rudolf put him aside without a word, whilst he pressed up to the guides. Franz began to cry at the unusual repulse, but Rudolf could not stay to comfort him. "Have you found him?" he cried eagerly.

"Ay, lad, we've brought him home," they answered sadly.

"Is he alive?"

"Yes, and asks for you."

Rudolf pressed on into the house. There, lying on the low bed in one corner of the room, was his strong, stalwart father, his face set and rigid with pain; his hands, which had done so much good work in helping travellers, lying powerless on the outside covering. The mother knelt by his side, with her face buried in her hands, sobbing aloud, and the little ones were crying below their breath in different corners of the room.

Rudolf knelt down by the bed and took one of the helpless hands. "Father," he whispered.

There was no answer.

"Father, it's I—it's Rudolf." His voice grew more piteous.

Still the eyelids were closed, and the fixed look of the face remained the same. The boy bent his face down and laid his cheek on his father's. "You always spoke to me before, father," he cried; "speak now."

Then the heavy eyes were opened for a moment, a half-smile came over Hans' face, and he said brokenly, "Rudolf, my back is hurt—so that I think I shall die. You'll take care of mother and the children and Franz. You're a good little lad—you'll work for them; poor Franz—can't work." Then, as if the effort had been too much for him, the father closed his eyes, the feeble flush which had risen to his cheek faded away again, and a deadly whiteness came in its place.

"Is he dead? is he dead, mother?" the boy wailed out. "Oh, Jacob! come here; he is dead."

III.

But Hans was not dead, though he lay for many weeks between life and death, and even when immediate death was no longer to be feared, it was found that his back was so much injured that the doctor ordered him not to move from the bed or to lift his arms, so that, as he said himself, he was as useless as a child.

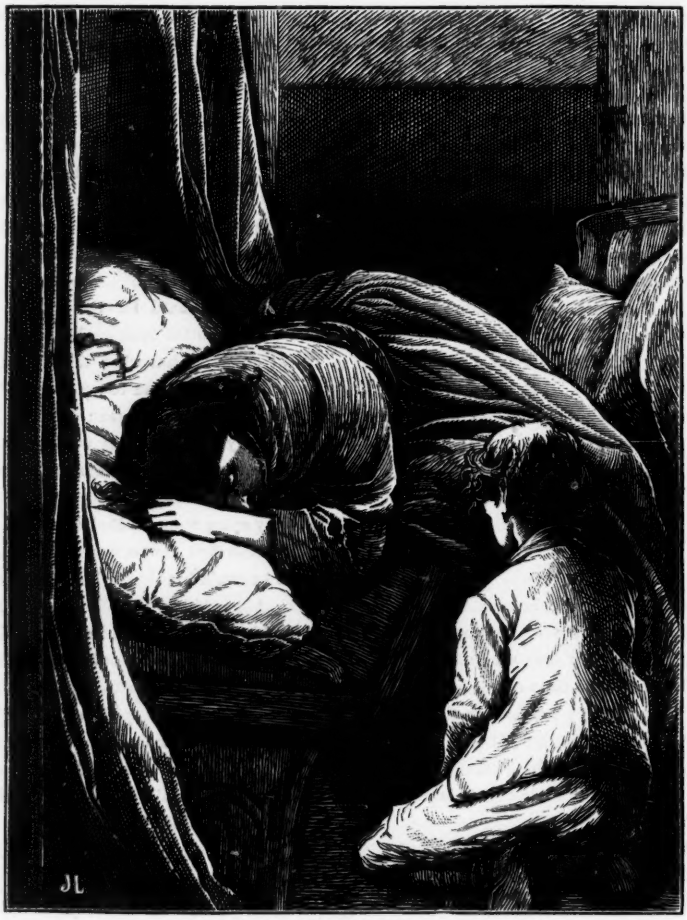
Rudolf worked hard for the support of all the family. Through the summer he got plenty of employment as guide, but when the season of tourists was nearly over he began to get fearful, for the cruel words of Nicholas Bauermann haunted him, and he dreaded every day that they would be told to leave their home, and then what was to be done with the helpless father?

In every spare moment Rudolf worked at his carving. For the first few mornings after his father's accident he could hardly see his work because of the blinding tears which filled his eyes. Franz often stood by his side watching him. The idiot boy took no notice of his father's suffering, but seemed to connect Rudolf's tears with the day when he had seen him cry about the spoilt sketch of the flower; and on the fourth morning after Hans had been brought home, Franz stole to Rudolf's side with a long spray of the white convolvulus, holding it out with one hand while he raised the other to his brother's face, putting his fingers on his eyes and saying, "Franz got snow-flower."

Then Rudolf carried the white flower safely to old Gottfried, and with his help and by the use of his tools he succeeded in carving a beautiful group for the top of his casket.

Gottfried was much pleased with the work, and, as his contribution to the boy's earnings, he made up the casket himself, lining it with blue velvet and fitting it with a lock and key.

"It is beautiful!" he said; "and it is well done for a boy. You go on as you have begun, young Rudolf, and you will yet come to carve the seats for the churches."



That same evening old Gottfried sat by the bedside of his friend Hans, and he said, "You have a good boy and a great help in Rudolf, neighbour Hans."

"Yes—yes, good as boys go. He gives much time to play," said the father, sadly.

"I have not done it," said the old wood-carver, laughing again.

"Why, no one else in these parts could," said Hans.

"Is he dead, mother?"—p. 59.

"Surely not so, neighbour; he seems ever diligent to me."

"Nay—nay," and Hans smiled; "for hours and hours each day he is away amusing himself: he will get steadier in time."

Old Gottfried laughed a merry laugh, and drew from behind his back the casket. "That is good, eh, neighbour?"

"That is very good," said Hans, looking at it; "there is pretty work there, though not as perfect as you often are, neighbour Gottfried."

"It is Rudolf's work—done in all the hours when you thought he was amusing himself," said his teacher, proudly.

And then tears of joy and pride came to the father's eyes. He called Rudolf to him and embraced him; and the mother came, and admired and rejoiced over him; and it was settled that Rudolf should go down the very next day to Lucerne to endeavour to dispose of the casket, and of some small pieces of his father's work which still remained unsold.

So the next day, in the early autumn morning,

Rudolf started, with a blessing from his father and an injunction from old Gottfried not to be induced to part with his work at too low a price.

Rudolf had never been in Lucerne before, and the novelty of the passage in the steamer from Stanstadt pleased him. The sight of the town also—so much larger than any he had ever seen before—impressed him much. The two tall spires of the cathedral, the great hotels by the side of the lake, the quaint covered and painted bridges over the Reuss, the beautiful shops all round him, were very new and strange. The casket, which the boy had been so proud of before, no longer seemed anything wonderful when he compared it with what he saw in Lucerne.

"In the early morning Rudolf started."

He went first to the shop where his father's things had generally been bought, and quickly disposed of them. He then modestly drew out his own work. Gottfried had told him that he was not to take less than fifty francs for it; but the people, seeing it was the work of such a small boy, offered him twenty francs.

He refused this, and named the sum that Gottfried had told him to ask. The shopkeeper refused to give him fifty francs; but at last consented that Rudolf should leave his casket in their hands, promising that if they could sell it for him they would only charge him a fair per-centage. So Rudolf left it with them, and then he went on into the great church to say his prayers.

While he knelt, the organ began to play, and the boy knelt on in wonder and delight. First there was a grand triumphant march played; then a low chant of sorrow; then a hymn of peace, which made Rudolf think that a number of men's and boys' voices were singing, though it was in reality the wonderful vox humana, or human voice-stop, that was being used. Rudolf had never even imagined music so grand and beautiful; it was as though God had "breathed into it the breath of life," and the organ had become a living voice.

When the music stopped the boy came out of the church, strengthened and comforted. He was sure God would hear his prayers, and help those whom he loved so well, and he went up into the cloisters, where the dead folk were buried, and looked through the narrow windows on to the lake, with the grand mountains all round it, and his heart was peaceful and calm.

He got back to his home the next day, and though he was grieved not to take with him the money for his casket, he set to work steadily to improve in his carving. He had some employment in carrying wood for one of his neighbours, and he began to hope that they might get through the winter, though every now and then the hard words of the landlord would come back to him, and he feared that he might yet make them come true.

Three months of autumn weather went by; half a year's rent was due, and Frau Müller had not enough money to make it up, and was wondering where the rest was to come from, when one day Nicholas Bauermann appeared at the cottage, demanding payment.

"Have patience with us, friend, and we will pay thee," said Rudolf's mother; "my husband is so helpless—my children are so small: I pray thee wait, and I will pay thee soon."

"Sell the cow," said Nicholas, shortly; "indeed, I will myself take it off thy hands."

"It is sold already," said the mother, "to buy what Hans has needed."

"Then you must all go. I must have tenants who can pay—the times are hard."

Then the poor woman wept. But the hard man was not to be moved, and went away, saying that if the full rent was not paid by Christmas Day, they must move.

The weather began to be severe. There had been several snow-storms. The mountains were now all snowy peaks, and stood like shrouded forms round the valley, which looked bleak and cold enough without its summer dress. The streams were all frozen, and the snow was beginning to lie on the ground.

Rudolf came to his mother. "I must go to Lucerne, mother, and see if the box is sold; it is our only chance."

"But the boat, my son—does it go?"

"Yes; there is one going from and returning to Stanstadt in two or three days. After this week Wilhelm says I may not be able to go."

"But it is dangerous weather, my boy, for one so young as thou art; and—and I could not lose you;" and the mother hid her face.

"The good God will take care of me," said the boy, bravely. "It is right."

And then his mother said he should go.

It was about a week before Christmas Day, and a sledge was going down from Engelberg to Stanz, in which Wilhelm Kustermann promised to take Rudolf to the edge of the lake, provided that he could find his own way home again. The weather, though cold, was not very severe, and looked settled, so that it did not seem a dangerous enterprise, and Rudolf set out with high hope and a courageous heart.

IV.

"The box is sold, boy, and here is thy earning," said the woman of the shop in answer to Rudolf's eager question.

Rudolf's hand closed over the money with great gladness of heart.

"You must do us more, boy; the box is new and much admired. If thou canst make four more we will pay thee well, and we will not have thee take thy goods to any other shop."

Rudolf was delighted. This was indeed good news to take home; he wished he had wings that he might fly. One joy he did promise himself. He could not get the cow for his mother; his poor father no longer needed the boots; but Franz should have his drum and flag, and he would get some bon-bons for the little ones. He could afford to spend a franc or two, and still have enough to take home to make up the deficiency of the rent.

He slept that night with some friends of his father's at Lucerne, and the next day, as the steamer was going, he crossed to Stanstadt, slept another night there, and commenced his long walk home the next morning. A lift in a sledge helped him from Stanz to Wolfenschiessen; but he then had to get on to Grafenort, and from thence up the steep mountain-road to Engelberg.

He trudged on merrily. The drum he slung round his neck; he held the flag over his shoulder, put the bon-bons in his little bundle, and the money safely in his pocket. It was still morning; by evening-time he would be at home to tell the good news and make them all glad for Christmas Day.

"But what is that?" he said to himself, in the midst of his happy thoughts, when a flake of snow fell upon his nose. Then he looked up, and saw that the weather had changed; the sky was full of heavy clouds, and snow-flakes were falling thickly and fast. He quickened his steps, but the snow fell faster and faster. The ground was hard with frost, and was soon white with snow. Walking became harder work each minute, for the snow-storm was so heavy that it soon began to lie thickly.

As the evening drew in Rudolf found that he was still some miles from home. He had left the woods, where he was partly sheltered by the trees from the snow, and had again got into the mountain-road, where he feared to make false steps.

The river in the valley below made an angry, sullen roar. Through the blinding snow the great mountains loomed out, all shrouded in white, and looking much larger than they did when they were bare and grey.

"I shall never get home," thought the boy, despairingly. "I have been out in storms, but never in one so bad as this. What shall I do? They will not get their money in time—what shall I do?"

He sat down for one moment by the road-side; his hands were numbed, his feet felt almost senseless. "If I sit here," he thought, "I shall die. I must make a push for it for mother's sake;" and he gathered all his courage together and got on a few yards further. Ah! how cold it was. A bitter wind had risen, and the boy shivered, although he was not altogether unused to cold weather.

On still; though the night grew dark, and only the moon amongst the snowy clouds showed him the path now. Could he reach home?—could he even reach any place of shelter? He knew of none; he must still be about two miles from home, and his strength was nearly gone.

On still, for his mother's sake, and the poor helpless father, who would be turned out of his home if the money were not forthcoming on Christmas Day. Were they thinking of him at home, and wondering why he was not with them on the Christmas Eve? He was sure they were; and he had meant to make them so glad with his good news.

Poor numbed feet! poor tired limbs! They must carry him a little further. Far off he heard the bell of the abbey chiming, and it seemed like a voice from home. Courage, Rudolf! There is the first light of the valley gleaming out! But as he saw it his feet failed him. All his courage seemed gone; he only wanted to rest. He sank down by the roadside in the snow; he planted the little bright flag beside him. It was pleasant to rest there; the wind did not seem cold now. He would like to have seen his mother, but even that did not matter; he was going to sleep. Far off he seemed to hear the organ at Lucerne playing the hymn of peace, and the voices of the men and boys chanting through the storm. They were singing of the angels, of Christmas, of the Christ-child. Well, he had tried to do the best he could; the money was there. God knew how hard he had tried to get home; He would be merciful to him. Ah! there was the sweet organ again; it was the grand triumphant march now; it was the Christmas "Gloria." A moment more, and brave Rudolf had sunk into the fatal snow-sleep from which so few travellers ever awake.

* * * * *

But he had not slept many minutes when through the snow and the storm a figure came shuffling on, seeming half-unconcerned and half-anxious to find something in the snow.

"Franz's drum! Franz's drum—drum—drum," said a voice; "here's a drum!" and Franz, the idiot boy, who had slipped away from his home unperceived, and had wandered out into the storm with some dim idea of finding his brother, flung himself down beside the little heap where the snow-flakes were already covering Rudolf's face.

"'Dolf! 'Dolf!" he cried, and bent his mouth down to his brother's cold cheek, "where's drumsticks?"

Rudolf heard the voice, and Franz's warm breath seemed to revive him. "Franz, Franz," he whispered, and he tried to put his arm round his brother's neck, "how did you come?"

The snow was not so heavy now, and the moon shone down on the two boys and the bright drum and flag; but Franz bounded away again almost directly, having snatched up the drum in his hands. Back he sped to his home in great haste, for it was not so far off as tired Rudolf had imagined. Jacob Kraus was sitting by the bedside of the father, trying to give what comfort he could about the missing boy.

The idiot boy came up to him and mumbled something about "'Dolf and drumsticks," which was hardly intelligible; but the sight of the many-coloured drum, which Franz had brought in from the snow, made Jacob hope that Rudolf could not be far

And his father's voice from the bed answered, "It is not too late, brave boy. This is the Christmas morning. Well done, Rudolf! you have saved us."

* * * * *

And so the rent was paid, and neighbour Bauer-

"Rudolf had sunk into the fatal snow-sleep"—p. 63.

off, and he told Franz to take him where he got the drum. The gay little flag, which they could see in the moonlight, marked the place where Rudolf lay buried in the snow. The strong guide lifted the boy in his arms, and bore him tenderly home; and when Rudolf woke from his long sleep, it was to find himself in his mother's arms, and to see Franz playing with his drum and flag.

"I have got the money. Oh, mother! it isn't too late!—say it isn't too late!" he whispered.

mann was so much touched by the story of Rudolf's enterprise that he dealt kindly and leniently with the family until Hans was well enough to earn money again.

And for Rudolf? He went on steadily in the right path, and by industry and honesty made his way, until he is now known as one of the most celebrated wood-carvers in the Oberland; and he tells to his little children the story of the casket and the Christmas Eve when he slept in the snow.